Netherlands Is Tax Shelter Hot-Spot For Royalty Earnings. The New York Times (2/4, Browning) reports, "Last spring, Keith Richards, the craggy-faced and hard-partying lead guitarist for the Rolling Stones, fell from a tree at a beach resort in Fiji, slamming his head against the trunk on his way down. Mr. Richards was flown to New Zealand, where a surgeon provided emergency care to treat swelling in his brain. While the accident forced the Rolling Stones to cancel part of their summer tour, Mr. Richards, 62, handily survived his plunge. … What two of the other three Rolling Stones apparently learned, including Mick Jagger and Charlie Watts, was that Mr. Richards's near-death experience meant that it was time to think about their heirs. For that, the aging rockers turned to a reclusive Dutch accountant, Johannes Favie, whose company, Promogroup, has helped them minimize their tax bills for more than 30 years. (The fourth Rolling Stone, Ron Wood, handles his finances apart from Promogroup.)" The Times adds, "And so, last August, according to details disclosed in documents maintained by the Handelsregister, the trade registry of the Netherlands, Promogroup helped the three performers set up a pair of private Dutch foundations that will allow them to transfer assets tax-free to heirs when they die. Other Dutch shelters that Promogroup has arranged for the three have already paid off handsomely; over the last 20 years, according to Dutch documents, the three musicians have paid just $7.2 million in taxes on earnings of $450 million that they have channeled through Amsterdam — a tax rate of about 1.5 percent, well below the British rate of 40 percent. … The Rolling Stones are not the only celebrities sheltering income in the land of tulips, windmills and Rembrandt. The rock powerhouse U2 has transferred lucrative assets to Amsterdam, as have other pop singers and well-known athletes, all of whom have used or continue to take advantage of the Netherlands' tax shelters, according to a Dutch tax lawyer who requested anonymity because of client confidentiality agreements." The Times notes, "When it comes to attracting celebrity wealth seeking shelter from taxes, the Cayman Islands and other classic Caribbean tax havens are receding in favor like so many waves on the beach, according to tax experts here and overseas. While old-school, offshore tax havens — the warm ones with tropical fish, off-the-shelf holding companies sporting post-office-box addresses, and scant regulation or transparency — still attract money, they are largely patronized, tax lawyers and entertainment bankers say, by hedge funds and private equity firms looking to protect lush trading profits from taxes. … But for earnings derived from intellectual property such as royalties, the Netherlands has become a tax shelter of choice. With celebrities lending their names and images to clothing lines, licensing their hit songs to corporate sponsors, seeking roles in Hollywood and engaging in other ventures that generate significant taxable income, the Dutch system, which does not tax royalties, offers a nifty shelter."

DOJ_NMG_0127278

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Proposing 11% Pentagon Spending Jump, Medicaid And Medicare Cuts. The AP (2/3) reports the Pentagon "is the big winner in President Bush's proposed budget for next year, while domestic items such as aid to schools and grants to local governments will get slight increases. Medicare and Medicaid, the health program for the poor and disabled, would shoulder modest but politically difficult cost curbs in the budget the White House is submitting to Congress on Monday. Some $18 billion in budget savings would come from farm programs over five years. … Domestic agencies would not face an outright cut, as proposed last year, but would see increases averaging 1 percent, White House Budget director Rob Portman said. That is less than anticipated inflation, but higher costs for veterans' health care probably would result in a larger than average increase." The Pentagon "would get an 11 percent increase, to $481.4 billion in its core budget. And that is before accounting for an additional $235 billion in war costs over the next year and a half." The AP notes Bush's plan "will get a skeptical reception from the Democratic-controlled Congress. Democrats say it meets the president's promise to balance the budget by 2012 by omitting war costs and expensive changes to the alternative minimum tax and assuming politically untenable cuts in payments to doctors under Medicare."

Medicare Beneficiaries Face Higher Premiums. The New York Times (2/4, A23, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "More and more Medicare beneficiaries would have to pay higher premiums for coverage of prescription drugs and doctors' services under President Bush's 2008 budget, to be unveiled on Monday. Single people with annual incomes over $80,000 and married couples with incomes over $160,000 already have to pay higher premiums for the part of Medicare that covers doctors' services. … Budget documents show that Mr. Bush will propose a similar surcharge on premiums for Medicare's new prescription drug benefit. In addition, the president will ask Congress to 'eliminate annual indexing of income thresholds,' so that more people would eventually have to pay the higher premiums."

Senators Seek To Close $300 Billion Tax Gap. The Los Angeles Times (2/4, Havemann, 850K) reports, "Washington has suddenly discovered a new buzzword — the 'tax gap' — and the roughly $300-billion pot of untouched gold that it promises. That's how much the Internal Revenue Service says taxpayers owe the government annually but, for various reasons, never pay. … Democrats and Republicans alike are talking it up as a way to fund politically appealing initiatives — and bring down the deficit to boot. 'Closing the tax gap has got to be one of our top priorities,' said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.). The IRS is probably low-balling its estimate of the tax gap, he said, and there should be more than $300 billion available. To boost efforts to harvest it, the chairman and the top Republican member of the Senate's tax-writing finance committee, Sens. Max Baucus of Montana and Chuck Grassley of Iowa, took the unusual step last week of visiting the IRS and asking some of its top bureaucrats about the tax gap — and presumably ways it might be closed."

Bush Tax Cuts Said To Have Exacerbated Income Inequality. The Washington Post (2/4, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes that President Bush "went to Manhattan and acknowledged for the first time the reality of income inequality. … This week Mr. Bush will insist in his proposed budget that all of his tax cuts be extended. Those have proved enormously more beneficial to the super-rich than to anyone else. Given the reality that Mr. Bush has at last taken note of, such a policy just makes no sense."

Waxman Hearings Will Probe Administration's Reliance On Contractors. The New York Times (2/4, A1, Shane, Nixon, 1.16M) reports, "Without a public debate or formal policy decision, contractors have become a virtual fourth branch of government. On the rise for decades, spending on federal contracts has soared during the Bush administration, to about $400 billion last year from $207 billion in 2000, fueled by the war in Iraq, domestic security and Hurricane Katrina, but also by a philosophy that encourages outsourcing almost everything government does. … The contracting explosion raises questions about propriety, cost and accountability that have long troubled watchdog groups and are coming under scrutiny from the Democratic majority in Congress." The Times notes that the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, whose new Democratic chairman, Rep. Henry Waxman, "added the word 'oversight' to signal his intentions, begins a series of investigative hearings on Tuesday focusing on contracts in Iraq and at the Department of Homeland Security. 'Billions of dollars are being squandered, and the taxpayer is being taken to the cleaners,' said Mr. Waxman, who got an 'F' rating last year from the Contract Services Association, an industry coalition. The chairman he succeeded, Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, earned an 'A.'" Tester Becomes First Senator To Post His Daily Schedule. The Washington Post (2/4, A6, Layton, 690K) reports Sen. Jon Tester stands out from the other 99 members of the Senate" in that he "posts his daily schedule on his Web site for all the world to see. In a culture where lawmakers spend hours in closed-door meetings, and their activities out of the public eye are considered proprietary, Tester is a trailblazer bent on opening up the inner workings of his office. His radical practice comes after irate voters in November tossed out longtime incumbents implicated in lobbying scandals and as public interest groups clamor for more transparency in the way Congress does business. … Every session with lobbyists, constituents and other lawmakers is conscientiously recorded, including names, affiliations and the duration of the meeting. 'I just wanted to give people an opportunity to see who I meet with,' said Tester. … 'I believe in transparent government and this is my effort.'" The Post notes Rep. Kirsten Gillibrand "is doing something similar. Although she gives less detail than Tester, Gillibrand lists her work-related meetings each day on her Web site."

DOJ_NMG_0127279

WPost Decries Attempts To Stop Disclosure Of Lobbyists' Contributions. The Washington Post (2/4, B6, 690K), in an editorial, notes that "disturbing, though not particularly surprising, rumblings are emanating from the House of Representatives to the effect that some Democrats are balking at requiring lobbyists to disclose the campaign contributions they arrange or collect for lawmakers. … The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported last week that some Democratic House members, egged on by K Street lobbyists, are agitating to have the provision removed. That can't be allowed to happen."

Cardin Assumes More Active Role As Senator. The Washington Times (2/4, Miller, 88K) reports Sen. Benjamin Cardin "has distinguished himself…with bold words and an aggressive style. In his first speech on the Senate floor, delivered a week after taking office, Mr. Cardin denounced President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq and called for the withdrawal of U.S. forces." Cardin "also spoke passionately about global warming as a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee. 'The impact of global warming is real and right before our eyes,' he said. 'It's a crisis that affects every human being on this Earth, and we must take action now.'" Cardin's "quick transition from 20-year House veteran to up-and-coming freshman senator has not gone unnoticed by his colleagues."

Experts, Officials Protest Planned Closure Of Armed Forces Institute Of Pathology. The Washington Post (2/4, A10, Lee, 690K) reports, "Medical specialists and former military officials are protesting the planned dismantling of a Defense Department health agency whose origin dates to the Civil War, saying the move would eliminate an invaluable tool in the diagnosis and understanding of disease. The Armed Forces Institute of Pathology is scheduled to be broken up as part of the federal base-closing process that will shutter Walter Reed Army Medical Center by 2011."

Bush Health Care Proposal Seen As Step Toward Systemic Reform. The Washington Post's David Broder (2/4, B7) writes, ""A major barrier to" healthcare reform "is the feature of the federal tax code that subsidizes job-based health insurance by making its cost deductible to the business and tax-free to the employee. As C. Eugene Steuerle of the Urban Institute testified to Congress last week, this represents a $200 billion-a-year subsidy, with most of the benefits going to the well-to-do -- a sum that could be much better spent on helping the uninsured. President Bush has proposed a partial remedy for that problem, substituting a flat deduction for the value of every health insurance policy costing the employer and worker up to $7,500 a person. … Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the ranking Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, joined many Democrats in saying that Bush's proposal can be improved by using tax credits, rather than deductions, to distribute the benefits."

NYTimes Urges Congress To Update Public Campaign Financing. The New York Times (2/4, WK15, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes, "Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and John McCain have already signaled their intentions to make a shameful and lucrative retreat to private fund-raising. The Clinton camp is creating a new honored donor category for those who bag at least a million dollars each. … All of this is because past Congresses failed to update the public financing option to keep pace with the costs of running a modern campaign." The Times concludes, "The new Congress pledged to clean up big-money corruption; it can make a good start by rescuing the good that came of Watergate."

LATimes Calls New Farm Bill A "Modest Fix." The Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) editorializes, "The Bush administration last week unveiled its proposal for the 2007 farm bill, a blueprint spelling out U.S. agricultural subsidies and food stamp payments for the next five years. For anybody interested in fairness, government waste, free trade or economic growth, it was a deeply disappointing document, even if it is a major improvement over the trade-distorting porkapalooza that was the 2002 farm bill. The trouble is, even this modest fix is being heavily resisted by the farm lobby and its backers in Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0127280

OTHER NEWS:

Giuliani Says "There's A Real Good Chance" He Will Seek Presidency. The New York Times (2/4, A27, Rivera, 1.16M) reports Rudy Giuliani "appeared to move a step closer to announcing his presidential ambitions yesterday, saying after an appearance in South Carolina that 'there's a real good chance' he will run." While Giuliani "has made two trips to New Hampshire…and has promised to make more," on the "nascent campaign trail itself," Giuliani "has coyly stepped around the question of 'Will he or won't he?'" The AP (2/3) says that Giuliani made the comment following a 30-minute speech and question-and-answer session with South Carolina GOP leaders.

"Oral History" Chronicles Giuliani's Career. The New York Times (2/4, A30, Roberts, 1.16M) examines "Giuliani: Flawed or Flawless?" by Deborah Hart Strober and Gerald S. Strober, an "oral history" consisting of interviews with "friends, former friends, and unforgiving foes" of Giuliani.

McCain Turns To Ex-Foes For Campaign Team. The New York Times (2/4, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports on its front page that Sen. John McCain's "team of political bruisers for 2008" includes "advisers who once sought to skewer him and whose work he has criticized as stepping over the line in the past." For example, McCain has hired three members of the 2000 George W. Bush campaign team to make ads. McCain's advisers "said he was not changing. But they were unapologetic about putting together a group dedicated to doing what it takes to reach the White House and employing lessons from his defeat at the hands of Mr. Bush in 2000." McCain's "longtime senior strategist" John Weaver said, "This is about winning at the end of the day. I don't want to be in a knife fight ever again, but if I am, we're going to win it."

Romney Plans To "Derail" McCain In South Carolina. In the South Carolina newspaper the State (2/4), Lee Bandy writes, "Mitt Romney's assignment in the 2008 S.C. Republican presidential primary is simply this: Derail John McCain's 'Straight Talk Express.' If there were any doubts about Romney's mission, they were erased during the former Massachusetts governor's two-day visit to the state last week." Romney "attracted large, enthusiastic crowds at stops in Charleston, Aiken and Columbia. It was a shot in the arm for his campaign."

Hagel, McCain Pursue Different Maverick Paths. The New York Times (2/4, A27, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "he first time Senator John McCain ran for president, few allies were more loyal than Senator Chuck Hagel ... But at the dawn of the 2008 presidential campaign, as a debate over the administration's Iraq policy intensifies on Capitol Hill, Mr. Hagel is standing alone. Mr. McCain is perhaps the most influential and outspoken supporter in Congress of the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq. Mr. Hagel is the most outspoken critic of the war among Senate Republicans." The "gulf between them is a personal manifestation of the broader national debate over the war and, to some degree, the legacy and lessons of Vietnam. It also speaks to the deep divisions among Republicans as they confront the political fallout from the war, the need to develop a post-Bush posture on national security and the fight over who should lead their party and the country."

Lieberman Not Interested In Being McCain's Running Mate. The Hartford Courant (2/3, Pazniokas, 190K) reported Saturday that Sen. Joe Lieberman put the damper on "speculation he might join Republican Sen. John McCain on a fusion ticket" in 2008, saying, "No, that's not going to happen. My days of seeking national office are over."

House Conservatives Debate 2008 Strategy. The Washington Times (2/4, Hallow, 88K) reports, "Conservative House Republicans are disappointed that their leaders have no strategy to win back in 2008 the majority they lost in November. 'We think they need to be a lot more aggressive than they are,' Rep. Steve King of Iowa said. 'They don't seem willing to have blood on the floor, and there's got to be blood on the floor.' … The 48 conservative lawmakers who met here for the annual House Republican Study Committee (RSC) retreat generally agreed that their 2008 presidential nominee would be Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney or former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. 'I don't see any one of them being singled out as a great front-runner by the House Republican members or any one of them being singled out as a "no-go,"' Rep. Tom Price of Georgia said. 'But whichever one of the three gets the nomination is going to have to have some link to the South, which is the bedrock of the Republican Party.' But the legislators also agreed they were not inclined to coalesce behind any one of the three and thought each of them fell short of the highest conservative standards. Though the Heritage Foundation, sponsor of the annual retreat, had invited all three of the men to speak, only Mr. Romney showed up."

Giuliani Leads McCain By Seven Points In ARG Iowa Poll. An American Research Group of 600 likely Iowa Republican caucus voters (+/- 4%), made up of 509 Republicans and 91 independents and conducted January 29-February 1, finds Rudy Giuliani at 27%, Sen. John McCain

DOJ_NMG_0127281

22%, Newt Gingrich 16%, Mitt Romney 11%, Sen. Chuck Hagel 5%, Mike Huckabee 2%, Sen. Sam Brownback 1%, Rep. Tom Tancredo 1%, and Jim Gilmore, Rep. Duncan Hunter, George Pataki, Rep. Ron Paul, and Tommy Thompson each at 0%, with 15% undecided.

McCain Leads, Giuliani And Romney Tied For Second, In ARG New Hampshire Poll. An American Research Group of 600 likely New Hampshire Republican primary voters (+/- 4%), made up of 427 Republicans and 173 independents and conducted January 31-February 1, finds Sen. John McCain at 27%, Rudy Giuliani at Mitt Romney tied at 20% each, Newt Gingrich 11%, Sen. Chuck Hagel 4%, Sen. Sam Brownback 1%, Mike Huckabee 1%, Rep. Tom Tancredo 1%, and Jim Gilmore, Rep. Duncan Hunter, George Pataki, Rep. Ron Paul, and Tommy Thompson each at 0%, with 15% undecided.

McCain Leads Giuliani By Nine Points In South Carolina Poll. A Whit Ayres poll of 500 likely South Carolina Republican primary voters conducted January 24-28 finds Sen. John McCain at 29%, Rudy Giuliani 20%, Newt Gingrich 14%, Mitt Romney 6%, Sen. Sam Brownback 2%, Mike Huckabee 2%, Rep. Duncan Hunter 2%, and Rep. Tom Tancredo 1%, with 23% undecided.

Giuliani, McCain Closely Matched In Michigan Poll. A Detroit Free Press-Local 4 Michigan poll on the Michigan Republican primary (+/- 8%) conducted last week finds Rudy Giuliani at 32%, Sen. John McCain 28%, Newt Gingrich 16%, and Mitt Romney at 8%.

Democratic Presidential Candidates Continue Attacks On Iraq War. The Washington Times (2/4, Lambro, 88K) reports, "Democratic candidates whom many consider underdogs for the presidential nomination in 2008 continued their party's attacks on the Iraq war yesterday, demanding it be ended and the troops brought home immediately." Sen. Joseph Biden, Gov. Bill Richardson, and ex- Gov. Tom Vilsack addressed the meeting Saturday. Biden "said reducing the number of troops in Iraq, 'not escalating America's troops, is the only way to force Iraq's leaders to seek a political settlement.'" Vilsack "went further than many of his Democratic rivals who are calling for a phased troop withdrawal from Iraq over the next year or two." Richardson "also raised the end-the-war ante against his party's pack of candidates in a speech that pointedly criticized the Democrats' pending nonbinding Senate resolution against Mr. Bush's troop surge."

The Washington Post (2/4, A4, Balz, 690K) says the Iraq war "is shaping the opening stages of the contest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, just as it did in the 2004 campaign. After 10 candidates' speeches over two days at the winter meeting of the Democratic National Committee in Washington, the war proved again to be the central point of differentiation among the party's presidential contenders." While "everyone" in the field now opposes the war, the "self-styled outsiders in the race -- those not in the Senate -- see political gain in pressing for a speedy end to the war."

The Albuquerque Tribune (2/4, Brosnan) says Richardson told Democrats Congress "should repeal the authorization for the Iraq War and 'bring our troops home by the end of this year.'" The Des Moines Register (2/4, 160K) reports Tom Vilsack "painted himself as an outsider and a truth-teller before members" of the DNC, "calling for an immediate end to financing of the war in Iraq." Vilsack "was the last of 10 presidential candidates to speak over two days to key Democrats from across the country shopping for their next nominee."

DNC Unanimously Backs House Vote For District Of Columbia. The Washington Post (2/4, C3, Pierre, 690K) reports the District of Columbia's "effort to win a full seat in the House of Representatives won unanimous support yesterday from the Democratic National Committee. It was the first step in a national lobbying campaign that will ask each of the presidential candidates to embrace the idea and will include grass-roots efforts in such early-voting states as Iowa and New Hampshire."

Biden Expresses "Regret" Over Comments About Obama. The AP (2/3, Pickler) reports Sen. Joseph Biden "tried yesterday to stem the damage from the botched launch of his presidential campaign as underdog candidates in the Democratic field looked to gain momentum from the party faithful." Biden "got right to the matter that has threatened his candidacy before it even gets off the ground," saying of his comments on Sen. Barack Obama and past black presidential candidates, "I want to say that I truly regret that the words I spoke offended people that I admire very much."

More Commentary On Biden. Under the headline "Nominate Biden: America Needs The Comic Relief," the New Hampshire Union Leader (2/4) editorializes, "This guy is a one-man laugh factory. Despite his lack of tact, we don't think Biden really is a bigot. He is, however, the court jester of the U.S. Senate. Bringing his act on the road would provide some much-needed stress relief for the American people. If Democrats really cared about providing relief to the American people, they'd nominate a walking punch line so we could all spend the bulk of the election year laughing at the ineptitude of their candidate -- just like in 2004. If we get really lucky, Biden will get the nomination and pick Dennis Kucinich as his straight man/running mate."

DOJ_NMG_0127282

In his Washington Post (2/4, B7, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland writes, "Reporters who long ago learned to concentrate on Biden's ideas rather than on his ill-assorted nouns, verbs and adjectives had to treat this gaffe as momentous: Against much of the available evidence, Biden had just declared that he was a serious presidential contender. The Delaware senator is a thoroughly decent, hardworking and thoughtful legislator. But I found it unnerving in his previous bid for the Democratic nomination, in 1988, to have him frequently deliver a loosely connected set of ideas during an interview and then look up to ask: 'Am I making sense here?' So I say, plus ça change."

In his Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait writes, "I'm not saying Biden shouldn't be president. I have tons of respect for him, and I think he'd do a terrific job if he could get it. I just find it amusing that he thinks there's some chance he could actually become president. It's a case study of that bizarre mental affliction that strikes so many senators. They see younger, less-experienced Senate colleagues -- who are far less esteemed than they are -- running for president, and they're offended. If the 100 senators were the only ones who could vote, Biden would probably beat Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama. Unfortunately for Biden, that's not how it works. … Biden looks as if he's the product of a laboratory experiment designed to create the world's worst presidential candidate. If the Obama gaffe doesn't knock him out of the race, something else will. I doubt he makes it to Iowa. Yes, Biden's very knowledgeable and dedicated. But to win the presidency, you actually have to be good at mass politics. Why is Biden not smart enough to recognize that?"

In the New York Times (2/4, WK1, 1.16M), Lynette Clemetson writes that Biden's characterization of Obama "as 'the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy' was so painfully clumsy that it nearly warranted pity. There are not enough column inches on this page to parse interpretations of each of Mr. Biden's chosen adjectives. But among his string of loaded words, one is so pervasive -- and is generally used and viewed so differently by blacks and whites -- that it calls out for a national chat, perhaps a national therapy session. It is amazing that this still requires clarification, but here it is. Black people get a little testy when white people call them 'articulate.'"

Gore Again Says He Has No Plans To Run In 2008. KEYT-TV Santa Barbara, California (2/3, 6:55 p.m.) reported, "Some say he will, some say he won't; KEY News has the official answer. Former Vice President Al Gore told us he has no plans to run for president in 2008. The Oscar nominee made a stop in Santa Barbara Saturday night to receive an honor from the Santa Barbara International Film Festival."

"Power Couple" Close To Clintons Hosted Richardson Fundraiser. The Washington Post (2/4, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) writes that "power couple" Beth and Ron Dozoretz, "longtime heavyweights in national Democratic money circles" and "close friends" of the Clintons, are making "tough choices." They hosted a fundraiser for Gov. Bill Richardson Friday; a Richardson spokesman said, "They and the governor are longtime friends." Some suggest the couple "has indicated privately that they will be with Richardson. Clinton communications director Howard Wolfson begged to differ." Wolfson said, "Beth Dozoretz is a good friend of the campaign, and she has made a major commitment to help Hillary. We appreciate her strong support."

Richardson Brings International Experience To Campaign. The AP (2/3, Pickler) profiles Richardson, saying it has been said that he "would negotiate with the devil. And by some definitions, he has -- several times." Richardson "has bartered with some of the most notorious rulers of modern times: Iraq 's Saddam Hussein , Yugoslavia's Slobodan Milosevic , Cuba's Fidel Castro , Kenya's Daniel Arap Moi, Zaire's Mobutu Sese Seko, Nigeria's Sani Abacha and most recently, Sudan's Omar al-Bashir. Richardson has compared himself to Red Adair, renowned for his ability to put out erupting oil well fires." Richardson "has more international experience than just about anyone else in the 2008 field. The 59-year-old was ambassador to the United Nations in the Clinton administration, served on the intelligence committee during his 14 years in the House and has done international work from his perch as a small-state governor."

Richardson Not Interested In Vice Presidency, State Department. The New York Times Magazine (2/4, Solomon) interviews Richardson, asking, "As the popular governor of New Mexico but one of the less-popular candidates seeking the Democratic nomination for president, did you enter the race to actually win or merely to angle for another position at the national level?" Richardson replied, "I want to be president. If I don't win the presidency, I am not interested in the vice presidency or in being secretary of state."

Illinois Senate President Says Blacks Should Back Obama. The Politico (2/3, Ben Smith) reports Illinois Senate President Emil Jones Jr., a "key supporter of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama," urged "united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still 'owe' Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support, according to several people who attended a meeting of black Democratic politicians." The comments by Jones,

DOJ_NMG_0127283

"which he confirmed Saturday, angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists."

Safire Says Obama Chooses Words With Care. In his New York Times Magazine (2/4) "On Language" column, William Safire writes that Obama "is a politician who apparently chooses his words with care." Safire also warns Obama that "one way to zap a hitherto little-known person getting a rush of publicity is to afflict him with the bogus title media darling. That's because media, when construed as singular -- especially as mass media and mainstream media -- connotes to its crowd of critics some manipulative monolith whose control of communication is to be resisted."

Clinton Jumps To 17-Point Lead Over Edwards In ARG Iowa Poll. An American Research Group of 600 likely Iowa Democratic caucus voters (+/- 4%), made up of 493 Republicans and 107 independents and conducted January 29-February 1, finds Sen. Hillary Clinton at 35%, John Edwards 18%, Sen. Barack Obama 14%, Tom Vilsack 12%, Sen. Joseph Biden 2%, Wesley Clark 2%, Rep. Dennis Kucinich 2%, Sen. Christopher Dodd 1%, Gov. Bill Richardson 1%, and Mike Gravel 0%, with 12% undecided.

Clinton Leads Obama By 20 Points In ARG New Hampshire Poll. An American Research Group of 600 likely New Hampshire Democratic primary voters (+/- 4%), made up of 408 Democrats and 192 independents and conducted January 31-February 1, finds Sen. Hillary Clinton at 39%, Sen. Barack Obama 19%, John Edwards 13%, Wesley Clark 2%, Gov. Bill Richardson 2%, Sen. Joseph Biden 1%, Sen. Christopher Dodd 1%, Rep. Dennis Kucinich 1%, Tom Vilsack 1%, and Mike Gravel 0%, with 21% undecided.

Grove Biographer Questions Prohibition On Immigrants Seeking Presidency. In a Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) op-ed, Richard Tedlow of the Harvard Business School, author of "Andy Grove: The Life and Times of an American," writes that immigrant innovators like the former Intel chief are not prohibited from "leading a U.S.-based company" but are prohibited from seeking the presidency. Tedlow writes, "What if our Constitution had told Grove: 'You can't change the world because you come from Hungary.' Sound ridiculous? Of course it does. Imagine what else would have been lost if we faced such constraints in the business world. What if the Constitution said: Pierre Omidyar, you can't found eBay here because you were born in France. Sergey Brin, you can't co-found Google here because you were born in Russia. Jerry Yang, you can't co-found Yahoo here because you were born in Taiwan. … It is odd that this freedom to harness the best and the brightest Americans, including immigrants, is a guiding principle at every address in our nation except for one: 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue."

Iran Invites Diplomats, Reporters To Tour Nuclear Site. Under the headline, "Iran Has Guests In To See, But Not Inspect, Nuclear Site," the New York Times (2/4, Fathi, 1.16M) notes Tehran "opened" the Isfahan facility "to a large number of local and international reporters and a delegation of foreign ambassadors on Saturday in an effort to show the transparency of its program before a United Nations Security Council deadline this month." Officials have "kept up efforts to give the Isfahan facility more publicity, and a senior tourism official said late last year that Iran planned to open it and other nuclear sites to foreign tourists." Ambassador Ali Asghar Soltanieh "said Saturday that the purpose of the tour was to assure the world that Iran's program was peaceful." The Times notes that reporters "passed the Natanz enrichment facility but were not permitted to tour the site, where Iran recently said it was installing 3,000 centrifuges."

The AP (2/4, Dareini) calls Isfahan "a key uranium conversion facility," and says Tehran "opened" its "gates" to "visiting diplomats and journalists in an effort to show that its disputed nuclear program is peaceful and not a cover for nuclear bomb making." The "visitors saw several areas of the Isfahan facility, including two cameras installed by the IAEA to monitor activity where uranium gas is produced."

On its front page today, the Los Angeles Times (2/4, A1, Murphy, 850K) describes Isfahan as the city "where Iran has been taking the initial technological steps to turn ordinary uranium into the makings of nuclear fuel." Those foreigners accepting Tehran's "rare invitation" to tour the site heard from officials "that the fledgling conversion program, which was in its infancy only three years ago, has now manufactured 250 tons of uranium hexafluoride gas, the feedstock for Iran's controversial uranium enrichment program." The Times adds, "Saturday's tour was mainly a publicity exercise; the delegates admitted that they understood little of what they were seeing. But it was clearly part of a strong effort on Iran's part to demonstrate its willingness to open up its nuclear program to inspection." However, "not all of the uranium conversion facility was on view Saturday."

Iran May Not Have Know-How To Back Up Nuclear Claims. An extensive analysis in today's New York Times (2/4, Broad, Sanger, 1.16M) notes, "After decades of largely clandestine efforts, Iran is expected to declare in coming days that it has made a huge leap toward industrial-scale production of enriched uranium — a defiant act that the country's leaders will herald as a major technical stride and its neighbors will denounce as a looming threat. But for now, many nuclear experts say, the frenetic activity at the desert enrichment plant in Natanz may be mostly about political showmanship." The Times cites the "many setbacks and outright failures of Tehran's experimental program," and says that history suggests "that its bluster may outstrip its technical expertise." The Times continues, "What the Iranians are not talking about, experts with access to the atomic agency's information say, is that their experimental effort to make centrifuges work has struggled to achieve even limited success and appears to have been put on the back burner so the country's leaders can declare that they are moving to the next stage." Tehran's "nuclear boasts come in the midst of an increasingly rancorous chess game between Tehran's mullahs and the Bush administration over the aims of Iran's nuclear programs, its role in Iraq and its ambitions to become the dominant power in the Middle East."

DOJ_NMG_0127284

Retired Flag Officers Ask Bush, Blair To Engage Diplomatically With Tehran. The AP (2/4, Lawless) reports, "Three former high-ranking U.S. military officers have called for Britain to help defuse the crisis over Iran's nuclear program, saying military action against Tehran would be a disaster for the region." The letter to the editor of the Sunday Times, written by Lt. Gen. Robert Gard, Gen. Joseph Hoar, and Vice Admiral Jack Shanahan, "urged President Bush to open talks 'without preconditions' with the Iranian government to find a diplomatic solution." The three retired officers "said Britain 'has a vital role to play in securing a renewed diplomatic push' and urged Prime Minister Tony Blair to make it clear he would oppose any military attack on Iran." They "said an attack 'would have disastrous consequences for security in the region, coalition forces in Iraq and would further exacerbate regional and global tensions.'"

Ex-Intelligence Offer Considers What To Ask Before "Next War." In the Washington Post (2/4, B7, 690K) Outlook, war critic and former intelligence officer Paul Pillar writes, "The administration so successfully shaped the policy question around its chosen selling points [on war with Iraq] that what passed for a national debate gave little attention to important questions about the likely nature and consequences of a war. ... Now, an accelerating debate about Iran and its nuclear program shows signs of the same dangerous reductionism." Pillar writes, "Some might argue that the worst case that could ensue from an Iranian nuclear weapon is so bad that it trumps all other considerations. But there is no more reason than there was with Iraq to consider the worst case of only one side of the policy equation. And the worst case that could result from U.S.-Iranian combat is plenty frightening: thousands of Americans dead from retaliatory terrorist attacks, a broader war in the Persian Gulf, $150-per-barrel oil, a global recession and more."

North Korea Allegedly Offers To Trade Nuclear Activity For Oil, Sanctions Relief. The AP (2/4, Chang) carries Japanese press reports that North Korea "is ready to freeze a key nuclear facility and allow international inspectors limited access to the country in exchange for millions of barrels of oil and an easing of U.S. financial restrictions." The Japanese reporting "quoted former U.S. State Department official Joel Wit, who met the North's chief nuclear negotiator, Kim Kye-gwan, and other regime officials during a visit to Pyongyang last week. It said the North was demanding half a million tons of oil a year — the equivalent of about 3.5 million barrels — in energy aid."

Kosovo Status Plan Said To Be Fraught With Regional Risks. The New York Times (2/4, Smith, 1.16M) describes Kosovar reactions to likely changes in the province's political status. It remains "bitterly divided between Serbian enclaves, including a large chunk of the north, and the rest of the territory, which is overwhelmingly ethnic Albanian." Any movement towards "secession by northern Serbs could provoke Albanian reprisals against Serbian enclaves elsewhere in Kosovo, warn Serbs and Albanians alike, and could destabilize a still fragile region full of ethnic slivers separated from their homelands." The Times says "the continued standoff suggested that the intended end may instead be a prologue to another difficult chapter in a troubled history." Noting the "deep" and "emotional connection to place [that] many Europeans have," the Times says European "countries facing their own secessionist movements … are skeptical of what they see as an American effort to jam a solution into place so Washington can turn its attention elsewhere."

Amid Continued Fighting, Hamas, Fatah Jointly Condemn Quartet's Aid Ban. Under the headline, "Palestinians Slam Major Powers Over Aid Boycott," AFP (2/4) notes Hamas and Fatah "have both condemned the failure of the major powers involved in Middle East peacemaking to end a punishing Western aid embargo on the Palestinians." Prime Minsiter Ismail Haniya is quoted saying the Quartet's "decisions mean more suffering for our people. Continuing the siege is to continue the pain and injury we suffer from throughout the year."

BBC.com (2/4) focuses its coverage on comments by Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak that Hamas and Fatah "have made progress towards agreeing a government of national unity." Mubarak "said he was working to 'seal the crack' between the two sides. … 'What is happening now is a problem between the Palestinians themselves, and it is impossible for the Palestinian side to sit with the Israelis, as they are still not agreeing with each other.'" German Chancellor Angela Merkel, appearing with Mubarak, "praised Egypt's efforts to broker a deal between the two factions. She also said she hoped the Middle East quartet of the US, UN, EU and Russia would develop a coherent strategy for peace rather than working in isolation towards peace in the region." Describing yesterday's violence in Gaza, the BBC says the two sides "have repeatedly agreed to ceasefires, aimed at ending a bitter power struggle," however, "a very similar plan was declared on Friday but failed to halt the violence."

DOJ_NMG_0127285

Hamas "Consolidating" Hold On Gaza. A lengthy New York Times (2/4, Erlanger, 1.16M) piece describes the tactical situation in Gaza. "Forces loyal to Hamas appeared to consolidate their hold on northern Gaza and much of Gaza City on Saturday, with at least 12 more people wounded in continuing clashes between" the two sides. "What has been some of the worst internal Palestinian fighting in years ebbed overnight after the warring factions … met to try to arrange a cease-fire." Hamas is coordinating an extensive system of roadblocks, and "detentions or kidnappings of fighters were reported, with Fatah accusing Hamas of detaining as many as 40 of its" fighters. Among civilians, "few people ventured from their homes, and many stayed away from windows."

The Los Angeles Times (2/4, Ellingwood, 850K) titles its coverage, "Factional Clashes Shoot Holes In Palestinian Truce." The fighting was "not as sustained or heavy as those of the previous two days, which left 23 people dead and scores injured. … Although the fighting had tapered off, the air in Gaza City was of a place besieged." The AP (2/4, Barzak) says both sides are "ignoring" the "truce deal" within Gaza. "Gunbattles raged across Gaza after the truce was announced, continuing through the night and early Saturday. With no casualties reported overnight, some Gazans, who had spent the previous two days huddled at home for safety, were emboldened to leave their houses to go to work."

Labor Revolt Against Blair Called Increasingly Likely. The Washington Times (2/4, Helm, 88K) reports, "The first cracks in Cabinet support for Prime Minister Tony Blair have emerged, with senior ministers questioning whether he can remain in office for another five months without inflicting lasting damage on the Labor Party." Blair's "defiant" refusal to "be hounded from office" has "failed to stem growing pressure for him to quit before the midterm May elections." The Times says high-ranking Labor MPs "have reported a collapse of morale within the party," and "some senior" Labor MPs are said to seek the Cabinet's support for Blair's removal. The Times also cites an opinion poll suggesting "that more than half of British voters believe Mr. Blair should leave office immediately."

UK Turkey Farm Infected With Deadly H5N1 Bird Flu. On its front page today, the Washington Times (2/4, A1, 88K) reports British authorities "scrambled to contain [the nation's] first outbreak of the highly pathogenic H5N1 strain of bird flu in domestic poultry yesterday after the virus was found at a farm run by Europe's biggest turkey producer." Officials will cull all of the 159,000 turkeys currently at the Bernard Matthews farm, near the town of Lowestoft. This outbreak is "the first time the deadly H5N1 strain was found on a British farm." The New York Times (2/4, A12, Cowell, 1.16M) adds the 2,500 turkeys killed by the virus so far at the Bernard Matthews farm makes this "the biggest outbreak of the strain reported in Britain since concern about its global spread began to take root in 2003." The Times says the "prospect of a mass slaughter recalled Britain's battle with foot-and-mouth disease in 2001, when nearly four million animals, mainly sheep, pigs and cows, were burned."

All three broadcast networks reported on the outbreak. ABC World News (2/3, story 7, :10, Weir, 8.78M) reported officials "are scrambling to contain an outbreak of bird flu on a turkey farm. … The first time bird flu has been detected in Britain since a dead wild swan washed ashore in Scotland last spring." The CBS Evening News (2/3, story 4, 1:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "For the first time, the deadly strain of bird flu has shown up in England." NBC Nightly News (2/3, story 4, :10, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The bird flu is back in the news. Officials in the United Kingdom have confirmed their first major outbreak of bird flu. More than 2,500 turkeys have died in the same strain of bird flu that's killed people around the world. No sign this outbreak has spread to humans."

The Washington Post (2/4, A14, Sullivan, 690K) notes the H5N1 strain "has killed 165 people" worldwide in the past four years. This "outbreak is the first confirmed case of H5N1 among British domestic poultry in more than 15 years, officials said, and it comes at a time of increasing concern that migrating birds are carrying the disease from its origins in Asia through Africa, the Middle East and deeper into Europe." The Post adds that "health officials said the immediate risk to humans from the Suffolk case was 'extremely low.'" The AP (2/3) calls the infection "Britain's first mass outbreak of the disease that has ravaged Asia's poultry stocks and killed more than 160 people worldwide." This outbreak "was the first time the deadly H5N1 strain was found on a British farm." British "experts stressed the situation did not pose a public health threat, and that eating well-cooked poultry products posed no risk."

Turkmen Presidential Candidates Expand Debate Despite Certain Outcome. The Washington Post (2/4, A14, Finn, 690K) profiles the candidates and probable outcome of Turkmenistan's February 11 presidential vote. "Acting President Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov, 49, will almost certainly win when the Central Asian country's citizens go to the polls Feb. 11. His opponents, a deputy minister and four regional officials, are willing foils, according to analysts and exiled politicians." However, "the modicum of debate in a country that during its 15-plus years of independence lived under the megalomaniacal shadow of president-for-life Saparmurad Niyazov amounts to a slight thaw. For the first time, the country will hold a presidential election in which more than one candidate is running." While "each of the six candidates continues to pledge loyalty to the legacy of Niyazov," many of their "speeches contain some implicit criticism of the late president by acknowledging the need to reverse the erosion of social programs, in particular."

DOJ_NMG_0127286

China's Hu Faces Skeptical Public In Zambia. Continuing coverage of Chinese President Hu Jintao's trip to Africa, the Washington Times/AP (2/4, Schatz) says Hu "brought his eight-nation African tour to Zambia, a copper-rich country where China's growing clout has prompted charges of exploitation and has emerged as a volatile political issue." Hu "has used the tour to cement China's increasing economic and political ties and its fast-growing role as a foreign donor throughout the continent." He planned "to attend a state banquet and meet with" Zambian President Levy Mwanawasa, "who has cultivated close ties with China. The country is a major foreign aid donor to Mr. Mwanawasa's government," and "has poured hundreds of millions of dollars into Zambia's copper sector, which accounts for 60 percent of the impoverished nation's exports." Hu's stop in Lusaka "is expected to focus on new Chinese aid for Zambia and the inauguration today of an economic partnership zone in Zambia's Copperbelt province, which has become a key source of copper for China's growing economy."

LATimes Implores Bush To Back Turkish-American Genocide Resolution. In an editorial today, the Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K) says there is "new hope" for Rep. Adam Schiff's non-binding Turkish-Armenian genocide resolution. The January murder of journalist Hrant Dink has increased pressure for passage, and "has sent a collective shiver down Turkey's spine, triggering street demonstrations and renewed calls for the government to change its policy." The Times says Schiff's "mild" text "makes the White House's opposition all the more vexing." While "Ankara has considerable diplomatic influence, and Turkey is too valuable an ally to alienate with congressional resolutions," the Times concludes that Washington "is at its best when it chooses truth over expedience, especially in matters as grave as genocide. It's hard to say 'never again' convincingly if you're too afraid to speak bluntly about what you aim to prevent."

Fukuyama Warns Against Pessimism, Says US, World Still Seeing Progress. In a 1,700-word op-ed in today's Los Angeles Times (2/4, 850K), scholar Francis Fukuyama cautions against becoming "very discouraged" about the modern world. "We "should stop to consider a broader context in which things look a lot brighter. The single most notable but overlooked fact about today's world is that the global economy has been driving ahead full speed, raising living standards and closing the gap between the First and Third worlds." China, India and East Asia are enjoying relative prosperity, and "the rest of the world is growing steadily too," especially Latin America and Sub-Saharan Africa. "These trends in the developing world are increasingly driven by south-south trade," and that "has spawned world-class multinational companies from developing countries." Fukuyama notes the "robustness" of worldwide growth, and says the "huge vulnerabilities" many experts see are exaggerated. He adds that, "in the long run, many of today's troublesome political trends are unlikely to be sustained," and "even pessimism about Iraq is overdone."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Blast Kills At Least 130 In Central Baghdad Market."
"East L.A. Leaders Push For Cityhood."
"Online Learning Goes Mainstream."
"This Isn't Your Mother's Salary."

New York Times:
"In Washington, Contractors Take On Biggest Role Ever."
"At Least 130 Die As Blast Levels Baghdad Market."
"Iraq's Shadow Widens Sunni-Shiite Split In U.S."
"McCain's Advisers Once Made Ads That Drew His Ire."
"Iran's Boast On Uranium Enrichment Is Put To Test."
"Far Away, Super Bowl's Losers Will Be Champs."

Washington Post:
"At Least 125 Killed In Blast At Baghdad Market."
"War In Iraq Sets Off A Massive Migration."
"At Democrats' Meeting, Bush Appeals For Cooperation."
"Reaching Out With The Word -- And Technology."
"At Last, A Historic First."

Washington Times:
"Deadliest Blast Kills 135 In Iraq."
"Ready For Some Football?"
"Bush Builds Bonds With House Democrats At Retreat."
"Cell-Phone Taxes Subsidize Land Lines, Enrich Telecoms."
"Britons Strive To Contain Bird Flu."

Detroit Free Press:
"It's Official: Sanders Is A Hall Of Famer."
"Dodge Unveils Redesigned 2008 Dakota."
"MSU Can't Upset OSU, Even In Cleaves' Presence."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Bush Courting Skeptical Dems."

DOJ_NMG_0127287

"Horror Of Forced Sterilization."
"Child In Room Before Mom Shot."
"Baghdad Bombing Kills Scores."
"Dog Drags Woman To Safety."
"Trial Brings Back S.C. Shootout."
"More Horses Rounded Up."

Dallas Morning News:
"Hall Of Fame Says Yes To Irvin."
"Bodies Are Missing Couple's, Families Told."
"Deadly Lightning's Impact Lingers 35 Years Later."
"USO Program Lets Soldiers, Kids Share Storytime."
"Euless Tries To Block Santeria Lawsuit."
"Experts: Super Sunday Isn't Automatic Diet Timeout."
"Dallas Facility Would Let Autistic Adults Live Independently."

Houston Chronicle:
"No Probe Planned In Houston Elevator Death."
"Injured Sugar Land GI Returns Home To New Fight."
"A&M Downs Kansas On Law's Late 3-Pointer."
"Hornets, Bad Aim End Rockets' Streak At 4 Wins."
"New Bayport Terminal Must Prove It Can Deliver."
"Texas Group Fills Need For Free Mental Health Care."
"Immigration Raid Fuels War Of Words In N. Houston."
"Houston Trash Pickup To Add 85,000 Homes."
"Texas Lawmakers Debate Slash To Pre-K Funding."
"HISD Sends Aspiring Principals Back To Class."
"Historian: CIA Funded Russian-Language 'Zhivago.'"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Florida Tornado; Florida Tornado Aftermath; Freezing Weather In Midwest; Violence In Iraq; Bush-Democrats; Indonesian Flooding; Global Warming Forecast; Bird Flu Outbreak In England; Shortage Of Male Teachers; Super Bowl Town Rivalry.
CBS: Florida Tornado; Florida Tornado Aftermath; Violence In Iraq; Bird Flu Outbreak In England; NFL-Black Coaches; Bush-Democrats; Sicilian Soccer Riot; Schools-Security; Madden NFL 07.
NBC: Violence In Iraq; Florida Tornado; Bush-Democrats; Bird Flu Outbreak In England; Global Warming; Cervical Cancer Vaccine; Military Advice Columnist.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:
PRESIDENT BUSH — In Washington. No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.
US Senate: Not in session.
US House: Not in session.

Other: SHERIFF'S ASSOCIATION _ The National Sheriff's Association holds its 2007 Winter Conference. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW Contacts: n/a, 202-836-7827

CLIMATE CHANGE _ George Washington University's School for Business hosts a conference, "Implementing Solutions to Climate Crises: Strategic Actions for Bueinesses, Communities, Citizens, and Consumers." Speakers include Chad O. Holliday Jr., chairman and CEO of DuPont; Lester Brown, founder of the Earth Policy Institute; and WorldWatch Institute President Chris Flavin. Location: Sunday's sessions at George Washington University's City View Room, 1957 E St. NE. Monday's sessions at George Washington University's Cloyd Heck Marvin Center, third floor, 800 21st St. NW. Contacts: Mark Starik, 202-994-5621

RESERVE OFFICERS _ The Reserve officers Association holds its Mid-Winter Conference and Military Exposition. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW. Contacts: n/a, 202-479-2200

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0127288

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, February 5, 2007 8:01 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, February 04, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070204.pdf; dojclips070204.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Attorneys Downplay Comments By Juror (SACBEE) 4
Prosecutors Rebut Hayat Request (STOCKREC) 5
Feds Say No Juror Misconduct In Lodi Terror Trial (CCT) 6
Salah's Long Road To Clear Name (DSOUTH) 6
Robyn E. Blumner column: Truly Tortured Logic (SPT) 8

War News:

Bush Tells Democrats He Welcomes Iraq Debate (AP) 9
Bush Says Iraq War Has Sapped "Our Nation's Soul" (HILL) 10
Bush: War Is "Sapping Our Soul" (POL) 11
Bush Drops In On House Democrats (LAT) 12
Bush Puts "Ic" Back In "Democrat Party" (AP) 13
At Democrats' Meeting, Bush Appeals For Cooperation (WP) 14
Bush Meets With Democrats On Their Turf (NYT) 16
A Decider Meets 535 More Of 'Em (NYT) 17
Bush Builds Bonds With House Democrats At Retreat (WT) 18
At Least 130 Die As Blast Levels Baghdad Market (NYT) 19
At Least 125 Killed In Blast At Baghdad Market (WP) 21
Deadly Blast's Damage Is Physical And Psychological (LAT) 23
130 Killed In Baghdad Bombing (CHIT) 24
Scores Killed In Baghdad Market Blast (AP) 25
Iraqi PM Vows To End Bomb Terror (BBC) 27
Doubts Run Deep On Reforms Crucial To Bush's Iraq Strategy (WP) 28
With Rumsfeld Gone, Critics Of War Look To Rice (NYT) 30
Japan's FM Calls US Operation In Iraq 'Naive' (AFP) 32
No I-Told-You-Sos (WP) 32
Under Bush's Pillow (NYT) 35
Coalition Phases In Iraqi Sailors (LAT) 36
Security Contracts To Continue In Iraq (WP) 37
War In Iraq Propelling A Massive Migration (WP) 38
Iraq War Spawns Growing Refugee Problem (AP) 42
Taliban Leader Killed In NATO Airstrike (AP) 44
Residents Flee Taliban-held Town (AP) 44
New Chief For NATO Afghan Force (BBC) 45
Afghan Schools Take On The Taliban (LAT) 46
The Road To Helmand (WP) 47
Wrong Model For Afghanistan (NYT) 53

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Firings Set Stage For Congressional Battle (WP) 54

Corporate Scandals:

Thomas To Review Stock Option Grants (AP) 55

Criminal Law:

Vice President's Shadow Hangs Over Trial (WP) 56
Libby Fights To Keep Tapes From Public (PHI) 58
Libby Prosecutors Await Judge's Rulings (CNN) 58
Why Dick Cheney Cracked Up (NYT) 59
Libby Prosecutors Hope To Show Marked News Articles (WP) 61
Libby Trial Reveals What Prosecutor Wouldn't (CNN) 62
F.B.I. Investigating Complaint Against California Lawmaker (NYT) 63
Former Manchester Mayor Arrested (LEXHL) 64
Federal Indictment Of Fumo Is Expected Soon (PHI) 65
FBI Probe Of Perata Apparently In Limbo (SANMCT) 67
FBI Investigates High-level Aide To Sheriff (STPPP) 68
Fletcher Aide Under FBI Probe Had Wide Reach (MINNST) 69
Indiana Killings Stir Fear Among Homeless (NYT) 71
Mich. Translator In Iraq Sentenced For Offering Bribe (AP) 72
Fulton Man Indicted For Child Pornography (JEFFCNT) 72
The Taxpayers' Tab: Police Billed $27,000 In Travel Costs To Federal Grant (AEAGT) 73
Are We All Gambling Criminals? (LAT) 75

Civil Law:

FTC Slaps Telemarketer With $1M Fine (AP) 75
ITT To Settle U.S.-China Technology Case, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM) 76

Civil Rights:

As Officers Stop And Frisk, Residents Raise Their Guard (NYT) ... 77
Officer In Louima Case Returns To State To Finish Sentence (NYT) ... 79
Taser Task Force Will Get To See Weapon's Effects (MERCN) ... 79
Curb Cuts: Going With The Flow Easier For All (MCT) ... 80
Felts: Seizure Of Home In '03 Violated Rights (MONNS) ... 82
Harsh Accusations Intensify In L.I. State Senate Contest (NYT) ... 83
Final Push In Nassau State Senate Race (NSDY) ... 84
Iraq's Shadow Widens Sunni-Shiite Split In U.S. (NYT) ... 85
With Jails Full, California Eyes Other States (NYT/AP) ... 87

Antitrust:

Letters Of Ill Repute (SLPD) ... 88
Grinstein Stood Tall As Delta's Defender (AJC) ... 91

Environment/Indian Affairs:

In Drill, CDC Practices For Influenza Pandemic (WP) ... 93
Can Washington Get Smart About Science? (LAT) ... 95
At Humanity's Doorstep (NYT) ... 97

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gang `capital' Steps Up Fight (CHIT) ... 98
Gun Charges Dismissed On Suspected Hit Man (PPG) ... 99
For Police, Ill-Gotten Gains Become Money Well Spent (NYT) ... 100

Immigration:

Acrobat Admits Guilt In Visa Scam (WT) ... 102
Contractors Walking Immigration Tightrope (DENP) ... 103
The Price Of Citizenship (NYT) ... 104

Tax:

Court Upholds Evasion Ruling In A Tax Case (NYT) ... 104
The Netherlands, The New Tax Shelter Hot Spot (NYT) ... 105

Congress-Administration:

Budget's Ups And Downs Leave Big Chunk For War (AP) ... 109
Bush's Medicare Budget Would Raise Premiums (NYT) ... 110
Lawmakers See Pot Of Gold In Tax Gap (LAT) ... 112
Facing Inequality (WP) ... 113
In Washington, Contractors Take On Biggest Role Ever (NYT) ... 114
Capitol's Newcomers Try A Little Openness (WP) ... 117
Balking On Bundling (WP) ... 119
Cardin Finds Passion For Speeches (WT) ... 119
Pathologists Protest Defense Site's Closure (WP) ... 120
Health Coverage's Momentum (WP) ... 121
A Billion-Dollar Election Warning (NYT) ... 122
Farm Bill Doesn't Go Far Enough (LAT) ... 123

Other News:

Giuliani On 2008 Bid: "A Real Good Chance" (NYT) ... 124
Rudy Giuliani Seriously Considering Presidential Bid (AP) ... 125
Inspiring Strong Emotions, And Very Mixed Ones, Too (NYT) 125
McCain's Advisers Once Made Ads That Drew His Ire (NYT) 127
Romney Targeting McCain (TSSC) ... 129
Mavericks Both, But Different Iraq Paths (NYT) ... 130
A Bar, A Brew, A Drifting Senator (HARTC) ... 131
GOP's Conservatives Strain For Leadership (WT) ... 132
Underdogs Demand Iraq War's End, Troops Home (WT) ... 133
Democrats Split On How To End The War (WP) ... 134
Richardson To Democrats: Bring Troops Home Now (ABQ) 135
Vilsack Calls For End To Financing Of Iraq War (DMR) ... 136
Democrats Endorse Voting Measure (WP) ... 137
Biden Says He Regrets Remarks On Obama (AP) ... 137
Nominate Biden: America Needs The Comic Relief (NHUL) 138
Twisting In Their Own Windiness (WP) ... 138
Joe Biden's Just A Barrel Of Gaffes (LAT) ... 139
The Racial Politics Of Speaking Well (NYT) ... 140
Clinton Camp Hasn't Written Off Fundraising Couple Who Helped Competitor (WP) ... 142
Richardson Touts Unique Qualifications (AP) ... 143
On The Run (NYT) ... 145
Obama Mentor Rallies Black Support (POL) ... 146
Obamarama (NYT) ... 147
Call It The "Andy Amendment" (LAT) ... 148
Iran Has Guests In To See, But Not Inspect, Nuclear Site (NYT) ... 149
Iran Shows Nuclear Facility To Diplomats (AP) ... 150
Iran Gives Visitors Inside Look At Esfahan Nuclear Facility (LAT) ... 151
Iran's Boast On Uranium Enrichment Is Put To Test (NYT) 152
Ex-U.S. Military Leaders Urge Iran Talks (AP) ... 154
What To Ask Before The Next War (WP) ... 155
Report: N.Korea Considering Concessions (AP) ... 156
On Road To Kosovo Independence, A Warning: Go Slow (NYT) ... 157
Palestinians Slam Major Powers Over Aid Boycott (AFP) ... 159
Palestinians "Nearer" Power Deal (BBC) ... 159
Hamas Fighters Appear To Tighten Hold In Gaza (NYT) ... 160
Factional Clashes Shoot Holes In Palestinian Truce (LAT) 162
Hamas, Fatah Ignore Truce Deal In Gaza (AP) ... 163
Pressure Grows For Blair To Depart Office Early (WT) ... 164

DOJ_NMG_0127291

Britons Strive To Contain Bird Flu (WT) 164
Deadly Bird Flu Confirmed In British Turkeys (NYT).....165
Bird Flu Detected On Turkey Farm In England (WP) 166
Deadly Bird Flu Virus Found In Britain (AP).....167
Turkmen Candidates Practice Pliancy (WP).....168
Hu Cultivates Source Of Industrial Materials (WT/AP).....169
New Hope For Genocide Resolution (LAT) 170
Relax, It's Not The End Of The World (LAT).....171

DOJ_NMG_0127292

TERRORISM NEWS:

Attorneys Downplay Comments By Juror (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, February 4, 2007

Federal prosecutors said Saturday there is little or no evidence to support allegations of juror misconduct in a motion for a new trial of a Lodi man convicted of terrorist activity.

Misconduct claims on behalf of Hamid Hayat are barred by rules of evidence, cannot be substantiated, actually describe proper conduct, or describe conduct not harmful to Hayat, prosecutors maintain in a 187-page brief opposing a new trial.

In their October motion, defense attorneys cite a statement by juror Alicia Lopez that jury foreman Joseph Cote made a "hangman gesture" and once said "hang him" in discussions with other jurors during the trial.

"These bare bone allegations, on their face, are vague and ambiguous and do not constitute substantial evidence that (Cote) was actually biased against the defendant," wrote prosecutors S. Robert Tice-Raskin and Laura Ferris in the opposition brief.

Defense attorneys also cited statements by jurors Lopez and Theresa Berkeley-Simmons that Cote used racial slurs during the trial, including his opinion that Pakistanis or Muslims all "look alike" if dressed the same.

Hayat is a U.S. citizen of Pakistani descent.

But the prosecutors answered that "it is far from clear whether Cote's reported statement is a 'racist statement,' or what it reveals about the foreperson's views in general with respect to individuals of different races, nationalities or creeds."

The statement does not seem to be aimed at "any individual or group in a marked or virulent derogatory fashion," Tice-Raskin and Ferris wrote.

Also highlighted in the defense motion are Cote's post-trial statements to an Atlantic magazine reporter suggesting that, when deliberating, he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for London subway bombings.

The Atlantic article should be given little weight given its "double-hearsay nature," and testimony regarding jury deliberations is inadmissible, the prosecutors answered.

Beyond that, they said, the "mere fact that the foreperson recalled the London bombings or that some of the bombers were Pakistani does not suggest he is prejudiced against Pakistanis or Muslims; that recollection is simply a neutral recollection of widely reported and known information."

Additionally, case law allows a juror "to utilize his/her life experiences and general, common knowledge when evaluating evidence," they wrote.

Cote spoke in the Atlantic article in 2006 of "new rules of engagement" that he viewed as applying in terrorism cases, and said he did "not want to see the government lose its case."

The prosecutors said this statement "reflected nothing more than his belief that the intent and danger issues were difficult and complex for the jury."

On April 25, the jury found Hayat guilty of undergoing terrorist training in Pakistan, returning to Lodi prepared to wage violent jihad -- or holy war -- against fellow Americans, and lying to the FBI when initially questioned.

The 23-year-old Hayat faces up to 39 years in prison. Sentencing has been postponed while U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. considers the motion for a new trial.

Oral arguments on the motion are next month.

At the same time the jury found Hayat guilty, a separate jury deadlocked in a parallel prosecution of his father, Umer Hayat. A mistrial was declared in that case. The elder Hayat was charged with initially lying to the FBI in 2005 about his son's support of terrorism and his own firsthand knowledge of terrorist training camps in Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0127293

Umer Hayat, a Lodi ice cream street vendor, later pleaded guilty to lying to customs officials in 2003 about the amount of money he and his family were taking on a trip to Pakistan. He was sentenced in August to the 11 months he had spent in jail awaiting trial.

The primary evidence against Hamid Hayat was a lengthy, videotaped interview conducted by FBI agents over two days in June 2005. He eventually made some damaging admissions, and the interview was seen by the jurors as a confession.

Burrell erroneously rejected the defense's attempt to present James Wedick, a retired FBI agent, as an expert witness on the bureau's policies and procedures for interviews, the defense lawyers argued in their motion.

They said Wedick, a highly decorated veteran of 34 years in the bureau, would have testified that it was inappropriate to start videotaping Hayat's interview only after a "confession" had been elicited following hours of questioning.

But the prosecutors argued in Saturday's brief that Wedick's testimony "would have been needlessly confusing, cumulative and wasteful of time."

Moreover, they wrote, it "would have amounted to nothing more than an impermissible attempt by (Hayat's lawyers) to argue his case via an expert; something that defense counsel was qualified to argue and, in fact, did argue during closing."

The defense motion said Hayat truthfully told the FBI he did not attend a terrorist training camp, but he eventually was worn down by the agents' marathon interrogation.

"Wanting simply to be permitted to go home, Hayat agreed, albeit rather incoherently, to his interrogators' insistent suggestions that he had so trained," the defense lawyers wrote in the motion.

Prosecutors responded that there was no showing Wedick "had any particularized experience rendering him qualified to opine on the issue of false confessions."

Burrell was being asked "to accept nothing more than Mr. Wedick's unsupported conjecture and supposition that these confessions were somehow contaminated," the prosecutors contended.

"That was plainly insufficient," they wrote. About the writer:

The Bee's Denny Walsh can be reached at (916) 321-1189 or dwalsh@sacbee.com.

Prosecutors Rebut Hayat Request (STOCKREC)

By Jeff Hood, Lodi Bureau Chief

Stockton Record, February 4, 2007

Bid for new trial called an attempt to fix mistakes

Federal prosecutors on Saturday characterized Hamid Hayat's request for a new trial on terrorism-related charges as an attempt by his defense attorneys to fix mistakes they made before and during his case last year.

Hayat, 24, was convicted in April of aiding terrorists and lying to the FBI about it after his return to his Lodi home following a two-year visit to his ancestral homeland of Pakistan.

Hayat's attorneys in October filed a 106-page motion for a new trial, stating they have new evidence that proves Hayat did not attend a terrorist training camp. The request for a new trial also alleges U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. made several improper rulings, such as denying Hayat the right to cross-examine government informant Naseem Khan on several matters.

Defense attorneys also claim Burrell erred by not prohibiting expert testimony that would have helped the U.S.-born Hayat's case, and that there were several instances of juror misconduct.

In their 187-page reply filed early Saturday, prosecutors restated the evidence that led to Hayat's conviction, which carries a possible 38-year federal prison sentence, and then argued against each of the eight points defense attorneys cited as grounds for a new trial.

Defense attorneys have an opportunity to file a rebuttal, and both sides will offer arguments supporting their positions on March 23 in Burrell's courtroom.

Prosecutors claimed Hayat's attorneys, Wazhma Mojaddidi and Dennis Riordan, want a second chance to fix Mojaddidi's procedural errors that kept her from asking certain questions of witnesses and from calling one of her experts, retired FBI Agent Jim Wedick.

DOJ_NMG_0127294

Government attorneys called Mojaddidi's strategy during the trial "tactical gamesmanship" that backfired. They stated the defense's claim that it has new proof of Hayat's innocence - the testimony of Hayat cousins Usama Ismail and Jaber Ismail of Lodi - is not accurate, saying there is a legal difference between "newly discovered" and "newly available" evidence, because they did not subpoena Usama Ismail to testify and made no effort to obtain testimony from Jaber Ismail, who was in Pakistan during the trial.

Prosecutors downplayed the alleged juror misconduct, including a gesture by foreman Joseph Cote in which he pulled up on an imaginary noose around his neck and said "Hang him," after the second day of testimony.

"It would be fair to say that the juror's act, at most, appears to be a premature reaction to compelling government evidence, but nothing more," prosecutors Robert Tice-Raskin, Laura Ferris and Sharon Lever state in their reply.

Other instances of jurors failing to abide by Burrell's orders did not have any significant effect on the trial, they argue.

Hayat and his father, Umer, were arrested by federal authorities in June 2005 after being questioned for several hours at the FBI's Sacramento office.

A trial for Umer Hayat, 48, on two counts of lying to FBI agents ended with a hung jury. He later pleaded guilty to lying about the amount of cash he was carrying during a trip to his native Pakistan in 2003 and was released from custody in August.

Contact Lodi Bureau Chief Jeff Hood at (209) 367-7427 or jhood@recordnet.com.

Feds Say No Juror Misconduct In Lodi Terror Trial (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, February 4, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. - Defense arguments that a jury foreman was biased in the trial of a Lodi man convicted of terrorist activity are not supported by evidence, federal prosecutors said Saturday.

The federal government's comments came in a 187-page brief opposing a motion for a new trial by Hamid Hayat's defense. The defense motion is based on statements made by juror Alicia Lopez that jury foreman Joseph Cote made a "hangman gesture" and once said "hang him" in front of others on the panel.

"These bare bone allegations, on their face, are vague and ambiguous and do not constitute substantial evidence that (Cote) was actually biased against the defendant," wrote prosecutors S. Robert Tice-Raskin and Laura Ferris.

The defense motion also highlights post-trial statement's by Cote in an Atlantic magazine report suggesting that, when deliberating, he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for London subway bombings.

Prosecutors answered that the Atlantic article should be given little weight and that "it is far from clear whether Cote's reported statement is a 'racist statement,' or what it reveals about the foreperson's views in general with respect to individuals of different races, nationalities or creeds."

Hayat is a U.S. citizen of Pakistani descent. On April 25 a jury found him guilty of undergoing terrorist training in Pakistan, returning to Lodi prepared to wage violent jihad against fellow Americans, and lying to the FBI when initially questioned.

Oral arguments on the motion are next month in front of U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr.

Salah's Long Road To Clear Name (DSOUTH)

By Chris Hack, Staff writer

Daily Southtown (IL), February 4, 2007

More battles ahead

Attorneys for Mohammed Salah, who was acquitted of racketeering charges last week, have vowed to keep working to clear the name of the Bridgeview man deemed a terrorist by the federal government and to help his family lead a normal life.

"These good people have had their lives put through the wringer," longtime Salah attorney Matthew Piers said Friday. "We are not done fighting on behalf of this family."

While the long-looming threat of a hefty prison sentence may now be off the table, Salah still faces an uncertain future of civil-court judgments, restricted liberties and the stigma of the government's terrorist label.

Salah, 53, was acquitted Thursday of the terrorism-related charges after a three-month trial. He was found guilty of a far lesser charge of obstruction of justice, but the overall outcome marked a dramatic victory for the defense in a case once touted by the U.S. Justice Department as an important component of the war on terror.

DOJ_NMG_0127295

"If this is the government's idea of the war on terror, it should keep us all awake at night," said Piers, a vocal critic of several federal anti-terror cases unveiled after 9-11. "This was a political prosecution plain and simple, and I think everyone in that courtroom knew it."

In the racketeering case, Salah was accused of breaking American laws to aid the militant Palestinian group Hamas, which is considered a terrorist group by the U.S. government. According to federal prosecutors, he delivered laundered money to Hamas operatives in the Occupied Territories in the early 1990s and helped recruit would-be terrorists.

The obstruction charge normally wouldn't carry much prison time, although prosecutors might push to have Salah's 1993 conviction in an Israeli military court on Hamas money-running charges count against him here. Defense attorneys, who insist the Israeli conviction was the result of bogus confessions tortured out of Salah during a two-month interrogation session, contend Salah should receive only probation for the U.S. conviction.

Also hanging over Salah's head is a 1998 civil case filed by federal prosecutors in a bid to seize $1.4 million in cash and assets they claimed Salah meant to funnel to Hamas. That civil case was put on hold as a criminal probe into Salah's alleged Hamas links stopped and started over the years.

Records show prosecutors were prepared to settle the case in July 2001 under an agreement that would have let the government keep the cash and Salah keep his Thomas Street house. But after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, the investigation into Salah's past was rekindled and the deal died.

"It's still pending and the government plans on pursuing it," First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary Shapiro said of prosecutors' civil case after the verdict in the criminal case was announced.

Piers said he'll likely argue the case should be tossed out on double-jeopardy grounds: The criminal case included many of the same allegations as the government's civil case, and prosecutors would have moved to seize Salah's cash and assets if he had been convicted on the racketeering charge.

"Our position is that the government had their shot and they lost," Piers said. "Beyond that, the government would come off looking extremely vindictive and they would be skating on very thin ice legally."

"But we're more than ready to take on the government if they want to pursue the civil forfeiture case."

Salah's assets have been blocked by the federal government since August 1995, more than two years before he would be released from an Israeli prison and return to Bridgeview. His family initially was allowed to withdraw living expenses from the frozen money, but Piers said that arrangement ended years ago.

"They're penniless," Piers said. "They've been living off the support of people in their community, and they would have starved to death without that."

Indeed, after the racketeering acquittal Thursday, Salah pointed out that generosity among crowds of supporters swarming the Dirksen Federal Building in a tearful celebration that continued into that night at the Bridgeview mosque.

"I have to thank everyone who helped my family put food on the table," Salah said.

Salah also could someday be on the hook for a share of a $156 million judgment against him and a group of local organizations accused of financing Hamas in the 1990s. The judgment was the result of a civil lawsuit filed by the parents of a Jewish teen killed in a West Bank terrorist attack.

Although the organizations had little money and the federal government already had dibs on Salah's assets, attorneys for the teen's family have aggressively moved to seize books, fax machines and Internet domain names from the groups in an effort to dismantle what they said was once a clandestine terrorist financing network.

The judgment has been appealed, and attorneys expect a decision soon. Oral arguments in the case were heard well over a year ago; the appeals court may have been reluctant to release a ruling in the high-profile civil case while the equally high-profile criminal trial was unfolding.

But perhaps most difficult to overcome is the fact Salah was declared a "Specially Designated Terrorist" in an executive order of the U.S. government in 1997; he's still the only American citizen to hold the distinction. It means Salah needs special licenses from the U.S. Treasury Department to get a job or conduct financial transactions, must account for his spending and explain any travel plans.

DOJ_NMG_0127296

The terror classification was made outside the judicial system, but Piers said Salah may eventually mount a legal challenge to the designation now that he's been acquitted of terrorism charges 10 years after he was labeled a terrorist.

Just as his racketeering trial drew crowds of supporters for months, Salah's fight to clear his name would be closely watched in the local Muslim community.

"We hope that the suffering of the Salah family is over," Chicago director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations Ahmed Rehab said in a statement last week. "We also hope that the 'terrorism' label be reserved in the future for those found guilty of that charge in an open and fair trial administered in a respected court of law."

Robyn E. Blumner column: Truly Tortured Logic (SPT)

By ROBYN E. BLUMNER, Times Perspective Columnist

St. Petersburg (FL) Times, February 4, 2007

Canada apologizes for aiding innocent man's torture, so why can't we?

"On behalf of the United States, I wish to apologize to you and your family," President Bush told Maher Arar in a televised news conference, during which the president announced that the United States was also giving Arar $8.9-million in compensation for our role in sending the Canadian to a Syrian prison where he was tortured.

Okay, now it's time to wake up from a dream. This scene happened all right, not in the United States but in Canada, and the nobly contrite politician was Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, not our own Decider-in-Chief.

Arar's ordeal is well known. The software engineer was detained during a stopover at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport in 2002. After being subject to days of interrogation in the United States, the Canadian of Syrian descent was sent to Syria under the American program of extraordinary rendition. He spent 10 months in a grave-size cell and was tortured into signing a false confession that he was associated with terrorists and had trained in Afghanistan - a place he had never visited. He was eventually released without charge.

Since Arar's return to Canada, our neighbor to the north has committed itself to investigating its role in this outrage. A two-year inquiry by Justice Dennis O'Connor concluded that there was no evidence linking Arar to terrorism and that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were demonstrably wrong when they informed U.S. border agents that Arar was suspected of Islamic extremism. The head of the RCMP resigned over the incident.

Canada has now issued a very public apology, coming straight from its national leader, and the nation will compensate Arar for its hand in his terrifying ordeal. Harper has also promised increased oversight of Canada's intelligence agencies "to lessen the likelihood that something like this will ever happen again."

Arar responded to the prime minister's gesture by declaring: "I feel proud as a Canadian."

Before George W. Bush came to the White House, I would have expected our own government to act in a very similar manner: a public apology, the rolling of heads responsible, a promise to exert tighter controls and due compensation to the victim.

Instead, we've responded to Arar by keeping him, his wife and his children on a government watch list so that they cannot travel in or over our country or its territories. We have stymied his lawsuit against the United States for abducting and deporting him, claiming that to allow it to go forward would jeopardize state secrets. And, perhaps most galling, even though it is an open secret that we send people to other countries for interrogation where they are sure to be tortured, we continue to claim that our actions are consistent with the Convention Against Torture - a treaty that explicitly bars such conduct.

The contrast between the model of responsible and responsive governance in Canada and the sniveling, defensive, fabulizing posture of the White House and Justice Department on this matter of national character is the answer to the question: Why does the rest of the world hate us?

The Arar case is the perfect storm of Bush administration arrogance, dishonesty and incompetence coalescing with its utter disregard for the principles of due process and human rights that used to pulse at the core of our nation.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff claim that there is reason to keep Arar on a watch list. But when Canada's minister of public safety, Stockwell Day, examined Arar's confidential U.S. files, he announced that there was "nothing new" to justify any continued suspicion.

DOJ_NMG_0127297

Arar is a terrorist the same way our Iraq adventure is full of "enormous successes" as the vice president just declared. When reality doesn't fit the script, Team Bush ignores it.

Some of our nation's more responsible political leaders have tried to act more Canada-like. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., has called on the White House to "admit publicly that it was cruel to detain and transfer" Arar for torture.

And it was a moment of national pride when Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., publicly called Gonzales to the mat at a recent Senate Judiciary Committee hearing for claiming that assurances were given by Syria that Arar wouldn't be tortured.

"We knew damn well if he went to Canada he wouldn't be tortured," Leahy declared loudly. "He'd be held. He'd be investigated.

"We also knew damn well, if he went to Syria, he'd be tortured."

Gonzales could only reiterate the bald-faced lie that the United States tries to meet its antitorture treaty obligations. How lame.

When Canada is better at demonstrating American values than we are, it's time our government took a refresher in Civics 101. Learn how to apologize and admit error and maybe our great nation will live up to its billing once again.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Tells Democrats He Welcomes Iraq Debate (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Virginia (AP) -- President Bush squarely addressed the issue most on the mind of House Democrats, saying Saturday that deep divisions over the Iraq war need not bring anyone's patriotism into question.

"You know, I welcome debate in a time of war and I hope you know that," Bush said in opening remarks as the guest speaker at a retreat that drew about 200 lawmakers to a Virginia resort.

He said disagreeing with him over the war -- as many in the room do -- does not mean "you don't share the same sense of patriotism I do."

"You can get that thought out of your mind, if that's what some believe," the president said. "These are tough times, but there's no doubt in my mind that you want to secure this homeland as much as I do."

Bush's conciliatory words were similar to some of his previous statements. But the applause that followed them offered some indication that this audience was happy to hear them so directly and in person.

Democrats, who in November wrestled control of the House from Republicans for the first time in a dozen years, have yet to settle on a legislative response to Bush's war plan. It involves adding 21,500 troops to the 132,000 already in Iraq.

Deciding what any nonbinding resolution in opposition should say or what should be done if the buildup fails to stop the violence were primary topics at the lawmakers' two-day retreat.

Options could include stripping the budget of war money, capping the number of troops in Iraq or refusing to pay for future deployments.

With that in mind, Bush gave his plan a soft sell.

"I listened to many members here, I listened to members of my own party, I listened to the military and came up with a plan that I genuinely believe has the best chance of succeeding," the president said.

He received applause for repeating his insistence that Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's government in Baghdad must show tangible improvement on the political front.

"I do know we agree on some things and that is that the Maliki government is going to have to show strong leadership," Bush said. "There's benchmarks that they have got to achieve."Achievements praised

Iraq was hardly the only topic on which Bush sought to win over a crowd of skeptics with flattery and acknowledgments of differences of opinion. With Democrats now in charge in the House and Senate, he had little choice.

DOJ_NMG_0127298

Among the "big things" he singled out as prospects for bipartisan cooperation were balancing the budget, tackling budget-busting entitlements, immigration overhaul, health care, education and alternative energy production. He also frequently complimented the Democrats for their out-of-the-gate accomplishments since the session began in early January.

"I look forward to working with you," he said. "I know you've probably heard that and doubt whether it's true. It's true."

Already, Bush has granted several of the new majority's demands. He has acknowledged making mistakes in Iraq, fired Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and surrendered the fight for John Bolton to be U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Reflecting the target set by Democrats, Bush has promised a plan to balance the budget by 2012 after presiding over record deficits and tax cuts. Also, the president tentatively has agreed to increasing the federal minimum wage. The House and Senate have passed competing versions of this legislation.

The president also had a little fun at his own expense, hoping it would prove his willingness to find bipartisan consensus. His reference in his State of the Union address to their party as the "Democrat majority" -- as opposed to the "Democratic majority" -- caused grumbling and offense and he sought to make up for it.

"Now look, my diction isn't all that good," Bush said to laughter. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language. And so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

After Bush's remarks, reporters were ushered out of the room while lawmakers asked the president a few questions.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and caucus chairman Rahm Emanuel of Illinois said Democrats would focus mostly on the war in Iraq.

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said the question portion of Bush's appearance was closed to be consistent with his appearances at gatherings of congressional Republicans. At those events, Bush spoke in public but the questioning was closed "to provide frank and open discussion," Stanzel said.

He said Bush last attended the House and Senate Democratic retreats in early 2001, right after he took office.

Bush Says Iraq War Has Sapped "Our Nation's Soul" (HILL)

By Jonathan Kaplan

The Hill, February 3, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Va. – Speaking to House Democrats Saturday at a resort in this historic town, President Bush admitted that the country's morale has suffered because of the war in Iraq.

Bush said that the war in Iraq is "sapping our nation's soul," as part of his answer to a question from Rep. Susan Davis (D-Calif.) about why the burden of fighting the Iraq war has fallen primarily on the military. Davis represents San Diego where many active duty military personnel live.

Unlike a parliamentary system, U.S. lawmakers do not get to question the nation's head of state and chief executive. But Democratic aides were stunned at the pronouncement perhaps recollecting President Carter's pronouncement in 1979 that there exited a "crisis of the spirit in our country."

Bush began speaking to a packed conference of lawmakers, spouses, and a few babies (including Speaker Nancy Pelosi's newborn grandson) and children around 10:15 a.m. after arriving in Newport News, Va., via Air Force One. He was driven to the Kingsmill Resort & Spa a few miles away.

Bush attempted to charm the new majority by explaining that he meant no offense during the State of the Union address by calling them the "Democrat Party."

"My diction isn't all that good," Bush said. "Thank you for inviting the head of the Republic Party."

He also thanked the families of the lawmakers who serve in public office.

"I know it's tough...sometimes they say bad things about you in the newspaper," Bush said, chuckling himself and eliciting the same from the crowd.

At times pointed and direct, he also told them that he wants to "do some big things together" and added that he did not question the patriotism of those who disagreed with the decision to go to war in Iraq.

"You can get that thought out of your mind, if that's what some believe," the president said. "These are tough times, but there's no doubt in my mind that you want to secure this homeland as much as I do."

DOJ_NMG_0127299

Bush rattled off policy areas in which he said he wanted to make some progress, including balancing the budget, immigration, energy, Iraq and some smaller bore foreign policy issues, such as slowing the growth of HIV/AIDS and malaria in Africa.

After Bush concluded his speech, Democratic leadership aides asked the press to exit the room so that lawmakers could ask Bush some questions on the war, veterans' issues, global warming, Hurricane Katrina and immigration.

According to staffers in the room, Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.) asked a question about budget deficits, Reps. Tim Walz (D-Minn.) and Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) asked why veterans and Katrina, respectively, were not mentioned in his State of the Union address, Rep. Jay Inslee (D-Wash.) prodded Bush on global warming and Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) asked about immigration.

To Thompson's question, Bush said he did not mention national parks in his speech to the nation but that he considers those important as well.

After the speech, questions and working a rope line, Bush appeared at a press conference with Pelosi and other Democratic leaders.

Bush described the session with the lawmakers as "relaxed, informative and enjoyable," and that the questions were very good.

"We don't always agree - that's why we're in different political parties," he said.

Bush: War Is "Sapping Our Soul" (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, February 3, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Va. – President Bush told a closed-door gathering of House Democrats Saturday that the war in Iraq was "sapping our soul in some ways," according to congressional aides who heard him.

During the private question-and-answer session, Rep. Susan Davis, D-Calif., had asked the president whether he agreed the effort in Iraq amounted to "a military at war and not a country at war," congressional aides said.

Later, in a meeting with reporters, both Bush and House Democratic leaders sounded notes of bipartisanship. But asked whether the president had responded to Democrats' criticism of his plan to send more troops to Iraq, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., offered a flat: "No."

"The president really stood his ground on Iraq," she said.

In other questions from Democrats to the president, according to the aides:

Rep. John Tanner of Tennessee asked what Bush would do to reduce the budget deficit and foreign debt. Rep. Tim Walz of Minnesota asked how he would handle skyrocketing medical costs for veterans. Rep. Luis Gutierrez of Illinois asked about comprehensive immigration reform. Rep. Bennie G. Thompson of Mississippi wanted to know what the president would do to improve rebuilding of the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina. And Rep. Jay Inslee of Washington raised concerns about the declining number of polar bears and increased risk of flooding in a question about global warming.

All of the questions followed Bush's brief speech to the Democrats.

In it, he drew applause when he mentioned common goals such as comprehensive immigration reform, promoting democracy in Afghanistan, eradicating disease in Africa and remaining focused on the humanitarian crisis in Darfur.

But Democrats sat on their hands when he renewed his call for new heath care legislation.

On Iraq, he stressed common ground.

"We agree on some things - that the Maliki government will have to show strong leadership," he said, drawing applause, in a reference to Prime Minister Jawad al Maliki.

Speaking at the House Democrats' retreat for the first time since 2001, Bush led off with a little conciliatory charm, joking about his reference to the "Democrat majority" in the State of the Union address, a choice of words that many Democrats had viewed as a calculated insult.

"My diction isn't all that good," the president ventured. "I've been accused of occasionally mangling the English language, so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

DOJ_NMG_0127300

The quip drew laughs and applause.

Referring to four Pelosi generations, the president wondered how her father would have reacted to her becoming the first female speaker, mentioning the recent birth of her sixth grandchild and praising the child's mother, Alexandra Pelosi, for being "spunky."

He called House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Md., a "down-to-earth, no-nonsense guy."

And Hoyer took the comment as a genuine bipartisan gesture.

"I thought it was the expression of a sincere desire on part of the president and the caucus that we do want to work together," Hoyer said.

Bush Drops In On House Democrats (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, VA. — Venturing into enemy territory, President Bush traveled to a retreat for House Democrats on Saturday to invite the new congressional majority to work with him on immigration, energy and even national security.

"I do know we agree on some things," the president told a ballroom full of lawmakers and their families in a carefully choreographed meeting of Washington's competing centers of power.

Bush sought to turn on the charm for his Democratic rivals, cracking jokes about his diction and showering praise on House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco and her new grandson (who also got a hug from the president, days after getting one from former President Clinton).

"I kind of remembered — help me remember the good old days," Bush said later in brief remarks to reporters. The president had not gone to House Democrats' annual retreat since 2001, shortly after he took office.

But even the meticulous planning that went into the encounter could not conceal the deep divisions between the White House and the Democratic majority on Capitol Hill. Pelosi introduced the president from a lectern bearing the slogan "Governing for a New Direction," but he spoke from his own lectern, emblazoned with the presidential seal, a few feet away.

No issue brought out the divisions more than the war in Iraq. The president devoted less than two minutes of his 16-minute address to the subject. And his attempt to highlight common ground over the feeling that the Iraqi government should do more to bridge sectarian divisions offered little comfort to his critics.

The president suggested, as he has before, that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki would have to meet a list of "benchmarks," including providing adequate troops to help American soldiers in Baghdad.

But Bush did not discuss timetables for Maliki's government or specify consequences if it should fail — omissions that have been repeatedly criticized by Democrats.

After his speech, Bush faced several tough questions from lawmakers in a private question-and-answer session, according to members of Congress and aides who were in the room.

In response to one question about Iraq, the president, who as recently as a few months ago insisted that America was winning, acknowledged that if he were asked about the conflict by a pollster, he would express concern as well. Large majorities of Americans say they believe the war is going poorly.

Bush also said the war was "sapping our souls," according to people in the room.

"The president's body language changed," one lawmaker said. "He was quite defensive." The White House and the Democratic caucus had carefully negotiated how many questions the president would face, ultimately agreeing that the Democrats could ask six — and only after reporters left the room.

In addition to the question about Iraq, which was asked by San Diego Rep. Susan A. Davis, lawmakers also asked about immigration, the budget and the government response to Hurricane Katrina.

In public, however, Bush, Pelosi and other Democratic leaders took pains to avoid appearing partisan.

In opening his speech, the president joked about having used the term "Democrat Party" in his recent State of the Union address — a phrase that some lawmakers interpreted as derogatory.

DOJ_NMG_0127301

"Now, look, my diction isn't all that good," the president said. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language. And so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

Democrats laughed appreciatively.

"Still has the touch," Pelosi noted later.

But some of her caucus seemed less impressed.

"I think people were grateful he came. But Iraq is the issue," said Massachusetts Rep. Jim McGovern, who staunchly opposes the war. "It is the issue that concerns most Americans … and telling jokes and hugging babies is not going to make these tough issues go away."

Bush Puts "Ic" Back In "Democrat Party" (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, February 3, 2007

Williamsburg, Va. (AP) -- Relying on self-deprecating jokes, unusual candor and outright flattery, President Bush on Saturday wooed lawmakers he not only needs but will have to answer to in the final two years of his presidency.

Bush had not seen fit to attend a Democratic congressional retreat since 2001, his first year in office. But the new political reality that has Democrats in charge of Capitol Hill for the first time in a dozen years changed his mind. When he appeared before House Democrats at a Virginia resort, he seemed to be trying to make up for lost time.

With his first words, he sought to put to rest one bone of contention between the White House and the new congressional majority: The dropped "ic."

Democrats found it demeaning when the president, in his State of the Union address last month, referred to the "Democrat majority," as opposed to the "Democratic majority."

"Now look, my diction isn't all that good," Bush told the 200 lawmakers who wrapped up two days away from Washington with family and aides. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language. And so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

He got hearty laughs. And he was careful to keep the "ic" firmly tacked on for the rest of his remarks.

Bush's address was followed by a private session. With the media ushered out of the room, lawmakers were allowed to ask the president a half-dozen questions that covered Iraq, immigration, education and other topics.

Even though this was expected to be the toughest part of Bush's foray onto Democratic turf, both he and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California emerged with good things to say.

"We were honored by your presence," Pelosi told Bush. "We're also encouraged by your remarks."

Speaking to reporters after the president had departed for Washington, she added: "Let's make no mistake. The choice is bipartisanship or stalemate. We have to work together."

Still, divisions over Iraq were never far.

One of the primary topics at the retreat was how to legislate opposition to Bush's overhauled Iraq strategy, which involves adding 21,500 troops to the 132,000 already in the country.

Democrats have not settled conclusively on the approach for any anti-war resolution or on what action to take if the buildup fails to halt the violence.

Bush explained how he settled on his proposal.

"I listened to many members here. I listened to members of my own party. I listened to the military and came up with a plan that I genuinely believe has the best of succeeding," he said.

The president earned applause for repeating his insistence that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government in Baghdad must show tangible improvement on the political front. "The Maliki government is going to have to show strong leadership," Bush said.

Seeking to earn his bipartisan stripes, he also said that opposing him on the war — as many in the room do — does not mean "you don't share the same sense of patriotism I do."

DOJ_NMG_0127302

"You know, I welcome debate in a time of war and I hope you know that," the president said. "These are tough times, but there's no doubt in my mind that you want to secure this homeland as much as I do."

Bush's conciliatory words were similar to statements he has made before. But the applause offered some indication that this audience was pleased to hear them so directly and in person.

In the private session, Bush told the Democrats he empathizes with their anguish, saying the war is "sapping our soul," according to two officials who attended the session. They spoke on condition of anonymity because it was a closed meeting.

Pelosi heard nothing to suggest the president is bending to any criticism.

"The president really stood his ground on Iraq. He explained why additional troops would be needed and why it would work this time," she said, adding parenthetically, "even though it had failed four times before."

No matter the topic, the president stayed on point, saying he wants to work together on "big things" and he respects that Democrats disagree on some issues:

_On balancing the budget and the spending blueprint for 2008 that he submits Monday to Congress, he said, "Some of it you'll like, some of it you won't like, but it achieves the goal that we have said, which is to balance the budget."

_On addressing the looming insolvency of entitlement programs such as Social Security, he said, "I'm under no illusions of how hard it's going to be. The only thing I want to share with you is, is my desire to see if we can't work together to get it done."

_On his proposal to make health insurance more available through changes in tax laws, he said, "I've already heard from some members who thought it was a lousy idea, I understand that. But please look at it in depth."

Bush brushed past the veto threats his aides have issued for one-third of the agenda that Pelosi's caucus approved in the House's first 100 hours of the year.

Instead, he focused on compliments, on the Democrats' choice of Pelosi — "this fine woman" — as the first female speaker ever and for their approval this past week of billions for fighting AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas.

"I look forward to working with you," he said. "I know you've probably heard that and you doubt whether it's true. It's true."

At Democrats' Meeting, Bush Appeals For Cooperation (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Paul Kane

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Feb. 3 -- President Bush, forced by circumstance to reach out to some of his strongest adversaries, appealed directly to House Democrats on Saturday to work with him to reform the immigration system, limit the cost of Social Security, curb the consumption of gasoline and balance the federal budget.

Visiting the Democrats' annual retreat for the first time since 2001, the president told lawmakers there are "big things" they could accomplish by working together and sought to defuse any bad blood with self-deprecating humor. He opened his public remarks with an allusion to his tendency to mispronounce the name of the rival party by calling it the Democrat Party, seen by many party activists as a calculated insult.

"I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party," Bush said to laughter. He drew scattered applause a few moments later when he used the correct name in calling on the "Democratic Party" to work with him to address the mounting future liabilities of Social Security and Medicare.

Democrats rose to politely applaud Bush before and after the speech, a sign of the outwardly cordial and respectful nature of the day's session.

Democrats had a rare opportunity to question the president directly, using a private session after his speech to press him on Iraq, immigration, global warming, the deficit and the absence of Hurricane Katrina and veterans' issues in his recent State of the Union address. While Bush asked Democrats to keep the conversation private, some people present said he gave no ground on his basic position on the war but was upfront in talking about its impact on the populace.

According to some Democrats present, Rep. Susan A. Davis (Calif.) told Bush about her concern that the military is fighting a war without the rest of the country sharing the sacrifice. Bush disagreed with that proposition, according to the Democrats there; he said that the war is psychologically draining for the entire country and that it is "sapping our souls" in some ways.

DOJ_NMG_0127303

Bush also defended his plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, saying that they would operate under new rules of engagement and that they could clear and hold troublesome areas. One senior Democratic staffer present said Bush spoke favorably of some of the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, the commission that recently evaluated the administration's war policy, such as embedding Americans to train Iraqi forces and eventually withdrawing U.S. troops. But he said there is too much sectarian violence to carry out such recommendations immediately.

The friendly tone, as described by officials on both sides of the day's session, was a marked change from a campaign season of heated rhetoric from Bush and the Democrats and followed six years of mistrust and lack of cooperation. As he closed his unsuccessful campaign last year to hold GOP majorities in Congress, for example, Bush described the Democratic war strategy as "The terrorists win, and America loses." In a 2004 interview with the San Francisco Chronicle, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), now House speaker, called Bush an "incompetent leader."

Deep divisions remain, especially on the war, and despite the talk of bipartisan goodwill, Pelosi was already making plans Saturday morning for symbolic showdowns with the White House on international affairs. Before Bush arrived at the Kingsmill Resort for the House members' strategy session, she told her caucus that they will be voting on a no-confidence resolution on the president's plan to send additional troops to Iraq.

Moreover, Pelosi told her colleagues that if it appears likely that Bush wants to take the country to war against Iran, the House would take up a bill to deny him the authority to do so, according to Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly.

Still, both sides may have incentives to cooperate in the next year or so. If Bush has any hope of domestic achievements in the remainder of his term, he must find Democratic votes, while many top Democrats concede they are under some pressure to show that they can be more than just an opposition party.

The president spent close to half an hour shaking hands and greeting people at the end of the question-and-answer session. He also spent time holding and hugging Pelosi's sixth grandchild, born shortly after the November elections. Pelosi's daughter, Alexandra Pelosi, is a documentary filmmaker whose 2002 film "Journeys with George" chronicled the president's 2000 campaign. She had a front-row seat Saturday and was filming the event with a hand-held camera.

"I felt welcomed," Bush said as he and the House speaker met with reporters afterward. "I felt like people understood that I've got pressures on me, like I understand they have pressures on them. And I really hope that the members out there get a sense that I bear no ill will, I bring no animosity about the fact that we may not agree on every position."

Pelosi said she came away "encouraged" by the president's remarks. After Bush left to return to the White House, Pelosi said she believes there is room for compromise with him on three areas: a jobs innovation program, energy independence and immigration.

"The choice is bipartisanship or stalemate," she said.

In the private session, two Democrats -- freshman Rep. Tim Walz (Minn.) and Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.) -- pushed the president in separate questions on why he did not talk about veterans' issues or the relief effort for Hurricane Katrina victims in his opening remarks to the caucus or in his State of the Union address.

Bush defended his record in those areas and said his silence in a particular speech should not be interpreted as a lack of concern, Democrats present said. As an example, Bush said he cares about maintaining national parks, even though the subject did not come up in the State of the Union.

Some Democrats said they remain wary of Bush. In his question to the president, Rep. Luis V. Gutierrez (Ill.) said it is difficult for Democrats to trust Bush on immigration after Republicans used the issue "so brutally" against his party in the elections -- a remark that drew a loud ovation from other Democrats, according to people in attendance.

Bush said Democrats are not the only ones with "arrows" in their backs, a reference to the deep divisions in his own party on immigration. He spoke about his desire to combine tough border enforcement and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants, and he indicated a hope to keep politics out of the debate.

After he was pressed by Rep. Jay Inslee (Wash.) about curbing carbon emissions to reduce global warming, Bush strongly defended his environmental record and the progress of the nation. According to some in the room, Bush told Inslee not to assume that he does not care as much about greenhouse gasses as Inslee does.

DOJ_NMG_0127304

Bush Meets With Democrats On Their Turf (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Va., Feb. 3 — In a rare appearance before an audience of Democrats, President Bush said Saturday that he did not question the patriotism of those who disagreed with his Iraq strategy and asked lawmakers not to let dissension over the war entirely erode their trust in him.

"I welcome debate in a time of war, and I hope you know that," Mr. Bush said. "Nor do I consider a belief that if you don't happen to agree with me, you don't share the same sense of patriotism I do. You can get that thought out of your mind if that's what some believe."

The president's words were met with applause from House Democrats, who gathered here at a secluded resort along the James River for their annual issues conference. Newly in control of Congress, Democrats invited Mr. Bush to their retreat, eager to show that they could no longer be overlooked by the White House.

"The choice," said Representative Nancy Pelosi, the House speaker, "is bipartisanship or stalemate."

So for nearly two hours, Mr. Bush held forth with some of the very Democrats he has spent the better part of six years sparring with. He spoke to members of Congress and their spouses, took pointed questions in a private session about Iraq, the budget deficit and immigration, and shook hands and posed for pictures.

"I'm looking forward to working with you," Mr. Bush said, gesturing to those seated in the crowded ballroom. "I know you've probably heard that and you doubt whether it's true — but it's true. We're going to do big things together."

The political reality, of course, requires Mr. Bush to work with Democrats in the final two years of his presidency if he wants his legacy to include legislation like overhauling the nation's immigration and health care systems, and beginning to curb America's dependence on foreign oil.

"A great goal is a comprehensive immigration bill," Mr. Bush said. "In order to get it done, it's going to require members in the House and the Senate — Republican members, Democratic members — finding common ground, and the White House wants to help."

The president's speech, which lasted about 16 minutes, was interrupted by applause 21 times. Occasionally, the clapping seemed tepid, as some legislators looked across the room to see whether fellow Democrats were joining in. At other times, particularly if Mr. Bush delivered a self-deprecating line, the clapping boomed.

He began his remarks with such a moment, saying he meant no ill will at the State of the Union address when he referred to the lawmakers as members of the "Democrat Party." The remark stirred a mini-dustup among some Democrats, who believed he was being pejorative.

"Look, my diction isn't all that good," Mr. Bush said. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language, so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

The event's cordiality stood in contrast to the coming days on Capitol Hill, where the Congress is heading toward a confrontation with the White House over Iraq policy. In a private session with lawmakers, several participants said, Mr. Bush conceded the war is "sapping our soul," but he said he intended to pursue his plan to send more troops to Iraq.

"We share a common goal," Mr. Bush said in his public remarks, "and that is to keep America safe."

In his weekly radio address on Saturday, Mr. Bush said the top priority of the budget he will submit to Congress on Monday was "keeping America safe and winning the war against extremists who want to destroy our way of life." He intends to request nearly three-quarters of a trillion dollars in military spending, which Democrats vowed to thoroughly scrutinize.

Mr. Bush did not wade deeply into the specifics of his budget proposals in his speech to Democrats, but he warned with a smile, "Some of it you'll like, some of it you won't."

Before Mr. Bush arrived, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the House majority leader, conceded that some Democrats were not thrilled about their guest speaker. "There was a little controversy about the president coming," he said. "Some of our members said, 'Well, why is he coming down?' "

But by the time he left the room, the president's critics almost certainly were not won over, yet they said they felt empowered by being able to ask questions and raise concerns after spending most of Mr. Bush's presidency in the minority.

DOJ_NMG_0127305

"Look, we don't always agree," Mr. Bush said. "That's why we're in different parties."

A Decider Meets 535 More Of 'Em (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

GEORGE W. BUSH was never one to cozy up to Capitol Hill.

From the outset of his presidency, Mr. Bush treated the Republican-run Congress like a tool at his disposal. If he invited lawmakers to the White House, it was to speak, not to listen. Rob Simmons, a moderate Republican from Connecticut who lost his House seat in November, recalls how a colleague recounted that Ronald Reagan invited freshman lawmakers in, four at a time, just to hear what was on their minds.

"I never had that opportunity, and that's a little disappointing, because when it comes to intelligence issues, I think I have something to offer," said Mr. Simmons, a former military intelligence officer who spent 10 years as a spy with the C.I.A. "The best I could do was to be invited in a fairly large group, up to 20 people, to receive essentially a briefing on the president's position."

Now that Democrats are in charge, the president is making a great show of Congressional outreach. Consider the last week: On Tuesday, Mr. Bush agreed on a bipartisan panel to advise him on the war. On Wednesday, the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, dropped by the Oval Office to report on her trip to Iraq. On Friday, Mr. Bush held a White House reception for Republican senators. On Saturday, he was headed to Williamsburg, Va., to a House Democratic retreat.

But there is little evidence that the Congressional courtship has influenced the president who famously called himself "the decider," whether the issue is Social Security or the decision to send more troops to Iraq. So this week, the Senate plans to push back, taking up a bipartisan resolution condemning the new Iraq strategy. The debate is more than a simple policy dispute, or even a public rebuke of the way Mr. Bush has managed the war.

It is a lawmakers' revolution, of sorts, an uprising against the way Mr. Bush has treated the 535 people who spend their workdays at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

"What has become clear with the troop surge is that there is not just a policy difference, but a real level of personal animosity as well," said Julian E. Zelizer, a professor of history at Boston University who writes frequently about Congress. "There's no trust. There's no respect. There's no love."

That animosity is palpable not only among Democrats — who are suddenly in the unfamiliar position of no longer being ignored by Mr. Bush — but also Republicans. Lawmakers of both parties are irked by the president's muscular expansion of executive authority, and what they see as his cavalier attitude toward their constitutional authority as a co-equal branch.

"The president repeatedly makes reference to the fact that he is the decider," Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the senior Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said about troop levels last week. "I would respectfully suggest to the president that he is not the sole decider, that the decider is a joint and shared responsibility."

Even Senator Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, the senior Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee who often backs the administration, tried to warn Mr. Bush to pay Congress more heed.

"The administration has been inclined not to disregard Congress, but to not take Congress very seriously," Mr. Lugar told Fox News in December. "I think this time Congress has to be taken seriously."

From his first days in Washington, Mr. Bush expected his fellow Republicans to work uncomplainingly in service of his agenda. And they did. Party unity was tight; White House officials say there were few policy disagreements that required the kind of discussions Mr. Bush has initiated over Iraq. Instead, the president devoted himself to campaigning to get Republicans re-elected.

Still, tensions built. When Senator Trent Lott, the Mississippi Republican, ran into trouble over remarks considered racially inappropriate, the White House did the unthinkable, inserting itself into Congressional affairs to orchestrate Mr. Lott's ouster. When Senator John Thune, the South Dakota Republican who passed up a bid for a governorship because Mr. Bush asked him to run for the Senate instead, wanted help saving a military base in his state, the White House spurned his request.

DOJ_NMG_0127306

"The attitude in the White House was, 'They're going to need us more than we need them,' " said Scott Reed, a Republican strategist. "The president liked to campaign, he liked to have an active schedule raising money for candidates, and there was a belief that was enough."

Now Mr. Bush is paying the price, says James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University. "Are the chickens coming home to roost?" Mr. Thurber asked. "Yes. If he had been a real solid guy with Republicans along the way, they'd be with him now, a lot more than they are."

Presidents past have used the power and glamour of the White House to stroke the occupants of Capitol Hill but also to forge relationships that produced legislation. President Bill Clinton got along with Newt Gingrich when he was speaker of the House, and the two paired to overhaul the welfare system. Lyndon Johnson, a creature of Congress and a master at manipulating it, maintained strong ties on Capitol Hill, even during the darkest days of Vietnam.

"As he struggled himself with his presidency, he wasn't isolated from legislators," Professor Zelizer said. "I think it's very different with this president."

With just two years left in the administration, White House officials say the president hopes to persuade Democrats to work with him on domestic issues like immigration and energy, even as they thwart him on Iraq. Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said the aim is for Mr. Bush to reassure his own party that "he's still a Republican" and "at the same time find common ground with Democrats."

The effort has not gone unnoticed. Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, jokes that he has been to the White House so often that, "I'm going to get a coffee cup and leave it there." Mrs. Pelosi's aides say she was touched when Mr. Bush, in his State of the Union Address, introduced her as "Madam Speaker" with a flourish — a moment so carefully orchestrated that White House aides deleted it from the advance text to preserve an element of surprise.

Yet even there, Mr. Bush stumbled, referring to the "Democrat Party," a phrase Democrats find insulting — though the president later said he meant no offense. And just last week, Mr. Bush grabbed more power for the White House, signing a directive giving the administration greater control over rule-making on matters of public health, safety and the environment.

"We're going to give him the benefit of the doubt," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. "But in my view, the most important test is: Are they going to shed the Dick Cheney view of the Congress, which is that it is a second-class branch of government?"

And therein lies the rub for Mr. Bush as he tries to repair his frayed relations with Capitol Hill. Unless he gives ground on policy matters, playing nice with lawmakers is not going to do him much good. Senator Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who is a lead sponsor of the resolution opposing the Iraq policy, gives Mr. Bush good marks for trying.

"But there is a difference," she said, "between being heard, and being heeded."

Bush Builds Bonds With House Democrats At Retreat (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG -- President Bush and House Democrats got off to a good start in finding common ground yesterday at the Democrats' annual retreat -- with Mr. Bush saying they even share a bond in having been shot in the back by Republicans on immigration.

"You are not the only one with arrows in your back," the president said during a closed-door question-and-answer session with the House Democratic Caucus, according to two individuals who were in the room.

He was responding to Rep. Luis Gutierrez, Illinois Democrat, who said Republicans had been merciless during last year's elections in attacking Democrats on border security. He asked Mr. Bush to win more Republican support for the Democrats' preferred bill.

To a round of applause, the president said he will fight for a bill that does not deport illegal aliens. Mr. Bush said it would be a mistake to miss the opportunity for reform this year and let the issue enter the 2008 election campaign, when he worried it would become too political.

DOJ_NMG_0127307

Immigration is one issue on which Mr. Bush may fare better with Democrats in control than with his own party. But, dependent on Democrats for his final two years, the president has made overtures on a host of other issues during the past month that he hopes can come to fruition under the new regime.

Yesterday, Democratic leaders said he convinced them he wants to work with them on some issues.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat, said Mr. Bush's acknowledgment of global warming in his State of the Union address and of growing "income inequality" in a speech on Wall Street last week both bode well, as did his admission that the Iraq war isn't going well and his early steps to increase education spending.

"We had plenty of common ground, which the president was willing to acknowledge," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said after the session.

During her introduction, she invoked Lincoln's second inaugural address calling for reconciliation between the North and South "with malice toward none, with charity for all."

She said Democrats can work with Mr. Bush on what she called the "three i's" -- immigration, energy independence and innovation for the economy.

The president broke the ice with Democrats by explaining his use of the term "Democrat Party" during his State of the Union address last month. The phrase had angered some lawmakers, who consider it a slur.

"Look, my diction isn't all that good," Mr. Bush explained, drawing chuckles. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language, and so, I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

The president assured Democrats he doesn't question their patriotism for disagreeing with his Iraq policy.

"You can get that thought out of your mind, if that's what some believe," he said, to a smattering of applause.

That's a change from the past, when Mr. Bush has wondered whether his political opponents would "forget the lessons of September 11th." And it's a sharp departure from the midterm campaign last year, when Republicans accused Democrats of favoring a "cut-and-run" strategy.

The president drew the biggest applause when he talked about spending on AIDS in Africa and keeping pressure on Sudan to find a solution to the mass killing and displacement in the Darfur region of that northeast African nation.

He faced six questions during the closed portion, including why his new Iraq plan would succeed when past troop surges have failed, what he plans to do about the size of the national debt, and whether he would agree to mandatory caps on carbon emissions to curb global warming.

Mr. Bush didn't outright reject caps, but said his focus on technology is a smarter approach. He also said Kyoto treaty-style caps, such as ones that Europeans have adopted, have failed and said fast-growing Asian countries won't participate in that solution, anyway, leaving technology as the only path.

Mr. Bush also was asked why he didn't mention Hurricane Katrina or veterans during his State of the Union address. He compared those issues to the national park system, saying he didn't talk about it either, but still considers it important.

One person in the room said Mr. Bush "sounded very defensive" on Katrina.

It was the first time since 2001 that the president addressed one of the Democratic caucus' annual retreats. He spoke to both House and Senate Democrats that year.

Mr. Bush was so warmly received yesterday that he stayed in the room to shake hands for a half-hour after he was done answering questions.

Protesters weren't allowed at the King's Mill resort, where the gathering took place, but they congregated on a corner just outside the complex.

"Stop funding; start impeaching; mandate peace" read the painted slogan on the back of one panel truck driving the streets nearby.

At Least 130 Die As Blast Levels Baghdad Market (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel, Qais Mizher

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127308

BAGHDAD, Sunday, Feb. 4 — A mammoth truck bomb obliterated a popular central Baghdad market on Saturday, ripping through scores of shops and flattening apartment buildings, killing at least 130 people and wounding more than 300 in the worst of a series of horrific attacks against Shiites in recent weeks.

The attack was the work of a suicide bomber who detonated about one ton of explosives in the bustling Sadriya market, in a largely Shiite enclave at 5 p.m., as shoppers finished buying food for dinner and men sipped coffee at cafes nearby, the police said. It was the deadliest single bomb blast since the United States invasion almost four years ago.

The bombing, the fourth major attack against a densely populated Shiite area in less than three weeks, seemed sure to inflame Shiite political and militia leaders just as more than 20,000 American troops begin to arrive in an attempt to stop the civil war that threatens to tear Iraq apart.

The unrelenting killing of Shiites also promises to put more pressure on Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who finds himself squeezed between American demands to crack down on Shiite militias and his fellow Shiites' increasing belief that the militias are their best defense against Sunni insurgents.

American commanders say that in recent weeks, as Mr. Maliki has tried to show he is supporting the current plan to secure Baghdad, top Shiite government officials have meddled less in the Americans' efforts to pursue militia leaders.

But Shiite community leaders say that as a result, they are now more exposed to Sunni insurgent attacks. And some Shiite militia commanders acknowledge that they have reduced militia checkpoints to avoid confrontation with American forces.

Within hours of the bombing, Mr. Maliki denounced the attack as the work of "Saddamists" and other Sunni insurgents.

The chaotic scene after the blast suggested how much pressure Shiite political leaders would face to seek revenge against Sunnis for the recent attacks: as onlookers cursed the Iraqi government for not protecting them from Sunni militants, Shiite militiamen descended on the area, angrily questioning people they believed did not belong in the neighborhood.

The bomber struck close to the middle of the narrow market, which stretches for about an eighth of a mile, killing everyone nearby and dozens more in collapsed apartment buildings and coffeehouses that line the market, witnesses said.

"Look at all these buildings," shouted Qadir Ali Ismael, a 41-year-old vegetable seller who escaped the blast. "There were families living in these apartments and they didn't find anyone alive in there. All of those people were killed!"

The attack left a crater 15 feet long, 10 feet wide and 5 feet deep. Blast waves left buildings a block away badly damaged.

Police officers rushed frantically to rescue wounded people trapped inside buildings, only to find that they could not break through damaged doors to get inside. By the time they did, some of the wounded had bled to death, said Abu Ali, who runs a health clinic a few blocks from the market.

"The doors wouldn't open," he said. "The rescuers are getting there too late." He said he treated more than 40 people himself, mostly children and women, and quickly ran out of first-aid supplies.

As the loudspeaker of a nearby Shiite mosque called for people to donate blood, American Humvees took up positions on a street that leads to a nearby Sunni neighborhood, apparently in an effort to prevent clashes between the sects.

Anger spread through the crowd that gathered at the blast site as people said that the attack was the work of Sunni insurgents. Although no group claimed responsibility by early morning Sunday, suspicion fell on Sunni militants, who have conducted large-scale suicide bombings in the past.

One elderly man, crying and shouting, was surrounded by younger men.

"They tried to kill us because we are Shia," the older man said. "Why are there no bombs in Adhamiya?," he said, referring to a large Sunni district of Baghdad. "Maliki and the Americans are the sons of dogs because they do nothing to protect us."

Grieving relatives rushed to hospitals. At the Imam Ali Hospital in the Sadr City neighborhood, the refrigerated portion of the morgue quickly filled and bodies were piled up next to it. People tried to donate blood, but were told to go to a blood bank that is in a dangerous area of Baghdad.

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, condemned the attack as an "example of what the forces of evil will do to intimidate the Iraqi people." And the White House called the bombing an atrocity, saying, "Free nations of the world must not stand by while terrorists commit mass murder in an attempt to derail democratic progress in Iraq and throughout the greater Middle East."

DOJ_NMG_0127309

Several Sunni neighborhoods came under retaliatory attack Saturday night. A Western official said Adhamiya was struck by several mortars, and an Interior Ministry official said another Sunni neighborhood in eastern Baghdad, Slaykh, was also hit by at least three mortar rounds.

The death toll on Saturday eclipsed the number in September 2005 attack in a Shiite area of Baghdad and one in the February 2005 bombing of a Hilla market, each of which killed at least 120 people. The largest overall attack remains a series of bombs that killed about 200 people in Sadr City last November.

With Saturday's bombing, more than 400 people have been killed in about a half-dozen bomb attacks on Shiite areas in Baghdad and Hilla in just the past three weeks. The Sadriya market was also hit by two large bombs in early December.

Saturday's attack came as both the Iraqi and United States governments have committed to yet another attempt to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. Many Democrats and some Republicans have assailed the White House for its decision to send extra troops.

The United States Senate is most likely to vote soon on a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop buildup.

Earlier on Saturday, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, repeated his call for Muslims to "stand together and repel division and reject sectarian rifts," and he denounced those who he said were "deepening the sectarian disputes between the Muslims."

The calamity in Baghdad came after a bloody day throughout the rest of Iraq that included a coordinated volley of seven car bombs in Kirkuk, apparently the latest strike by insurgents seeking to thwart Kurdish efforts to fully annex the disputed oil-rich city.

The first Kirkuk suicide attacker detonated his bomb-laden Toyota near the offices of the powerful Kurdistan Democratic Party at about 10:30 a.m., killing one civilian and wounding 17 others while damaging 10 nearby houses, according to Burhan Habib Tayeb, a senior police officer in Kirkuk. Other reports placed the casualty toll at 2 dead and 30 wounded.

The next four car bombs were detonated about every 10 minutes, beginning at 11 a.m. One wounded two students at a school for girls and another wounded four people at a gas station. Two more bombs went off later in the day, wounding two civilians, said a Kirkuk police captain, Emad Jasim.

Gunmen fatally struck Iraqi forces twice in Samarra, north of Baghdad, where the destruction of a Shiite shrine last February set off a wave of sectarian violence. Gunmen struck a police checkpoint north of the city about 7:30 a.m., killing six policemen and wounding six more, a police official said. Four Iraqi soldiers were later killed just south of the city after gunmen attacked their checkpoint. Three other soldiers were wounded, and three of the gunmen were killed, the police official said.

The Iraqi police also battled insurgents in a neighborhood of western Mosul on Saturday, while a large bomb wounded three policemen in another part of western Mosul, a police official said. Several insurgents were killed in the gun battle, but no policemen died, he said.

Iraqi forces imposed a curfew in Kirkuk, Mosul and Samarra following the violence.

The American military on Saturday reported the deaths of six more servicemen. Two soldiers assigned to units in insurgent-dominated Anbar Province in western Iraq died Friday from "wounds sustained due to enemy action," the American military announced. The names and specific units were not released.

Two other soldiers based near Baghdad were killed when a roadside bomb struck their patrol south of the capital on Friday.

A soldier from the 13th Sustainment Command (Expeditionary) died from an apparent heart attack after physical training on Friday, while another from the same command died Jan. 30 from "noncombat-related causes" during a two-week leave, the military said.

At Least 125 Killed In Blast At Baghdad Market (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 3 -- A suicide bomber detonated more than a ton of explosives in a market in central Baghdad late Saturday afternoon, killing at least 125 people and wounding 300 in the deadliest single bombing in the capital since the war started.

DOJ_NMG_0127310

The blast at the al-Sadriya market in a predominantly Shiite Muslim area leveled at least three buildings and set fire to dozens of businesses, trapping scores of people under piles of rubble.

The explosives were hidden under produce and bags of groceries in the back of a pickup truck that the driver parked near an entrance to the market.

"It's a massacre," said Tahsin Abu Lubna, who lives near the area. "It's like a slaughterhouse. You can see blood everywhere. It's an unbelievable sight."

The attack followed a recent string of bombings targeting places where Shiites congregate in Baghdad and elsewhere in the country. Officials say Sunni insurgents are behind the violence, which comes as the Iraqi government and U.S. military are stepping up security in the capital as an intended first step to restoring order in Iraq.

Ambulances rushed to the scene after the bombing, but many of the corpses and the wounded were loaded on the back of pickup trucks.

"They were carrying the bodies like sheep," Abu Lubna said in a phone interview as he watched emergency vehicles stream out of the devastated area outside his window.

A 29-year-old mechanic who works nearby said he rushed to the scene to help.

"This is a real disaster," said the mechanic, who gave only his first name, Amjad. "I carried four bodies," he added, including two he recognized: a yogurt vendor and a man who sold tea.

Iraqi officials said that determining the exact death toll would take at least a day.

"The bodies are still under the destroyed buildings, so this is why it is hard to have a final number now," Maj. Gen. Jihad al-Jabiri, an explosives expert at the Interior Ministry, said on state-run al-Iraqiya television.

Iraqi news stations showed piles of bloody bodies lying in the street outside a hospital.

"The hospitals are equipped to handle this number of casualties because they get used to it," Health Minister Ali Hussein al-Shamari said on the state-run station.

Ali Dabbagh, a spokesman for the Iraqi prime minister, said authorities suspect that a Sunni insurgent group sponsored the attack. Most recent large bombs in Iraq have been detonated during the morning hours, but the two large bombings this week -- two suicide bombers killed dozens of shoppers at a bazaar in the southern city of Hilla on Thursday -- came in the evening.

"They're trying to change their strategy," Dabbagh said. "They change in order to show that they have the upper hand."

Dabbagh said the pickup truck used in Saturday's attack did not have a license plate, making it difficult to trace it to the bomber's accomplices.

Dabbagh blamed Syria for not doing enough to stop the violence, saying that 50 percent of insurgents enter Iraq through Syria.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki attributed the attack to "forces of evil and terrorism" driven by "Saddamists and Baathists" who have "cheapened the blood of innocent civilians."

The market has been struck at least twice before, last month and in December.

Shoppers frequent the market to buy meat, poultry, vegetables and household goods. Vendors work out of small stores and wooden carts. The market is generally packed on Friday and Saturday afternoons, when many Iraqis do not work.

The White House condemned the attack, saying in a statement issued last night: "Another atrocity in Baghdad today has targeted the innocent people of Iraq. Free nations of the world must not stand by while terrorists commit mass murder in an attempt to derail democratic progress in Iraq and throughout the greater Middle East."

The U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said in a statement, "To those who commit these heinous crimes, we send this message: You will be relentlessly hunted until you are apprehended and brought to justice. Have no doubt; you will pay for your role in these crimes."

Earlier in the day, seven car bombs detonated in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing at least two people and wounding nearly 30. One of the bombs exploded in front of the Kurdish Democratic Party building in the ethnically mixed city.

The city's police chief decried the recent loss of an Iraqi military brigade based in Kirkuk -- one of the units the government has sent to Baghdad as part of the capital's security plan.

DOJ_NMG_0127311

Also Saturday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of four soldiers Friday. Two were killed in Anbar province in western Iraq. The other two were killed in a roadside bombing south of Baghdad. Their names will be released after relatives have been notified, the statement said.

Deadly Blast's Damage Is Physical And Psychological (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A dump truck hauling a ton of explosives hidden beneath boxes of food exploded in the center of a crowded Baghdad market Saturday, killing at least 130 people and injuring more than 300 in the deadliest blast since the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

The attack, carried out by a suicide bomber, was designed to inflict a massive physical as well as psychological toll on a population haunted by a string of devastating strikes on other markets, including one Thursday that killed 73 people in the southern city of Hillah, and another in Baghdad last month that killed more than 80.

This one came in the evening, when the Sadriya market was crowded with after-work shoppers stocking up for dinner.

The truck's deadly payload included land mines, ammunition, rockets, mortars and other explosives, which erupted in a fireball and sent buildings crashing down on top of merchants and customers, said Maj. Gen. Jihad Jabiri of Iraq's Interior Ministry.

The White House and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki denounced the attack, which was another reminder that their vows to counter spiraling bloodshed with increased troops are having no deterrent effect. Ten other explosions, including seven car bombs in the northern city of Kirkuk and one south of Baghdad, killed at least three more people Saturday. In addition, Iraqi police reported finding the bodies of 15 Iraqi men around Baghdad, all shot to death and apparent victims of the sectarian warfare enveloping the country.

Shirwan Ridha, a taxi driver, was on his last run of the day and was standing near his minivan, waiting for it to fill with passengers, when the truck blew up about 300 feet away from him. "Huge fire rose to the sky. I was thrown into the air and then to the ground," said Ridha. "I saw my car being destroyed, and the people inside it were shouting and screaming."

Hamed Majed, a butcher who works in the market, said he was tending to customers when he noticed a large yellow truck struggling to navigate through the narrow street, which was lined with cafes, food shops, and stores selling everything from DVDs to computer goods. When some people asked the driver where he was trying to go, he "told them he was carrying food products for the shops in the area," Majed said.

Seconds later, after the truck had gone about 500 feet down the road, it exploded. "The explosion was the biggest one that I have seen in my life," said Majed, adding that he has seen several in the area. The market area was hit by a series of blasts on Dec. 2 that killed 51 people, and a June bombing in the market killed four people.

"The shop walls, ceiling and the refrigerators fell on us," said Majed, 35, who suffered leg and head injuries. "The people rescued me . . . and transferred me to the main street by a cart." He spoke from Kindi Hospital, which was so overwhelmed with casualties that it began turning away new ones and sending them to other medical facilities.

Bodies covered in white sheets were laid out on the hospital floor outside the emergency room. Survivors also were being treated on the floors. "The situation is catastrophic," said one hospital official. "It is turmoil over here. The halls are filled with the blood of the injured and the dead. There are children, women and men."

The explosion severely damaged 10 apartment buildings and left a ghastly landscape of human remains, food, shattered goods and animal meat that was sent hurtling from butchers' stalls. Witnesses said fuel from generators added to the blast's fiery aftermath. One man, wearing a black leather jacket, sobbed as he clung to a piece of blackened metal protruding from the ground.

In a statement, the White House called the attack an "atrocity." Al-Maliki, the Shiite prime minister, echoed the denunciation and blamed it on "Saddamists and Takfirists," a reference to supporters of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein and Sunni Muslim extremists. The attack was similar to others blamed on Sunni forces, who frequently have used car bombs to target crowded, civilian targets in Shiite-dominated or ethnically mixed areas, such as Sadriya.

DOJ_NMG_0127312

Just hours earlier, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the country's most revered Shiite cleric, had appealed for an end to sectarian bloodshed, saying it was the duty of good Muslims to discourage violence and dissension. "We need to be more united than ever and keep ourselves away from sectarian tumult and sectarian clashes," he said in a statement.

At the same time, a Sunni militant group linked to al-Qaida vowed to step up attacks across Iraq and claimed responsibility for the string of Kirkuk bombs.

The same group claimed responsibility for shooting down a U.S. military helicopter north of Baghdad Friday, which killed two U.S. crew members.

Three more U.S. military deaths were reported Saturday by military officials -- two in fighting in western Anbar province, and another in a noncombat incident.

President Bush plans to send an additional 21,500 troops to attempt to quell violence in Baghdad and other areas of Iraq in coming months, but U.S. intelligence agencies said Friday the situation is so bleak that it will be well more than a year before the country can be stabilized. In their report, known as the National Intelligence Estimate, the agencies said the causes of violence in Iraq were so complicated that the term "civil war" was too simplistic to explain the situation.

The attacks in Kirkuk on Saturday underscored the complexities of Iraq's violence. The worst attack targeted offices of one of the main Kurdish parties, the Kurdish Democratic Party, which favors autonomy for the oil-rich region. Two people were killed when a suicide bomber tried to ram a car into the building, the Kirkuk police chief, Shirko Shaker, said.

In the next few hours, seven more car bombs and two other explosions rocked the city, injuring 28 people, and prompting officials to place the city under a 4 p.m.-6 a.m. curfew.

A party official, Nashat Hassan, blamed the violence on forces opposed to efforts to return to the city thousands of Kurds displaced by Saddam as part of his plan to remake the city for Arabs.

A referendum is scheduled later this year for Kirkuk residents to decide whether to join the autonomous region of Kurdistan, a move that could deny Iraq's other regions much of the area's oil wealth.

"What kind of Islam is this?" said Kirkuk resident, Bashar Hassan, 42, in an emotional voice. "They have created their own rules by killing innocent people from all backgrounds," he said of the bombers. "May they go to hell."

130 Killed In Baghdad Bombing (CHIT)

By Liz Sly

Chicago Tribune, February 4, 2007

The deadliest single bombing in Iraq since the 2003 invasion killed at least 130 people and wounded at least 300 in a crowded Baghdad street market Saturday, the latest in an escalating campaign of terror targeting shoppers that has claimed hundreds of lives in recent weeks.

A fuel truck packed with a ton of explosives detonated in the narrow streets of the Sadriyah open-air market in central Baghdad just before dusk, at a time when the market was crammed with people stocking up on supplies before nightfall. Two buildings were obliterated, 10 others collapsed, dozens of stalls were incinerated, and many victims died instantly in the huge explosion, which reverberated across the city.

Police and witness accounts said the blast was caused by a suicide bomber who disguised his cargo with boxes of oil and flour. But government officials later said the explosives were packed into a fuel tanker that was parked in the street and then detonated by remote control.

It was just the latest attack in a string of bombings against markets that appear designed to maximize civilian casualties and inflame sectarian tensions ahead of the deployment of an extra 17,500 U.S. troops to Baghdad to help enforce a tough new security plan.

Two days earlier, a pair of suicide bombers killed 73 people in the Shiite town of Hillah, and on Jan. 22 a bombing in a different Baghdad market killed 88--the worst recent examples of the sustained bombing campaign that has intensified since President Bush announced his plans to "surge" the number of troops in Baghdad. The mostly Shiite Sadriyah market was hit last December by a wave of car bombings and mortar shells that killed more than 50.

DOJ_NMG_0127313

Even by Iraqi standards, however, this bombing was shocking, in its size and in the number of casualties inflicted. Previous waves of attacks have claimed more lives, such as last November's onslaught of six car bombs in the Shiite Sadr City slum neighborhood in which more than 200 people died.

Rarely, however, has such a large bomb been used against a purely civilian target. Until Saturday, the bloodiest attack was a suicide bombing in Hillah in February 2005, also against a market, in which 115 people died.

In a strongly worded statement, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki blamed the attack on "Saddamists and taqfiris," or Sunni extremists.

"The forces of terror and evil have united together against our dear Iraqi people," he said. "We were shocked today, and so were all Iraqis and honest people around the world by this despicable crime."

The bombing came 40 days after the execution of Saddam Hussein, prompting some speculation that it was intended to mark the day normally commemorated as the end of the traditional mourning period in Iraq.

"Maybe the terrorists wanted to do something big to commemorate the death of Saddam," said Shiite lawmaker Hassan Snaid, a security adviser to al-Maliki.

Another theory is that insurgent cells are disposing of their stockpile of prepared bombs ahead of the security plan. Most of the extra U.S. units won't reach Iraq for several more weeks, but al-Maliki has said his security plan is due to go into effect within days, reinforced by the U.S. troops now in the capital.

Yet another possibility is that insurgents are seeking to intensify the sectarian conflict engulfing many Baghdad neighborhoods before extra U.S. troops arrive, rendering Bush's plan unworkable.

Although many of the attacks have occurred in Shiite neighborhoods and none in Sunni ones, markets such as Sadriyah in the heart of the capital can't be considered as belonging to any particular sect. "The victims would have been Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds," Snaid said.

The bombing came hours after the most senior Shiite cleric in Iraq, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, issued a statement appealing to Iraqis not to fall prey to attempts to divide them along sectarian lines.

"Unite, reject division, stay away from sectarianism and avoid provoking religious disputes. Those disputes are several centuries old, and there's no solution to be found which satisfies everybody," he said. "We must focus on the issues we all share in order to strengthen Islamic unity and spread love and brotherhood among the sons of this nation."

Past such appeals by the revered ayatollah have failed to halt the intensifying attacks against Sunnis and Sunni neighborhoods by Shiite death squads and militias, often acting in revenge for bombings against Shiite neighborhoods.

Saturday also saw a wave of seven coordinated suicide bombings against Kurdish and government targets in the northern city of Kirkuk, in which two people died. The authorities imposed a curfew in the northern city of Mosul after gunmen staged a major ambush against Iraqi police in which six died.

Those attacks were claimed by the Islamic State of Iraq, an Al Qaeda-linked group that says it represents an Islamic government in Sunni areas of Iraq.

But none of the recent bombings against civilian markets has been claimed by any group.

Also Saturday, the U.S. military reported the deaths of five more soldiers -- four in fighting and one of an apparent heart attack. All of the victims died Friday.

Scores Killed In Baghdad Market Blast (AP)

By STEVEN R. HURST

Associated Press, February 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- A suicide bomber driving a truck loaded with a ton of explosives hidden beneath cooking oil, canned food and bags of flour obliterated a Baghdad food market on Saturday, killing at least 132 people in one of the most fearsome attacks in the capital since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

The explosion was the deadliest strike by a single suicide car bomber since the war started, surpassing the Feb. 28, 2005, attack targeting mostly Shiite police and national guard recruits in Hillah that killed 125.

DOJ_NMG_0127314

Saturday's attack also was the bloodiest in the capital since a series of car bombs and mortars killed at least 215 people in the Shiite district of Sadr City on Nov. 23, and the fifth major bombing in less than a month targeting predominantly Shiite districts in Baghdad and the southern city of Hillah.

The attack leveled about 30 shops and 40 houses, witnesses said.

Hospital officials said 132 people were killed and 305 were wounded in the thunderous explosion that sent a column of smoke into the sky on the east bank of the Tigris River. The nearby al-Kindi hospital - quickly overwhelmed - began turning away the wounded and directing ambulances to hospitals in the Shiite Sadr City neighborhood.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the bombing was "an example of what the forces of evil will do to intimidate the Iraqi people."

The bombing came just days before American and Iraqi forces were expected to start an all-out assault on Sunni and Shiite gunmen and bombers in the capital.

Only a day earlier, 16 American intelligence agencies made public a National Intelligence Estimate that said conditions in Baghdad were perilous.

"Unless efforts to reverse these conditions show measurable progress ... in the coming 12 to 18 months, we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate," a declassified synopsis of the report declared.

Emergency workers and civilians wheeled scores of bloodied and mangled victims into the hospitals with intravenous drips already in their arms. Doctors and paramedics were in a frantic triage to save the lives of the most seriously wounded.

"We don't allow big trucks in the market, but the driver convinced us that he had food to deliver for a shop. Once he got inside, he detonated the bomb," said Kamil Ibrahim, a 36-year-old vegetable vendor at the entrance to the market district.

Ibrahim - wounded in his head, chest and abdomen - said two of his workers, young men 18 and 19 years old, were killed instantly.

The shopkeeper spoke from a bed in al-Kindi Hospital, where he was rushed in a private car after rescuers wheeled him out of the market on a wooden cart.

Suspicion immediately fell on Sunni insurgents - al-Qaida in Iraq and allied groups in particular. The militant bombers are believed to have stepped up their campaign against Shiites in the final days before the joint U.S.-Iraqi crackdown in Baghdad. Many saw the operation as a last-chance effort to clamp off violence that has turned the capital into a sectarian battleground.

Suspected Sunni attackers have appeared emboldened in recent weeks after radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, under pressure from fellow Shiites who dominate the government, ordered the thousands of gunmen in his Mahdi Army militia to avoid American attacks in the coming assault.

In the hours after the explosion, Shiite and Sunni mortar teams traded fire across the darkened city. Two people were killed and 20 wounded in one predominantly Sunni district.

The White House called the bombing an atrocity and said, "Free nations of the world must not stand by while terrorists commit mass murder in an attempt to derail democratic progress in Iraq and throughout the greater Middle East."

On Sunday, a roadside bomb struck a police patrol in a predominantly Sunni area in Baghdad, killing four policemen and wounding three.

The blast occurred about 7:30 a.m. in the Azamiyah neighborhood in northern Baghdad, police said, giving the casualty toll. The area, which is mainly inhabited by Sunni Arabs, also has faced mortar attacks in recent days in apparent retaliation for a series of bombings against Shiite targets.

Also Sunday, a mortar round landed at about 8 a.m. in a religiously mixed residential area in downtown Baghdad, killing one woman and wounding three civilians, police said.

Violence shattered the northern city of Kirkuk on Saturday as well. Eight bombs exploded within two hours, the opening blast a suicide car bomber apparently targeting the offices of the Kurdish Democratic Party of Massoud Barzani, leader of Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region.

Two people were killed in that blast and four nearby homes destroyed. There was no claim of responsibility for the series of bombings in the oil-rich city where Arabs, Kurds and Turkomen all claim ascendance.

DOJ_NMG_0127315

Sunni insurgents were seen as likely suspects, however, as many of them have fled to the north of the country in a bid to escape the crackdown in the capital.

Further signs the insurgents were migrating north appeared in Mosul, where insurgent forces fought Iraqi police and soldiers. Police said five insurgents were killed. Police spokesman Brig. Abdul Karim al-Jubouri said fighters abandoned their attack when Iraqi security forces moved in backed by U.S. air power.

In the Baghdad blast, Maj. Gen. Jihad al-Jabiri of the Iraqi Interior Ministry said one ton of explosives ripped through the Sadriyah market.

"There are still bodies under the rubble," he said. In an outburst of frustration and anger he called for the government to "deport (non-Iraqi) Arabs immediately."

The general's comments reflected growing displeasure inside the government of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki with neighboring Syria, which Baghdad charges has done too little to close its border to Sunni militants.

In his second heated verbal attack on Damascus in two days, government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said "50 percent of terrorism enters Iraq from Syria, and we have evidence" to prove that.

"The Interior Ministry and the Ministry of State for National Security gave them (the Syrians) evidence about those who are conspiring and are sending car bombs. We gave them the numbers of their apartments and the buildings where they live," al-Dabbagh said on Al-Arabiya satellite television.

The Sadriyah market sits on a side street lined with shops and vendors selling produce, meat and other staples. The market is about 500 meters from a Sunni shrine.

Not far from the Sadriyah marketplace, a suicide bomber crashed his car into the Bab al-Sharqi market 12 days ago and killed 88 people.

South of Baghdad, a pair of suicide bombers detonated explosives Thursday among shoppers in a crowded outdoor market in the Shiite city of Hillah, killing at least 73 people and wounding 163.

An Iraqi militant group tied to al-Qaida in Iraq announced, meanwhile, it had launched its own new strategy to counter the coming U.S.-Iraqi crackdown.

In an audiotape posted on a Web site commonly used by the insurgents, a voice purported to be that of Abu Abdullah Rashid al-Baghdadi, also known as Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, said the group would "widen the circle of battles" beyond Baghdad to all of Iraq. Al-Baghdadi heads The Mujahedeen Shura Council, an umbrella organization of insurgent groups in Iraq.

The U.S. military reported the deaths of five more soldiers - four in fighting and one of an apparent heart attack. All died Friday.

Iraqi authorities said that 145 people were killed or were found dead Saturday, including those killed in the market bombing. Of the total, 19 were found dumped in the capital, most of the bodies showing signs of torture.

Iraqi PM Vows To End Bomb Terror (BBC)

BBC.com, February 4, 2007

Iraq's PM has vowed to put an end to attacks like Saturday's deadly truck bombing in Baghdad, which he blamed on followers of ex-leader Saddam Hussein.

The vehicle blew up in the mainly Shia al-Sadriya district in central Baghdad, killing more than 130 people and injuring more than 300.

Washington said the attack was another atrocity aimed at innocent Iraqis.

Free nations should not stand by while mass murder was committed, the White House statement said.

"The Iraqi people and the world is shocked by this... The Saddamists have returned to commit a new crime," Mr Maliki said.

"We reassure the population that we will put an end to these crimes," he added.

An Iraqi government spokesman, meanwhile, said that half of the attacks in Baghdad were carried out by extremists who came from Syria.

"We say that - and we have evidence to prove it," Ali al-Dabbagh told al-Iraqiya TV.

DOJ_NMG_0127316

'Tonne of explosives'

Saturday's blast took place as people bought food ahead of a night-time curfew.

It shattered stalls and left a huge crater in the street.

Maj Gen Jihad al-Jaberi of the interior ministry told state television the truck was carrying one tonne of explosives that were detonated by a suicide bomber.

Nearby hospitals were overflowing with dead and injured

Rescuers pulled the dead and injured from the rubble of the blast and loaded them on to pick-up trucks to be ferried to hospital.

Wards and corridors overflowed at the nearby Ibn al-Nafis hospital, with relatives screaming for help for their loved ones.

The same market was hit by car bombs on 2 December that killed more than 50 people.

Another attack, on the Haraj market in Baghdad on 22 January, killed 88 people.

BBC world affairs correspondent Mike Wooldridge says the attacks on markets are widely seen as Sunni insurgent groups stepping up their activities before a new joint Iraqi-US security operation in Baghdad gets under way.

He says the fear is always that bombings like this will bring retaliation form Shia militias.

Iraq's most prominent Shia cleric, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, made a new appeal to all Iraqis to "reject sectarian violence".

In a separate attack on Saturday, five people were killed and some 40 injured in car bomb blasts in the northern city of Kirkuk.

In the central city of Samarra, six policemen were shot dead by unidentified gunmen, police said.

Doubts Run Deep On Reforms Crucial To Bush's Iraq Strategy (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The success of the Bush administration's new Iraq strategy depends on a series of rapid and dramatic political and economic reforms that even the plan's authors have little confidence will work.

In the current go-for-broke atmosphere, administration officials say they are aware that failure to achieve the reforms would result in a repeat of last year's unsuccessful Baghdad offensive, when efforts to consolidate military gains with lasting stability on the ground did not work. This time, they acknowledge, there will be no second chance.

Among many deep uncertainties are whether Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is up to the task and committed to spearheading what the administration foresees as a fundamental realignment of Iraqi politics; whether Maliki's Shiite-dominated government and its sluggish financial bureaucracy will part with $10 billion for rapid job creation and reconstruction, at least some of it directed to sectarian opponents; and whether the U.S. military and State Department can calibrate their own stepped-up reconstruction assistance to push for action without once again taking over.

A pessimistic new National Intelligence Estimate released Friday described the Iraqi government as "hard-pressed" to achieve sectarian reconciliation, even in the unlikely event that violence diminishes. Without directly mentioning Maliki, it noted that "the absence of unifying leaders among the Arab Sunni or Shia with the capacity to speak for or exert control over their confessional groups limits prospects."

Several senior officials involved in formulating the political and economic aspects of the administration's strategy, along with a number of informed outsiders, agreed to discuss its assumptions and risks on the condition that they not be identified by name. Other sources refused to be even anonymously quoted, describing the administration as standing on the brink of an intricate combination of maneuvers whose outcome is far from assured.

The foundation of the strategy is not new -- U.S. policy since the March 2003 invasion has been to use American military might, money and know-how to foster a peaceful Iraq with a unified government and a solid economy. The strategy incorporates major elements of last year's "clear, hold and build" plan, whose "hold and build" parts never got off the ground.

Several sources expressed concern that the administration, by publicly rejecting a "containment" option -- withdrawing U.S. troops to Iraqi borders to avoid sectarian fighting while preventing outside arms and personnel from entering the country -- has not left itself a fall-back plan in the event of failure.Shift in Political Climate

DOJ_NMG_0127317

The strategy's political component centers on replacing deepening Sunni-Shiite-Kurdish divides with a new delineation between "extremists" and "moderates." Moderates are defined as those of all religious and political persuasions who eschew violence in favor of safety and employment.

With the help of outside Iraq experts, the administration has compiled lists of active and still-untapped moderates around the country. "They wondered could I give them some [names] from the provinces or anywhere" from which to construct a new political base, recalled one think-tank expert called to the State Department in December. According to the intelligence estimate, however, Iraq's reservoir of such people, especially trained technocrats and entrepreneurs, has been drained as they have fled the country in droves.

As American and Iraqi combat forces focus on cooling the cauldron of violence in Baghdad, U.S. military commanders and State Department teams plan to funnel "bridge money" toward moderate designees in outer provinces and in the capital to create jobs, start businesses and revitalize moribund factories. Iraqi money would come in behind to make it all permanent.

Iraqis with physical and economic security, the thinking goes, will give their political support to the government that produces both. Closing the circle, the Iraqi government will see non-sectarian moderates as the central support for a new political coalition.

As they put the plan together, officials held heated internal debates over whether Maliki was the right man to head such an effort. Some argued in favor of engineering a new Iraqi government under Maliki's Shiite coalition partner, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), and Hakim's political stalking horse, Iraqi Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi.

They closely examined the makeup of Iraq's 275-seat parliament, where a no-confidence vote requires only a simple majority. Maliki's Dawa party is part of the Hakim-led United Iraqi Alliance, the largest Shiite group, with 130 seats. Making a strong case for SCIRI, some argued that the Iraqis themselves were so fed up with Maliki that a different governing coalition is possible with realigned Sunni and Kurdish elements. This view found proponents in the White House and Pentagon, and it extended into parts of the normally more cautious State Department.

Maliki, whose Dawa party holds 12 seats in the parliament, was seen as unwilling to separate voluntarily from his existing power base -- dominated by the violent and unruly Baghdad-based Jaish al-Mahdi militia, also known as the Mahdi Army, of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. With a new coalition, the Alliance would not need Sadr's 30 seats.

SCIRI's own militia, the Badr Organization, is seen as more cohesive, "an actual organization with command and control" that might be integrated into the Iraqi military, said one State Department official. The administration has charged that both the Sadr and Badr militias receive assistance from Iran. But officials regularly note that Badr forces have not attacked the U.S. military and that SCIRI has voiced equal opposition to Iranian and U.S. domination.

Other officials find that view naive, noting that evidence of Iran's involvement in Iraqi violence was found in a SCIRI compound during a raid last month.

Several officials said they believe that Hakim's backers in the Bush administration have been seduced by his forceful demeanor and Abdul Mahdi's fluent English. And while many emphasized the importance of a single, visible Iraqi leader, others have said it is a mistake to personalize the policy in one Shiite actor.

After extensive discussions last month with Maliki, Hakim and Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, the most senior Sunni in the Iraqi government, policymakers decided to place their bets on Maliki. "We judge that Maliki does not wish to fail in his role," National Intelligence Council Chairman Thomas Fingar told Congress in a tepid endorsement recently. "He has some, but not all, of the obvious requirements for success."

In any case, replacing Maliki was determined to be "too hard," in the words of one analyst. A two-thirds parliamentary majority is required to install a new prime minister, and any attempt to remove Maliki by parliamentary maneuver, it was agreed, should remain a Plan B that Iraqis themselves would undertake if he failed to produce results.

So far, Maliki has said the right things about cracking down on the sectarian violence -- including by Sadr's militia -- that is tearing Baghdad apart. But there are worrisome signs. A parliamentary session late last month in which Maliki introduced the new plan was adjourned after it erupted in sectarian squabbling in which the prime minister gave as good as he got.

DOJ_NMG_0127318

Many experts believe that the administration's effort to build a new political center, supported by "moderate" Sunni allies in the region that fear Shiite Iranian expansion, such as Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt, is hopelessly outdated. "Our struggle may be between moderates and extremists," Brookings Institution scholar Martin Indyk said last month. "Their struggle is between Sunnis and Shias."New Economic Initiatives

On the economic front, where the United States has already invested more than $38 billion, the administration has asked for $538 million to keep current programs running and has proposed an additional $1.2 billion for new initiatives that it says will receive long-term Iraqi funding.

A combination of violent attacks on previous projects, sectarian favors, inefficient and overly cautious officials, and a complex bureaucracy -- much of it installed by the United States under the post-invasion Coalition Provisional Authority -- has left the Iraqi government with a significant capital surplus in each of the past several years.

Getting approval for reconstruction expenditures in the past, observed one U.S. official, has been like "pushing wet spaghetti." The surplus, which is kept in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, now totals $12.5 billion. Maliki has publicly agreed to spend $10 billion of it on reconstruction and jobs.

The State Department has sent new "tiger teams" to six Iraqi ministries to help clear away the wreckage of the past and speed financing for approved projects, and it plans to double to 20 the number of U.S.-staffed provisional reconstruction teams in Baghdad and around the country.

In addition to Foreign Service officers, experts including small-business advisers and camel veterinarians are being recruited from the U.S. Agriculture Department and elsewhere to staff the teams, the State Department's Iraq coordinator, David Satterfield, told Congress last week.

Former Foreign Service officer Timothy M. Carney, who worked in Iraq in 2003, has been appointed to coordinate the U.S. and Iraqi bureaucracies, to get the Iraqi government's money moving and to make sure that Iraqi funding priorities coincide with the administration's.

But some officials worry that the expanded U.S. presence will repeat the mistakes of the past -- when the United States oversaw virtually every part of the Iraqi government -- and undermine the goal of turning the country over to the Iraqis themselves.

"It's the same old problem as in 2003," cautioned one official. "The same impatience that if they can't do it we'll step in and do it. There is a bit of that creeping into this dialogue."

With Rumsfeld Gone, Critics Of War Look To Rice (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3 — For six years, first as national security adviser and then as secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice worked under the cover of a very effective shield: Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was the administration's lightning rod for criticism over its handling of Iraq.

But in recent weeks, with Mr. Rumsfeld gone, Ms. Rice has faced increased, and somewhat unfamiliar, criticism. At a Senate hearing on Jan. 11, she confronted a wall of opposition from Republicans as well as Democrats. During hearings this week on Iraq, several of her predecessors were pointed in their disapproval of her job performance.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III took issue with Ms. Rice's refusal to engage Syria diplomatically. Back in his day, he told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, "We practiced diplomacy full time, and it paid off."

This week, Senators Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, and John McCain, Republican of Arizona, released three letters demanding that Ms. Rice make public the administration's requirements for actions to be taken by the Iraqi government to earn continued American support. Along with the letters, and Ms. Rice's reply — which indicated that the Iraqis had already missed most of the benchmarks — the senators also released an irate statement.

"Secretary Rice finally provided a response" to the senators' repeated requests, the statement said. "What Secretary Rice's letter makes abundantly clear is that the administration does not intend to attach meaningful consequences for the Iraqis continuing to fail to meet their commitments."

And on Jan. 20, The Economist published an editorial titled "The Falling Star of Condoleezza Rice."

DOJ_NMG_0127319

"Condoleezza Rice," it said, "is not the woman she once was."

Ms. Rice rarely becomes flustered — she bristles whenever reporters ask her how she "feels" about anything — and her aides maintain that she has taken the criticism in stride. But the Jan. 11 hearing clearly took its toll. "Let's just say it was a bad day and leave it at that," one senior State Department official said. The next day, Ms. Rice hit back at Senator Barbara Boxer, the California Democrat, who said Ms. Rice did not pay a personal price for the war because she had no immediate family members serving in Iraq.

"I thought it was O.K. to be single," Ms. Rice said. "I thought it was O.K. to not have children, and I thought you could still make good decisions on behalf of the country if you were single and didn't have children."

Despite her role at the heart of the Iraq war from its beginnings, Ms. Rice had, thus far, avoided the public pillorying that Mr. Rumsfeld received. She has repeatedly had the highest approval ratings of anyone in the administration, and she continues to earn approval ratings that are substantially higher than her boss's.

In particular, as secretary of state, Ms. Rice has been treated like a celebrity, appearing on Vanity Fair's best-dressed list and in an article in the November issue of Vogue. There are Web sites devoted to persuading her to run for president — www.draftcondi.us says her nomination "would be the greatest political move of the century" — and a blog obsessed with her personal style: <></> includes a Rice "hairdo alert system," and on Jan. 29 it posted a photograph of an Italian designer's gown that features Ms. Rice's face.

But as the Bush administration's overall foreign policy has come under fire, and other senior officials have left the administration, Ms. Rice is starting to take the heat previously reserved for Mr. Rumsfeld.

"Before, nobody assigned her the kind of ownership or authorship over the administration's policy — she did get something of a pass," said Michael A. McFaul, a political science professor at Stanford who knows Ms. Rice. "Now, there aren't that many officials still around, and she's much more exposed."

Kenneth M. Pollack, a research director at the Brookings Institution, said: "It is no longer the case that Rumsfeld is the administration bad guy. People will look much harder at Condi's role now, and Iraq is really going to rest on her shoulders."

In the past, most of the criticism has come from the left. But now the disapproval has spread, and Republicans are joining in. The starkest example came on Jan. 11, when Ms. Rice faced a room full of skeptics as she defended, before a Senate panel, President Bush's new Iraq strategy. "You're going to have to do a much better job" explaining the rationale for the war, Senator George V. Voinovich, Republican of Ohio, told her, adding that the administration could no longer count on his support.

The censure continued this week during three days of rare Senate testimony from a cadre of Ms. Rice's predecessors. While the former secretaries of state and national security advisers — Mr. Baker, Henry A. Kissinger, Madeleine K. Albright, Brent Scowcroft and Zbigniew Brzezinski — were diplomatic in their critiques of the administration's foreign policy, all left the impression that as America's top diplomat, Ms. Rice was not engaging in real diplomacy.

"That's what we hire a secretary of state for, not to sit there and proclaim categorical statements, but to engage in the process," said Mr. Brzezinski, President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser.

Mr. Kissinger and Ms. Albright both sounded a similar note. Mr. Kissinger, while giving lukewarm support to the administration, said America should always be ready to negotiate with Iran and Syria, while Ms. Albright added that "one gains by communicating with countries with which one disagrees."

Ms. Rice's mentor, Mr. Scowcroft, who was national security adviser to President Gerald R. Ford and the first President Bush, called the troop increase a "tactic, not a strategy."

Ms. Rice remains extraordinarily close to the president — she spends time at Camp David and in Texas with Mr. Bush and his wife — and friends said that relationship was a source of comfort to her.

The criticism of Ms. Rice has yet to reach the decibel level of that directed against Mr. Rumsfeld, and it may never get to that point, in part because she is not highhanded in her behavior toward colleagues and underlings, her close friends and aides said. Mr. Rumsfeld was heavily criticized by Democrats, and eventually, Republicans, but he also received a lot of disapproval from people who worked with him and for him at the Pentagon and in the administration.

Mr. Rice has yet to inspire that level of exasperation from colleagues, either from inside the State Department or the National Security Council. "Whatever harping you may find, you won't find the same kind of internal dissent" which Mr. Rumsfeld provoked, said Philip D. Zelikow, the State Department's former counselor and a close friend of Ms. Rice. "She'll occasionally have a tart thing to say, but she's not one of those people who wrings their hands and worries incessantly about their press."

DOJ_NMG_0127320

But she sometimes does take criticism personally. Last fall, she telephoned President Bush's father, who employed her on his National Security Council in the early 1990s, after Bob Woodward's book "State of Denial" reported that the elder Mr. Bush had said that she had been a "disappointment" and "not up to the job."

The former president told Larry King on CNN that Ms. Rice "called me and said, 'There's something in this book.' " He denied that he called her a disappointment. "I guess there were some hurt feelings," he said.

Japan's FM Calls US Operation In Iraq 'Naive' (AFP)

AFP, February 4, 2007

Japan's foreign minister has criticised the US occupation of Iraq as "very naive" and blamed it for spiralling unrest there, in another swipe at US tactics by the key Washington ally.

Taro Aso said in Kyoto that then-US Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- now replaced -- "started off the war, but the operation after the occupation was very naive."

"Because this operation did not work well, it (Iraq) is in trouble now," he said, quoted by Jiji Press.

"It became clear that the operation after a war is very important when you think about peace-building."

Aso's comments came on the day a suicide bomber blew up his Mercedes truck in a Baghdad market, killing at least 130 people and injuring hundreds, in the second deadliest attack since the US-led invasion of 2003.

They follow those by Japanese Defence Minister Fumio Kyuma who has made a series of critical comments about US policies.

Last month Kyuma said US President George W. Bush was wrong to invade Iraq and warned that Tokyo might not automatically renew its air force mission to the war-torn country.

That rebuke from one of Washington's closest foreign allies came just hours after an embattled Bush had used his annual State of the Union speech to plead for public support to send more troops to Iraq.

The White House last month announced that 21,500 extra US troops would be sent to Iraq in a bid to rein in the violence.

Kyuma also has criticised Rumsfeld, saying that "he was too bullish on the conditions in Iraq" and called the US decision to invade "premature".

Prime Minister Shinzo Abe has insisted Japan will continue supporting Iraq, however.

Japan was a staunch backer of the Iraq invasion. Former premier Junichiro Koizumi, a close friend of Bush, took the landmark step of deploying Japanese troops to Iraq.

Tokyo ended the troop mission in July but has kept its air force engaged in transporting goods and personnel to the war-torn country.

No I-Told-You-Sos (WP)

By Lynne Duke

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Sweet vindication. Who wouldn't want it? To be right. To be free of criticism and upheld by evidence, by actual proof, that one's predictions about a controversial war were correct.

It is the culture of this town -- trafficking in rightness. People clamor day in and day out, in that polished and politic way of the Washingtonian, to be proved right.

But on Iraq, the vindicated are pained. There is no gloating -- not with thousands of people dead, Americans and Iraqis; not with the Iraq war precipitating an ongoing foreign policy crisis that has left the United States' global image in tatters.

For people who were pilloried, penalized or warned to be careful because of their opposition to a powerful president's war, vindication is nothing to celebrate. It is a victory most bitter.

"Emotionally, it's a very traumatic and unhappy outcome." That is retired Army Lt. Gen. William E. Odom, head of the National Security Agency under President Ronald Reagan. "How can you be happy about being right about the disaster that's been created?"

DOJ_NMG_0127321

It weighs on him.

"Vindication is not pleasing," he says. "Even some of my friends have noted: the more vindicated I've been, the more irritable I become."

Back before the war even began, Odom said its aims were wrong. He criticized the doctrine of preemption, said al-Qaeda had nothing to do with Iraq and predicted that democracy could scarcely take hold there. A year after the war began, he was quoted calling it a failure -- and heard soon thereafter that he'd been dubbed a Benedict Arnold for his views. To dissent, back then, was risky. Not like now, when the conventional wisdom about the conflict has made a U-turn in a political climate where anger over the war toppled the majority party in Congress. The president sounded almost plaintive in his State of the Union address, saying, "This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in."

Lots of people predicted things would turn out this way. They are military brass and lawmakers and foreign policy intellectuals, the kind of wise ones whose counsel is routinely sought and respected. In the run-up to this war, their concerns carried no weight against a swelling of patriotism, a backdrop of fear and an administration determined to oust Saddam Hussein. Their warnings that Iraq had nothing to do with the attacks of Sept. 11 were ignored. Worse, some were shunned and scolded.

As president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Jessica Tuchman Matthews, raised hard prewar questions about the looming Iraq engagement. They predicted Iraq would become a long occupation and recruiting tool for al-Qaeda and would damage U.S. relations with the Muslim world. And: No weapons of mass destruction would be found.

One day back then, one of Matthews's colleagues ran into an acquaintance on the street, and that acquaintance warned: " 'What is your boss doing? Nobody at Carnegie is ever going to get through another Senate confirmation.' " And Matthews was herself admonished by a colleague at another think tank, who told her: "You're going to make Carnegie irrelevant. The war's going to happen and you ought to have Carnegie working on the after-war rather than on 'we shouldn't go to war.' "

Amid what she calls the "seemingly inexorable roll" toward war, the clear message was "you better get on the bandwagon or you'll never be taken seriously in this town again."

Instead, she looks like an accurate prognosticator. But, "you can't take any pleasure in having been right," says Matthews, "because this is a catastrophe for the United States and people are dying and didn't have to die, and it's going to take us years and years and years to dig out of this, and it's been a catastrophe for the Iraqi people."

Also repudiated were people who supported the war but diverged from the official administration line. Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, then the Army's chief of staff, was sharply rebuffed in early 2003 for publicly saying that several hundred thousand U.S. troops would be needed to keep the peace in Baghdad.

Now, as President Bush seeks additional troops for Iraq, it is widely agreed that the war was indeed prosecuted with too few troops -- a seeming vindication for Shinseki, though he did not respond to an e-mail seeking comment.

Vindication is a difficult and complex concept and one that has to be considered with many caveats, such as those presented by Zbigniew Brzezinski when asked if he felt vindicated.

"If vindication was accompanied by a sense that America is likely to undo the damage they have done and can dis-embarrass itself of the tragic involvement, then my answer would be yes."

But Brzezinski, former national security adviser under President Jimmy Carter, scarcely believes such course corrections will happen.

He opposed Bush's doctrine of preemption and assessed the war policy as one that "was propelled forward by mendacity." He spoke out before and during the war, and he believes his criticisms began to sting as the war began to falter. As a result, he says, he was ultimately shut out of high-level Defense and State Department briefings he had often attended and was publicly upbraided by a foreign policy peer.

Despite the broad sea change in opinion among the political and policy class, Brzezinski's sense of vindication has its limits, he says, because "I have the feeling that the president's team is hellbent on digging itself in more deeply and if it does not succeed in Iraq some of its wilder policymakers seem to be eager to enlarge the scope of the war to Iran."

"I'm saddened," he said, "because I think it's doing terrible harm to America. But more than being sad, which is an emotion, I'm worried."

DOJ_NMG_0127322

From Afghanistan to Iraq to Iran? Could this scenario actually play out? It is, among the vindicated, not at all absurd, for official Washington's sights have turned to Iran with "the same signs, a very similar drumbeat" as that which preceded the war in Iraq, says Rep. Barbara Lee (D-Calif.).

Lee saw it coming -- not Iran, but Iraq. Back in September 2001, days after the terror attacks, she saw the broadly worded congressional resolution authorizing President Bush to use force to fight terrorism as giving him a dangerous degree of carte blanche.

That early resolution allowed the president to "use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on Sept. 11, 2001, or harbored such organizations or persons, in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons."

It is language that haunts her still.

"I said then it was giving the administration a blank check to use in perpetuity," Lee says. "If you read that resolution, it's very clear that it was the beginning of a march to war."

She voted against that resolution -- the only member of Congress to do so -- and then took the barbs.

"It was a very tough period," she says. "To call me unpatriotic was the lowest of the low," especially considering that her father, an Army lieutenant colonel, served for 25 years and saw duty in World War II and Korea.

Now, she says, people are eager to tell her she was right. But "it's not about feeling vindicated," she says.

"I want people to understand that this is a very dangerous foreign policy, the administration's foreign and military policy is very dangerous, that the notion of preemptive war is very dangerous and that we need to support more rational approaches to our foreign and military policy."

Lee, like Odom and many others, is calling for the war to end. They are strange bedfellows -- she, a progressive liberal; he, a usually hawkish conservative.

For months, Odom, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute, has been pushing a "cut and run" policy. He even wrote a piece in the Los Angeles Times in October headlined "How to Cut and Run," in which he wrote, "We must cut and run tactically in order to succeed strategically."

He advocates troop withdrawal coupled with a diplomatic engagement with Iraq's neighbors, especially Iran, with whom the United States actually has common interests, nukes notwithstanding.

Retired Marine Gen. Anthony Zinni, formerly the top U.S. military man in the Middle East, started where Odom started -- in opposition to the war. Zinni argued that going into Iraq would destabilize the region and distract from the fight against al-Qaeda.

For his opposition, he says he was accused by some fellow officers of having political motivations and was disinvited from attending meetings at the Joint Forces Command, where he'd been a regular as a senior mentor for more junior officers.

But he diverges from most early critics of the war, because he now is arguing that withdrawing from Iraq would destabilize the region. Instead, he says, a new strategic framework for the war is needed -- something far broader than the increase Bush has proposed, which Zinni calls a "half-step."

"It's breaking my heart, watching it," he says of the war. "I was praying somehow I'd be wrong, but in my heart of hearts I knew it would happen this way -- the bad decision-making, the insufficient troops."

Congress now is mulling varying resolutions on the war, but Zinni complains that "the debate is wrong. I think Congress is debating the arrangement of the deck chairs on the Titanic."

But the ship, he argues, doesn't have to go down.

As the debate now centers on what can be salvaged from the U.S. engagement in Iraq, a cynical Washington exercise is underway, some of the vindicated say. It's a snake-like shedding of skin, a policy metamorphosis in which people who once were prominent cheerleaders for the war now are cozying up with the war's early opponents and distancing themselves from their earlier roles.

Matthews has seen it and fears it may warp the crucial debates about the way forward in Iraq and toward Iran.

"So many of the people who were wrong have gone on to being very visible pundits without ever admitting how wrong they were," Matthews says.

DOJ_NMG_0127323

Brzezinski says there are some people -- and he's talking "outside of the administration, of course" -- who have embraced his positions in the oddest and most disingenuous way.

They say "that they are happy to have associated themselves with these views . . . ," Brzezinski says. "That is the funny part, because you meet people who say, 'Oh, I was with you all along.' "

Under Bush's Pillow (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Dick Cheney as Lord Voldemort?

A reader named Melissa S. e-mailed to say that she explains Iraq policy to her 8-year-old son in terms of Harry Potter characters: "Dick Cheney is Lord Voldemort. George W. Bush is Peter Pettigrew." Don Rumsfeld is Lucius Malfoy, while Cornelius Fudge represents administration supporters who deny that anything is wrong. And, she concludes, "Daily Prophet reporter Rita Skeeter is Fox News."

That was one of the 400 comments from readers offering literary or historical parallels to the Bush administration and Iraq. One of the most commonly cited was Xenophon's ancient warning, in "Anabasis," of how much easier it is to get into a Middle Eastern war than out.

As a reader named John H. summarized "Anabasis": "Ten thousand Greek mercenaries march from Greece to Iran to effect regime change (unseat one emperor and establish his younger brother). They win the first few battles (cakewalk, mission accomplished) but then the younger brother is killed."

So the invaders found themselves without an effective prime minister to hand power to, yet they were stuck deep inside enemy territory. Xenophon's subtext is how the slog of war corrodes soldiers and allows them to do terrible things. Xenophon is particularly pained when recounting a massacre that was the Haditha of its day.

The readers who sent in comments were responding to a column I wrote last month arguing that President Bush is inadvertently a fine education president, because he breathes new life into the classics. Thucydides' account of the failed "surge" in the Sicilian expedition 2,400 years ago is newly relevant, and "Moby Dick" is interesting reading today as a bracing warning of the dangers of an obsessive adventure that casts aside all rules. (You can submit your own favorite literary or historical parallel at nytimes.com/ontheground.)

Perhaps I'm cherry-picking from the classics to support my own opposition to a "surge" in Iraq. In writing this column, I wondered what classics Mr. Bush's supporters would cite to argue for his strategy. Shakespeare's "Henry V"? "Hamlet"?

Yet frankly, it's difficult to find great literature that encourages rulers to invade foreign lands, to escalate when battles go badly, to scorn critics, to be cocksure of themselves in the face of adversity. The themes of the classics tend to be the opposite.

Literature and history invariably counsel doubt and skepticism — even when you think you see Desdemona's infidelity with your own eyes, you don't; even when your advisers are telling you "it's a slam-dunk," it's not. The classics have an overwhelmingly cautionary bias, operating as a check on any impulsive rush to war.

Perhaps that is because, as Foreign Policy argues in its most recent issue, humans have an ingrained psychological tilt to hawkishness. In many ways, the authors note, human decision-making tends to err in ways that magnify conflict and make it difficult to climb down from confrontation.

My hunch is that the classics resonate in part because they are an antidote to that human frailty; literature has generated so many warnings about hubris in part to save us from ourselves.

Eastern classics have that same purpose of trying to tame and restrain us. The central theme of Chinese philosophy is the need for moderation, and Sun Tzu's famous "Art of War" advises generals on how to win without fighting. (Sun Tzu and Julius Caesar alike also appreciated the diplomatic benefits of treating enemy prisoners well; they would be appalled by Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo.)

So Mr. Bush should resolve that for every hour he spends with Mr. Cheney, he will spend another curled up with classical authors like Sophocles. "Antigone," for example, tells of King Creon, a good man who wants the best for his people — and yet ignores public opinion, refuses to admit error, goes double or nothing with his bets, and is slow to adapt to changing circumstance.

DOJ_NMG_0127324

Creon's son pleads with his father to be less rigid. The trees that bend survive the seasons, he notes, while those that are inflexible are blown over and destroyed.

Americans today yearn for the same kind of wise leadership that the ancient Greeks did: someone with the wisdom to adjust course, to acknowledge error, to listen to critics, to show compassion as well as strength, to discern moral nuance as well as moral clarity. Alexander the Great used to sleep with the "Iliad" under his pillow; maybe Mr. Bush should try "Antigone."

Oh, and for Mrs. Bush? How about Aristophanes' "Lysistrata"?

Coalition Phases In Iraqi Sailors (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

Khawr Al Amaya Oil Terminal, Persian Gulf — Every morning on this aging metal hulk, an Iraqi naval officer reads the weather report over the radio so it can be heard by dozens of civilian boats.

It's a job that used to be done by an American sailor.

Here and elsewhere in the Persian Gulf off Iraq's shores, Iraqis are gradually taking over jobs once done by U.S. Marines and sailors. They stand guard on terminals such as this one, which is often compared to the bizarre structures of the movie "Waterworld."

At the port of Umm al Qasr, Iraqis are lectured by U.S. Navy and Coast Guard personnel and British Royal Navy sailors on the techniques of boarding ships, quizzing often hostile crews and searching for contraband and weapons. Some Iraqi sailors participate in inspections with U.S., British and Australian sailors.

It is a slow process for a nation whose navy was destroyed in the early hours of the 2003 assault led by the United States.

"In 2003 we destroyed anything that floated," said Marine Maj. Gen. Carl Jensen, commander of a coalition task force assigned to guard terminals. "So we're trying literally to bring the Iraqi navy back from the grave."

The Khawr al Amaya terminal, and a second facility a few miles away, lie about 60 miles from Iraq and 12 miles from Iran. Together, they provide more than 95% of the Iraqi government's income.

The oil terminals have long been points of friction between Iran and Iraq, leading to several battles during their war. "This place has been shot to hell," said Jensen, walking the 1,000-yard length of the Khawr Al Amaya terminal.

U.S. military sources say the Iranians spy on the terminals from a sunken construction crane and that Iranian patrol boats are a frequent sight.

Tankers arrive daily to fill up with crude oil and depart for refineries around the globe. Disrupting the terminals could sink the Iraqi government's hopes of rebuilding its country.

"This is the economic anchor for Iraq," said Navy Capt. Chris Noble. "We need to guard that anchor."

Cmdr. Jaimie Hatcher, captain of the Australian frigate Toowoomba, puts it in what he calls Australian vernacular: "This mission is bloody important."

Insurgents made a bold assault on the terminals in 2004 but were repelled. Two U.S. sailors and a Coast Guardsman were killed.

Now, a dozen ships ring the terminals to thwart attacks on the hundreds of ships that transit this part of the gulf: fishermen, merchants, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and even a few pirates. A 2.5-mile perimeter is kept around the terminals.

Newly arrived coalition sailors are lectured on the 2004 attack.

"It's not like everybody out here is trying to kill us," Lt. Cmdr. Cesar Rios told a group of Australian sailors last month. "But we have to be aware of what is normal."

In recent months, the Navy has tried to make its presence more friendly to passing ships and their captains. By having an Iraqi read the weather report, the U.S. hopes to encourage those captains to report anything suspicious on the water.

"Think of it as the 1950s cop on the beat in a complicated neighborhood. If you can establish trust, things will work out better," Noble said.

DOJ_NMG_0127325

For the fishermen, the coalition sailors have a message: An attack on the oil terminals could cause a disastrous oil spill. "We make it real to them," said Ensign Lisa Green. "They need to know we're here protecting the oil terminals so your fertile fishing grounds remain fertile."

Some of the Iraqi officers are veterans of the Iraqi navy. Many of the enlisted are new recruits.

"They're learning as they go, but they're definitely getting better," said Coast Guard Lt. j.g. Kristopher Ensley, executive officer of the cutter Aquidneck.

U.S. officials say Iraq's navy faces the same challenge as its army: changing a top-down style that does not encourage leadership in the enlisted ranks.

"The way they once worked, if you weren't the guy in charge, you weren't anything," said Lt. Aaron Bergman. "They're finally realizing that if you break into smaller units, you can be more effective."

Iraqi oil workers live aboard the terminals, as do U.S. personnel. Six months ago, the U.S. Navy docked a three-story barge at Khawr al Amaya to provide quarters and a chow hall.

Duty in the winter can be pleasant. During the summer it is brutal. Temperatures soar above 120 degrees. "The metal grates get so hot it will melt your shoes," Bergman said.

The U.S. ships are part of the 5th Fleet, based in Bahrain. The smaller craft, such as the 170-foot patrol boats, are permanently based in the gulf, but larger ones, such as the aircraft carriers and their escorts, are assigned from the Pacific and Atlantic fleets.

No one is putting a timetable on when the U.S. can withdraw from the terminals. The Iraqi navy has only half a dozen small boats; it has about 1,000 personnel but hopes to have 2,000 next year.

Security Contracts To Continue In Iraq (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The Defense Department plans to continue hiring private contractors to provide security at reconstruction projects in Iraq and to train U.S. and Iraqi military officers in counterinsurgency, despite problems with past contracts for such jobs that traditionally have been done by military personnel.

The contracting out of these wartime activities comes at a time when the United States is stretching its resources to provide the additional 21,500 troops in Iraq that are needed under President Bush's new strategy, which involves stepped-up counterinsurgency operations in Baghdad and the expansion of economic reconstruction activities.

During an appearance before the Senate Armed Services Committee last month, Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new top commander in Iraq, said he counts the "thousands of contract security forces" among the assets available to him to supplement the limited number of U.S. and Iraqi troops to be used for dealing with the insurgency.

A former senior Defense Intelligence Agency expert on the Middle East, retired Army Col. W. Patrick Lang, said last week that contracting out intelligence collection and security for Army units and their contractors "results from actual military forces being too small." He added: "I can't remember a subordinate commander considering mercenaries as part of his forces."

Retired Marine Gen. Anthony C. Zinni, who once headed the U.S. Central Command and today serves on an advisory board of a defense contractor, said there is a role for private firms taking on security missions. But he warned that problems can arise "when they take on quasi-military roles."

Aegis Defence Services Ltd., a British security firm, has about 1,000 employees in Iraq, about 250 of them Iraqis, under a $300 million contract that began in 2004.

Under that contract, which is up for rebidding, Aegis provides security support services to U.S. Army Corps of Engineers personnel working on reconstruction projects throughout the country. Among its tasks is the operation of six Reconstruction Operations Centers, which disseminate threat warning information and track convoys.

Aegis also coordinates security in Iraq for 10 prime contractors and their subcontractors through security liaison teams, and the teams pass on to the military information gathered by their sources.

DOJ_NMG_0127326

Aegis provides about 300 guards to Corps of Engineers facilities in Iraq, along with personal security escort teams for Corps personnel and contractors when they travel to such sites. The firm also provides the reconstruction liaison teams that travel the country to get updates on projects and information about local communities.

In 2005, the U.S. special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction investigated the Aegis contract and found a number of shortcomings. Among them was that Aegis did not vet all of its Iraqi employees for security, as required.

A sample check of the personnel records of 20 of 125 Iraqi nationals then on the payroll found no evidence of an interview for six, no evidence of a police background check on 18 and no records at all on two. "As a result, there is no assurance that the Iraqi national employees do not pose an internal security threat," the inspection report said.

In response, Aegis managers said Iraqi police checks were too difficult to obtain, given the destruction of past records. The requirement was dropped. The report also said that the company agreed that Iraqis would be vetted through the State Department system. The inspection report said that, as of April 2005, only 17 of the "last" 213 Iraqis hired had been vetted through that system. Aegis employees include foreign nationals, among whom are Gurkhas from Nepal, and all must be vetted.

Under the new contract now out for bids, the winner is to monitor all convoys, maintain a Web site, provide "Iraq-wide unclassified daily reports," as well as "provide relevant and timely intel/ops reports throughout Iraq" -- referring to intelligence/operations reports.

The U.S. government will provide about 134 vehicles, primarily sport-utility vehicles, but also armored personnel carriers. The government will also furnish weapons and ammunition, but the contractor must identify the people to whom the weapons will be issued. Employees will have access to government dining facilities and post exchanges, "where available," and will be entitled to "acute medical and dental services to include medical evacuation under emergency circumstances . . . at no cost" while they are "in theater."

Another contract up for bids is the operation of the Counterinsurgency Center for Excellence (COIN CFE) for up to three years at Camp Taji, north of Baghdad, in a section called the Phoenix Academy, which is devoted to joint U.S.-Iraqi training. Established in 2005 by Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commander of Multi-National Force-Iraq then, it will now operate under Petraeus, who recently rewrote the Army's counterinsurgency manual.

Last May, a Pentagon news release said COIN CFE, which involves U.S. and Iraqi personnel, was established "to help units adapt to and train for the war against terror in Iraq as it is fought today." At that time, it was a week-long course with 31 trainers and classes with about 40 trainees, including "brigade commanders, battalion commanders, company commanders and senior staff -- including noncommissioned officers," the news release said.

Under the new proposal, contractors will handle a variety of classes, including a special seminar for "general officers and senior field grade leaders at the multi-national corps and division levels." The group for senior leaders will be limited to 25, while the lower-level classes will include up to 70 students and will involve not just Iraqi army forces but also Iraqi National Police.

Lang, a former Green Beret who worked in counterinsurgency in the post-Vietnam War period, said the need to set up a counterinsurgency school in Iraq and rewrite the textbook showed that the Army had dropped that subject matter altogether during the 1980s and the 1990s. "The old doctrine died out, along with the lessons of East Africa, Vietnam and Bolivia," he said, "and now they need people with this kind of memory who are retired and know from experience."

War In Iraq Propelling A Massive Migration (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

AMMAN, Jordan -- Inside his cold, crumbling apartment, Saad Ali teeters on the fringes of life. Once a popular singer in his native Baghdad, he is now unemployed. To pay his $45 monthly rent, he borrows from friends. To bathe, he boils water on a tiny heater. He sleeps on a frayed mattress, under a tattered blanket.

Outside, Ali, 35, avoids police officers and disguises his Arabic with a Jordanian dialect. He returns home before 10 p.m. to stay clear of government checkpoints. Like hundreds of thousands of Iraqi refugees here, he fears being deported. Six months ago, near his home in Baghdad, two men threatened to kill him. Singing romantic songs, they said, was un-Islamic.

So when his pride hits a new low, he remembers that day.

DOJ_NMG_0127327

"Despite all the hardships I face here, it is better than going back to Baghdad," said Ali, long-faced with a sharp chin, who wore a thick red sweat shirt and rubbed his hands to keep warm. "They will behead me. What else can I do? I have no choice."

As the fourth year of war nears its end, the Middle East's largest refugee crisis since the Palestinian exodus from Israel in 1948 is unfolding in a climate of fear, persecution and tragedy.

Nearly 2 million Iraqis -- about 8 percent of the prewar population -- have embarked on a desperate migration, mostly to Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, according to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. The refugees include large numbers of doctors, academics and other professionals vital for Iraq's recovery. Another 1.7 million have been forced to move to safer towns and villages inside Iraq, and as many as 50,000 Iraqis a month flee their homes, the U.N. agency said in January.

The rich began trickling out of Iraq as conditions deteriorated under U.N. sanctions in the 1990s, their flight growing in the aftermath of the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. Now, as the violence worsens, increasing numbers of poor Iraqis are on the move, aid officials say. To flee, Iraqis sell their possessions, raid their savings and borrow money from relatives. They ride buses or walk across terrain riddled with criminals and Sunni insurgents, preferring to risk death over remaining in Iraq.

The United Nations is struggling to find funding to assist Iraqi refugees. Fewer than 500 have been resettled in the United States since the invasion. Aid officials and human rights activists say the United States and other Western nations are focused on reconstructing Iraq while ignoring the war's human fallout.

"It's probably political," said Janvier de Riedmatten, U.N. refugee agency representative for Iraq, referring to the reason why the world hasn't helped Iraq's refugees.

"The Iraq story has to be a success story," he said.

For decades, Jordan welcomed refugees. Roughly a third of its 5.9 million residents are Palestinian refugees. According to the United Nations, 500,000 to 700,000 Iraqi refugees live in Jordan, but aid officials say the actual number is nearer to 1 million because many Iraqis live under the radar. Jordan's tolerance has waned, however, since a group of Iraqis bombed three hotels in November 2005, killing 60 people, according to Iraqis, aid officials and human rights groups. The government fears that Iraq's mostly Sunni Arab refugees could remain in the country permanently or become recruits for Iraq's insurgency.

Now, the exodus is generating friction and anger across the region, while straining basic services in already poor countries. Iraqis are blamed for driving up prices and taking away scarce jobs. Iraq's neighbors worry the new refugees will carry in Iraq's sectarian strife.

"The Jordan government does not want to encourage Iraqis to stay for a long time," said Gaby Daw, project officer for the Catholic charity Caritas Internationalis, one of the few aid agencies assisting Iraqi refugees.

Into their new havens, Iraqis are bringing their culture and way of life, gradually reshaping the face of the Arab world. But the cost of escape is high. Feeding the bitterness of exile is a sense that outside forces created their plight. Many Iraqis here view the U.S.-led invasion that ousted President Saddam Hussein as the root of their woes.

"We were promised a kind of heaven on earth," said Rabab Haider, who fled Baghdad last year. "But we've been given a real hell."Sad Goodbyes

The road out of Iraq begins on Salhiye Street in Baghdad.

On Jan. 13, knots of Iraqis waited to board 14 buses to Syria. Inside a travel agency, Raghed Moyed, 23, sat solemnly with her 12-year-old brother, Amar. It had become too dangerous for her to attend college, so she was heading to Damascus to continue her education. As she sat, her head bowed, she recalled the previous night, when she bade farewell to her friends.

"It's really sad," said Moyed, her voice cracking as tears slid down her face. "I cried the whole way from the house to here. I don't want to leave Iraq, but it is hard to stay."

Sameer Humfash, the travel agent, watched her cry. By his estimate, 50 to 60 families were fleeing each day on the buses lined up outside. Nowadays, Iraqis were heading mostly to Syria, he said.

"They are not letting Iraqis in at the Jordanian border," interrupted Ahmed Khudair, one of Humfash's employees.

Humfash makes all his passengers sign waiver forms that read: "I am traveling on my own responsibility and God is the only one that protects us." On the roads to both Jordan and Syria, Sunni insurgents have dragged Shiites from buses and executed them. Humfash stays in radio contact every hour with the bus driver, usually a Syrian. He always asks three questions, he said:

"How is the road?"

DOJ_NMG_0127328

"Did they take any passengers?"

"Did they hurt any passengers?"Angst at the Border

Along the Iraq-Jordan border Jan. 16, a brisk wind howled across the barren landscape. It was 1:45 p.m. Until recently, hundreds of cars and buses filled with Iraqis would have been lined up to enter Jordan. On this day, there were four vehicles. A Jordanian border security official said many Iraqis were afraid to travel through Anbar province, one of Iraq's most violent regions.

Abu Hussam al-Khaisy, an Iraqi taxi driver, offered another explanation. The day before he had brought a family of seven Iraqis to the border, but Jordanian officials, he said, denied them admission with no explanation.

"They are not giving permission to enter because they are scared about security," said Khaisy at a restaurant in Ruwayshid, a Jordanian rest stop about 55 miles from the border. In other instances, he said, officials have turned away young Iraqi men who could take jobs away from Jordanians.

Today, the government is making it increasingly difficult for Iraqis to reside legally in Jordan. It views Iraqis as temporary visitors, not refugees, and has not sought international assistance. Human rights activists and U.N. officials have accused Jordan of shutting its border to many Iraqis fleeing persecution and deporting others.

Nasir Judah, a government spokesman, said Jordan has kept its door open to Iraqis even as they have become a burden on Jordan's economy and natural resources. In recent years, the influx was largely unregulated, but now tighter security measures are needed, he said. Iraqis, he added, have tried to enter Jordan using fake passports and identity cards.

"There are no mass deportations of Iraqis," Judah said. "Otherwise the numbers would be dwindling, and they are not."

On this day, Khaisy was driving Abu Wisam al-Azzawi, 35, back to Baqubah, a city about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Two months ago, members of Azzawi's immediate family were refused entry into Jordan, even though he owned a car dealership in Amman. Azzawi still remembers his son, on the Iraq side of the border, pleading through the cellphone: "Daddy, don't leave us."

Now, he was planning to fetch them from Baqubah and take them to Syria.

"I haven't told my family I am coming back," said Azzawi, before getting into Khaisy's maroon Caprice Classic in Ruwayshid. "Maybe I am not going to see them."

"Maybe I will get killed on the road."Seeking Safety, Aid

Outside the restaurant, two sport-utility vehicles passed by, heading to Amman. One, with large red-checkered bags on its roof, carried Abu Saif al-Ajrami's family. The other vehicle carried their life's possessions.

The Jordanians let them in after the family waited more than 24 hours at the border. It helped that Ajrami's father was Jordanian. At night, they arrived in Amman near a place refugees call Iraq Square, where taxis drop off recent arrivals. Two relatives, whom the family had not seen in five years, met them. There were hugs and kisses, and praises to God.

"I feel psychologically relieved. You can see it is very safe," said Ajrami, waving his hands at the cars flowing by. "But I have left my family, friends, my neighbors, my memories back in Baghdad. The first day there is security, I will go back."

Then he declared he would find a job the next day. "From the border to here, we felt like we had entered paradise," he said.

Widad Shakur, 53, said that when she arrived in Amman in October, she felt the same way. A Shiite Muslim, she fled after Sunni extremists threatened to behead her daughter, a teacher. But Iraq's chaos is never far away. A week ago, Shakur learned that a Sunni family had occupied her house. Now, she cannot sleep at night.

And she cannot afford to return to Iraq. Her daughter, a saleswoman, earns barely $300 a month, half of which goes to their rent. "I wish I was a bird and I could fly back to my house," said Shakur, as tears welled in her eyes.

"Who expected it would turn out like this -- Sunni against Shia?" she continued. "We were like brothers. Why is this happening?"

She has a more pressing problem. Her legs hurt, she said. But she cannot afford a doctor. She worries that seeking help at a Jordanian hospital might lead to deportation, even though she has a three-month residency permit.

"I don't know whether we have the right to go to it or not," said Shakur, who wore a black, sequined head scarf. "I am afraid to go there."

At the Royal Association for Iraq Immigrants, Salah al-Samarai had 28 pink and yellow folders stacked on his desk. They belonged to Iraqis in need of surgeries.

"I don't know what to do," said Samarai, the head of the nonprofit that helps Iraqis, as visitors waited outside his door.

DOJ_NMG_0127329

In front of him sat Waad Abdul Rahim, a solemn Iraqi professor dressed in a tweed jacket. His 14-year-old daughter, Mina, needed an intestinal operation. It cost $5,000. For the past month and a half, he has visited Samarai's office.

"I come every day, and then I go back to suffer," Rahim said. "Her life is in danger. The longer it takes, the more dangerous it is going to be."

Samarai nodded in sympathy and said, "We have four or five more-serious cases."

Most of the organization's funds come from donations, he said. He doesn't blame the Jordanian government. "It's enough they opened their doors for us to stay here," Samarai said. But he wished the international community would do more to help.

"Lots of Americans tell us we don't need money: 'You are wealthy.' I even went to the European Union. They also said, 'You don't need money.' "A Taste of Baghdad

Rabab Haider and her husband, Ibrahim al-Shawy, live in an elegant, sunlit apartment in Amman. Along with other middle-class Iraqis, they live in a parallel Iraq. Many of their relatives and friends are here. Iraq's sectarian divisions rarely enter their lives.

The richest Iraqis can get residency permits by depositing $70,000 in a Jordanian bank, buying property or investing. Others simply pay a $2 daily fine for expired permits.

"I see more Iraqis here than I do in Baghdad," said Shawy, who travels every few months to Iraq, where he owns land.

Qaduri, a popular restaurant nearby, was once an institution in Baghdad. Then it was bombed. Seven months ago, its owners decided to resurrect it in Amman. Now it serves tashreeb, a traditional Iraqi stew, from midnight to noon, just as it did in Baghdad.

Next door, a sign reads that another restaurant plans to open soon. Its specialty: pacha, the dish of boiled lamb's head that Iraqis consider a delicacy.

At a recent Iraqi wedding in the upscale Bristol Hotel, an Iraqi singer sang songs and guests moved to the drumbeats of the jobee, an Iraqi folk dance. In Baghdad, with the car bombs, checkpoints and kidnappings, large weddings are all but extinct.

"You turned the clock back four years," Um Ammar, a guest who had recently arrived from Baghdad, told the groom's mother.

The singer began to hum a patriotic Iraqi hymn. In the audience, eyes filled with tears. Others sobbed.

Moments later, the singer crooned: "Baghdad."

The audience responded: "In my eyes is Heaven."

"Baghdad," the singer sang again.

"Is our one and only love," the audience sang. "Baghdad is our sole mother, may God safeguard you from the evil surrounding you."

On a January afternoon, over cake and coffee in their Amman apartment, Haider and Shawy spoke of nostalgia, guilt and uncertainty.

"What about the torment?" said Haider, a pleasant, short-haired woman with a faint British accent. "You being safe and your people in Baghdad are not."

They have six months of savings left, Shawy said. He's sending rÃ©sumÃ©s around the world.

"How long can we keep this?" asked Haider, looking at their plush sofas, the purple vase, the glass dining table.Living in Fear

On Jan. 18, a curly-haired artist named Qais Mohammed Ateih sat inside singer Saad Ali's two-room apartment, which is nestled near a warren of shops and narrow alleys. A third Iraqi refugee, Razzaq al-Okaeli, 35, joined them. The trio spoke about being like beggars, depending on friends for meals. Ateih said he knew at least 70 Iraqis who have been deported since 2003.

In the wake of Hussein's execution in December, many Iraqi Shiites say they have been targeted because of their sect. Jordan, a mostly Sunni nation, is home to many supporters of Hussein, who was a Sunni and a benefactor of Palestinians.

"Is the government targeting us for being Shiites? No. But from individual policemen, we feel this," said Ateih, 36. "They say, 'You betrayed Saddam.' "

If they are lucky, Ateih said, they find jobs as day laborers, earning $7 for a 14-hour workday. But Jordanian employers, they said, often exploit Iraqis. Okaeli said he recently worked for two months as an air-conditioning repairman; his employer paid him for only 10 days of work.

DOJ_NMG_0127330

"They know we cannot complain to the authorities," said Okaeli, a short man with brushed-back hair and long, trim sideburns. "If we complain, we will get deported."

Ali sat on a worn brown sofa, rubbing his hands, taking in the conversation. He had hoped to earn enough money to help his parents in Baghdad. Now, when he speaks to them, he never reveals the truth.

"They are inside Iraq. They should have to worry only about themselves," said Ali, his eyes lowered at the dusty red carpet. "So I tell them I am fine."

He paused, then glanced at the tiny heater, and said, "I never expected it would be like this."

Iraq War Spawns Growing Refugee Problem (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

Decades after the Middle East was hit by the mass uprooting of Palestinians, it is again struggling with a gigantic refugee problem — this time from Iraq.

The exodus — one million to neighboring Syria alone, according to the U.N. — is another unforeseen byproduct of the 2003 Iraq invasion. When it might peak, nobody knows, but if it continues at its present rate, the consequences for the region would be profound.

Iraqis now make up more than 5 percent of Syria's population, the U.N. refugee agency says. Jordan says its 700,000 Iraqis have swollen its population by 12 percent, and its officials say they have already moved to cut off the flow. So has Egypt, with 130,000 Iraqi newcomers.

But Syria's doors remain open and the new arrivals have transformed some Damascus neighborhoods to such an extent that Iraqi-accented Arabic is all that's heard.

In the capital's Jarramana suburb, restaurants advertise Iraqi dishes, along with belly dancers and singers imported from Baghdad, Basra and Mosul. Many store windows advertise apartments and houses for rent or sale. In al-Sayda Zeinab, another Damascus suburb, Iraqis crowd into the marble-tiled plaza of a Shiite mosque, far outnumbering Iranian pilgrims.

Syria is poor and lacking in jobs, and many Syrians grumble about the newcomers pushing up the cost of food and housing. The U.N. refugee agency says it is struggling to help the Iraqis, many of whom are poor and running out of the meager funds they brought.

New York-based Human Rights Watch accuses the United States of doing too little, saying it should "significantly" increase the number of Iraqi refugees it will resettle this year and contribute generously to the U.N. appeal for funds to cope with the crisis.

"Washington is spending about $2 billion per week on the war in Iraq, but has barely begun to address the human fallout from the war," said Bill Frelick, Human Rights Watch's refugee policy director.

The U.S. resettled several hundred Iraqis in 2006, according to the U.N. agency, whose formal title, UNHCR, stands for U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. It wants Washington to take up to 20,000 in 2007.

Egypt and Jordan have reported only minor security frictions with the refugees, but both say their fear of importing Iraq's violence forces them to clamp down.

Jordanian officials point to the killing of 60 people in 2005, when Iraqi suicide bombers linked to al-Qaida blew themselves up in three hotels in Jordan's capital, Amman.

Human Rights Watch says Jordan refuses entry to Iraqi men between ages 17 and 35. Government officials acknowledge restrictions on the entry of Iraqis, but won't give specifics.

The Iraqi presence in Jordan is a "burden," Jordanian government spokesman Nasser Judeh said. Jordan, he said, wants an international conference to discuss compensation for Arab nations hosting fleeing Iraqis.

Syria, population 18 million, is the refuge of choice primarily because of its relaxed entry regulations for Arabs, the relatively low cost of living and availability of schools and health care.

President Bashar Assad's government is reluctant to detail the costs. "There is indeed a burden, but Syria doesn't complain to anyone and is not asking anyone for help," Vice President Farouk al-Sharaa told reporters in Damascus in January.

DOJ_NMG_0127331

Still, the impact is felt. Housing prices in the Damascus area have soared by up to 300 percent. Syrians also complain about higher food prices and overcrowding at some schools, which have reportedly admitted up to 28,000 Iraqi children. In areas where Iraqis have settled, residents say some classes have swollen from 30 pupils to 50.

The Damascus office of the UNHCR says about 40,000 Iraqis arrive monthly. They can stay for six months, then must leave and renew the visa process from scratch. The quickest way is a short trip to neighboring Lebanon, but at $20 a person or more, the sightseeing packages are too costly for the poor.

Still, most Iraqis in Syria say they have no serious complaints about their life in exile, and have made a home away from home.

Some have settled in Palestinian refugee camps, where rents are lower, joining tens of thousands of Palestinians who came to Syria as refugees following the 1948 creation of Israel and the 1967 Arab-Israeli war.

Iraqis also have set up a private university outside the capital, with Iraqi lecturers and a mostly Iraqi student body — a reflection of Iraq's war-driven brain drain.

Two Damascus theaters are showing Iraqi plays, complete with star actors-in-exile. "Homesick," a slapstick comedy set in the offices of an imaginary Iraqi satellite TV channel based in Syria, has drawn near sellout crowds since opening Dec. 7.

"My homeland is like a paradise even if it resembles hell," blares a song from the theater's speakers.

For $5 a ticket, Iraqis who have fled suicide bombings, death squads, gunbattles, unemployment and violent crime laugh hysterically as comedians Majid Yassin and Nahi Mahdi joke about Baghdad's fuel shortages and power outages.

"It is not a good life, but at least we are safe here," said Ibrahim Hamad, a former Iraqi army officer who came to Syria eight months ago with his wife and three children from Anbar province, the heartland of Iraq's Sunni-led insurgency.

"No bombs, no shootings, no Americans, no militiamen and no power cuts," he said.

Hamad is not entitled to an army pension because he was an active member of Saddam's now-outlawed Baath party. The family lives on the $250 a month he collects from tenants living in his central Baghdad apartment, and from dabbling in cross-border commerce.

The promise of a well-paid job in a business run by relatives in the Persian Gulf city of Dubai keeps his hopes up.

The United States and Iraq's Shiite-dominated government accuse Syria of harboring leaders of Iraq's Sunni-led insurgency — particularly former Baath Party officials — and allowing them to move back and forth across the border with Iraq. Among the Iraqis in Syria are some 300,000 Shiites, but there have been no reports of Iraq's Sunni-Shiite tensions spilling over into Syria.

The UNHCR is struggling to deal with the flood of Iraqis across the region — and within their homeland. It says some 500,000 fled their homes to other parts of Iraq in 2006 alone, and that the number of internally displaced people could reach 2.3 million — nearly one in ten Iraqis — by the end of 2007.

This month, the Geneva-based agency made an emergency appeal for $60 million to help fleeing Iraqis.

"Unremitting violence in Iraq will likely mean continued mass internal and external displacement affecting much of the surrounding region," it said.

Already, its resources in Syria are stretched thin. The waiting time for seeing a UNHCR official is five months, said Laurens Jolles, the UNHCR representative in Syria. He hopes it will drop to one month after his office recruits 10 new staff.

"Syria's generosity is admirable and must be noted," he said in an interview.

But many Iraqi families are running out of money and becoming increasingly dependent on aid from religious and political support groups, he said. Up to 30 percent of young Iraqis aren't attending school, he added.

Some of the refugees are fortunate enough to find legal work, but Jolles said many more are employed illegally, and vulnerable to exploitation.

The Iraqis pose no security threat, "but there are social ills like theft and prostitution," said Elias Murad, editor-in-chief of the Al-Baath, official newspaper of Syria's ruling Baath Party.

Saad Hamza Ilwan, a retired primary school teacher from Mahmoudiyah, a particularly dangerous Sunni Arab town south of Baghdad, came to Syria with his wife and three children nearly two years ago. He could only afford a flat in the al-Yarmouk Palestinian refugee camp, which is more like a sprawling suburb of Damascus.

DOJ_NMG_0127332

He sells cellular telephones and phone cards. "Business is slow," he said as his 10-year-old son, Mohammed, dusted the shelves. "There are five shops selling the same things on this part of the street alone."

He said his children are struggling with a Syrian school system that is more rigorous than Iraq's.

"But the Syrians treat us well," said Ilwan, who says he fled Iraq four months after U.S. troops stormed his home, arrested two of his brothers and held them for eight months.

In al-Yarmouk, the men spend their evenings smoking and drinking sweet black tea while swapping stories of conditions at home learned from telephone conversations with relatives and friends in Iraq.

Mohammed, the 10-year-old, huddles by an electrical heater to fend off the cold and declares himself homesick.

"I don't like Damascus," he says, drawing protests from his father. "I want to be back in my school in Iraq."

Associated Press correspondents Jamal Halaby in Amman, Jordan, and Salah Nasrawi in Cairo, Egypt, contributed to this report.

Taliban Leader Killed In NATO Airstrike (AP)

AP, February 4, 2007

NATO-led troops killed a senior Taliban leader with a precision airstrike near a southern Afghan town overrun by militants, a spokesman for the alliance said Sunday.

Col. Tom Collins said the airstrike near Musa Qala on Sunday morning killed a senior Taliban leader riding in a car.

Musa Qala on Thursday was overrun by an estimated 200 Taliban fighters who disarmed local police, ransacked the district center and hoisted their trademark white flag.

The town had been subject to a peace deal brokered last October between village elders and the Helmand provincial government that prevented NATO, Afghan and Taliban fighters from coming within 3 miles of the town center.

Collins said the Taliban leader was killed within that 3-mile zone with the approval of the Afghan government. He said no NATO or Afghan forces were on the ground in Musa Qala.

Collins didn't immediately name the person killed in the strike, but Mohammad Wali, a Musa Qala resident, said the airstrike killed a Taliban leader named Mullah Abdul Gafoor and some of his associates while they were riding in a truck through a small village just outside Musa Qala.

Another resident, Lal Mohammad, told The Associated Press on Saturday that the fighters in Musa Qala were being led by Gafoor, the hardline militia's corps commander in western Afghanistan during the Taliban regime.

Musa Qala saw intense battles between Taliban fighters and British troops last summer and fall. The fighting caused widespread damage to the town of around 10,000 inhabitants, most of whom were forced to leave.

British forces withdrew from Musa Qala in October after the truce, which turned over security to local leaders and prevented NATO forces from entering the town.

Gen. David Richards, who was replaced Sunday as NATO's commander, told the AP on Saturday that "very surgical and deliberate" force would be used to evict the fighters from Musa Qala, where he said the alliance's strategy of avoiding military action has driven a wedge between residents and Taliban insurgents.

Residents Flee Taliban-held Town (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) -- Hundreds of villagers fled a southern Afghan town overrun by Taliban militants, fearful of a NATO attack on the insurgent fighters who have hoisted their trademark white flag over the town's ransacked government center, residents said.

NATO's outgoing commander, Gen. David Richards, said "very surgical and deliberate" force would be used if needed to solve the crisis in the town of Musa Qala, and Afghan Defense Minister Abdul Rahim Wardak said: "If there is a need for an operation, there will be one."

Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said Saturday that NATO was watching the situation, but that no forces were in Musa Qala. NATO troops pulled out of the town in October after the government and village elders signed a peace agreement.

DOJ_NMG_0127333

"It is only a matter of time before (the) government re-establishes control," Collins said.

However, he said NATO had reports that Taliban militants had reinforced their defensive positions.

Abdul Baqi, a villager who fled Musa Qala with five family members on Saturday, said residents feared a bloody clash was imminent after the Taliban fighters swarmed the town Wednesday and Thursday, temporarily taking village elders hostage.

"I'm going to stay with my relatives and will return only if the situation gets better," Baqi said while sitting in his pickup truck in the nearby district of Gereshk.

Resident Mohammad Wali said Taliban fighters had hoisted a white flag over the damaged government compound, and villager Lal Mohammad said hundreds of residents had fled.

British troops fought intense battles with Taliban fighters in Musa Qala in the second half of last year. The clashes caused widespread damage to the surrounding town of around 10,000 inhabitants, most of whom were forced to flee.

British forces left Musa Qala in October after elders and the Helmand provincial governor struck a truce that turned over security to local leaders and prevented NATO forces from entering the town.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmadi, said the Taliban took over the town in response to NATO attacks he said violated that agreement -- an apparent reference to a NATO airstrike outside of Musa Qala that killed a senior militant leader and a number of his deputies late last month.

But NATO said the Taliban were never party to the agreement, and that "by their actions, the Taliban have ended over four months of peace in Musa Qala which, until now, had seen a return to normality with reconstruction and development getting under way."

"It is very clear that the Taliban are acting against the wishes of the people of Musa Qala," a NATO statement said.

Richards, a strong supporter of the British-backed peace agreement, said the Taliban move proved the agreement's success.

"These mechanisms to drive a wedge are an absolute classic part of any counterinsurgency," he said. "Far from being a failure, it shows what a success this can be and how upsetting it can be to the Taliban."

New Chief For NATO Afghan Force (BBC)

BBC.com, February 4, 2007

UK General David Richards has handed over control of the Nato force in Afghanistan to US General Dan McNeil.

During Gen Richards's nine months in charge, the International Security Assistance Force (Isaf) has increased from 9,000 to more than 33,000 troops.

Commanders who have recently faced a fierce Taleban offensive in the south have asked for further reinforcements to fight the insurgents.

But so far only the US and Britain have pledged more troops.

Criticism

It has been a challenging time for Gen Richards

Gen Richards faced Taleban attacks in the south where US, British, Canadian and Dutch troops were deployed in areas previously outside the control of the government, our correspondent says.

Nevertheless, he marked the end of his reign by declaring that the conflict in Afghanistan is a "winnable war".

In a BBC interview, Gen Richards said the Taleban commander in the disputed town of Musa Qala in Helmand province, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, was killed in an air strike overnight.

"It's almost 100% certain that... the leader of the Taleban grouping in Musa Qala that intimidated the people and took over the centre, has just actually been taken out in an air strike along with some of his leading henchmen."

Speaking to the Associated Press, he said the Taleban had failed to recover from a major battle last year.

"They know in a conventional sense their attempt, which I will give them credit for was a good attempt, failed when they gathered 1,000 fighters in one place."

New approach?

Gen McNeil took command of the multinational headquarters in a ceremony on Sunday morning.

DOJ_NMG_0127334

He has been based in Afghanistan before, and will take on the Isaf mission of bringing security and development, and helping win over the people for the Afghan government, our correspondent says.

He says there has been some criticism from US quarters of the British policy of making peace deals with local elders - notably in Helmand province where a four-month ceasefire recently collapsed in one town.

The new commander is expected to have more troops available to him than Gen Richards could call upon.

There is an uncertainty as to whether Gen McNeil might take a more direct approach to the counter-insurgency but that is yet to be seen, our correspondent says.

Afghan Schools Take On The Taliban (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

WACH TANGI, AFGHANISTAN — Even before the winter wind had scattered the ashes of their village school, the people of this poor hamlet in eastern Afghanistan decided they had to fight back.

On a bitterly cold night last month, suspected Taliban militants set fire to all five "classrooms," housed in canvas tents donated by a humanitarian agency. It was one of nearly 200 schools across the country burned in the last year by Islamic insurgents.

Four hundred more schools were closed by threats and intimidation, driving more than 130,000 students from their classrooms and dealing a harsh blow to massive international efforts to rebuild an education system ravaged during the years of Taliban rule.

Over the last three months, however, the rate of attacks has fallen dramatically, with fewer than half a dozen schools believed to have been targeted. Education officials attribute the decrease at least in part to a nationwide drive to create local "defense committees" for schools, enlisting the help of tribal elders, Islamic clerics and, in some cases, homegrown militias.

The people of Wach Tangi, which lies about 10 miles north of Jalalabad, the capital of Nangarhar province, believed their village was too remote and their tent school too rudimentary to attract the notice of any Taliban militants in the area.

The road leading to the village of 1,800 people resembles a dry riverbed: winding, pitted and stone-strewn. So arid and forbidding is the landscape that in the Pashto language, Wach Tangi means "valley without water."

But on the night of Jan. 6, arsonists took the trouble to make the journey, and methodically set each tent ablaze. Villagers raised the alarm within moments, but it was too late. The classrooms vanished in a whoosh of flames that scorched the stone foundations and charred the metal support poles.

"We realized right away that we had made a big mistake by not doing more to protect ourselves, to protect our school," headmaster Wali Mohammed said.

A posse of village men took to the dry hills, trying unsuccessfully to track the arsonists. The next day, virtually all of Wach Tangi's families, even the poorest, agreed to chip in what they could to have armed men guard the school at night once it reopened.

Within two days, the village had organized a protection committee made up of its most influential citizens, charged with the task of keeping the school, its pupils and its teachers safe.

The school is up and running again, in UNICEF-donated tents. Students still have the schoolbooks that were home with them when the old school was burned, and more are on the way from donors.

But the fire remains fresh in everyone's mind.

"Those who did this to our school are enemies of our country," said Abdul Wahed, a white-bearded tribal elder. "We won't allow this to happen to us or to our children."

Afghanistan's Education Ministry has encouraged grass-roots school-protection initiatives in recent months, even though the central government has no money to fund them. There are no reliable figures, but the ministry believes more than half the country's 9,000 schools are under some form of locally organized protection, whose effectiveness remains to be seen.

DOJ_NMG_0127335

"There just aren't enough police to watch over every school in the country," said Zuhoor Afghan, a ministry spokesman. "But the local people know their own towns and villages best. They know who is a stranger; they know who has business there and who does not."

Villagers are aware that their vigilante methods could cost them their lives. The Taliban, whose name means "students," see Western-style education as a threat to their concept of a pure Islamic state. Their followers regard modern education as a force for Western colonialism.

Wahed, the elder in Wach Tangi, said he did not know what would have happened if villagers had caught up with armed men on the night of the fire.

"We had only a few old guns," he said with a shrug. "But we would have done our best against them."

Likewise, the night watchmen hired by the village are equipped only with handguns, little match for the automatic rifles carried by Taliban fighters.

Still, the villagers believe their newfound watchfulness will be a deterrent. And the school-protection committee members are trying, each in his own way, to help stave off attacks.

The mullah on the committee has been using mosque sermons to emphasize that nothing in the Koran forbids girls from receiving an education, as they do in Wach Tangi, where about half the nearly 500 pupils are girls. Boys study in the morning and girls in the afternoon.

One of the tribal chieftains on the committee is calling in favors from kinsmen nearby, asking them to keep their ears open for word of any threat. Another committee member has lobbied the police to mount more frequent patrols, winning a sympathetic hearing from a commander who grew up in the area.

Many of those associated with the school remain deeply fearful. Teacher Gul Anar said that after the fire, she considered abandoning her work. Dozens of teachers have been killed in Afghanistan, and she was afraid of becoming a victim too.

"I was terrified," she said. "And losing our school was such a very sad moment. But then I thought of my students, how eager they are to learn, and I decided I must continue."

Some educators believe that the recent lull in school burnings and other attacks is only partly due to the establishment of protection committees. Violence traditionally decreases during the coldest months, and they think the insurgents will become more active again during the spring.

Other school officials believe that the Taliban, after initially underestimating the strength of the country's education ethic, may have discerned that the school-burning campaign was backfiring.

"People hated it during the time of the Taliban, when their daughters could not study and when nothing was taught in the schools but theology," said Mohammed, the Wach Tangi headmaster. "Attacking schools is not going to make them popular again. Even they can see that."

In what may have been a concession to that sentiment, a Taliban spokesman in the country's south announced last month that the movement would begin opening schools of its own, at which girls "eventually" would be welcome.

Educators and Western military officials scoffed at the notion.

"What's the curriculum going to be — suicide bombings?" asked Mark Laity, the chief spokesman in Afghanistan for NATO.

"We don't believe for a moment that education is a genuine goal of these people…. They don't want Afghanistan to have a functioning government or civil society."

"It's only a ruse," said Afghan, of the Education Ministry. "If they did open schools, they wouldn't teach anything but religion — no mathematics, no language, no history."

In the classroom tents of Wach Tangi, teachers said, they still had not been able to adequately explain to their pupils why their school had been a target.

"After the fire, they asked me over and over again, 'Why? Who would do this?' " said teacher Shoiabullah, who uses one name.

"We didn't have a real answer for them. We said only that we would try our best to keep it from happening again."

The Road To Helmand (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0127336

By Holly Barnes Higgins

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The news came in a phone call from Afghanistan. Ten days ago, a suicide bomber tried to talk his way into a compound in Lashkar Gah where I had worked until last October. He blew himself up without getting in and no one else was seriously hurt, but the story shook me. What I had expected for so long had finally happened.

I went to Afghanistan in October 2005 to work on an economic development project funded by the U.S. government. I went because I believed in the mission: helping to improve the quality of life in a war-torn land. I was lucky to get out.

Now I am home, hearing with dismay that President Bush lauds our work as a success and is requesting more aid for Afghanistan. I think of my colleagues still back in Helmand province, especially the young Afghans who risk their lives to work with us because the United States has insisted that progress is on the way.

I know about the millions of dollars already wasted there.

When I was in the field, I sometimes had to travel to Kabul to talk to U.S. officials about various assistance strategies and whether they were viable on the ground. They call the process "groundtruthing."

A year later, this is the story of my time in Afghanistan. This is my own groundtruthing.September 2005

I didn't want to go.

When a friend mentions the job in Afghanistan, I shake my head before he even finishes talking. I'm not looking for another adventure. I've worked with uban youth and in Angola. I've done enough hard time in hard circumstances. At 36, I feel it's my time to settle down. The most dangerous province in Afghanistan is the last place I want to go.

But my friend presses. "Would you be willing just to talk with them?" he asks. I imagine what I've seen of Afghanistan in the media -- a desperate place bombed to hell even though it already looked to be in pieces. Still vulnerable to the idea of humanitarian service, and to adventure, I agree to a meeting.

The project in question, run by a private contractor and funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) to the tune of $121 million over four years, is intended to provide jobs, develop business and agriculture, and improve infrastructure in Helmand province -- all part of the effort to reduce poppy-growing in that region, one of the largest opium-production centers in the world. It seems a worthy goal.

But the project is also taking over from another that shut down after 11 members of its staff were killed. The Taliban have never claimed credit for the deaths, but most people assume they're to blame.

I talk to anyone I can find who has experience in the region. No one thinks I should take the job. Only one person I meet has ever even set foot in Helmand, and she sounds stunned that I'm considering working there for a year or two. The lone voice of optimism is that of a journalist. "You'll have a ball," he says.

Before I leave for Kabul, I put my belongings in long-term storage, ship my cats home to Texas, rent out my apartment. I also prepare a power of attorney and my will.October 2005

Our little plane hits the large swath of gravel that serves as an airstrip for Lashkar Gah, the capital of Helmand. The barrenness all around is astounding: no buildings, no parking lots, nothing but a few dust-colored structures.

A group of Afghan men with Soviet-era rocket-propelled grenade launchers watch us get off the plane. They follow every move I make, but I'm careful not to look them in the eye.

My living quarters are a bedroom and bath in a 10-bedroom, three-story pink stucco building that people call "the palace," short for "narco-palace." Blast-protection film covers the windows, and the security manager is preparing to hire a crew to fill thousands of sandbags to fortify the perimeter. The project office is in the same compound, so my commute is about six steps door to door.

The house speaks of rare wealth (and bad taste), but the periphery of our compound is just like everyone else's: rudimentary ditches filled with rubbish and a black-green soup of waste and water.

An American colleague takes me up to the roof. All around are grassless yards and square houses of mud or clay. Directly below us, a scrawny cow stands under a drought-shrunken tree, a chicken pecking at her hoof, while a child prepares to fly his plastic-bag kite. Passersby stare up in shock at the sight of a blond woman with an uncovered head. Ducking, I hurry back inside.

* * *

DOJ_NMG_0127337

One of 34 Afghan provinces, Helmand lies about 400 miles southwest of Kabul. It's home to the highly conservative Pashtun people. Poppy production was nearly unheard of here before the Soviet invasion in 1979. But today, most farmers grow poppy, along with smaller amounts of other produce. It's simple economics: A farmer can earn about $5,400 per hectare of opium yield, almost 10 times what he would get for a hectare of wheat.

In the 1950s and '60s, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and USAID developed a 1,600-kilometer irrigation system in the province. Many residents remember a time when Lashkar Gah, with its newly paved streets and neat rows of tree-shaded houses, was called "Little America."

Today, much of the pavement is ruined, and the sagging former USAID homes look much older than they are. Meanwhile, massive, gaudy structures built with drug money rise around them. Because of their bizarre, strange-colored exteriors dotted with mirrors and decorative tiles, these narco-palaces are also referred to as "Pakistani wedding cakes."

* * *

I am the only woman on our team. I'd been warned that locals would think I was a prostitute brought from the West for the male staff of American, Australian, British and Latin American contractors, and that this perceived violation of Islamic morality would put the team at heightened risk.

So I am required to stay on the first floor, while my expat male colleagues enjoy more private quarters upstairs. I dress in shapeless clothing and wear only enough makeup to feel comfortable, yet I still feel as though I'm surrounded by a neon light.

The only time I feel relief from this self-consciousness is around A., our Hazara cook. Unlike the Pashtun men, A. looks me in the eye, laughs easily, doesn't seem afraid of me. He spends hours preparing our meals, then watches our expressions as we eat, awaiting appreciation from the table, often winking at me.

Nonetheless, by and large the food is horrible -- sometimes really horrible. But about once a week, A. hits the bull's eye. His "Pashtun burgers" are a favorite. He uses an old coffee can to cut circles out of nan, the flat Afghan bread, to serve as buns.

More than anything, A. wants to be a chef in the United States. Sometimes I get excited about this idea and think about ways to help make it happen. But the barriers are too great.

I feel the same about S. and R., the two young Afghan women in our office. They want to go to medical school, but they have no passports and no money. Nor do they know much English. I feel impotent in the face of their dreams. Getting an Afghan into the United States post-9/11 is as ambitious an undertaking as, well, getting poppy out of Afghanistan.

* * *

The people of Helmand fall into two categories. The great majority believe that poppy is the only reliable source of income. The small minority believe that with help, alternative livelihoods are possible. They don't know how to make progress, but they're hungry for it, so they're willing to trust us.

The project's goal is to diversify the economy and create jobs. Plans include building roads and refurbishing the irrigation system, electrification improvements, job training, an industrial park. I'm responsible for setting up the public information office and developing a campaign to promote the project to Afghans. But there's a substantial caveat: illiteracy. The project's security manager tells me that not one man in his unit of 60 can write his own name; to receive their pay, they "sign" with their thumbprint. Whatever strategy I come up with will have to be compelling but simple.

The company seems most invested in pleasing its client, USAID. Meanwhile, USAID is concerned about pleasing the Afghan people, local and national Afghan leaders, the media, Capitol Hill and the State Department. So I am to issue reports every other week, as well as "success stories" that will convince everyone that these millions of dollars are well spent, that U.S. efforts in Helmand are a shining example of our good work in the world.

On paper, it sounds great. But in practice, all I have to promote are concepts. I'm told to wait before I initiate any public education effort. Weeks go by. Nothing happens. I tell the team I'm concerned about losing the confidence of Afghans who are interested in finding livelihoods other than poppy cultivation. I suggest announcing project timelines so that people can anticipate positive changes. We must provide something to generate discussion as people eat their meals, sit together for tea, walk to Friday prayers.

DOJ_NMG_0127338

But because of mismanagement at multiple levels, personnel turnover, lack of initiative and concerns about personal security, progress simply isn't forthcoming. Often the local Afghan government and its culture of corruption, or USAID, are blamed for the lack of results, but the bottom line is the same: We have very few accomplishments to report.

In the meantime, the reports are still due. And I feel pressure to explain to local residents what we are doing here. I hear over and over how the Afghans feel let down by the international community. So our words and images must be chosen with great care. I have little but words and images to offer.

* * *

Though the Taliban pulled out of Lashkar Gah after the U.S. invasion in 2001, they have gradually made their way back, working with drug lords to control the production of the poppy crop they once forbade, the profits from which now fuel their resistance. The Taliban and their collaborators approach our laborers regularly, making deals to ensure their loyalty during the planting and harvesting season.

But maintaining poppy production is only part of their mission. They are here to expel the infidels, maintain the status quo of fear and resist progress that suggests cooperation with the West.

We hear that the Taliban see Helmand province as their proving ground, the key to taking back Afghan territory from NATO and Afghan troops. Commanders on the ground describe the situation as the most brutal conflict the British army has been involved in since the Korean War.

* * *

I ask the elders who work in our office to help me find someone to serve as my assistant. B. comes in the next day. She's nervous, and her English is poor. She doesn't have any real qualifications. But I'm desperate for help, so I hire her.November 2005

Our security manager is continually checking rumors of danger. Recently, he has received reports of more "night letters" distributed locally.

The night letter calls on holy warriors to fight the infidels. One that I read states that cooperation with Christians and Jews and those associated with the U.S.-backed invasion is punishable by death. Any Afghan known to work as a cook or driver or to engage with Westerners will be executed.

I think of B. and the risks she takes to work with us. We agree that she will call me at the end of every work day to let us know that she has arrived home safely. She in turn worries that I could be poisoned, and insists that I eat food prepared only by people I trust.

* * *

A vehicle-borne suicide bomb detonates outside the provincial governor's office compound, about two blocks away. It's only a partial explosion, and the bomber survives the blast to be shot down as he gets out of the car. Several days later, we hear more blasts -- the rest of the suicide mission's explosives. U.S. Special Forces forgot to tell anyone they were going to set them off. Our ribs shake from the impact, and a tense silence descends on the office.

* * *

I hold a dry opium pod, and it rattles like a baby's toy. Today I learned that women are planting poppy openly in front of their homes, trying to attract buyers. I'm told that some are widows who can't imagine another way to provide for their children. Others are virtual widows, their husbands lost to the haze of opium addiction.

I met today with F., the director of women's affairs for the province. Apparently she secretly educated hundreds of girls in her home during the Taliban era. The Helmand Women's Association is housed in a dank, dilapidated building. F. receives no salary and faces begging, pleading women every day. She feels helpless, and is grateful that we are here.

* * *

Several of us go to the bazaar in search of spices for our Thanksgiving meal. I bite into things, hoping to find nutmeg, and examine the local version of peppercorn. My favorite senior Afghan staff member, H., is with me as the crowds gather to watch us.

Suddenly, I'm pushed. I assume it's an accident, but H. snaps at the crowd. We've just received a call from security about a possible car bomb, so he's already on edge. It's one of only two shopping trips we'll make before the market is designated "no go" for expats, and it is cut short. But I have nutmeg.December 2005

DOJ_NMG_0127339

I heard this today: "Helmand is where God comes to cry." The barren surroundings are so overwhelming that they blunt any interest in conversation, so our travels on the road are mostly quiet. Until we see a camel, or an enormous Kuchi dog, or a little girl decked out in something bright and sequined.

Every day here, it is palpable, the cost exacted from a people living between abject poverty and illegal income. I see it in the cautious eyes of turbaned men coming into the compound to meet with our agricultural team, and in the suspicious expressions of local leaders.

I don't think they know that we understand their situation. Inside this compound we think about it all day, every day. We talk about it at meals; we know the world outside these walls is waiting for more and better options.

But the team seems to face obstacles everywhere: some USAID regulation that management can't get around; resistance to new ideas; and a general sense of being overwhelmed that's the result of an ill-conceived mission.

Local residents live between a rock and a hard place, and expect us to extricate them. We live between a rock and a hard place, and clock time until our contracts are up.February 2006

I feel bad that we're not accomplishing more here, but I have no guilt about living in this compound and earning hardship pay. Especially because USAID keeps raising our danger pay, but never talks about evacuation. We're the only foreigners left here except the military. Even a Bangladeshi nongovernmental organization shut its doors recently after one of its Afghan staff members was killed as he prayed in the nearby mosque.

* * *

As harvest season approaches, we brace ourselves for foreign media inquiries. Predictably, most want to tell the sinister story of opium and violence. I am determined to show a different Helmand. But after the first two or three visits, it becomes obvious that the project has few activities to showcase. Over and over we take reporters to the cobblestone road at Qalai Bost.

Our one success story, the road was begun early this year, using stones harvested from the Helmand River. Nearly 350 men were paid $4 a day to leave the poppy fields and work on it. I never thought I could get excited about road construction, but it truly is a thing of beauty, as is the laborers' pride in it.

In preparation for a visit by reporters, I want the men to practice being interviewed, so I play reporter while B. serves as interpreter. I ask her to encourage the workers to use their own words. To my relief, each man speaks authentically about his fondness for the work. A day's wage on this project, one says, is enough to buy medicine and send his child to school, and he is proud of the fact that it is clean money.

The reporter I accompany to the site the next day has been around the region a lot longer than I have. When I suggest that she speak to the men I had talked to, she recoils and strikes off in the opposite direction, looking for other laborers who will tell her the darker story of poppy. We all could have saved her the time and risk and told her that over the phone. We all know that story.

* * *

B. has grown so much in the job. Once a young woman who refused to talk to men she didn't know, she now makes phone calls and engages with both men and women with confidence. Mortified when I first suggested that she accompany me to a meeting with government officials, she regularly makes presentations to groups.

She also has an acute case of wanderlust. When I return from London, she asks about my holiday. "It was lovely," I say. She smiles but her look is one of longing. "Where would you want to go if you could go anywhere in the world?" I ask her.

She stiffens, and says I must not suggest such things. "God has written on our foreheads where we are to go in this life," she says, "and he has not written that I am to leave Afghanistan."

I smile. "A few months ago, would you have believed it if someone had said: 'God has written on your forehead that you are to work with an American organization and make a good living'?"

She seems uncomfortable. I feel guilty and go back to my computer. Then she whispers, "Holly. I would like to visit India -- India and London!"

* * *

In the past, threats of poppy eradication have been empty, but now we hear that it has begun. Locals tell me the average citizen believes that "alternative livelihood programs" and eradication efforts go together. This is just what we didn't want, and what some on our team fear puts us at greater risk. We urgently need to make the public distinction between alternative livelihoods and eradication.

DOJ_NMG_0127340

We all seem to know how inverted this process is. The options that the project is proposing should have been in place before the eradication threat returned. It comes to these farmers every year lately, and every year they ask, "What are our alternatives?" And every year, the answer is the same, though no one is honest enough to say it: "There are no other options."August 2006

I'm back from home leave, and B. tells me about the phone calls.

"I was called by this man," she says. "I don't know who he is, but you know, he shouldn't do this. So I said to him, 'What kind of Muslim are you to call an unmarried woman?' " But he responded: "What kind of Muslim are you to work with Americans?"

The caller said he knew where she lived, what time she left her family's home for the walk to our compound, what color her burqa is. I think of the threats to the women on the provincial council, to F., and the recent killing of F.'s counterpart in Kandahar, as well as of F.'s own driver. I tell B. she must now call me when she reaches her afternoon classes. I make her change her route and ask her to call me after she arrives home each night.

* * *

F. and the other women in Helmand's department of women's affairs have avoided going to their new building since her driver was killed, so B. and I head to the old office for a meeting. For this three-block drive, B. covers all but her eyes. She says she doesn't want to be seen in our vehicles; it frightens her. In the front seat, two middle-aged former soldiers from South Africa serve as our escorts. They are carrying automatic weapons; we all wear body armor.

During the meeting, we hear a large explosion. On the way back to the compound, we learn that it was a suicide bomb at the market nearby. It killed 23 people, many of them women and children doing their midday shopping.

The intentional killing of innocents, virtually around the corner. We go to dinner, talk about it briefly, then move on to new recipe ideas. Without our being conscious of it, numbness sets in.September 2006

The head of the British government's drug team is pacing on the tarmac in Kabul, his bulletproof vest a stark contrast to his summery plaid shirt and rumpled khaki suit. He and his colleagues don't get to Helmand much, and he seems anxious.

We are headed back to Lashkar Gah, to a counter-narcotics shura, a consultation with religious leaders and tribal elders. Planting season is fast approaching, so the pressure is on to encourage people to plant something other than poppy. To increase confidence in him, we've told locals that the governor of Helmand has called the meeting. In truth, the meeting was put together by the British drug team working with USAID and the State Department.

We arrive two hours late and enter a room crowded with somber, sweating men. Some have traveled for more than a day to be here.

After a series of benign speeches by the governor and the ministers of agriculture and of rural reconstruction and development -- speeches that fail to make use of the statistics and talking points we've worked around the clock to produce -- the crowd asks questions. The men become worked up, but all I hear are the predictable complaints: There are no alternatives to poppy. Why can't you just raise the price of cotton, we'd all grow it instead. Where has all the reconstruction money gone?

I am getting as agitated as the crowd, because I know that the materials in the unopened plastic folders would have preempted all these questions. I watch the ministers take notes as the governor mops the sweat from his face and neck.

I get up and go into the hall, where the governor's shooters are pacing. But before I can leave, the meeting breaks and I am led to a private lunch where 30 people sit in silence.

* * *

Another suicide bombing, this one even closer to the compound. I'm in the reception area. At first I think someone has slammed the metal-and-glass door behind me really hard, so I keep talking. We've just received 15,000 information booklets that I've designed. I'm showing them to our Afghan staff when I notice people running.

Our security force comes through the door and rushes past with weapons in hand. We cancel the road move we had planned and some of us gather to watch the smoke rise. The bomb killed 21 people down the street, about a block and a half away.

DOJ_NMG_0127341

Once every few days, I think about the very real chance that this could be B.'s last day, some guard's, even mine. Bribes are offered and accepted frequently here, and I wonder when someone wearing an explosive vest will pay off one of our Afghan guards for access to our building.October 2006

It is my final full day in Afghanistan. I feel spent. I make some green tea out of sight of colleagues who are fasting for Ramadan. If depressing had a taste, I think it would be lukewarm, unsweetened green tea.

It occurs to me that I have been set up to fail, and that this is what has made me so tired, not the dysentery or the malaria or the long days and nights. On the good days, I still feel like progress is possible. Other days, I internalize the project's failure, and that is the feeling I leave Afghanistan with. The sandbagged walls and armored vehicles have not prevented guilt from penetrating my bones.

I now think that the West can do little if anything to quell the opium poppy trade, except to intercept the traffickers. This will be true as long as Helmand's residents refuse to recognize and respect the central government; as long as streets and schools, markets, mosques and government buildings are targeted by suicide bombers; as long as elders strike deals with the Taliban and government officials themselves profit from poppy production.

Still, I wish I could have been and done more. Then on this last day, I see the photographs of our public information materials being distributed in the villages of Helmand. They show wide-eyed children studying the pictures, teachers in full classrooms pointing to pages in the booklets I wrote, smiling policemen handing them out.

I don't know if the words and images inspired any conversations about hope and possibility. But in my final hours in this country, these pictures allow me, at last, to feel some small glimmer of satisfaction.

Holly Barnes Higgins is a former aid worker in Afghanistan and Angola.

Wrong Model For Afghanistan (NYT)

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

There is no question that Afghanistan needs to wage a far more effective fight against opium trafficking if it ever hopes to achieve a stable peace. But Colombia — another United States ally whose narcotics trade is helping finance a lethal insurgency — is not the model to follow.

Unfortunately, that is exactly what America's top-ranking military officer, Gen. Peter Pace, recently called for, after the nomination of Washington's current ambassador in Bogotá, William Wood, to be the new American ambassador in Kabul.

The limited gains Colombia has achieved in recent years have been offset by an overly generous amnesty program for right-wing paramilitary leaders and drug traffickers, which has seriously compromised the rule of law. And American aid has been disproportionately directed into military and police programs, leaving far too little to promote alternative livelihoods for Colombia's farmers. Despite all the money spent, the amount of land planted with coca crops has risen and the net harvest has been reduced only slightly. Afghanistan's problems will not be solved by copying these mistakes.

Last year Afghanistan produced 90 percent of the world's opium — a rise of almost 50 percent from the year before. The exploding drug trade is not just a problem for Europe, where most of the heroin produced from that opium ends up. It is a major destabilizing force inside Afghanistan.

Drug money, which represents roughly 35 percent of the country's gross domestic product, is fueling government corruption, financing warlords — some pro-government and some pro-Taliban — and adding to a dangerous disillusionment with President Hamid Karzai's government.

Most of the American aid sent to Kabul since 2001 has gone into security programs and short-term relief and reconstruction, not the long-term development on which lasting security depends. This has left Afghan farmers prey to drug traffickers who often supply the only credit available, with repayment expected in opium poppies.

And with no visible help coming from Kabul or Washington toward alleviating crushing poverty, people in Afghanistan's southern provinces are beginning to look favorably toward a resurgent Taliban. The significantly increased American aid package for Afghanistan announced last month needs to focus more on development. Mr. Wood needs to bring a different set of priorities to Afghanistan, not simply repeat the mistakes Washington has made in Colombia.

DOJ_NMG_0127342

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Firings Set Stage For Congressional Battle (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

H.E. "Bud" Cummins III had served for five years as the U.S. attorney in Little Rock -- a job he obtained in large part because of his credentials as a longtime GOP lawyer and avid supporter of President Bush.

So Cummins, 47, was more than a little surprised when he got a call from the Justice Department last year asking him to resign. He was told there was nothing wrong with his performance, but that officials in Washington wanted to give the job to another GOP loyalist.

"I don't think many of us were aware that the administration might want to ask someone to step aside just to give someone else an opportunity," said Cummins, who left office in December and was replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove. "The precedent was that once you were appointed, assuming you were successful in office, you were there until there was a change in the White House."

Cummins was the first in a wave of seven U.S. attorneys to be fired by the Justice Department, a move that has prompted sharp criticism from Democrats in Congress and has set the stage for a legislative battle over the attorney general's power to appoint federal prosecutors.

Six of the prosecutors received calls notifying them of their firings on a single day shortly before Christmas, officials said, including the U.S. attorney who oversaw a prominent public corruption probe in San Diego and a prosecutor in New Mexico whose life as a military lawyer was portrayed by Tom Cruise in the movie "A Few Good Men." Most have told colleagues that they have no idea why they were shoved out, according to aides.

A little-noticed provision passed last year allows Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint interim U.S. attorneys indefinitely without seeking approval from the Senate. Fearing an attempted end run around congressional prerogatives, both House and Senate Democrats have introduced legislation to repeal the provision. The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to hold a hearing on the issue Tuesday.

"The U.S. attorneys' job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions, or worse, any appearance of undue influence," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said in a floor speech last month.

Gonzales and his aides say that they intend to seek Senate approval for every new U.S. attorney and that the old system, which allowed federal judges to appoint replacements, has both practical and constitutional problems. Justice Department officials also defend Gonzales's right to fire U.S. attorneys at will and have suggested that each of the recently dismissed prosecutors had performance problems.

"Every U.S. attorney, like the attorney general of the United States, serves at the pleasure of the president," Gonzales said in a recent interview with The Washington Post. "We can be asked to leave at any time; we can be asked to leave for any reason."

He added later: "From time, to time we make an evaluation as to whether we believe we can put in people who can produce better results, who can do a better job."

But there is also evidence that broader political forces are at work. One administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity in discussing personnel issues, said the spate of firings was the result of "pressure from people who make personnel decisions outside of Justice who wanted to make some things happen in these places."

Several of those fired have already left, and the rest will be gone by the end of the month.

The dismissals include the heads of two of the most important U.S. attorneys' offices in the country: Carol S. Lam in San Diego and Kevin Ryan in San Francisco. The others were John McKay in Seattle; David C. Iglesias in New Mexico; Daniel G. Bogden in Nevada; and Paul K. Charlton in Arizona. All declined to comment for this story.

Ryan's departure was perhaps the least surprising because his tenure had been marked by public complaints about plummeting morale and high staff turnover. But Lam's departure has been more controversial, prompting public complaints from the head of the local FBI field office and questions from Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and others.

Some Democrats speculated that the administration was attempting to undermine the ongoing corruption probe centered on former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), which was overseen by Lam.

"We have people from the FBI indicating that Carol Lam has not only been a straight shooter but a very good prosecutor," Feinstein said. "Therefore, it is surprising to me to see that she would be, in effect, forced out, without cause. This would go for any other U.S. attorney among the seven who are on that list."

Justice Department officials -- who discussed personnel issues on the condition of anonymity -- said that Lam's record was far more mixed, noting that prosecutions of firearms offenses plunged during her tenure and that she personally oversaw a major health-care fraud case that ended in a mistrial.

Another surprise was the firing of McKay, whom Cummins described as "a rock-star U.S. attorney" and whose effort to build a law enforcement database is the template for a new nationwide program at Justice. McKay was also rebuffed for a federal judgeship at the same time.

Like President Bill Clinton before him, Bush removed nearly all the U.S. attorneys when he came into office and replaced them with his own Senate-confirmed appointments. Under previous statutes, the attorney general had the power to appoint an interim prosecutor for 120 days in the case of a vacancy, but then it was up to the local district court to make an appointment until the Senate approved a final pick.

Gonzales and many legal experts say that arrangement was a troubling intrusion on the separation of powers between the independent branches of government.

A new provision, which was quietly tucked into USA Patriot Act reauthorization legislation last year, allows Gonzales to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely. Not counting the recent dismissals, there have been 11 vacancies since the measure was enacted, and Justice Department officials said they will provide nominations to the Senate for each position.

Feinstein and other Democrats fear the provision would allow an attorney general to avoid Senate confirmation of U.S. attorneys altogether and are proposing a return to the previous system.

B. Mahlon Brown III, a former U.S. attorney for Nevada who now heads the National Association of Former United States Attorneys, said most members of the group are in "shock and awe" over the wave of firings. "It goes against all tradition, and it's very troubling to a lot of us," Brown said.

But Dennis W. Boyd, executive director of the National Association of Assistant U.S. Attorneys, which represents currently employed federal prosecutors, said many of the group's members "do not see it as particularly unusual." Seven firings among 93 U.S. attorneys offices are not that many, Boyd added.

Cummins said "the political aspect of it shouldn't really be a shock to anybody," noting his own status as an active Republican lawyer who served as one of Arkansas's electors committed to Bush in 2000.

"Every U.S. attorney knows they serve at the pleasure of the president," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Thomas To Review Stock Option Grants (AP)

AP, February 4, 2007

Thomas Group to Review Stock Option Practices

IRVING, Texas (AP) -- Thomas Group Inc., a management consulting firm, said Friday that it is initiating a review of its past stock option granting practices and will report its fourth-quarter and full-year results when the review is complete.

The company said that the stock options review was initiated voluntarily and not in response to an inquiry by the Securities and Exchange Commission or any other regulatory agency. More than 100 companies are under investigation by the SEC or Justice Department for their stock option granting practices, and at least 93 others have launched their own internal reviews, according to an Associated Press review.

Thomas said it plans to report its full quarterly and full-year earnings and file its Form 10-K annual report by the March 31 filing deadline.

DOJ_NMG_0127344

The company did report revenue for the quarter ended Dec. 31 and the full year. Thomas said quarterly revenue increased 26 percent to $14.8 million from $11.7 million in the year-earlier period. For the full-year, revenue increased 38 percent to $59.5 million from $43.1 million in 2005.

Thomas Group also said it increased its signed contracts 46 percent in 2006 to $59.5 million from $40.8 million in 2005.

Shares of Thomas Group fell 14 cents to $13.70 in after-hours trading, after rising 13 cents to close at $13.84 on the Nasdaq.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Vice President's Shadow Hangs Over Trial (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith, Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Vice President Cheney's press officer, Cathie Martin, approached his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, on Air Force Two on July 12, 2003, to ask how she should respond to journalists' questions about Joseph C. Wilson IV. Libby looked over one of the reporters' questions and told Martin: "Well, let me go talk to the boss and I'll be back."

On Libby's return, Martin testified in federal court last week, he brought a card with detailed replies dictated by Cheney, including a highly partisan, incomplete summary of Wilson's investigation into Iraq's suspected weapons of mass destruction program.

Libby subsequently called a reporter, read him the statement, and said -- according to the reporter -- he had "heard" that Wilson's investigation was instigated by his wife, an employee at the CIA, later identified as Valerie Plame. The reporter, Matthew Cooper of Time magazine, was one of five people with whom Libby discussed Plame's CIA status during those critical weeks that summer.

After seven days of such courtroom testimony, the unanswered question hanging over Libby's trial is, did the vice president's former chief of staff decide to leak that disparaging information on his own?

No evidence has emerged that Cheney told him to do it. But Cheney's dictated reply is one of many signs to emerge at the trial of the vice president's unusual attentiveness to the controversy and his desire to blunt it. His efforts included the extraordinary disclosure of classified information, including one-sided synopses of Wilson's report and a 2002 intelligence estimate on Iraq.

Under questioning from FBI agent Deborah S. Bond, Libby acknowledged that he and Cheney "may have talked" aboard the plane from Norfolk that day about whether to make public Plame's CIA employment, Bond testified Thursday.

Her testimony brought Cheney closer than ever to the heart of the controversy surrounding the Bush administration's efforts to discredit Wilson, who had accused the White House of twisting intelligence he had gathered as it sought to justify the invasion of Iraq.

White House officials testified that Cheney was irritated because he thought Wilson had alleged the vice president sent him on the fact-finding trip to Niger but rejected the investigation's conclusions. Time after time at the height of the controversy, they said, Cheney directed the administration's response to Wilson's criticism and Libby carried it out.

Cheney personally dictated other talking points for use by the White House press office; helped negotiate the wording of a key statement by then-CIA Director George J. Tenet; instructed Libby to deal directly with selected reporters; told Libby to disclose selected passages from the national intelligence estimate and other classified reports; and held a luncheon for conservative columnists to discuss the controversy.

Throughout this period, Cheney kept a news clipping of Wilson's criticisms on his desk, annotated with the question, "did his wife send him on a junket?" according to court statements. Libby told a grand jury that he and Cheney discussed it on multiple occasions each day.

Randall Eliason, a former chief of public corruption prosecutions for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington, said, "There has been significant evidence of how deeply the vice president was involved. If Cheney is personally, deeply involved in it, it's Libby's job to be personally, deeply involved."

DOJ_NMG_0127345

Wilson was a former U.S. ambassador dispatched by the CIA the previous year -- at the suggestion of his wife but on a decision by other officials -- to determine whether Iraq had recently tried to acquire nuclear materials from Niger. The agency later said that it was responding to inquiries made by Cheney's office, the State Department and the Defense Department.

On July 6, 2003, 16 months after his return, Wilson publicly accused the administration of ignoring his report, which debunked the Iraq-Niger speculation, and of twisting his information to justify the invasion of Iraq.

Wilson's allegations provoked a political firestorm. Within days, the White House was forced to repudiate a key assertion President Bush had made in his State of the Union address, and Tenet issued an unusual public apology for failing to stop the president from making it. But rather than tamping down the controversy, the administration's backtracking only "made it flare up," as then-White House spokesman Ari Fleischer testified last week.

In its response, the White House wound up training its fire not only on the substance of Wilson's allegations but on him personally, trial testimony has shown.

Over the course of that week in July, bracketed by Wilson's published criticism and Cheney's flight back from Norfolk, three senior White House officials -- Libby, Fleischer and special presidential assistant Karl Rove -- inaccurately told or suggested to five reporters that Wilson had been dispatched to Niger by Plame, according to the testimony. Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage separately told columnist Robert D. Novak that Plame worked at the CIA, and Novak made that news public July 14.

The belittling implication of the disclosure, as Fleischer and others testified last week, was that nepotism, rather than Wilson's knowledge and experience, lay behind his involvement in the matter.

While Cheney and Libby have asserted that their sole intent in contacting journalists was to defend the credibility of their policy, prosecutors disclosed new evidence on Wednesday that the administration was focusing on Wilson himself. Cheney's then-communications director, Mary Matalin, advised Libby in a phone call July 10, prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg said.

Matalin, according to notes Libby made of the conversation, called Wilson "a snake" and warned that his "story has legs," Zeidenberg said. She laid out a plan: "We need to address the Wilson motivation. We need to be able to get the cable out. Declassified. The president should wave his wand."

While arguing unsuccessfully that the jury should see all of Libby's notes on the conversation, Zeidenberg said, "All we have heard from the defense all along is that Mr. Libby was only interested in responding on the merits." He said it was significant that Libby wrote down word for word "an extremely negative and ad hominem attack, if you will, about a critic."

Plame's employment at the CIA was classified, making it illegal for any official to knowingly and intentionally disclose it. Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's 22-month investigation did not produce charges of that offense.

But Libby was indicted on charges of making false statements, obstruction of justice and perjury for denying that he was aware of Plame's employment and had disclosed it to journalists.

In courtroom testimony, witnesses have asserted that Cheney and two others told Libby about Plame in June, and that he told two journalists and Fleischer -- who in turn said he told two more journalists. It was, in short, a hot topic of gossip by the administration.

According to Martin's testimony, Cheney directed her early in the week of July 6 to keep track of daily news coverage of the controversy, including "who was continuing to comment." During a meeting on Capitol Hill, Martin said, Cheney "dictated to me what he wanted me to say" about it to reporters.

In a meeting July 8, Martin said, Cheney also decided that Libby would call NBC News reporters Andrea Mitchell and David Gregory to discuss the matter. Martin said she walked out during Libby's subsequent calls to the reporters.

After Mitchell suggested in a broadcast that the White House was "pushing blame" for the mess toward the CIA, Martin said, then-deputy national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley looked directly at Martin during a staff meeting and said such efforts were improper. At that moment, Martin said, Libby "looked down," in effect leaving her to absorb the blame.

Three months later, White House spokesman Scott McClellan publicly cleared Rove of leaking Plame's name -- inaccurately, as it turned out -- but provided no such statement about Libby.

According to Cheney's own notes, introduced at the trial last week, Cheney told McClellan that such a statement "has to happen today. Call out key press saying same thing about Scooter as Karl. Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

DOJ_NMG_0127346

Libby Fights To Keep Tapes From Public (PHI)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON - Former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is fighting to keep his grand jury testimony about the leak of a CIA officer's name from being released and broadcast.

That testimony - the sworn statements Libby gave investigators about his conversations with Vice President Cheney and journalists - is at the heart of his perjury trial. Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald plans to play hours of recordings of that testimony in court next week to bolster his case that Libby lied and obstructed Fitzgerald's leak investigation.

Trial evidence is normally public, and all exhibits in Libby's case have been made public so far. Even though Fitzgerald successfully fought to get Libby's full grand jury testimony admitted into evidence, Libby's attorneys say the audiotapes should not be released outside the courtroom.

Defense attorney William Jeffress, who successfully argued a Supreme Court case that kept the Watergate tapes from being released, said in court Thursday that grand jury tapes are never meant to be made public.

He said he knew of no case in which such tapes have been released.

In the tapes, Libby discusses conversations he had regarding CIA officer Valerie Plame Wilson, the wife of a prominent Iraq war critic, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson. Her identity was leaked to reporters in 2003.

Nobody was charged with the leak. Fitzgerald said Libby learned her identity from Cheney and discussed it with journalists. Libby says that he forgot about his conversation with Cheney and that, when he heard about Valerie Wilson from a reporter weeks later, it struck him as new information.

Fitzgerald says Libby concocted that story to protect himself from prosecution, because repeating rumors from reporters was less serious than repeating sensitive information from Cheney.

If the tapes are released, they could be broadcast on television, radio and online. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he worried that would sensationalize an already public trial.

Attorneys for the Associated Press and more than a dozen other news organizations argued in court documents yesterday that the tapes should be made public. Libby's testimony is far less sensational, they wrote, than other tapes that have been released in court, such as 911 phone calls from inside the World Trade Center and FBI tapes from the Abscam investigation.

Walton said he would consider the matter over the weekend.

Libby Prosecutors Await Judge's Rulings (CNN)

By Paul Courson, Cnn Washington Bureau

CNN, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Prosecutors in the criminal trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby plan to rest their case as soon as Tuesday.

Nearly a dozen witnesses have taken the stand in the past two weeks. The last witness is expected to be Tim Russert, moderator of NBC's "Meet the Press."

Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, is fighting a five-count indictment including charges of perjury and obstruction of justice related to the public disclosure of a one-time operative at the CIA.

Valerie Plame's identity was made public in a column by Robert Novak on July 14, 2003. Libby told a grand jury that Russert told him the operative's name four days earlier, but a former New York Times reporter testified last week that Libby gave her Plame's name the previous month.

Libby is not accused of leaking classified information, but Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald hopes to show Libby lied under oath trying to save his job.

"You may be involved in something that is a big mess in terms of law, in terms of politics and in terms of getting yourself fired," Fitzgerald said Thursday as he tried to establish Libby's state of mind with proposed evidence that could include newspaper articles Libby had saved in his office.

DOJ_NMG_0127347

Fitzgerald on Thursday asserted he has proof as to what Libby "had in mind when he made up a story that says, 'You know what? I forgot everything that ever came from the vice president. That wasn't what I passed on. I passed on what came from Mr. Russert when Mr. Russert told me that all the reporters are saying it.' "

Fitzgerald wants the jury to consider two undisclosed newspaper articles Libby had saved in his office files. Defense attorneys have objected, saying the articles contain all manner of hearsay they would not be able to challenge in court.

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton hopes to rule on the evidence by the time the trial resumes Monday and before the defense makes its case.

Libby resigned after he was indicted by a federal grand jury in October 2005.

The story started more than three years earlier, when former Ambassador Joseph Wilson made a trip to Africa in February 2002, investigating whether Iraq, under Saddam Hussein, had tried to acquire uranium from the African country of Niger.

Wilson told the CIA he doubted there were any transactions.

Almost a year later, President Bush asserted the disputed link between Iraq and Niger in his State of the Union address. The reference was later renounced by the head of the CIA, partly because of a firestorm caused by Wilson openly questioning the claim in a column in the New York Times.

By June 2003, information began circulating more widely among reporters that Plame was Wilson's wife and worked at the CIA, and among officials that Plame had arranged for her husband's trip, according to testimony in the Libby case.

Thursday, an FBI agent took the witness stand for the prosecution to describe the first Libby interview in connection with an investigation as to how Plame's name got out.

Defense attorney William Jeffress, on cross-examination of Agent Deborah Bond, recounted her report that Libby had told her "he had been told by the vice president during a telephone call that Mrs. Wilson worked at the CIA in the Counter Proliferation Division, correct?"

Agent Bond replied, "Yes, but that he had forgotten about it."

The phone call between Libby and Cheney took place on June 12, 2003, about a month before Libby says he first learned about Wilson's wife from NBC's Russert, according to testimony and documents presented at trial.

Since the jury was seated January 23, prosecutors have called witnesses from the CIA, the White House and the press. Testimony and evidence include handwritten notes by Libby, Cheney, the vice-president's spokeswoman, his legal counsel, and two reporters with knowledge of the story.

Courtroom devices have included audiotapes of Libby's secret grand jury testimony, videotapes of White House briefings, and opportunities for the members of the jury to hand questions to the judge to ask witnesses.

Prosecutors have hours of recordings of Libby's grand jury testimony they want to introduce as evidence.

But if Walton allows the recordings to be played in the courtroom, defense attorneys hope to block their public release. Walton indicates he is inclined to agree, as he tries to avoid exposing the nonsequestered members of the jury to media coverage of LIbby's trial.

As the second week drew to a close, Walton said coverage would become all the more "sensational" if the recordings were broadcast on news and talk programs.

Walton already was thinking of putting constraints on evidence and testimony admitted after Libby lawyer Ted Wells declared his intention to call Cheney to the witness stand.

Defense attorneys also have former CIA Director George Tenet and Rove on a list of proposed witnesses.

Why Dick Cheney Cracked Up (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

IN the days since Dick Cheney lost it on CNN, our nation's armchair shrinks have had a blast. The vice president who boasted of "enormous successes" in Iraq and barked "hogwash" at the congenitally mild Wolf Blitzer has been roundly judged delusional, pathologically dishonest or just plain nuts. But what else is new? We identified those diagnoses long ago. The more intriguing question is what ignited this particularly violent public flare-up.

DOJ_NMG_0127348

The answer can be found in the timing of the CNN interview, which was conducted the day after the start of the perjury trial of Mr. Cheney's former top aide, Scooter Libby. The vice president's on-camera crackup reflected his understandable fear that a White House cover-up was crumbling. He knew that sworn testimony in a Washington courtroom would reveal still more sordid details about how the administration lied to take the country into war in Iraq. He knew that those revelations could cripple the White House's current campaign to escalate that war and foment apocalyptic scenarios about Iran. Scariest of all, he knew that he might yet have to testify under oath himself.

Mr. Cheney, in other words, understands the danger this trial poses to the White House even as some of Washington remains oblivious. From the start, the capital has belittled the Joseph and Valerie Wilson affair as "a tempest in a teapot," as David Broder of The Washington Post reiterated just five months ago. When "all of the facts come out in this case, it's going to be laughable because the consequences are not that great," Bob Woodward said in 2005. Or, as Robert Novak suggested in 2003 before he revealed Ms. Wilson's identity as a C.I.A. officer in his column, "weapons of mass destruction or uranium from Niger" are "little elitist issues that don't bother most of the people." Those issues may not trouble Mr. Novak, but they do loom large to other people, especially those who sent their kids off to war over nonexistent weapons of mass destruction and nonexistent uranium.

In terms of the big issues, the question of who first leaked Ms. Wilson's identity (whether Mr. Libby, Richard Armitage, Ari Fleischer or Karl Rove) to which journalist (whether Mr. Woodward, Mr. Novak, Judith Miller or Matt Cooper) has always been a red herring. It's entirely possible that the White House has always been telling the truth when it says that no one intended to unmask a secret agent. (No one has been charged with that crime.) The White House is also telling the truth when it repeatedly says that Mr. Cheney did not send Mr. Wilson on his C.I.A.-sponsored African trip to check out a supposed Iraq-Niger uranium transaction. (Another red herring, since Mr. Wilson didn't make that accusation in the first place.)

But if the administration is telling the truth on these narrow questions and had little to hide about the Wilson trip per se, its wild overreaction to the episode was an incriminating sign it was hiding something else. According to testimony in the Libby case, the White House went berserk when Mr. Wilson published his Op-Ed article in The Times in July 2003 about what he didn't find in Africa. Top officials gossiped incessantly about both Wilsons to anyone who would listen, Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby conferred about them several times a day, and finally Mr. Libby, known as an exceptionally discreet White House courtier, became so sloppy that his alleged lying landed him with five felony counts.

The explanation for the hysteria has long been obvious. The White House was terrified about being found guilty of a far greater crime than outing a C.I.A. officer: lying to the nation to hype its case for war. When Mr. Wilson, an obscure retired diplomat, touched that raw nerve, all the president's men panicked because they knew Mr. Wilson's modest finding in Africa was the tip of a far larger iceberg. They knew that there was still far more damning evidence of the administration's W.M.D. lies lurking in the bowels of the bureaucracy.

Thanks to the commotion caused by the leak case, that damning evidence has slowly dribbled out. By my count we now know of at least a half-dozen instances before the start of the Iraq war when various intelligence agencies and others signaled that evidence of Iraq's purchase of uranium in Africa might be dubious or fabricated. (These are detailed in the timelines at frankrich.com/timeline.htm.) The culmination of these warnings arrived in January 2003, the same month as the president's State of the Union address, when the White House received a memo from the National Intelligence Council, the coordinating body for all American spy agencies, stating unequivocally that the claim was baseless. Nonetheless President Bush brandished that fearful "uranium from Africa" in his speech to Congress as he hustled the country into war in Iraq.

If the war had been a cakewalk, few would have cared to investigate the administration's deceit at its inception. But by the time Mr. Wilson's Op-Ed article appeared — some five months after the State of the Union and two months after "Mission Accomplished" — there was something terribly wrong with the White House's triumphal picture. More than 60 American troops had been killed since Mr. Bush celebrated the end of "major combat operations" by prancing about an aircraft carrier. No W.M.D. had been found, and we weren't even able to turn on the lights in Baghdad. For the first time, more than half of Americans told a Washington Post-ABC News poll that the level of casualties was "unacceptable."

It was urgent, therefore, that the awkward questions raised by Mr. Wilson's revelation of his Africa trip be squelched as quickly as possible. He had to be smeared as an inconsequential has-been whose mission was merely a trivial boondoggle arranged by his wife. The C.I.A., which had actually resisted the uranium fictions, had to be strong-armed into taking the blame for the 16 errant words in the State of the Union speech.

DOJ_NMG_0127349

What we are learning from Mr. Libby's trial is just what a herculean effort it took to execute this two-pronged cover-up after Mr. Wilson's article appeared. Mr. Cheney was the hands-on manager of the 24/7 campaign of press manipulation and high-stakes character assassination, with Mr. Libby as his chief hatchet man. Though Mr. Libby's lawyers are now arguing that their client was a sacrificial lamb thrown to the feds to shield Mr. Rove, Mr. Libby actually was — and still is — a stooge for the vice president.

Whether he will go to jail for his misplaced loyalty is the human drama of his trial. But for the country there are bigger issues at stake, and they are not, as the White House would have us believe, ancient history. The administration propaganda flimflams that sold us the war are now being retrofitted to expand and extend it.

In a replay of the run-up to the original invasion, a new National Intelligence Estimate, requested by Congress in August to summarize all intelligence assessments on Iraq, was mysteriously delayed until last week, well after the president had set his surge. Even the declassified passages released on Friday — the grim takes on the weak Iraqi security forces and the spiraling sectarian violence — foretell that the latest plan for victory is doomed. (As a White House communications aide testified at the Libby trial, this administration habitually releases bad news on Fridays because "fewer people pay attention when it's reported on Saturday.")

A Pentagon inspector general's report, uncovered by Business Week last week, was also kept on the q.t.: it shows that even as more American troops are being thrown into the grinder in Iraq, existing troops lack the guns and ammunition to "effectively complete their missions." Army and Marine Corps commanders told The Washington Post that both armor and trucks were in such short supply that their best hope is that "five brigades of up-armored Humvees fall out of the sky."

Tomorrow is the fourth anniversary of Colin Powell's notorious W.M.D. pantomime before the United Nations Security Council, a fair amount of it a Cheney-Libby production. To mark this milestone, the White House is reviving the same script to rev up the war's escalation, this time hyping Iran-Iraq connections instead of Al Qaeda-Iraq connections. In his Jan. 10 prime-time speech on Iraq, Mr. Bush said that Iran was supplying "advanced weaponry and training to our enemies," even though the evidence suggests that Iran is actually in bed with our "friends" in Iraq, the Maliki government. The administration promised a dossier to back up its claims, but that too has been delayed twice amid reports of what The Times calls "a continuing debate about how well the information proved the Bush administration's case."

Call it a coincidence — though there are no coincidences — but it's only fitting that the Libby trial began as news arrived of the death of E. Howard Hunt, the former C.I.A. agent whose bungling of the Watergate break-in sent him to jail and led to the unraveling of the Nixon presidency two years later. Still, we can't push the parallels too far. No one died in Watergate. This time around our country can't wait two more years for the White House to be stopped from playing its games with American blood.

Libby Prosecutors Hope To Show Marked News Articles (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The day of his interview with the FBI, Vice President Cheney's then-top aide hand-marked copies of two Washington Post articles about the breadth of a criminal leak investigation -- and underlined were passages suggesting that any official who had told reporters about a CIA officer could be in legal jeopardy, prosecutors said in court filings yesterday.

Government prosecutors argued that the October 2003 articles -- stored in former chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's personal folders, and printed from the Internet at his request -- show that Libby had a motive to lie about his secret conversations with reporters and knew that he could be in trouble.

The prosecutors are urging presiding U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to let the articles be placed into evidence so the jury can see them.

Libby told investigators in 2004 that he kept and read the articles, according to the filings, and that he may have underlined the key passages about criminal liability and investigators' interest in any officials' discussions with reporters about CIA officer Valerie Plame.

DOJ_NMG_0127350

Plame's name was revealed in a syndicated column by Robert D. Novak on July 14, 2003 -- eight days after her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify war with Iraq.

Defense attorneys argued in competing filings yesterday that the Oct. 4 and Oct. 12 articles, written by Walter Pincus and Mike Allen, would prejudice the jury against Libby.

They say the articles are "inflammatory" because they indicate that Plame had been engaged in covert work in recent years and that revelations about her identity could harm national security interests -- both issues that, they argue, the judge has ruled are not relevant to Libby's trial.

Libby Trial Reveals What Prosecutor Wouldn't (CNN)

By Kevin Bohn, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, February 4, 2007

In our Behind the Scenes series, CNN correspondents and producers share their experiences in covering news and analyze the stories behind the events. CNN's Kevin Bohn has been in the courtroom as the perjury and obstruction trial of the vice president's former chief of staff has unfolded.

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- As the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby goes on, we are learning more and more about special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's investigation, which was prompted by the leak that Valerie Plame was an undercover CIA agent.

Fitzgerald was appointed in December 2003 to oversee the probe, which originally was being led by the Justice Department's criminal division.

The only public comment Fitzgerald made about the case before the trial began was in his news conference in October 2005.

Libby, the vice president's former chief of staff, is charged with lying to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating who leaked Plame's identity to the press.

Now we learning what witnesses told FBI agents or testified before a grand jury, and we are gaining more insight through the release of many documents related to the case.

Those range from a mundane calendar of then-Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman to the often-talked about memo from the State Department's intelligence unit about former ambassador Joseph Wilson's 2002 trip to investigate claims that Iraq was trying to obtain uranium in Africa.

We have seen correspondence between the Justice Department and Fitzgerald's office and Vice President Dick Cheney's office asking for documents, as well as subpoenas that were issued.

In fact, David Addington, the vice president's current chief of staff, says his office handed over more than 12,000 documents as part of the probe, including many handwritten notes from Libby himself.

Some of those notes had to be analyzed by experts to figure out exactly what Libby was saying since his handwriting is notoriously bad.

One of the more intriguing exhibits was the handwritten note from the vice president in which he appears to talk about how Libby should not be made a scapegoat.

"Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy (the words 'the Pres.' are marked out) that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," Cheney wrote.Jurors questioning witnesses

One unusual thing in this trial: allowing the jurors to ask questions of witnesses. Lawyers say it's rare in federal courtrooms but occurring more in some federal trials.

The presiding judge, Reggie Walton, is a former superior court judge where this practice is more common. Some lawyers say there is a lot of discussion about this type of activity to try to get the jury more involved and to allow them to address any doubts they might have.

Jurors have so far posed several questions for most of the witnesses.

When prosecutors and defense attorneys are finished with the witness, the jurors are given the chance to write questions on note cards which are handed to the judge. He and the lawyers on both sides then have a conference to decide if the questions are appropriate for this witness or if they ask for speculation, whether they involve classified information, or whether they are asking about issues too far afield.

One of the questions posed by the jury for former New York Times reporter Judith Miller was, "Why did you make the decision to go to jail?"

Miller had discussed it briefly in her earlier testimony. In answer to the juror's question she said, "Because everything that I do and I have done in Washington -- all of my reporting depended on people coming to me and being able to trust me that I would protect them."

For former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, one juror wanted to know more about the procedure used to make sure he understood an official was discussing classified information with him.

Many of the questions asked about specific points raised during testimony of the various witnesses, which seemed to indicate the jurors were paying pretty close attention.

There are several questions the judge has said he couldn't ask. One of them involved a request for classified information that caused the judge and lawyers to talk for an extended period. Eventually, the judge denied the request for the specific document.Journalists also on trial

Libby is not the only person being scrutinized in this trial. Several high-profile journalists have testified and others are expected to be called.

How journalists keep their notes, where they keep their notes and how they interpret attribution for information they were given have come under the microscope. There have been legal fights over the journalists' notes.

Some major points of stories weren't in their notes. Under cross-examination, Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper admitted there is no reference to the quote he says Libby gave him confirming that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Defense attorneys also pointed out some of the sloppiness in Cooper's note taking.

When Miller explained that she had found about 50 notebooks in a shopping bag under her desk, defense attorney William Jeffress asked, "Was this standard method used for archiving your notes?"

After some in the courtroom chuckled, Miller responded "No. I was actually intending to take them home" but didn't get a chance to before she was jailed for contempt for refusing to discuss her sources with the grand jury.

Miller refused to answer questions from other reporters Wednesday afternoon after she had been grilled by Libby's attorneys. She was heard to tell her attorney that she was relieved it was over.

F.B.I. Investigating Complaint Against California Lawmaker (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer, Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 3 — The Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating whether Representative Gary G. Miller, Republican of California, improperly used an unusual tax provision to avoid paying capital gains taxes on profits from land sales to California cities, law enforcement and government officials said.

Last summer, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group, filed a complaint with the Internal Revenue Service saying that Mr. Miller had failed to pay capital gains tax on the 2002 sale of 165 acres in Monrovia, Calif.

The complaint said Mr. Miller invoked a rarely used provision that allows tax deferment if the land that is sold is facing an eminent domain threat and the protected proceeds are reinvested within two years.

Mr. Miller, who would have faced about a 30 percent tax on the property under a normal sale, used the roughly $10 million in profits from the Monrovia sale to buy property in Fontana, Calif., from Lewis Operating Corp., one of his major campaign contributors, and then resold some of that land to the City of Fontana in 2005 and later in 2006.

Mr. Miller requested and was provided with letters from each city saying that they had the power to invoke eminent domain, said his spokesman, Scott Toussaint.

On Thursday, Mr. Toussaint said that Mr. Miller used the same tax deferment on the Fontana land sales, but on Friday said that he had not, and that Mr. Miller had paid back taxes to Monrovia.

Mr. Toussaint declined to provide documentation of those payments.

DOJ_NMG_0127352

Mr. Toussaint added that Mr. Miller had no knowledge of an F.B.I. investigation, and that the congressman, whose district snakes along a narrow swath of Los Angeles, Orange and San Bernardino Counties, had requested that the House Ethics Committee review the deals.

The committee has declined to comment on whether it has conducted an investigation. The committee's spokesman did not return a phone call for comment on Friday.

In recent weeks, the F.B.I. has interviewed current and former officials from Monrovia, said the city's spokesman, Dick Singer, and requested a videotape of a 2000 City Council meeting in which Mr. Miller appears, asking the council to buy his land.

Mr. Singer said in an interview that the city was interested in buying the land from Mr. Miller to avoid development on the site, which was later turned into a wildlife preserve.

The city passed a ballot measure to raise tax money from residents to match state funds to help buy the land, as well as parcels owned by other potential developers, but eminent domain was never invoked.

Mr. Singer said that Mr. Miller did request, and was given, a letter suggesting that the land could be condemned.

"We use eminent domain very, very, rarely," Mr. Singer said, saying its use was almost exclusively limited to commercial-use properties in areas where the city wants to develop housing.

"In 30 years we have done as much redevelopment as anyone in the country, and we have used it maybe a half-dozen times."

A former mayor of Monrovia, Lara Larramendi, has told reporters that she was contacted by investigators and that eminent domain was never mentioned in letters to Mr. Miller.

Reached Friday, Ms. Larramendi said she had been advised to not answer further press questions.

Multiple calls and an e-mail message to Kenneth Hunt, Fontana's city manager, were not returned, but in published reports, Mr. Hunt is quoted as saying that the city did not have eminent domain authority in the areas where Mr. Miller bought the land.

"You get a sense from the whole transaction that there is an unseemly underbelly of contacts and connections that, if not illegal, is deeply troubling," said Shaun P. Martin, a law professor at the University of San Diego. "Things are happening in this case that do not happen to regular people."

This week, Mr. Miller threatened to sue the City of Monrovia if it did not "retract or correct any misstatements made to the media or any governmental agencies" about the sale of the land.

"It was our feeling based on those letters that Miller had committed fraud," said Melanie Sloan, the executive director of the watchdog group that filed the complaint with the I.R.S. "There was no eminent domain and therefore he had no business claiming it."

In Washington, Mr. Miller sits on the Financial Services Committee and is the ranking Republican member of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations.

Former Manchester Mayor Arrested (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), February 4, 2007

DAUGH WHITE BEING HELD ON FEDERAL CHARGES

Federal authorities have arrested a longtime Eastern Kentucky mayor who lost re-election last November.

Former Manchester Mayor Daugh K. White was being held yesterday at the Laurel County Detention Center on federal charges, the facility confirmed. The charge against White was not available.

The FBI raided Manchester City Hall last October and seized a variety of records, but has not disclosed the nature of its investigation.

However, a state audit released in December said that while White was mayor, the city misused taxpayers' money by paving more than 30 private driveways, making undocumented loans to employees and private companies and paying for personal travel expenses of city workers.

DOJ_NMG_0127353

A spokesman for state Auditor Crit Luallen said the office had given a copy of its findings to the FBI, and current Mayor Carmen Lewis said questions from FBI agents indicated city finances are a focus of the inquiry. No information was available yesterday on whether charges against White had anything to do with that case.

Lewis beat White, a seven-term incumbent, in November after an aggressive campaign.

White becomes the third Clay County public figure arrested by federal authorities in the last few months.

Federal Indictment Of Fumo Is Expected Soon (PHI)

By John Shiffman, Mario F. Cattabiani And Craig R. Mccoy

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 4, 2007

The four-year investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo is coming to an end, and lawyers familiar with the case expect him to be indicted soon, possibly as early as Tuesday.

Fumo, one of the most powerful politicians in Pennsylvania, last year received a target letter - a formal notice that he is likely to face charges related to the fraud and obstruction-of-justice probe.

Fumo recently told people close to him to brace for an indictment, and has assured them that he will vigorously fight the charges.

"He's looking forward to clearing his name," said a person close to the Philadelphia Democrat. "He's kind of relieved the investigation is coming to a close."

Since 2003, the FBI and IRS have grilled everyone from Fumo's florist to a Senate-paid private eye. Agents have scrutinized Fumo's yacht trips, his finances, his use of legislative staff - and his aides' alleged cover-up.

But the heart of the case appears to be whether Fumo illegally exploited a multimillion-dollar South Philadelphia charity to fund his personal and political agenda - using it, as one person close to the case put it, "as his personal piggy bank."

The charity, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, is funded mainly by public dollars and Peco Energy donations - most of the money won with Fumo's influence or help.

Early on, agents scrutinized those donations. Now, instead of pursuing how the money was raised, they are focused on how it was spent.

The Inquirer previously reported that the charity paid for political polls and secretly funded a lawsuit against a Fumo political rival.

The Inquirer has learned from sources that authorities are also investigating whether the charity bought Fumo household items and provided its SUVs - a Ford Expedition and a Lincoln Navigator - for Fumo to use on vacation.

Last week in Harrisburg, Fumo walked away without answering when asked whether he expected to be charged.

Fumo, who has served in the state Senate for nearly three decades, has said the investigation is politically inspired by the Bush White House.

Now 63, he has long been respected and at times feared for his intelligence, political instincts, and network of appointees and allies.

Fumo has faced criminal charges before, only to prevail against them.

In 1973, five years before he became a senator, he was arrested on charges of vote fraud, but the charges were quickly withdrawn.

In 1980, a federal jury convicted him of putting "ghost" employees on the state payroll, but a judge threw out the conviction, a decision affirmed on appeal.

Citizens' Alliance was founded in 1991 by Fumo allies, including two legislative aides.

One was Ruth Arnao, a close friend and a senior staffer in Fumo's legislative office in South Philadelphia until 2004. Until recently, Arnao, 51, was executive director of Citizens' Alliance. She, too, received a target letter last year. Her lawyer did not return phone calls seeking comment Friday.

The senator has extolled the charity's good works: rehabbing the Passyunk Avenue commercial strip, subsidizing charter schools, and doling out grants to the likes of the St. Edmunds Golden Age Club, a legal clinic for the disabled, and the Anti-Defamation League.

DOJ_NMG_0127354

FBI and IRS agents began investigating Fumo's relationship to Citizens' Alliance in 2004 after The Inquirer reported that the charity had collected millions of dollars in donations from unidentified sources.

The newspaper later revealed that the money had come from Peco Energy and the Delaware River Port Authority.

Peco secretly gave the charity $17 million as part of legal settlements in which Fumo agreed to drop his opposition to its business plans, the paper revealed. The senator has noted that Peco also agreed to cut bills to consumers as part of the settlements.

Fumo, long a power on the port authority, used his clout to obtain $10 million for Citizens' Alliance. The port authority is largely funded by tolls paid on its bridges and the PATCO commuter train.

Aside from the Peco and port authority money, Citizens' Alliance has received more than $4 million in state and other government grants.

As the federal probe nears its end, people knowledgeable about the inquiry say prosecutors have dropped the idea of bringing charges related to the Peco donations.

One source explained that prosecutors had concluded the donations weren't a crime because they had come as part of settlements in "real litigation," including a dispute over utility deregulation.

Fumo has portrayed his role in Citizens' Alliance as a patron.

"I don't get any benefits from it," Fumo said during a 2004 radio interview. "In fact, once in a while, I think they've picked up trash at my house and I've paid them $100 a month."

Trash pickup wasn't all that Citizens' Alliance did for Fumo, a source said.

On occasion, Fumo legislative aides drove Citizens' Alliance SUVs to Martha's Vineyard so Fumo could use them when he flew in for his annual vacations, according to a source familiar with the trips.

In a recent written response to Inquirer questions, Fumo's lawyer, Richard A. Sprague, said Fumo's work as a senator did not "cease even when he is on 'vacation.' "

Sprague said Fumo's Senate staff would drive office equipment to him - "computers, fax machines, etc."

"Sen. Fumo has long had the reputation as a tireless public servant whose efforts on behalf of Pennsylvania are not compressed into a 9-to-5, Monday through Friday schedule," Sprague wrote. "To the contrary, Sen. Fumo and his staff work 24/7 at the job of being the most effective Senate office in the commonwealth."

While Fumo has generally declined to talk about the investigation, his supporters have dismissed the inquiry as a witch-hunt that has ignored the good work of Citizens' Alliance and sought to criminalize mistakes and legitimate spending.

In reference to the lawsuit, the polls, and alleged obstruction of justice, Fumo's supporters offer explanations:

In 2001, the charity anonymously funded a legal challenge to then-Republican State Sen. Robert Jubelirer, a Fumo political enemy. The suit unsuccessfully sought to stop Jubelirer from serving simultaneously in the Senate and as lieutenant governor. Sprague has said the charity's payment was justified because the issue was of "great public importance." He suggested that the secrecy had been necessary to protect the nonprofit from "retaliation from the very officials involved in the litigation."

In 2002 and 2003, Citizens' Alliance paid more than $200,000 for political polling. After questions were raised, one of the senator's campaign funds reimbursed the charity. Fumo's supporters say it was an accounting error.

Last year, two former Senate aides, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, were charged with obstruction of justice, accused of deleting Fumo office e-mail as part of an effort to thwart the FBI investigation. In court filings, prosecutors have said they are investigating whether Fumo was involved in that alleged cover-up.

Fumo staffers have said that long before the investigation began, office policy required employees to delete old e-mail on a regular basis.

Prosecutors have tried to get Luchko and Eister to testify against Fumo - without success. Their lawyers say Luchko and Eister have done nothing wrong and have nothing bad to say about Fumo.

The grand jury investigating Fumo is set to expire within two weeks. Prosecutors have said they will complete their investigation by then.

Already, the grand jury has heard a mountain of evidence, generating thousands of pages of transcripts, a court filing shows.

FBI agents and prosecutors have issued scores of subpoenas. Seized e-mails alone run for 40,000 pages, prosecutors have said.

One other focus of the case has been Fumo's use of luxury yachts of the Independence Seaport Museum, where he sits on the board.

The museum leased one such boat for Fumo in 2001 at a cost of $13,375. He reimbursed the museum for the cruise in April 2004, three months after news of the investigation broke and more than 21/2 years after the trip, The Inquirer has learned.

Agents have conducted hundreds of interviews, seeking information from City Council members tied to Fumo, from the senator's political advisers - and from Frank Wallace, the private detective who has been retained by the state Senate Appropriations Committee.

Wallace's lawyer, Frank DeSimone, declined to comment Friday. It is not known why the FBI spoke with Wallace.

Two weeks ago, two of Fumo's close friends, South Philadelphia florists Jerry and Ann Catania, were seen trudging into the grand jury area. Their lawyer, Michael M. Mustokoff, declined to comment, and it could not be learned why the Catanias had been called to testify.

Fumo has long used the Catanias' business, Ten Pennies, to garland political fund-raisers. Since 2003, records show, Fumo's campaigns have paid the florists $176,000.

FBI Probe Of Perata Apparently In Limbo (SANMCT)

By Steven Harmon, MEDIANEWS SACRAMENTO BUREAU

San Mateo County Times, February 4, 2007

State senator seems unconcerned with investigation into campaign spending

SACRAMENTO — Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata has spent nearly $1 million defending himself against a federal probe into whether he illegally funneled money to family and close associates.

But more than two years after the harsh light of suspicion first fell on the 61-year-old East Bay Democrat, the FBI investigation appears to have fallen quietly into a black hole of obscurity.

The flurry of subpoenas flying out of FBI offices in San Francisco has slowed to an apparent stop. There haven't been any publicly acknowledged FBI interviews of witnesses since last summer. Images of FBI investigators carting off computer files and papers from Perata's home have faded. The urgency to defend Perata has also waned: Money going into Perata's legal defense fund has essentially dried up, and his debts are nearly all paid up.

Perata has walled himself and his staff from the investigation by handing all legal issues to his Sacramento-based law firms: Stevens & O'Connell, which serves as his main counsel, and Olson, Hagel & Fishburn, which specializes in campaign finance law. Democratic political consultant, Jason Kinney, a former political aide to former Gov. Gray Davis, is handling public relations duties for Perata.

"This situation — we don't even call it an investigation — doesn't touch him in any way," Kinney said. "He's been forced to put together a legal team so they can be prepared for anything that comes along ... and so he can focus 100 percent of his energies on rebuilding California, the needs of his caucus and constituents. Rarely do these worlds intertwine."

Advertisement

Perhaps one measure of Perata's concern over the probe can be discerned from his defense fund, which now totals $168.22. After receiving $441,000 in contributions in 2005, the fund took in just $5,150 in contributions last year, according to campaign finance reports released this week.

Not only has fundraising slowed, so has spending. Having shelled out $682,305 from his defense fund in 2005, last year Perata spent $283,609 to cover debts — and $260,000 of that was covered by a transfer from his campaign committee, Taxpayers for Perata.

Having paid $965,914 total in legal expenses, he still owes $55,255 to his lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0127356

The original charges centered on payments that Perata's campaign committees, or side committees controlled by friends, made to Perata's relatives and close associates for campaign work. Some of that money went back to Perata for rent or consulting services.

Timothy Staples, a longtime friend and former college roommate, got similar treatment. A pair of political consulting businesses Staples ran received contracts from committees financed by the senator's campaign donors. Staples paid Perata more than $200,000 for consulting services in 2002 and 2003. Perata has since severed business relations with Staples.

Perata refuses to talk about the investigation with reporters and it appears to be a nonissue in the Capitol. In fact, he has never been stronger as the leader of the Senate, having just been re-elected by his caucus without a whiff of a challenge that would seem certain if anyone sensed he was vulnerable.

He made full use of his position to help usher one of the Legislature's most productive sessions last year, and took the lead in the successful campaign to pass $37.3 billion in infrastructure bonds.

Perata has appeared unfazed through it all, plowing through the daily demands of being leader and remaining unbridled in his views. He has regular meetings with the governor and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, D-Los Angeles, has maintained a visible presence at the Capitol, and has even advocated extending his own term limits and, hence, his power as leader of the Senate.

But no one knows if another shoe is out there ready to drop. The FBI has made no comment on where the investigation is, whether they're about to indict or if they're ready to close up shop — and a spokeswoman said they won't comment. They don't even have to inform Perata if they've already abandoned their investigation, she said.

The apparent disarray in the U.S. Attorney's Northern District office may be Perata's biggest ally. More than half of the 101 federal prosecutors have left the office since Ryan, the Bush-appointed U.S. attorney, took over in 2002. The lead prosecutor on Perata's case, Ben Burch, left in 2005 for a spot on the Superior Court bench in Contra Costa County.

Trying to read into it has been a waste of time — whether the silence is a good or a bad sign — Kinney said. So Perata has taken a page from former President Bill Clinton, who stared down an endless array of investigations: He's learned to compartmentalize.

"I've never seen it affect Don," said former Senate President Pro Tem John Burton, a longtime friend. "If you know you didn't do anything, it doesn't bother you. It's obvious to me that Don feels secure in his own probity and he's just going ahead in his job. It says something about his inner strength. Seeing him, talking to him, you wouldn't even think he's got a care in the world."

Contact Steven Harmon at sharmon@cctimes.com or (916) 441-2101.

FBI Investigates High-level Aide To Sheriff (STPPP)

By Mara H. Gottfried

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, February 4, 2007

Ramsey County Sheriff Bob Fletcher said Friday the FBI is investigating a high-level civilian aide in his department.

Mark Naylon, a public information officer and Fletcher's friend, is being investigated for allegations of criminal conduct, the sheriff said.

Fletcher declined to detail the allegations. No other county employees were being investigated, he said.

Naylon, 46, didn't return calls Friday. His lawyer, Paul Rogosheske, declined to comment.

The allegations are ones the FBI "is obligated to investigate," Fletcher said.

If they prove true, Fletcher said, "I would be shocked, but I'll let the investigation run its course."

Fletcher hired Naylon in 1998. Naylon served as best man at Fletcher's wedding in 2004. Fletcher narrowly defeated former St. Paul Police Chief Bill Finney in November to win another term.

The FBI contacted Fletcher about its investigation into Naylon for the first time Friday and asked for a meeting, the sheriff said. Agents requested documents and access to employees for interviews. Fletcher said his office is cooperating.

An FBI spokesman said the agency does not confirm or deny whether an investigation is taking place.

The sheriff's office will launch an internal affairs investigation, Fletcher said. Naylon is on vacation out of state and his employment status with the department didn't change Friday, Fletcher said.

DOJ_NMG_0127357

"Typically, we take the approach that a person is innocent until proven guilty," Fletcher said.

When Fletcher hired Naylon as public information officer, his friend didn't have a background in law enforcement or media relations.

"He's certainly one of the hardest workers at the sheriff's office," said Fletcher, who added that information from Naylon's community contacts has led to "dozens of felony arrests."

Naylon, who has lobbied for the sheriff's office at the Legislature, is hoping to get a part-time peace officer's license and start a career in law enforcement this year, Fletcher said. Naylon's salary is $64,660.

Naylon's name surfaced in a gambling investigation by the Minnesota Department of Public Safety's Alcohol and Gambling Enforcement Division in 2003.

The investigation focused on Naylon's friend, Michael Ogren, who then owned a bar called Rock in Maplewood.

Acting on a tip, investigators raided the bar July 14, 2003, and found people playing blackjack, craps and roulette. That night, Ogren told investigators he sent gambling proceeds from his annual game nights at the bar to Fletcher's re-election campaign.

"I think in the past couple of years we can go back, I have the canceled checks from right after this tournament that can substantiate that," Ogren said, according to a transcript of the interview.

The next day, Fletcher directed a sheriff's inspector to ask state investigators to interview Ogren about his allegation and investigate further, according to a July 2003 sheriff's office memo.

According to the same memo, the state Department of Public Safety declined to pursue the allegation. A state investigator there told the sheriff's department inspector that investigating the Fletcher allegation "doesn't fit" the department's job and that it "doesn't care where the money goes," according to the memo.

On July 16, 2003, the sheriff's inspector interviewed Ogren, who recanted his statement about routing gambling proceeds to Fletcher's campaign.

Ogren told the inspector that making the allegation about Fletcher was "stupid on my part" and "a bad case of judgment," according to a transcript of the interview.

In the meantime, the commissioner's office of the Department of Public Safety reviewed Ogren's allegation and referred it to the FBI, according to Assistant Commissioner Tim Leslie.

Leslie said he does not know what became of the referral.

In October 2003, the Ramsey County Attorney's Office charged Ogren with gambling, a felony. Ogren did not enter a plea of guilty or not guilty. He agreed to complete 100 hours of community service and, after remaining law abiding for one year, the county attorney's office dropped the charge against him.

Ogren did not return a call Friday.

Naylon was deposed in 2005 as part of an unrelated lawsuit against the sheriff's department. Naylon said in the deposition that he was gambling at the Rock bar the night of the raid, but left before investigators arrived. He was not arrested or charged.

"They gamble everywhere," Naylon said when a lawyer questioned him about gambling. "Why is it illegal? … I don't think gambling's a crime."

Ogren now owns the Myth nightclub in Maplewood. Fletcher said Naylon moonlights for Ogren as security director at Myth.

Mara H. Gottfried can be reached at mgottfried@pioneerpress.com or 651-228-5262.

Fletcher Aide Under FBI Probe Had Wide Reach (MINNST)

By Paul McEnroe, Mary Lynn Smith And Howie Padilla, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 4, 2007

Though not a sworn deputy, the public information officer has been credited with playing a key role in the Ramsey County Sheriff's Office.

Ramsey County Sheriff Bob Fletcher says his department has made "dozens, if not hundreds of arrests," based on the connections of his public information officer, Mark Naylon.

Those connections also appear to be why Naylon finds himself the target of an FBI investigation into allegations that he stole money, tampered with evidence and tipped off suspects and informants.

On Friday, FBI agents spent more than an hour in Fletcher's office informing him that Naylon was under criminal investigation. Agents seized Naylon's files and his office computer. Sources have told the Star Tribune that the FBI is particularly interested in Naylon's relationship with the Hell's Outcasts motorcycle gang, which has a history of gun and drug trafficking.

Naylon, who Fletcher said is on vacation out of state, couldn't be reached. Calls to his home and cell phone Saturday were not answered.

The probe has put Fletcher, who was elected to a fourth four-year term in November, on the defensive. He hired Naylon, whom he describes as a "great friend," to be the department's spokesman in 1998, though Naylon had no experience in law enforcement or in media relations.

Officially, Naylon is the office's public information officer. Fletcher said that Naylon also has played a key role for the office's interaction with drug and gun task forces.

While Naylon had no formal training or experience for the post, Fletcher lauds him for his work.

Fletcher said Naylon received a commendation letter from the FBI for his assistance in identifying the SpongeBob SquarePants bank robber, who in 2005 was convicted of robbing a Minneapolis TCF bank.

"He shares the passion of law enforcement," Fletcher said Friday. "Although he's not a sworn officer, he's been very valuable to the department."

Naylon grew up on St. Paul's East Side, graduated from Johnson High in 1978 and briefly attended then-Mankato State University. In 1992, he became business manager of a 4,000-member local laborers and construction union and held the job until 1998, when he resigned to work for Fletcher.

While with the union, he also co-owned a bar, Moose's Locker, on St. Paul's East Side. On his liquor license application, Naylon listed Fletcher, then-Hennepin County Sheriff Pat McGowan and then-St. Paul Mayor Norm Coleman as character references. The bar has since closed.

Fletcher, who was introduced to Naylon through a mutual friend in the St. Paul Police Department, has benefited from Naylon's political connections. One of the sheriff's favorite projects was to help establish the Minnesota Gang Strike Force, and Naylon lobbied on his behalf at the Legislature.

But records also show that, while working for Fletcher, Naylon also was a registered lobbyist several years ago for horse racing gambling interests, insurance companies and a bank.

Fletcher said Friday he didn't know whether Naylon, whose county salary is about $63,000 a year, actively lobbied for these groups while being paid by taxpayers. Fletcher said he also does not know much about Naylon's off-duty jobs.

Naylon runs a private security business that uses moonlighting Ramsey County deputies at Minnesota's largest nightclub, Myth, which is in Maplewood. That bar is owned by Naylon's friend, Mike Ogren, who was charged with illegal gambling when his former bar, the Rock, was raided by state gambling enforcement agents in 2003.

While agents were questioning witnesses, Naylon showed up at the bar to make sure that his friend didn't think he had given information leading to bust, according to court documents. Ogren told state investigators that the gambling proceeds were going into Fletcher's reelection fund. Days later, Ogren recanted his statement when questioned by two county investigators, who had been sent there on Fletcher's orders.

Naylon frequently shows up at crime scenes. Some deputies and authorities from other agencies have complained about his presence.

Within months of Naylon's hiring, Ramsey deputies first got a glimpse into Naylon's style. During a 1999 standoff, Naylon was accused of endangering deputies who were hiding and surrounding a house. He drove onto the scene, his headlights illuminating the deputies, according to a memo sent to a supervisor.

"I do not know what police training Naylon has, but putting an untrained civilian into these situations endangering deputies is obviously not a good idea," wrote then-Sgt. R.J. Sanchez

Fletcher dismissed Naylon's behavior, chalking it up to "enthusiasm." Fletcher didn't discipline Naylon. Fletcher said he "coached" him.

Since then, Fletcher said, he can't recall any formal or informal complaints about Naylon, only compliments.

pmcenroe@startribune.com • 612-673-1645 mlsmith@startribune.com • 612-518-8337 hpadilla@startribune.com • 612-590-2637

Indiana Killings Stir Fear Among Homeless (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

The first two bodies were found on a hunch in early January in South Bend, Ind., during a search of an old industrial part town. Two police officers popped open the lid of a manhole and down there, beaten to death and stacked upright one above the other, were two missing men, Michael S. Nolan Jr. and Michael W. Lawson.

Just three days later, as the investigation expanded, the police opened another manhole about 100 yards away from the first and found two more men, Jason A. Coates and Brian Talboom, their bodies bludgeoned and discarded underground the same way.

To one officer on the scene, Sgt. David Wells, the discovery seemed more like something from a dark crime drama than anything that tranquil and academic South Bend had ever experienced. "It was really horrific," Sergeant Wells said. "And really perplexing."

The four men had only two things in common: they lived together in a burned-out building that they had painstakingly transformed into a makeshift home. And they made money by "scrapping" — hunting the urban landscape for increasingly valuable and marketable metals like copper and brass to sell to recyclers and construction businesses.

On Saturday night, the police announced that two homeless men had been arrested and charged with murder in the four deaths, said Capt. Jeffrey Walters of the South Bend Police Department.

The men, Daniel J. Sharp, 56, and Randy L. Reeder, 50, were being held in St. Joseph County, Ind., and Berrien County, Mich., respectively, according to The Associated Press. The police said Mr. Sharp and Mr. Reeder killed the four men because they believed they had stolen salvaged scrap metal that Mr. Sharp and Mr. Reeder had intended to sell.

The killings have fostered a sense of dread in the unusually tight-knit community of homeless men and women in South Bend. "I don't go out at night anymore," said James Manns, 45, who is living in a homeless shelter near downtown. "All we can do is step back and see if it happens again."

These sorts of feelings represent a reversal for many. Particularly among the homeless, the quiet college town of South Bend cemented its reputation for tolerance and hospitality a long time ago. For years, it has been the place to go from around the region for emergency shelter, free meals, and even shots of hope, some said, from myriad charities and service groups. An accurate count is hard to come by but some of the larger shelters in this city of 107,000 can accommodate up to 200 people a night and are almost always full.

Sergeant Wells said before the arrests that the police thought the slayings of the four homeless men were neither a case of random violence nor the work of a serial killer, and they believed the killings were connected with the scrapping business.

Scrappers in an old rust-belt factory town like South Bend can make hundreds of dollars out of a single haul mining the mechanical past if, they are crafty and strong enough. Many scrappers team up for added manpower, as the four friends had done.

Some of what scrappers do involves demolition of abandoned property — ripping out pipes and electrical tubing — but often they tread into what is simply theft, the police said. They leave behind aggrieved property owners and, often, face turf wars over territory.

"We have both supply and demand here," said Capt. Philip A. Trent, a spokesman for the South Bend Police Department. He noted the high number of derelict buildings around town and that there were plenty of people desperate enough to engage in the dangerous, backbreaking work. "Add it all up, and you've got a cottage industry — and a profitable one at that."

The police first interviewed Mr. Sharp on Wednesday and noticed that his boots matched some forensic evidence from the building, Tim Corbett, commander of the St. Joseph County homicide unit told The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0127360

Mr. Sharp confessed to the police on Friday that he and Mr. Reeder killed the other men sometime between Dec. 18 and Dec. 21, according to The Associated Press. Forensic evidence in the building confirmed Mr. Sharp's account, Mr. Corbett said.

While Mr. Lawson, 53, Mr. Nolan, 40, Mr. Talboom, 51, and Mr. Coates, 29, lived on their own, and they were well known among the staff and residents of several local shelters, where they would sometimes stop for food, or to do odd jobs. Over the years, the four had also lived off and on in various shelters.

"I'm just upset. I knew those guys. Good guys, all of them," said Jim Holleman, who was spending one night last week at the Hope Rescue Mission shelter near downtown.

Just days before they were killed, the men offered what they considered a "guest room" to Matthew Miller, who had been kicked out of a shelter for drinking alcohol. Mr. Miller said he had run into Mr. Lawson at the neighborhood library, where he passed the time on many cold days.

"Mike said: 'You don't have to be on the street. Come stay at our building,' " Mr. Miller said. "So I did for about three days, then I got back into the shelter. Three days after that, I heard about him being missing."

Mr. Miller, 30, said he was so distraught by the killings that he could not get out of bed for days, not even to attend the memorial services.

"My anxiety went up so high since then," he said. "I miss them. And I don't go places alone after dark by myself like I used to. A lot of people feel that way, they won't go anywhere around here by themselves anymore."

Mich. Translator In Iraq Sentenced For Offering Bribe (AP)

AP, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A suburban Detroit man who worked as a translator in Iraq was sentenced today to three years in prison for offering a bribe to a police official for the purchase of armored vests and other equipment for $1 million.

Faheem Mousa Salam, 29, was sentenced in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia by Judge Richard J. Leon, according to a statement from the Justice Department.

Salam, of Livonia, pleaded guilty on Aug. 4 to violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

He admitted that he offered $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, prosecutors said. Salam said he had 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer to sell.

Salam tried to complete the sale with someone he believed was an official of the training group, but who actually was an undercover agent of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. Salam offered the agent a separate payment of $28,000 to $35,000 for his help.

Salam was arrested in March. He was an employee of the Titan Corp., a government contractor working in Iraq.

Prosecutors said at Friday's sentencing that Salam was motivated by greed, not a desire to provide troops with equipment.

Fulton Man Indicted For Child Pornography (JEFFCNT)

Jefferson City (MO) News Tribune, February 4, 2007

David Matthew McCormick is facing new federal charges after a grand jury on Friday issued a new indictment in his case.

Bradley J. Schlozman, the United States Attorney for the Western District of Missouri, announced in a Friday news release the federal grand jury in Jefferson City added a charge in its new, two-count indictment that replaces one issued last Nov. 6.

McCormick, 20, now is charged with possessing child pornography on April 27, 2005, and distributing child pornography over the Internet on March 26, 2005.

Friday's indictment also includes a forfeiture allegation, which would require McCormick to give the government any property used to commit the alleged crimes, including two computer hard drives, a computer tower, a compact disc and a cellular camera telephone.

Schlozman said the case is being brought as part of "Project Safe Childhood," a nationwide federal Justice Department initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse launched in February 2006 by U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

DOJ_NMG_0127361

The national effort is led by the United States Attorneys' offices, with help from federal, state and local resources to identify and rescue victims and to better locate, apprehend, and prosecute individuals who exploit children using the Internet.

McCormick's case was investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Fulton, Mo., Police Department, the Missouri State Technical Assistance Team and the Missouri Division of Family Services.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Lawrence E. Miller will handle the prosecution in federal District Court.

More information about Project Safe Childhood can be found on the Web site, www.projectsafechildhood.gov.

The Taxpayers' Tab: Police Billed $27,000 In Travel Costs To Federal Grant (AEAGT)

By Stephanie Chelf And Zach Church, Staff writers

Andover (MA) Eagle Tribune, February 4, 2007

METHUEN - Methuen police Capt. Kristopher McCarthy treated himself and other top police brass to an afternoon snack of pretzels and water at an Atlanta mall in March 2005 and billed taxpayers $11.22.

Later on, someone wanted cheese sauce, and taxpayers picked up that tab, too - a bill for 45 cents at Mr. Pretzel.

These expenses were among $27,000 in travel costs billed to a $1 million federal grant meant to fight crime in the Arlington district, the city's poorest neighborhood. The receipts are just a small part of the police spending records subpoenaed by the federal government last August. The U.S. attorney's office will not discuss the subpoena, its investigation or whether it is looking into the travel costs. A spokeswoman did not return a call for comment for this story.

An Eagle-Tribune analysis of the records shows that between 2001 and 2006, the grant known as "Weed and Seed" paid for 11 trips to conferences across the country for seven people - police Chief Joseph Solomon, his secretary Patricia Giarrusso, Deputy Chief Joseph Alaimo, Lt. Kevin Mahoney, Sgt. Michael Havey, Capt. Katherine Lavigne and McCarthy.

For the first several trips, police officials documented their expenses with receipts backing up each reimbursement claim. But by 2005, police began using a per diem system granting themselves a daily spending allowance. Fewer supporting documents were provided.

During the March 2005 trip to Atlanta, Solomon, Giarrusso, Mahoney and McCarthy stayed for nearly six days at the Hyatt Regency on the government's dime. They had dinner at the Hard Rock Cafe, racked up a $70 breakfast bill for three at the Hyatt Hotel, spent another $203 for dinner at a Brazilian steakhouse and took more than $400 worth of cab rides.

McCarthy also expensed $8.06 for breakfast at Logan Airport in Boston. Solomon was paid $305.59 for food and transportation on the trip, but did not submit receipts to the city.

Five months later, the group got together in Los Angeles and did it all again.

Solomon, in a written response to questions for this story, said the trips "form an integral part of the Weed and Seed program" and that federal grant officials expect attendance.

Attempts to reach the other officers, as well as Giarrusso, were unsuccessful. Methuen Mayor William Manzi said the decision to attend conferences is up to the local grant administrators.

"As a general rule, I think that be it city or federal or state grant money, you should be frugal and parsimonious (in travel)," Manzi said. "I think when you're out there, you have to use your best judgment."

From Methuen's Broadway to the Vegas Strip

In 2001, the U.S. Department of Justice awarded Methuen a $1 million, five-year grant to launch a community policing effort in the Arlington neighborhood, a 12-block area near the Lawrence line where the median income for 4,000 residents is about $33,000. Almost a third of the homes are occupied by single-parent families.

The grant's purpose is in its name - to weed out crime and seed the neighborhood with programs and initiatives. It has paid for officers' overtime and equipment, as well as many of the day-to-day expenses for Methuen Arlington Neighborhood Inc. at 1 Broadway, which provides resources for children and families.

The Justice Department invites those who receive Weed and Seed grants to attend conferences around the country in places like Los Angeles; Orlando, Fla.; New Orleans; and Las Vegas. The conferences are not mandatory, but a Justice Department spokesperson said they are highly recommended as a training tool and to provide technical assistance for law enforcement and other agencies involved in the program.

DOJ_NMG_0127362

"Conferences offer workshops on crime-prevention techniques, day-to-day site management, recruitment and retention of volunteers, and measuring performance," according to a written statement from the Department of Justice. "Conferences provide the opportunities for attendees to work directly with program staff from Washington, D.C., and meet and exchange best practices with representatives from over 250 active Weed and Seed communities nationwide."

The police department is permitted to pay for travel expenses with the grant money, according to the statement.

Linda Soucy, director of Methuen Arlington Neighborhood Inc., said the trips were indispensable to police. Soucy attended one conference in Philadelphia, though the city's Weed and Seed money was not used to pay for the trip.

"You go for just a couple of days, and you learn so much," said Soucy. "We can take things from what other people are doing and having success there and bring them back to our community."

McCarthy, who is head of the Police Department's Neighborhood Services Bureau and the city's Weed and Seed coordinator, went to eight conferences in the five-year span. Giarrusso, secretary to Solomon and program assistant for the Weed and Seed fund, attended seven conferences.

Solomon made four trips out of state, two before he became chief in the fall of 2002. Alaimo attended three conferences. Mahoney attended three, Havey attended two, and Lavigne went to one.

Where they ate

Police charged round-trip airfare, cab rides, dinners and snacks such as the pretzels and sauce to the grant. The trip to Los Angeles in 2005, for example, cost the U.S. Department of Justice and taxpayers $5,468.70.

Meals during these 10 trips ranged from pedestrian - Applebees in San Antonio and Subway in Indianapolis - to classy - Emeril Lagasse's Nola in New Orleans and a Japanese steakhouse in Orlando. The Hard Rock Cafe was a favorite, too. Police ate there in at least five cities.

Generally, the group ate moderately priced meals, always deducting food for guests and alcohol from the bills they charged to the grant. But at times, the group ate at pricey chain and tourist restaurants, including Jimmy Buffett's Margaritaville.

During the February 2004 trip to Dallas, McCarthy, Havey and Giarrusso spent $192 on dinner at a Brazilian steakhouse chain called Fogo De Chao. By comparison, the grant also paid $116 to a local Borders for 18 books for Arlington neighborhood children.

A year later, on March, 23, 2005, in Atlanta, three of the four conference attendees dined at another Fogo De Chao, where each ordered a $45.50 fixed-price dinner and spent a total of $18.40 on coffee and three desserts. A receipt for $203.50 was submitted for reimbursement. The grant paid about the same amount for bus service for 16 Methuen children to visit the planetarium in Concord, N.H.

The record keeping for later trips was far less specific. Solomon, McCarthy, Giarrusso and Mahoney each received $400 reimbursement for food and transportation during the six-day trip to Los Angeles in 2005, for example. That allowed each $300 per diem for food, which does not require receipts, and another $100 for incidentals.

The group kept receipts that justify $357 of those expenses, all of which were for cab and subway rides.

On all of the trips, in fact, cab fare represented a significant amount of the bills.

McCarthy and Havey spent more than $250 in cab fare on a trip to Albuquerque, New Mexico. Solomon, Alaimo and Giarrusso spent $233 on cabs in Indianapolis. In Dallas, Havey, McCarthy and Giarrusso charged for 22 cab rides that collectively cost more than $450. On the trip to Atlanta, McCarthy expensed $25 for a cab ride from The Cheesecake Factory to his hotel.

'We have done so much good'

Back in Methuen, Soucy is still working with the federal grant to bring opportunity to the children of the Arlington Neighborhood.

All the money, including the costs for the trips, has been spent wisely, she said. Strategies and tips police have picked up at the conferences have sped up improvements at home, she said.

Solomon in his statement pointed to the Safe Haven Afterschool Homework and Computer Center, a Youth Leadership Academy and tri-city police patrols as three ideas developed during conferences and later implemented in Methuen.

There is a "myriad of initiatives, ideas, plans and programs that are presented at each conference," he wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0127363

"We have done so much good with this money that it is unbelievable," Soucy said. "You take what's already working and you just run with it. And that's why we've been so successful, because we haven't tried to reinvent the wheel."

Manzi, too, said he was pleased overall with the results of the Weed and Seed program.

"I think overall the point here is that the Weed and Seed program has done good things for the community, has done good things for the target area," he said. "And if I had to accept it again, I would."

Are We All Gambling Criminals? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

MILLIONS OF Americans have engaged in criminal behavior leading up to today's Super Bowl. You know who you are — those of you outside Nevada who placed bets on the Indianapolis Colts or Chicago Bears. It's estimated that about $5 billion will be on the line this afternoon in a nation in which even office pools are technically illegal in some states.

President Bush in October signed the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, a law intended to resolve any ambiguities about the unlawfulness of placing bets online. Although most fans in the free world can place bets with regulated online casinos, U.S. law enforcement has been busy cracking down on the heinous crime, going after enabling credit card companies, detaining those who run legal foreign online sites if they deign to enter the country and subpoenaing major Wall Street investment banks involved in overseas initial public offerings of online casinos. It's another brazen attempt to extent prudish American mores to other jurisdictions.

One bemused Las Vegas sports handicapper told the Wall Street Journal last week that the ban on Internet gambling should be renamed the "Sopranos Support Bill," because the main beneficiaries of keeping closely regulated casinos from doing business online are bookies. Instead of protecting consumers and raising tax revenue from this popular entertainment, the government is protecting the turf of unsavory bookies, many of whom have ties to organized crime.

The gambling crackdown is part of a broader trend of a paternalist state protecting citizens from themselves, curtailing their freedoms in the process. We live in a nation still engaged in a war on terror and in a city struggling with escalating gang violence, yet precious law enforcement resources are being spent on prosecuting morality. But, for today, enjoy the game while pretending you don't know the spread. After all, that could prove incriminating.

CIVIL LAW:

FTC Slaps Telemarketer With $1M Fine (AP)

By Christopher S. Rugaber, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

FTC Penalizes Telemarketer With $1M Fine for Hanging Up on 64M People

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal regulators have slapped a $1 million penalty on a telemarketer that automatically dialed and then illegally hung up on more than 64 million people.

A Florida-based company known as The Broadcast Team settled charges brought by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice by agreeing to a court order that will bar them from making similar calls in the future and require them to pay a $1 million penalty.

The Broadcast Team also called more than a million numbers on the national Do Not Call Registry, the FTC said.

The company's principals, Robert J. Tuttle and Mark S. Edwards, were also named in the FTC's complaint. Edwards did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

The FTC said that the company was able to deliver over a million recorded messages per day to voice mailboxes and answering machines. But the company violated the commission's telemarketing sales rule by calling tens of millions of numbers and, when the calls were answered by people, hanging up or playing a recording.

The commission's rules require that calls answered by a person rather than an answering machine be connected to a live representative within two seconds, and not be "abandoned" by hanging up or playing a recording.

DOJ_NMG_0127364

Telemarketers that make sales calls or for-profit telemarketers seeking charitable contributions are bound by the restrictions on abandoning calls, the commission said.

And the Broadcast Team received more than $2 million in revenue for telemarketing calls that violated the FTC's telemarketing sales rules, the commission said last year.

The Justice Department first filed a complaint in federal court at the FTC's request in December 2005. The complaint said the company abandoned 64 million calls on behalf of debt management companies and more than 450,000 calls made for charities and other purposes.

The complaint also said that the company violated the law by calling numbers on the national "Do Not Call" Registry and for making calls without paying the required annual fee for access to that Registry.

The company has agreed to a proposed court order that bars TBT from hanging up or playing a recording when a person answers its calls, and prohibits the company from calling numbers on the "Do Not Call" list.

The proposed order would also impose a civil penalty of $2.8 million, with $1.8 million suspended due to the company's inability to pay.

The company's agreement with the court order does not constitute an admission by the defendants that they violated the law, the commission said.

Michael Tankersley, a spokesman for the FTC, said the order would become final when signed by a federal court judge, which is expected to occur imminently.

ITT To Settle U.S.-China Technology Case, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt And Tony Capaccio

Bloomberg, February 4, 2007

Feb. 2 (Bloomberg) -- Defense contractor ITT Corp. may pay as much as $100 million to resolve U.S. charges the company violated export control rules by allowing the transfer of night- vision technology to China, people familiar with the case said.

ITT, the world's biggest maker of night vision goggles, is in advanced talks with Justice Department prosecutors in Virginia, said the people who asked not to be identified because negotiations with the government are continuing and the size of the settlement could still change. The agreement probably will be announced within a few weeks, the people said.

China has been energetic in trying to obtain so-called Generation 3 night-vision technology and develop ways to counteract the devices, analysts say. The goggles, binoculars and scopes are used by soldiers to see clearly when fighting in darkness and low light.

``The Chinese are aggressive collectors of all kinds of military-related technologies," said Steven Aftergood, a senior research analyst at the Federation of American Scientists in Washington.

The settlement would be ITT's second in a little more than two years for export control violations. In November 2004, the company agreed to settle a State Department civil case by paying $8 million and improving its internal controls for preventing sensitive technology from falling into the wrong hands.

The company must still honor the terms of the settlement in that case, which involved export violations of night-vision technology and remote sensing equipment for satellites. The agreement with the State Department requires ITT to submit to heightened government scrutiny, including arranging for on-site audits at the request of the agency, until 2009.

War-Fighting Devices

``The night vision devices produced by ITT contribute critical war-fighting capabilities to the U.S. military," the State Department said in an October 2004 document on the agreement. ``The ability to observe and target potential hostile forces at night is an important force multiplier for the U.S. military and its coalition partners."

Generation 3 is the most sophisticated night-vision technology available and, because it is considered critical by the U.S. military, can't be exported without the permission of the State Department.

DOJ_NMG_0127365

ITT bills itself on its Web site as ``the world's leading developer, producer and supplier of Gen 3 night-vision devices, specialty cameras and high-voltage miniaturized power supplies for U.S. and allied military forces as well as federal, state and local law enforcement."

Regulatory Filing

The company, based in White Plains, New York, disclosed the more recent probe, by the U.S. attorney in Roanoke, Virginia, last March in a regulatory filing. ITT also said it was conducting an internal probe of the matter and didn't reveal the nature of the violation or what country was involved.

The company said it expects to reach an agreement with the government soon. ``Because the negotiations are ongoing, we cannot speculate on the exact timing or the final terms -- financial or otherwise," ITT said in a statement.

The company reported today that its fourth quarter profit was $140.8 million, or 75 cents a share, compared with a loss of $84 million, or 45 cents, a year earlier. ITT shares fell $1.09 to $59.51 as oft 4:02 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Failure to Safeguard Data

The export-control case is being investigated by the Pentagon's Defense Criminal Investigative Service, the State Department's trade controls office and the Department of Homeland Security's Immigration and Customs Enforcement. The probe began in 2002.

The case involves the failure of ITT to safeguard technical data on the manufacture and characteristics of the night-vision devices used by the U.S. military, according to the people familiar with the probe. The investigators suspect ITT technical data was illegally transferred to China between 2001 to 2005 by a Singapore-based subcontractor, the people said.

John Schoeneweis, the senior resident agent for the Richmond Office of the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, declined to comment, saying the case was ``an open investigation."

Heidi Coy, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Roanoke, declined to comment.

The company said in a statement in December and repeated today that it was taking a $25 million charge in connection with the investigation. That money, plus other reserves, would cover a settlement ``resolving all outstanding issues relating to this investigation that began several years ago," the company said.

``ITT is committed to having a world-class compliance culture," Chief Executive Officer Steven Loranger said in the Dec. 15, statement. ``We are working diligently with the government to resolve this matter by early next year."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

As Officers Stop And Frisk, Residents Raise Their Guard (NYT)

By Trymaine Lee

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

At 14, Rocky Harris knows the routine: You raise your hands high, you keep your mouth shut and you don't dare move a muscle.

Then the police officer's gloved hands go up and down each leg, around your waist, across your chest and back, then down your shoulders to your wrists.

When they don't find guns or drugs, Rocky said, they let you go. He said that he had been searched, fruitlessly, at least three times since last summer, and that he had friends who had been searched repeatedly.

"They tell you that you're selling drugs. But I don't do nothing wrong. I just play ball," he said, walking through the Red Hook East housing development in Brooklyn yesterday morning, headed to a community center for a game of basketball.

On Friday, the New York Police Department released a report showing that police officers stopped 508,540 people on city streets in 2006, an average of 1,393 a day and quintuple the number from 2002. While it was difficult to find a consensus on the significance of those statistics — good patrolling, overly aggressive officers and more faithful recordkeeping are just a few explanations — it was not hard yesterday in Red Hook to find a handful of that number walking around.

DOJ_NMG_0127366

More than half of those stopped, and sometimes frisked, by the police were black. The Red Hook projects have a large black population, a history of crime problems and, at least in a few young men, a wariness of the police.

Mikel Jamison, 32, said that "he came up in these Brooklyn streets," and that it is "hard being an African-American, hard to live and walk down the street without the police harassing us."

Mr. Jamison said some young men bring the unwanted attention of police on them, "with their pants down to their ankles and drugs in their pockets." He then urged that he and this reporter keep their voices down because "some of the dealers, they're out here right now."

But he said he blames police practices like the stop-and-frisks for tension between the community and the police. He said many officers might want to stop crime in the community, but many cannot discern between common criminals and the common people who live among them.

After having a police officer jam a gun in his chest a few years ago, in an incident he said he would rather not discuss, Mr. Jamison said he converted to Islam and is now more conscious of the way the community is affected by such police actions.

Anthony James, 28, who works for a large sanitation company and, as such, often keeps late hours, said the police frequently stop him as he leaves or comes home. He said that the stops had become such a problem that he has taken to carrying his work identification badge home to prove to the police that he has a job and is not selling drugs.

"You see where you're standing. This is the Red Zone," he said, mapping with his hands a section of the projects from Columbia Street to Clinton Avenue. "This is the war zone. If they catch you in here alone they're going to stop you. And they'll play mind games with you. Ten minutes after searching you, they'll come back by, just staring."

Mr. James, who said his "bad-boy days" are behind him, said officers doing the stops will say that the basis of the stops is that people are coming out of known "drug buildings."

"But we live here. I put my 7-year-old son to bed here. We have grandmas and old ladies up in here. This ain't just a drug building, this is home," he said. "It's serious and dangerous out here, and they wonder why some people want to pull out their guns and start blasting."

Dorothy Shields, 74, has served as president of the tenants association at the Red Hook East housing development for 33 years, and said she believes the issue is less about people being picked on by the police, and more about a new generation of young people who do not have respect for authority, or their neighbors for that matter.

Ms. Shields said she doubted some of the reports of overaggressive patrolling. "Some of them young men are not telling the truth about the police officers," she said. "A lot of them feel they should be able to do anything they want do, wherever and whenever they want to."

Ms. Shields said she thinks frisks, at least in her neighborhood, are happening but not as much as some suggested.

"Some people just don't care for the police, no matter how right or wrong they are," she said.

At a press conference outside police headquarters yesterday, representatives of black and Hispanic officers' groups called the data damning, and renewed calls for Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly to step down.

"These numbers substantiate what we've been saying for years," said Noel Leader, a co-founder of 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care. "The New York Police Department under Raymond Kelly is actively committing some of the grossest forms of racial profiling in the history of the New York Police Department."

The Police Department said that officers stop people only if they are suspected of committing a crime, and that the practice is vital in getting guns off the streets. About 21,000 of the stops ended in arrests and about 29,000 in summonses.

"I think it is one tool," Deputy Police Commissioner Paul J. Browne said yesterday. "One law enforcement tool that is used to apply pressure. One of many."

Responding to complaints of profiling, the department noted that while 55.2 percent of those stopped were black, 68.5 percent of reported crimes involved suspects described as black.

Mr. Browne said he could not speak about patrolling in Red Hook with any authority, but that in general the increase in reported stop-and-frisks was a result of the more scrupulous recording of such stops.

"I think some of the individuals who have been critical of the department in the past will be critical of the department for this as well," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127367

At the community center in Red Hook where Rocky Harris had gone to play basketball, a 50-year-old man named Stanley, who is a big brother of sorts at the center, was shooting pool.

When asked if he had been stopped and frisked by the police, Stanley, who said he did not want his last name published, said, "I'm an old man now, and they don't bother me one bit. It's the youth that they're after. Not me."

Officer In Louima Case Returns To State To Finish Sentence (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

A former police officer convicted of perjury in the 1997 assault on Abner Louima, a case that scarred both the city's race relations and its police force for years, has been released from prison to a halfway house in upstate New York, his lawyer said yesterday.

The officer, Charles Schwarz, 41, was released from a minimum-security facility on a former Air Force base in Duluth, Minn., more than two months ago, said the lawyer, Ronald Fischetti. Mr. Schwarz is expected to complete the remainder of his five-year sentence in May.

"I talked to him five minutes ago," Mr. Fischetti said in a telephone interview yesterday. "His frame of mind is excellent because he knows he only has a few more months, and he can take his wife and child and move and put this episode behind him completely."

Mr. Fischetti would not disclose the location of the halfway house but said Mr. Schwarz's wife, Andra, and 2-year-old son, William, lived nearby.

Mr. Schwarz "plans to relocate in a different area and doesn't plan to come back to the city," Mr. Fischetti said, because of unwanted press attention.

"He's looking for opportunities in the northern area of the country" outside law enforcement, Mr. Fischetti said. "Something outdoors, maybe carpentry."

Mr. Schwarz's release was first reported yesterday in The Daily News.

In August 1997, Mr. Louima, a Haitian immigrant arrested after a nightclub disturbance, was beaten in a police station's bathroom by an officer who then sodomized him with a broomstick. The officer, Justin A. Volpe, later pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 30 years in prison.

Mr. Louima has contended that there was a second officer in the bathroom, Mr. Schwarz. Mr. Schwarz has denied the allegation, and Mr. Volpe also said Mr. Schwarz was not there.

After a tangled path through the courts — a conviction was reversed and two juries were hung — Mr. Schwarz agreed not to appeal a perjury conviction and was sentenced to the federal prison camp.

"The worst that Chuck did is that he saw Mr. Volpe walking Mr. Louima toward the bathroom, and when he was asked about that, a cop being a cop, he said he didn't remember it," Mr. Fischetti said.

Mr. Louima, who now lives in South Florida, could not be reached for comment yesterday. He sued the city and accepted an $8.75 million settlement in 2001.

At a March 2006 hearing on Mr. Schwarz's sentence, Judge Reena Raggi said that he had failed to accept responsibility for lying to protect other officers, including Mr. Volpe. She told Mr. Schwarz she was convinced that there had been another officer in the bathroom, and that "it was either you, which I think is highly probable — in fact, I think it's more than highly probable — or it was someone else."

Taser Task Force Will Get To See Weapon's Effects (MERCN)

By S.I. Wykes

The San Jose Mercury News, February 4, 2007

The members of the Palo Alto Taser Task Force, beginning their journey toward a decision about whether stun guns should be a part of any police officer's equipment in the city, will get as close as they can Tuesday to test-driving the experience.

Part of Palo Alto Police Chief Lynne Johnson's presentation will include videos of people being shocked with a stun gun.

These videos were taken in real-life situations by other police agencies, Johnson said.

DOJ_NMG_0127368

At last week's meeting, Johnson told the panel that the presentation would include a live Taser stunning of a volunteer from the police department.

Some members of the task force balked at the idea, not wanting to be directly responsible for a deliberate infliction of pain, so Johnson changed to the video format.

But she held fast to the idea that if the task force is going to educate itself as wholly as possible, the use of a stun gun is important to see.

``It is painful. It is an unpleasant experience, but hopefully, after our presentation, people will understand the myths and misconceptions and misunderstandings'' about such weapons, she said.

Santa Clara County Deputy District Attorney Jay Boyarsky is on the task force and knows that even just watching a video will not be a welcome sight. He compared it to what juries must sometimes go through when hearing cases involving child molestation or rape. ``It's scarring and unpleasant,'' he said, ``but it is done in the service of the greater good.''

It will not be an easy job. Taser use has generated many questions about how dangerous it is and under what circumstances it is used.

In November, the family of a Fresno man, who died after being stunned by San Jose police, filed a federal lawsuit claiming he was the victim of excessive and unreasonable force. The Santa Clara County coroner included the use of the Taser and pepper spray as a contributing factor in the man's death -- one of the first times that has happened in Santa Clara County.

More than a quarter-million Tasers are in use by police departments nationwide and justified as a control method far less lethal than a gun.

The San Jose Police Department was the first in the Bay Area to use the weapon. Other Taser-carrying departments now include Gilroy, Fremont, Morgan Hill, Belmont, San Bruno, San Mateo and San Mateo County SWAT teams.

The Taser inflicts five seconds of 50,000 volts of electricity, and its effect on the body is not completely predictable. The American Civil Liberties Union and Amnesty International have been lobbying hard for its use to be suspended.

The ACLU recently asked the San Jose City Council to produce a report on stun-gun incidents. The city gave Tasers to its officers in 2004, and five months after its institution released a summary of its use, but has not done so yet for 2005.

The U.S. Justice Department is reviewing its use and researchers at Wayne State University in Indiana are applying biomedical engineering to determine if a stun gun can be made safer by lessening its power.

The Palo Alto Task Force includes a physician, a public defender, a mediator, a nurse, two members of the city's Human Relations Commission, a rabbi, a member of the NAACP, a city attorney, a Palo Alto police captain and the attorney hired by the department to act as its auditor.

The group expects to have a recommendation to make to the city council this spring.

IF YOU'RE INTERESTED

The task force will meet at 6 p.m. in the meeting room of the city's Art Center, 1313 Newell Road.

Curb Cuts: Going With The Flow Easier For All (MCT)

By Frank Greve, McCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

McClatchy Newspapers, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — The barricades that quadriplegic Ed Roberts and his comrades stormed nearly 40 years ago were a few inches high. Yet today, millions of Americans pass daily through the breaches they created.

Curb cuts, the breaches are called. Or curb ramps.

Since 1990, the Americans with Disabilities Act has required them in construction, renovation and wherever a city does major street or sidewalk work. All this curb-ramp building has helped the United States lead the world when it comes to providing public access for people with disabilities.

"For all this country's many faults, one thing we do better than anybody is architectural-barrier removal," said Mary Lou Breslin, the co-founder and senior policy adviser of the Disability Rights Education and Defense Fund, based in Berkeley. By her estimate, more than 60 countries are trying to catch up.

DOJ_NMG_0127369

Curb ramps also are a boon for bicyclists, stroller-pushers, skateboarders and in-line skaters. They're a help, too, for travelers with wheeled luggage and delivery truckers with hand carts.

In fact, nine out of 10 unencumbered pedestrians will veer off course to take advantage of a curb ramp, according to Jim Terry, an architect specializing in accessible design who studied pedestrian behavior at a shopping mall in Sarasota, Fla.

Roberts, quadriplegic because of polio, had none of this in mind when he enrolled at the University of California at Berkeley in 1962.

His dorm — and that of a dozen other students with severe disabilities who joined him over the next few years — was Cowell Hospital, high on a hill on the eastern end of the campus.

"I had to plan my classes so that each was downhill from the former one," recalled Michael Pachovas, who got around campus in an ineffectual powered wheelchair called a Motorette. "At the end of the day, I'd hitch rides with people or ask them to push me back uphill."

City of Berkeley was first?

Roberts and his cadre were determined to escape Cowell Hospital and live off campus.

"They were adults, living in a hospital with nursing charts and dating patterns being recorded (visitors, in other words), and it was no way to live," recalled activist Ken Stein, now a program administrator for the Mayor's Office on Disability in San Francisco.

Roberts, by then a graduate student, was the first to escape, but found himself confronting obstacles to independence at every street corner. Unassisted wheelchair users in those days would wheel to driveways at alleys or loading docks, then roll along in the street to the next driveway that tended in the right direction. It was slow, it wasn't always possible and it was often dangerous.

An ally of Roberts, Hale Zukas, persuaded the city of Berkeley's public works department in 1969-70 to create some cement curb ramps at intersections on Telegraph Avenue just south of the campus. Although two Illinois campuses had poured some curb ramps in the '50s, Berkeley's are thought to be the first built by a city government to promote independent living for people in wheelchairs.

Within a year, Roberts and Berkeley's other students with disabilities — by then politically charged enough to call themselves the Rolling Quads — were demanding curb ramps faster than the city's permitting procedure could provide them.

"We had a Wednesday night poker game in those days, and a lot of good ideas came up over those games," recalled Pachovas, 58. "One night, we decided to put in some curb ramps on our own after the game.

"A couple of our attendants did construction work, so they had access to cement, and I had a wheelbarrow."

They set out sometime after midnight.

"We didn't cut curbs; we just added skirts to existing curbs," Pachovas said. "The police threatened to arrest us, but they didn't."

The early results were crude. "You needed a running start to get up them, and going down, you could end up on your head in the street," Breslin said.

It didn't take long, however, to see how much the ramps enhanced mobility.

Curb ramps are crucial to independence for people who use wheelchairs, according to architect Bill Hecker of Hecker Design Ltd. in Birmingham, Ala., a specialist in access for people with disabilities.

Most wheelchair users rely on public transportation and need to cross several streets between their homes and the nearest mass transit stop, Hecker said.

"If you take out the curb ramp, which is the key link between the two, you've taken a huge, huge chunk out of accessibility," he said.

It's unclear how many ramps are in existence or how much they've cost. The simplest single curb ramp runs about $900, according to Hecker. As a rule, cities put them in when it's convenient or when the Justice Department convinces them that they must.

Among the most accessible cities, disabled-rights activists say, are Portland, Ore.; Sacramento; Chicago; Kansas City, Mo.; and, of course, Berkeley, where Roberts died in 1995 at the age of 55.

DOJ_NMG_0127370

The chair that he took his curbs in is now in the Smithsonian Institution's National Museum of American History in Washington.

Outside the museum, all the corners are ramped, enabling what Breslin described as "the seamless inclusion of people with disabilities into the mainstream."

Felts: Seizure Of Home In '03 Violated Rights (MONNS)

By Johnny Gunter and Stacy Temple

Monroe (LA) News-Star, February 4, 2007

Another volley has been fired in the dispute between the Ouachita Parish Sheriff's Office and some of its former deputies.

Former deputy Stan Felts said he has filed a federal civil rights complaint against Lt. Mike Rowlan and Chief Deputy Joe Davis.

Felts was a 16-year employee of the Sheriff's Office and headed up the department's Special Crimes Apprehension Team before resigning Jan. 4 with the rank of sergeant. His resignation came in the middle of an Internet scandal that accuses the department of corruption. The complaint alleges that Davis and Rowlan, who has been the major target of the Internet postings, conspired under color of the law to deprive Felts and his wife of their civil rights to privacy.

The complaint states that Rowlan, under Davis' direction, tried in July 2003 to remove a personal computer from Felts' western Ouachita Parish residence without probable cause or without trying to obtain a search warrant.

Felts' federal filing follows a lawsuit filed Jan. 25 by Rowlan naming three former deputies — Gene Caviness, Jacob Greer and Todd Newton — claiming defamation, invasion of privacy and Internet stalking. The postings on the Copwatch.com Web site accuse Rowlan of illegal activity and accuse Sheriff Richard Fewell of covering up for him. Rowlan works with Metro Narcotics Unit, and the postings on Copwatch.com revealed his identity by showing his driver's license photo and even his home address.

Only Greer was employed by the department at the time of the Internet postings and was fired after an internal investigation revealed he passed along his personal identification number to Newton so Newton could enter the Thinkstream law enforcement information center. Newton had left the Sheriff's Office for a job with the West Monroe Police Department.

Caviness was working with the FBI Task Force through his employment with the East Carroll Parish Sheriff's Office. After the internal investigations by the Sheriff's Office and West Monroe police, Caviness resigned his job with FBI Task Force but still works with the East Carroll Sheriff's Office.

Even though he passed a polygraph test that showed he wasn't participating in the Internet postings on Copwatch.com, Felts was demoted to deputy and reassigned to the department's work-release program. He said the demotion resulted in an approximate $350-a-month cut in pay.

Felts, who is now employed by the Sterlington Police Department, said he did not file any complaints when the incident occurred because he feared for his job. He said at that time he still supported the sheriff and that the next election was upcoming.

"I am now coming forward with this information because I am no longer under threat of termination by exposing it and that his (Rowlan's) criminal actions ... must be dealt with," Felts wrote in his letter to the FBI, a copy of which he furnished to The News-Star.

The FBI's Monroe office referred The News-Star to the New Orleans office for confirmation of receipt of the complaint. Public Information Special Agent Sheila Thorne would not confirm nor deny receipt of the complaint. She did say such civil rights complaints are passed on to the U.S. Attorney's Office and the Justice Department to determine if such cases are to be pursued.

According to written reports and notes received from the Sheriff's Office, Felts had been running intelligence for almost a year on a white supremacist living in the Calhoun area with the approval of Maj. Royce Toney, head of investigations.

Meanwhile, Rowlan apparently became aware of the white supremacist and mentions in notes on the incident that local FBI Special Agent Niki Allen asked him to gather intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0127371

Rowlan also admits in his notes that he did not follow the chain of command by letting his boss, Toney, know what he was doing. Rowlan also believed, because of things he was told, that Felts may have been involved with the white supremacist group, Aryan Nations.

In his complaint to the FBI, Felts states Rowlan's motive for attacking him may have been because (Rowlan) and another person were possibly involved with the supremacist group.

Rowlan called for Lt. James Purvis, Felts' immediate boss, and Felts to meet with him at his office at Metro Narcotics. Rowlan asked Felts if he would share the information he had gathered, and Felts agreed.

"When we left that meeting, Lt. Purvis asked me if I felt like I might be a part of the investigation, and I told him he was overreacting," Felts said.

Felts said he agreed to turn over his information to Rowlan and tried to do so the next day when Rowlan and other Metro Narcotics Unit agents showed up at his house.

The only information Felts could not give them were some e-mails that were lost when his computer crashed several months prior. Felts said he advised Rowlan that the e-mails from the white supremacist could be retrieved and was willing to let a technician come to his house and do so. He said Rowlan wanted to take the computer, and Felts did not like the accusatory tone taken by Rowlan. Felts told Rowlan the computer hard drive would not leave his house without a search warrant.

At this point, notes from Felts and Rowlan both state that Rowlan contacted Davis, and Rowlan was told to send Felts to his office to discuss the issue. Felts had to wait on his father to come to the house before leaving for Davis' office because he needed someone to watch his son.

In his notes, Rowlan said Davis asked him about getting a search warrant. Rowlan said he had contacted the FBI's Allen, and she advised against the search warrant because she did not want to reveal the agency's involvement in the intelligence gathering.

In his federal filing, Felts states that shortly after he left for Davis' office his wife returned home and that Rowlan "held his house" for nearly three hours. He explained that when officers have probable cause, they can "hold a house" to protect the evidence, giving them time to get a search warrant.

According to Felts' filing, Rowlan attempted to get a fellow Metro agent to write the search warrant, but that agent advised Rowlan he didn't have probable cause.

Rowlan left without a search warrant or the computer.

Fewell said that after he reviewed the facts of the case, he determined it occurred because of miscommunication among all the departments involved. The sheriff said he did not see where any laws or procedures were violated, so no disciplinary action was warranted.

Fewell said Rowlan was acting at his direct request.

Rowlan's notes only mention Davis and not Fewell.

Davis said Friday he was unaware of Felts' filing and that he would have no comment.

Harsh Accusations Intensify In L.I. State Senate Contest (NYT)

By Bruce Lambert

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

The already ferocious campaign to fill a State Senate seat on Long Island reached a new pitch yesterday with a mass mailing featuring Osama bin Laden, accusations of improper donations, and a request for federal monitors to guard against voter intimidation at the polls on Tuesday.

The contest has drawn intense statewide political attention because a Democratic victory would edge that party closer to controlling the Senate. Unions and other special interest groups are funneling money and workers into the contest, which could become New York's most expensive state legislative race.

Gov. Eliot Spitzer has taken a direct role by campaigning and filming a television commercial for the Democratic nominee, Craig M. Johnson. Equally determined to preserve their majority, top Republicans are marshalling their forces behind their candidate, Maureen O'Connell.

DOJ_NMG_0127372

Citing fears that Republicans will challenge the legitimacy of Democratic voters on Election Day to sway the outcome, the Democratic campaign formally asked the United States Department of Justice to dispatch monitors to polling places to prevent "voter intimidation" and voting delays.

"Independent federal monitors are critical to ensure a fair election," the request said. A Justice Department spokeswoman said the request was under review.

The Democrats cited past voting problems in the election district, in northwest Nassau County, and repeated incidents in last November's closely fought election for the Senate's 35th District in Westchester County, where the Democratic candidate, Andrea Stewart-Cousins, upset the longtime Republican incumbent, Nicholas A. Spano.

The Republican Party chairman for New York State and Nassau County, Joseph N. Mondello, said in an interview that he would "join in that request" for federal monitors. But he countered, "Perhaps that will help prevent the onslaught of people from New York City being bused here and trying to vote."

Democrats deny using such tactics and say that Republican operatives in Westchester challenged legitimate voters in Democratic areas in November, causing confusion, delays and discouragement.

In Nassau on Wednesday, Republican election officials sought to include forms for challenging voters in the kits prepared for polling place workers. The Democrats blocked the move, but there is nothing to stop Republican workers from taking the forms to the polls and using them.

Mr. Mondello served notice that his field workers would closely scrutinize voters. "Our poll watchers and election inspectors will challenge people to show some kind of identification as to who they are," he said. "They have a right to ask for identification to make sure you are John Smith. Our people have been cavalier about this in the past. This time, in this election, we're dearly concerned."

Among other last-minute issues, Ms. O'Connell's campaign sent out a flier on domestic security that featured a photograph of Osama bin Laden. And she was pictured with Michael A. L. Balboni, the popular Republican who held this seat until Governor Spitzer crossed party lines to appoint him as the new homeland security chief, thus creating the Senate vacancy.

Above Mr. Balboni's head in the leaflet is what appears to be the official seal of the State Office of Homeland Security. But it is slightly different from the real seal, and the homeland security office issued a rebuke: "It is completely inappropriate for a political candidate to use a falsified seal in the context of a political campaign. Politicizing security issues is inappropriate and trivializes the law enforcement efforts of New York's Office of Homeland Security."

The office also said that "such actions are arguably illegal" under the section of the state's criminal impersonation law regarding anyone who "wears or displays with authority any uniform, badge, insignia or facsimile thereof."

In another dispute, Mr. Mondello called for an investigation into whether Democrats effectively "purchased" the Working Families Party endorsement of Mr. Johnson. Mr. Mondello quoted a complaint from Chuck Pohanka, who calls himself the Working Families Party chairman in Suffolk County, that the statewide party received $225,000 from the Johnson campaign.

But the state party's executive director, Dan Cantor, denied the charge. He said that Mr. Pohanka led a small splinter group that did not represent the party in Suffolk but instead did the bidding of Republicans. He said Democratic donations helped finance Working Families operatives for Mr. Johnson, who knocked on the doors of 45,000 homes.

Final Push In Nassau State Senate Race (NSDY)

By Celeste Hadrick, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 4, 2007

Nassau's two major political parties begin their final campaign blitz Saturday in the hard-fought 7th Senate District race after Democrats on Friday called for federal poll monitors while a Republican mailing featuring Osama bin Laden and former Sen. Michael Balboni drew barbs.

The campaign manager for Democrat Craig Johnson, a Nassau legislator running against Republican County Clerk Maureen O'Connell in Tuesday's special election, faxed a request for federal monitors to the Justice Department, contending "there has been significant voter intimidation in previous elections within the 7th District."

DOJ_NMG_0127373

Democrats raised the issue of intimidation this week after Republicans requested that poll inspectors be supplied with voter challenge forms and validation oaths.

Nassau Republican Chairman Joseph Mondello said, "We welcome federal monitoring because it will prevent anyone from running people in from New York City who are not eligible to vote in Nassau County."

Mondello acknowledged he was "very concerned" that Democrats may bring in Queens residents to vote illegally in the district, which runs from Port Washington to Elmont and is bordered on the west by Queens. Democrats deny that.

A Justice Department spokeswoman said the agency is considering Johnson's request and will decide by Monday "if there is a factual and legal basis that warrants" monitors.

A new campaign flier that pairs O'Connell with Balboni, the district's former Republican senator who resigned to become the state's homeland security chief, hit mailboxes Friday.

It features a photo of bin Laden and states, "As long as New York and Tel Aviv are targets for terrorists, we need Maureen O'Connell protecting us in the Senate." Inside, there is a photo of O'Connell next to Balboni in front of a mock-up of the state Homeland Security seal.

Balboni said he has not endorsed any candidate and was not aware of the mailing. "To the extent that it implies that there is a governmental agency supporting the candidacy of anybody, that is incorrect and inappropriate," he said.

State homeland security office spokesman Dennis Michalski added in a statement, "It is completely inappropriate for a political candidate to use a falsified state seal in the context of a political campaign."

National Jewish Democratic Council also blasted the mailing. "This is a desperate and shameful attempt to try to use Israel as a wedge issue," said deputy executive director David Goldenberg.

O'Connell spokesman Mike Arens called both complaints "a smokescreen" to deflect allegations by Suffolk County Working Families Chairman Chuck Pohanka that Johnson bought the party's nomination through contributions. Pohanka requested a federal investigation.

State Working Families Chairman Dan Cantor dismissed the Pohanka complaint "as a political hit job by a Republican Party that's using this guy."

Meanwhile, Mondello expects 800 Republicans to rally this morning at the Williston Park American Legion hall to begin a walk-through of the district, visiting the houses of all Republican, Independence and Conservative party members, while Democratic Chairman Jay Jacobs said 800 to 1,000 of his party's workers will be out knocking on Democrats' doors.

Albany bureau chief Errol A. Cockfield Jr. contributed to this story.

Iraq's Shadow Widens Sunni-Shiite Split In U.S. (NYT)

By Neil MacFarquhar

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

DEARBORN, Mich. — Twice recently, vandals have shattered windows at three mosques and a dozen businesses popular among Shiite Muslims along Warren Avenue, the spine of the Arab community here.

Although the police have arrested no one, most in Dearborn's Iraqi Shiite community blame the Sunni Muslims.

"The Shiites were very happy that they killed Saddam, but the Sunnis were in tears," Aqeel Al-Tamimi, 34, an immigrant Iraqi truck driver and a Shiite, said as he ate roasted chicken and flatbread at Al-Akashi restaurant, one of the establishments damaged over the city line in Detroit. "These people look at us like we sold our country to America."

Escalating tensions between Sunnis and Shiites across the Middle East are rippling through some American Muslim communities, and have been blamed for events including vandalism and student confrontations. Political splits between those for and against the American invasion of Iraq fuel some of the animosity, but it is also a fight among Muslims about who represents Islam.

Long before the vandalism in Dearborn and Detroit, feuds had been simmering on some college campuses. Some Shiite students said they had faced repeated discrimination, like being formally barred by the Sunni-dominated Muslim Student Association from leading prayers. At numerous universities, Shiite students have broken away from the association, which has dozens of chapters nationwide, to form their own groups.

DOJ_NMG_0127374

"A microcosm of what is happening in Iraq happened in New Jersey because people couldn't put aside their differences," said Sami Elmansoury, a Sunni Muslim and former vice president of the Islamic Society at Rutgers University, where there has been a sharp dispute.

Though the war in Iraq is one crucial cause, some students and experts on sectarianism also attribute the fissure to the significant growth in the Muslim American population over the past few decades.

Before, most major cities had only one mosque and everyone was forced to get along. Now, some Muslim communities are so large that the majority Sunnis and minority Shiites maintain their own mosques, schools and social clubs. Many Muslim students first meet someone from the other branch of their faith at college. The Shiites constitute some 15 percent of the world's more than 1.3 billion Muslims, and are believed to be proportionally represented among America's estimated six million Muslims.

Sectarian tensions mushroomed during the current Muslim month of Muharram. The first 10 days ended on Tuesday with Ashura, the day when Shiites commemorate the death of Hussein, who was the grandson of the Prophet Mohammad and who was killed during the bloody seventh-century disputes over who would rule the faithful, a schism that gave birth to the Sunni and Shiite factions.

The Shiites and the Sunnis part company over who has the right to rule and interpret scripture. Shiites hold that only descendants of Mohammad can be infallible and hence should rule. Sunnis allow a broader group, as long as there is consensus among religious scholars.

Many Shiites mark Ashura with mourning processions that include self-flagellation or rhythmic chest beating, echoing the suffering of the seventh-century Hussein. As several thousand Shiites marched up Park Avenue in Manhattan on Jan. 28 to mark Ashura, the march's organizers handed out a flier describing his killing as "the first major terrorist act." Sunnis often dec ry Ashura marches as a barbaric, infidel practice.

Last year, a Sunni student at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor sent a screed against Ashura to the Muslim Student Association's e-mail message list. The document had been taken off SunniPath.com, one of many Web sites of Islamic teachings that Shiite students said regularly spread hate disguised as religious scholarship.

Azmat Khan, a 21-year-old senior and political science major, said that she, like other Shiites on campus, was sometimes asked whether she was a real Muslim.

"To some extent, the minute you identify yourself as a Shiite, it outs you," Ms. Khan said. "You feel marginalized."

Yet some Shiite students said they were reluctant to speak up because they felt that Islam was under assault in the United States, so internal tension would only undermine much-needed unity among Muslims. At the same time, the students said, the ideas used by some Sunnis to label Shiites as heretics need to be confronted because they underlie jihadi radicalism.

At the Ann Arbor campus, Shiite students set up a forum for all Muslims to discuss their differences, but no Sunnis who had endorsed the e-mail message about Ashura showed up, and the group eventually disbanded.

Trying to ease tensions, the Muslim Student Association this year invited a prominent Shiite cleric to speak.

"I don't want Shiite students to feel alienated," said Nura Sediqe, the president of the Ann Arbor student group. "But the dominant group never sees as much of a problem as the minority."

At the University of Michigan's campus in Dearborn, the Muslim association pushed through rules that effectively banned Shiites from leading collective prayers.

Apart from a greater veneration among Shiites for the Prophet's descendants, there are slight variations in practice. Shiites, for example, pray with their hands at their sides, while Sunnis cross them over their chests.

"Most Sunni Muslims can't pray behind a Shiite because if you are praying differently from the way the leader is, then it doesn't work, it's not valid," said Ramy Shabana, the president of the association on the Dearborn campus.

Shiite students at various universities said they faced constant prejudice. Some Sunni students have refused to greet Shiites with "Salamu aleikum," or "Peace be upon you," to slight them.

At Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, Salmah Y. Rizvi, a junior who stocked a reading room with Islamic texts, said the Muslim Student Association there told her to remove them because too many were by Shiite authors.

DOJ_NMG_0127375

Students have also taken note of attacks on their faith from the broader world through the Internet. One YouTube video showed Catholics bleeding by crucifying themselves and then showed Shiites bleeding through self-flagellation, as the Arabic voiceover suggested that Shiites were more Catholic than Muslim.

Not all campuses have been affected. Some, like Georgetown University and Cornell University, were considered oases of tolerance.

At Rutgers University, the tension started last year after 15 to 20 conservative Sunni students began openly mocking Shiites, and considered barring women from leading the student association. "They felt it was time to correct individuals within the organization, cleansing the beliefs of the students," said Mr. Elmansoury, who opposed the rift.

Several students involved said the group was heavily influenced by teachings from Saudi Arabia. The puritanical Wahhabi sect there holds that Shiite reverence for the Prophet's family smacks of idolatry.

Shiite advocates believe that that thinking has influenced some mainstream American Muslim organizations like the Islamic Society of North America and the Council on American Islamic Relations, which they said were slow to criticize attacks against Shiites abroad until the violence in Iraq escalated. As a consequence, Shiites founded their own national lobbying organizations.

Both organizations denied that they disregarded Shiite issues.

Still, some Muslims said that prejudices had continued.

After Saddam Hussein's execution Dec. 30, one Sunni cleric near Dearborn reportedly gave a sermon concluding that the Prophet Mohammad forgave his enemies, so why couldn't certain people in Iraq?

Much of the Middle East tension stems from the sense that Shiite power is growing, led by Iran. The grisly video of Mr. Hussein's execution, with his Shiite executioners mocking him, fanned the flames.

"As a Shiite, I was taking in this event very differently from the Sunnis," said Shenaaz Janmohamed, a graduate student at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. "In a lot of ways Saddam has become this martyr figure who sort of represents Shiite unruliness."

It is not the first time Shiite-Sunni tensions have spilled over into the West. Britain has experienced periodic outbursts for years. Stabbings and other violence between Sunni and Shiite prisoners in New York state jails prompted a long-running lawsuit by Shiite inmates seeking separate prayer facilities.

Some Muslims worry that the friction might erupt in greater violence in the United States. Others, in both camps, think the tension could prove healthy, forcing American Muslims to start a dialogue about Muslim differences.

With Jails Full, California Eyes Other States (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Feb. 3 (AP) — As many as 5,000 California convicts will be transferred out of state to ease an overcrowding crisis in the state prison system, the top corrections official said Friday.

"We are severely overcrowded, and the need for more space is absolutely critical," James E. Tilton, the secretary of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, said in a statement. "This decision is being made to protect public safety."

In December, a federal judge warned that he would start releasing inmates early or prohibit convicts from being sent to state prisons from county jails unless the state acted immediately to ease overcrowding.

The threat followed an executive order signed by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in October authorizing voluntary and involuntary transfers of up to 5,000 inmates. At the time, a survey found that nearly 20,000 inmates were willing to be sent voluntarily to other states.

Since then, however, only about 380 inmates have volunteered, despite a marketing campaign by the corrections department that included videos showing inmates in better conditions in out-of-state prisons. In one video, a former California inmate boasts about having television selections that include ESPN.

California's 33 state prisons are designed to hold 100,000 inmates but currently house about 174,000. About 16,000 inmates sleep in gymnasiums, hallways and other common areas filled with beds.

DOJ_NMG_0127376

"We will continue to seek volunteer inmates who are willing to serve their sentences in other states," Mr. Tilton said. "But we also will begin to move inmates involuntarily so that they are no longer sleeping in gymnasiums, day rooms and other inappropriate areas of the prisons."

The first transfers could start within days, although administrative appeals by inmates could delay some for up to 10 weeks.

Prison guards fear some inmates will turn violent if forced to transfer.

"This is lighting a match to an already tense powder keg," said Lance Corcoran, spokesman for the California Correctional Peace Officers Association.

But the pressure from the court is forcing the state to act, Mr. Tilton said. "We have tension now, and every day we don't move inmates, it just gets worse."

Private prisons in Mississippi, Arizona and Oklahoma are likely to get transfers.

Lawsuits have left federal courts in charge of various aspects of California prisons, with overcrowding at the root of many of the system's problems.

ANTITRUST:

Letters Of Ill Repute (SLPD)

By Rachel Melcer, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 4, 2007

Biotech crop giant Monsanto Co.'s proposed purchase of the nation's largest cottonseed company is alarming some farmers and agribusiness competitors — but Charles Martin isn't one of them.

Martin said he doesn't know how a letter opposing the deal, bearing his name, address and purported signature, was sent to a U.S. senator by a former congressional colleague as part of a lobbying campaign.

The letter identifies Martin as a longtime family farmer. "Somebody is using my name falsely," said Martin, a retired mechanical engineer from Hawkinsville, Ga. "I've never farmed. … I can't even raise dust."

The letter is one part of varied efforts aimed at derailing Creve Coeur-based Monsanto's plan to buy Delta & Pine Land Co. of Scott, Miss., for $1.5 billion. Opponents say the acquisition would give Monsanto too much control over American cotton.

Some opponents are pushing for congressional hearings on the deal, which Washington observers say are unlikely. Letter-writing campaigns are sparking interest among states' attorneys general; 32 have requested information from Monsanto. Staff at a Minneapolis public-relations firm are e-mailing appeals for an outcry in regions where no cotton is planted.

"There's a level at which this is just the way the game is played, by getting hearings and building pressure from stakeholders. … [It's] political hardball," said Jarol Manheim, a professor of media and public affairs and of political science at George Washington University School of Media in Washington.

However, "the letters from people who didn't write them — if that happens, that's clearly unethical," Manheim said.

Thomas Susman, a lawyer who is chairman of the professional ethics and standards committee of the American League of Lobbyists, said doing so "is never a standard or usual practice — period. Certainly not for lobbyists, whose reputation is their stock [in] trade."

Monsanto already provides — and profits from — genetic traits that last year protected nearly 86 percent of the U.S. cotton crop from worms, herbicide or both, according to data from the Agriculture Department.

If Monsanto buys D&PL and fulfills a related promise to sell its own Stoneville cottonseed business, Monsanto's share of the U.S. cottonseed market will jump to nearly 50 percent, up from about 12 percent. In a half-dozen Southern states where D&PL is the preferred brand, that market share would top 85 percent.

The combined company would control both valuable parts of the cottonseed market — the natural germplasm, or inherited traits that make particular hybrid seeds valuable, plus the genetic traits that are added to protect those seeds from herbicide and pests.

The annual cotton crop is worth about $4.7 billion to farmers, according to the National Cotton Council, a trade group.

Deal involves 'big players'

"There's a lot of money involved. There are some big players in this" and that is attracting attention, said Layne Lindebak, an assistant attorney general in the Farm Division of Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller's office.

Lindebak's division is coordinating a review of the deal's competitiveness on behalf of more than a dozen states' attorneys general — a role it has taken in other farm-related mergers due to its experience in agriculture and antitrust issues.

The Iowa attorney general generally is concerned with maintaining open agricultural markets, even when it comes to a crop unconnected with the state, such as cotton, Lindebak said. He said the interest of his office has nothing to do with the headquarters of agribusiness Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc. in Des Moines.

"It's not like we play favorites for the neighborhood guy," he said. "They're obviously big enough to play on their own without our little help, if they want to. They've got more resources than we do."

Indeed, Pioneer is taking an active role. "We are telling our side of the story," said Doyle Karr, the company's spokesman.

The Monsanto—D&PL deal "is anti-competitive, and we have concerns about the impact it would have on farmers and the ag industry — and on consumers, ultimately," Karr said.

To make that point in Washington, Pioneer hired Tim Hutchinson, a former senator who is now a lobbyist. He is a Republican from Arkansas who is associated with Dickstein Shapiro LLP, a law firm in Washington with which Pioneer's parent, DuPont, has a long-term relationship.

Hutchinson declined to detail his efforts. But in an e-mail response to a request for an interview, he wrote: "Our client, DuPont, and others do not believe that Monsanto's proposed acquisition of Delta & Pine Land is conducive to fair competition and farmers' choice. We believe the acquisition should be rejected by federal and state regulators."

Letters to a senator

One federal official on the receiving end of Hutchinson's communication is Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., who until this year was chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee; he now is the ranking minority member.

Chambliss' office received an e-mail on Dec. 29 from Hutchinson containing seven letters apparently written by Georgia constituents in opposition to the Monsanto—D&PL deal, said the senator's spokeswoman, Erin Hamm. Two of those letters were addressed to Chambliss and the remainder to Georgia Attorney General Thurbert Baker; the latter group included the one purportedly written by Martin.

Baker's office could not confirm receiving any from that bundle, though it has received about a dozen others expressing concern about the Monsanto deal, said spokesman Russ Willard.

Of the seven letters e-mailed by Hutchinson, two others are suspect: One sent by Virginia Adams of Adams Farm, a self-pick strawberry-and-produce operation in Fayetteville, Ga., who said she has not written any letters about Monsanto; the other bore the purported signature of Georgia State Rep. Terry England.

When England learned of its existence, he fired off a letter on Jan. 3 to clear the air with Chambliss. "I received a copy of the letter on my House of Representatives letterhead bearing a signature that is not mine, making charges that I do not agree with," he wrote. A stance against Monsanto's acquisition of D&PL "is not, nor has it ever been, my position."

In an interview, England said his district includes just one cotton farm of about 50 acres — and that farmer plants neither Monsanto nor D&PL seed.

"I don't really have a dog in that fight," England said. "It's free enterprise and a free market. If two companies want to get together they ought to be allowed to, so long as the consumers … and farmers are protected from it being a complete monopoly."

England investigated the false letter and found that someone outside of his office, whom he would not identify, solicited it from a member of his staff, who mistakenly drafted it. "It was someone [here] doing what they thought I would want to be done, but obviously not," he said.

State legislator seeks letters

Among the genuine letters in the batch is one from Don Collins of Pike County, Ga., who raises pecans, not cotton. He said he is concerned about any business deal that limits competition. He said he wrote the letter at the request of a "good friend," Georgia state Sen. Ronnie Chance.

Douglas Dickens, a cotton farmer in Watkinsville, Ga., said he, too, sent a letter through Chance's office.

DOJ_NMG_0127378

Chance "owns a public relations firm that's been working on this and 100 other things," said England. Chance had brought up the Monsanto deal with England while talking as a state legislative colleague, he said.

Chance did not return calls seeking comment. Hutchinson said in an e-mail that he does not know Chance and has not worked with him. Hutchinson did not respond to questions about the letters he sent to Chambliss.

Meanwhile, on another front, staff at ASI Communications, a public-relations firm based in Minneapolis, have e-mailed farmers and agriculture leaders with personal appeals urging that opposition letters be written to officials such as state attorneys general.

In one such missive, addressed to "Dear Illinois Corn Grower," ASI also asks for a copy so it can be compiled "in the likely case that Monsanto be taken to court."

ASI declined to comment or to disclose its client.

Daryn McBeth, executive director of the Minnesota Agri-Growth Council, a St. Paul-based agriculture trade group, said he received an e-mail from ASI that he found strange on several levels:

•Monsanto as well as its competitors are members of his council.

•Minnesota is not a cotton-growing state.

•"And it's odd that I was getting this from ASI and they were putting themselves in the shoes of being concerned about this," rather than disclosing the letters are being sent on behalf of someone in the industry, McBeth said.

Farmers are concerned

While some communications about the Monsanto—D&PL deal may be suspect, the subject is raising concerns among some cotton farmers.

Dickens plants Monsanto's Roundup Ready cotton and said it is a valuable tool. But he worries about the increasing cost of Monsanto's technology and the power the company will have as owner of D&PL.

It's important that regulators take a close look at the deal, he said. "I want to be sure that it's done properly because Monsanto could corner the market. … I want to make sure research is continued into other kinds of chemicals and genetic traits."

The Arkansas Farm Bureau passed a resolution opposing the deal shortly after it was announced, and considered promoting a similar measure in January at the Beltwide Cotton Conference, a national meeting of the Cotton Council, said president Stanley Reed.

"We got [Monsanto's] attention," Reed said.

Monsanto representatives met with Arkansas farmers, as well as with others around the country, to listen to concerns and try to allay their fears. At the Beltwide conference, the company unveiled initiatives such as a crop-failure guarantee in certain states, funding for cotton research and more transparent pricing strategies.

As a result, the Arkansas Farm Bureau is less opposed to the Monsanto—D&PL deal, but still concerned about the need to ensure choices for farmers, Reed said.

Reed and his bureau have been lobbied by Monsanto competitors "and those companies have the same concerns that we have. But my response back to them is, 'If you don't like it, why don't you buy Delta & Pine Land?' Then we'd have more options and that's what we want. All they do is complain, but they don't want to rise to the occasion."

Efforts by Monsanto

Monsanto, like its competitors and nearly all corporations, employs lobbyists to promote its views among politicians and industry leaders. However, the company considers that a regular part of doing business and keeping open the lines of communication, regardless of any pending acquisition, said spokeswoman Lori Fisher.

"We feel like we've been addressing it from a business point of view, but some parties who are opposed to the deal seem to be politicizing the process," she said.

Monsanto has a lot at stake.

The company tried to buy D&PL once before, in 1998, but the acquisition fell apart when a Justice Department review dragged on.

DOJ_NMG_0127379

Since then, the cotton industry has changed and become more competitive; D&PL's U.S. cottonseed market share has dropped to about half from 71 percent. If the deal again falls through, Monsanto stands to pay D&PL a fee of up to $600 million.

"You just have to let the Department of Justice do their job," Fisher said. Monsanto hopes for a positive outcome and that the deal will close as soon as possible. In the meantime, the "noise level" being generated by opponents "is more disappointing and frustrating than anything," Fisher said.

Grinstein Stood Tall As Delta's Defender (AJC)

By Dave Hirschman, Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 4, 2007

At first glance, the battle for Delta Air Lines seemed likely to be a rout.

The youthful, dynamic executive team at US Airways seized the initiative last fall when it launched a surprise takeover bid that caught a wounded Delta off guard.

The group had already transformed a second-tier airline, the Tempe, Ariz.-based America West, into a major player by buying US Airways and taking its name a year earlier. By snatching Delta from bankruptcy court, 45-year-old Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker would get a tarnished gem and create the world's biggest airline in a single audacious stroke.

All that stood in the way was lame-duck Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein who, at 74, already planned to step down as soon as the Atlanta icon got out of bankruptcy court. He led a corps of untested executives who got their jobs when the previous executive team bailed out with controversial bonuses and protected pensions. Delta's 45,000-member work force had been battered by a string of layoffs, pay cuts and benefit reductions.

Grinstein vowed to resist the US Airways offer, but some wondered if the opposition would wilt. Many airline analysts — always eager to see fewer players in the fractious industry — thought the deal would be a long-awaited catalyst for consolidation.

"Wall Street declared us dead," said Ed Bastian, Delta's chief financial officer.

What neither US Airways nor Wall Street anticipated, however, was the high-spirited campaign Grinstein and Delta workers waged to defeat the merger proposal, which died last week when the airline's bankruptcy creditors refused to back it. Instead, they endorsed Delta's standalone reorganization plan, forcing Parker to abandon his $10 billion bid.

Delta's strategy took advantage of Grinstein's long experience as a smooth boardroom operator and persuasive leader, as well as workers' hunger for a positive cause to rally around.

It also benefited from the daunting obstacles that have long made large-scale airline mergers easier to talk about than pull off. While such deals may make financial sense, they are rarely popular with labor leaders, politicians or passenger advocates — and merger foes played those cards as well.

Creditors decide fate

With Delta in Chapter 11, the company's creditors — not its board or stockholders — got the final word on the US Airways proposal. The creditors are represented by a nine-member committee whose members included the biggest suppliers, banks and other groups with claims in Delta's bankruptcy case.

One of the members is Delta's pilots union, whose leaders vehemently opposed the merger. Jet maker Boeing, with close ties to both airlines, is also on board, as is the federal pension agency. But US Airways also had allies on the committee, including bond-trading firm MacKay Shields, which backed the takeover from the start.

Soon after US Airways' initial bid, Delta executives began holding daily 8:30 a.m. strategy meetings to plan and launch a broad counterattack.

Bastian was put in charge of two key fronts. One was finishing Delta's standalone reorganization plan, which laid out how the airline will leave bankruptcy and repay creditors. It also served as a counteroffer to the US Airways bid. Delta filed that plan in late December.

Bastian also arranged the financing Delta would need to make its standalone plan credible, and he pushed deals on various side issues with key creditors, including Boeing.

DOJ_NMG_0127380

Chief Operating Officer Jim Whitehurst, who oversees daily operations, was charged with making sure Delta met performance projections already given to creditors. He also dissected US Airways' proposal for antitrust issues, which Delta hoped would add to creditor doubts about whether the deal would fly with antitrust regulators.

Unlike most proposed or completed airline mergers that married complementary route networks, this one involved two carriers whose routes were centered along the Eastern Seaboard. Still, Parker exuded confidence that, in a post-9/11 landscape where older carriers faced extinction, regulators would approve such a deal.

Grinstein steps to front

Grinstein — a longtime Delta board member from Seattle who became CEO when Leo Mullin abruptly left at the end of 2003 — had preferred to put Bastian and Whitehurst out front as the bankruptcy case proceeded. But he took a leading role in the US Airways battle.

Charming and grandfatherly, the reluctant CEO had built a reserve of goodwill among many Delta employees despite the Chapter 11 filing and cutbacks. His first-year salary was $500,000, but he took only half. Usually mild-mannered, Grinstein bluntly set Delta's tone.

"No airline has ever been taken over in a hostile merger," he said in one meeting, "and we're not going to be the first." He termed US Airways "the worst of all potential merger partners."

It didn't take much to get Delta workers excited about the anti-merger campaign.

Bill Morey, who represents reservations workers on a Delta employee council, said he was inundated by e-mails after US Airways' bid.

"Everybody was asking, what are we doing [to fight it]?" he said. "People were just flabbergasted." Soon Morey's board was selling T-shirts and distributing buttons with the "Keep Delta My Delta" slogan.

Delta's pilots union, which had warred with management over two deep pay cuts negotiated since 2004, helped organize rallies and set aside $15 million to spend on anti-merger activities. Lee Moak, a scrappy former Marine Corps pilot who heads the union, relished his role as merger buster and likened Parker to fictional Wall Street raider Gordon Gekko.

By last week, Delta workers had collected more than 100,000 signatures from people backing their drive to remain independent. The continuous show of force was aimed at raising doubts among creditors that US Airways could smoothly integrate the larger airline.

"Airlines depend on their people to provide skilled labor and excellent customer service," aviation consultant Michael Boyd said. "They've got to be wholeheartedly on board for any merger to have a chance."

Playing political angles

Grinstein, who spent a chunk of his early career as a U.S. Senate staffer, personally worked the political angles. One of his first calls was to Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.).

Isakson had helped Delta pull off what many saw as an improbable victory last year by getting a bill approved that let the airline stretch out its pension funding obligations. That saved Delta's main pension plan from termination during the Chapter 11 case.

By contrast, US Airways had dumped its pension plans during an earlier bankruptcy case, adding $4.8 billion to the federal pension insurance agency's obligations. Isakson had his pitch as he lobbied colleagues to oppose the merger: If US Airways were to take control of Delta, would it turn around and abandon its pension obligations? Isakson said he contacted White House officials to make sure they understood how much both Republicans and Democrats objected to the deal.

"There wasn't anyone of any consequence that didn't know this was a big issue," he said.

Isakson also pushed for a Senate Commerce Committee hearing on the competitive effects of big airline mergers, which took place a few days before last week's deadline for a decision by the creditors.

Isakson introduced Grinstein, and the hearing room's walls were lined with uniformed Delta pilots. Hundreds of employees and retirees filled hallways outside. Parker and a few US Airways executives were also there but had no visible support among either spectators or senators.

"There is no question in my mind that the visibility of employees was a significant factor" in creating a political climate that was hostile to the transaction, Isakson said.

DOJ_NMG_0127381

The significance of that: While Congress plays no direct role in deciding airline mergers, the political opposition buttressed Delta's argument that anti-trust approval of the deal was anything but assured.

Down to the wire

Through it all, the creditors committee sent few public signals about its leanings. After Delta filed its standalone plan, the committee hired colorful ex-Continental Airlines Chief Executive Gordon Bethune — at $250,000 for 10 days' work — as an adviser. Bethune ran Continental during a time when it had repeated merger discussions with Delta, leading some to view the move as a positive sign for US Airways.

In early January, US Airways sweetened its cash-stock bid by about 20 percent, to around $10 billion.

But by mid-January the tide appeared to turn. A seemingly deflated Parker said in interviews that he'd had no response from the creditors to the sweetened bid.

The decision point came during a three-hour creditors committee meeting Tuesday in New York that was to end in a vote by secret ballot. That morning, Delta announced it had lined up six powerhouse Wall Street firms to supply $2.5 billion in exit financing for its standalone reorganization — a critical step.

But Delta also may have made a few concessions. It gave creditors the right to name more board members in the reorganized airline, as well as Grinstein's successor. It also agreed management's stake in the company will be between 2.6 percent and 4 percent — about half as big as what United Airlines' management got in that carrier's case.

The committee voted about 6 p.m., with an agreement that only the result — not the count — be revealed.

Delta prevailed.

The battle had lasted 77 days.

Boyd, the airline consultant, said Grinstein secured his legacy. "He wasn't trying to make a name for himself. He was trying to do the right thing for Delta. That counts for a lot."

Said Paul Lapides, director of Kennesaw State University's corporate governance center: "It was the first time in a very long time that rank-and-file workers had wanted to support their management."

Questions about Delta's future remain. The company still has to complete its restructuring and prove it can survive without the shield of bankruptcy protection. There's lingering speculation about other merger scenarios down the road.

But for now, the battle seems to have put air under the company's wings.

Wednesday night, a few hours after US Airways withdrew its bid, Delta officials symbolically relit the long dormant "Fly Delta Jets" sign atop the company's big hangar at Hartsfield-Jackson International Airport. Hundreds of employees watched as the retro neon lights — dark for years in an apparent cost-saving move — came to life.

Timothy Burns, a Delta mechanic attending the event, said years of hard times took a deep personal toll on many Delta workers. Some 25,000 jobs have been cut in the last six years.

"We all rode this horse to the ground," said Burns, 48, of Fayette County, "and now we're building it back up. We've been through hard times together. But I honestly believe the worst is over."

Cox Washington Bureau staff writer Marilyn Geewax contributed to this article.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

In Drill, CDC Practices For Influenza Pandemic (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

ATLANTA -- A 22-year-old Georgetown University swim team member just back from Indonesia eats dinner with his teammates but then develops a fever and doesn't accompany them to a meet in New York.

That is how a flu pandemic in the United States started.

A winter storm bears down on saltless and plowless Atlanta, closing schools and scaring commuters.

That is how it ended.

DOJ_NMG_0127382

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention held a pandemic "war game" here last week but aborted it at midnight Wednesday, halfway through its planned 24-hour run. The reason -- ironically, but perhaps not surprisingly -- was concern about public safety. CDC did not want a hundred of its most valuable employees rushing on Thursday morning over ice-slick roads to a mock disaster.

A real pandemic, which is considered inevitable, won't be stopped by weather, which in this case turned out to be mostly rain. In fact, it probably won't be stopped by anything. But public health experts believe it could be made less disastrous with practice and preparation.

For that reason, CDC's director, Julie L. Gerberding, who spent Wednesday facing nail-biting pseudo-decisions -- and made the real one to call things off -- was happy with half a pandemic.

"The long-frame view is that this was a tremendous success. We exercised, we learned and we are definitely committed to this process," she said when it was over.

The federal government is hard at work trying to ready the country for a global outbreak of a new, highly transmissible strain of influenza -- a pandemic. Such events occur at unpredictable intervals. There were three in the last century, in 1918-19, 1957 and 1968.

The H5N1 strain of avian influenza, or bird flu, has killed millions of birds and 164 people, mostly in Asia, since 2003. It does not pass from person to person efficiently. But it is highly lethal and still evolving; many experts believe it has the potential to cause a pandemic.

Last week's exercise was conducted by MPRI, an Alexandria-based consultant with a $7 million contract to help CDC plan for pandemic flu. Founded in 1987 as Military Professionals Resources Inc., the company is run principally by retired officers.

Horace G. "Pete" Taylor, a retired Army lieutenant general, led a team of 24 people who wrote the outbreak scenario, "injected" new information as the exercise ran, played the roles of non-CDC decision makers, and are now helping the agency analyze its performance. Taylor, 69, used to run war games at the Pentagon.

The exercise began Jan. 12 with e-mail traffic to CDC officials describing H5N1 flu activity in Indonesia. With six cases and five deaths in 2007, that country is currently the most active place for bird flu.

A week ago a fictional element appeared in the e-mails in the form of the Georgetown student's story. Two days before the exercise began, his virus was identified as H5N1. When the game began at 7:30 Wednesday morning, he was a few hours from dying and two of his housemates were down with the flu, its type not yet identified.

About a hundred people -- many in the Navy-like uniforms of the U.S. Public Health Service -- filled the CDC's emergency operations center, typing and clicking at benchlike workstations, milling and meeting as maps, presentations and video feeds filled screens at the front of the room.

The exercise sought to capture the elements that make outbreaks hazardous and decisions difficult.

For example:

The ill person came from a country with less-than-optimal disease surveillance and laboratory testing. Nobody was certain what the facts of the Indonesian outbreak were. Was there casual spread of the illness in Jakarta? Were there outbreaks in other parts of the country? These are not minor details. They help determine whether the World Health Organization -- with lots of CDC help -- will try to mount a mass distribution of antiviral drugs in a one-shot effort to snuff out the virus at its source.

A passenger on one of the student's flights had died in Chicago and another was sick in Baltimore. Was this just a coincidence? It was flu season, and regular influenza virus makes some people very sick -- killing some of them.

The number of people who might be incubating flu grew by the hour. Should the whole swim team be quarantined? How about all the other swim teams at the meet?

The federal government has 20 million doses of oseltamivir (Tamiflu). When should this stockpile be distributed to the states? At the first hint of a pandemic, when many doses might prevent cases but also be wasted? Or later, when the outbreak is confirmed and the drugs will go only to the ill, possibly saving their lives?

There were hints that the Georgetown student might not be the only source. A passenger on a flight from Singapore to Hawaii developed fever and "respiratory distress." Did he have some link to Indonesia? Should all flights from Asia be diverted to the 20-odd airports that can screen and quarantine passengers? Should CDC push to have people leaving certain countries be medically evaluated?

DOJ_NMG_0127383

And then there were the small annoyances.

The scenario said the student was "living in an on-campus dorm." But this was wrong. He lived in a rented house in Northwest with 10 people -- an error that gave headaches to the two cartographers who were marking satellite photos of the District -- all the places the "index patient" had been.

The exercise included a mock news conference. CDC media officers questioned Gerberding while four real reporters (from The Washington Post, the New York Times, the Associated Press and the Canadian Press) watched.

Gerberding ran two high-level meetings like an experienced college professor in a freshman seminar. She regularly summarized the avalanche of facts, cleared the air with concrete questions and demanded unambiguous answers from her advisers.

"We probably have to assume the worst," she said at one point, noting that even with woefully incomplete data from Indonesia it appeared that one-third of the people there with the flu were dying. Later, she asked: "So, do we agree there is strongly supporting evidence that we have a pandemic?" The senior staff agreed there was.

In the news conference, however, she avoided eye contact with reporters, emphasized uncertainty and concentrated on the paucity of facts. A news release quoted her as saying: "We have not yet seen sustained or repeated human-to-human transmission of H5N1. It's important for people to remember that one case does not mean that a pandemic has begun." She later admitted she hadn't had time to read the quotations attributed to her.

The game will pick up in April with an exercise in which pandemic flu has spread to many states. In a final round in May, the virus gets to Atlanta and takes out 40 percent of CDC's workforce.

It's unlikely there will be any snow to save them.

Can Washington Get Smart About Science? (LAT)

By Chris Mooney, Alan Sokal

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

By beginning to investigate the Bush administration's interference with scientists' work on global warming, the Democratic Congress has embarked on a key task: restoring respect for science — and more generally, for evidence and reason — in the federal government.

That we need such reform, and from Democrats, is a historic irony, because it's the Republicans who have often tried to paint themselves as defenders of "sound science" against ideologically motivated attacks.

In the 1990s, conservatives such as Dinesh D'Souza, Gertrude Himmelfarb and Roger Kimball wrote best-selling jeremiads attacking postmodernist academics who, they insisted, were taking over American universities and subverting the standards of scholarship. Although much exaggerated, this contained a grain of truth. Some self-described leftist academics did seem determined to reduce the real world to mere "discourse." No worldview, they insisted, could be considered objectively more valid or factual than any other. Even the findings of science were described as reflecting societal conditions and struggles for power and dominance rather than something true about the nature of the world.

One of us — Sokal — was sufficiently disturbed by these trends to try an unorthodox experiment: write a parody of postmodern science criticism to see whether a trendy academic journal would accept it as a serious scholarly article. Asserting up front that "physical 'reality' [note the scare quotes] … is at bottom a social and linguistic construct," Sokal averred that the latest conceptions of quantum gravity support deconstructive literary theory, Lacanian psychoanalysis, "postmodernist epistemology" and, of course, progressive politics. The cultural-studies journal Social Text ate it up.

After Sokal revealed his hoax in the magazine Lingua Franca, a debate exploded about the nature of science and rationality, popularly known as the "science wars." It pitted scientists and their staunch defenders within and outside of the academic community — spanning the political spectrum from left to right — against a band of intellectuals from the humanities, virtually all of them situated on the left.

DOJ_NMG_0127384

Sokal took on his postmodernist colleagues because he feared that the rejection of a rigorous, evidence-based standard for assessing claims of purported fact would disarm us not only in the face of quack medical remedies or alleged paranormal occurrences, but also when confronted by distortions of scientific information having major public-policy implications. A classic example is the tobacco industry's well-documented campaign to sow doubts about the health risks of smoking. Another is the interminable push by religious fundamentalists to undermine the teaching of evolution in American schools.

As these cases suggest, attacks on science by ideologues and special interests have a long history in this country. A stance of postmodernist relativism — or, on the part of the media, of giving "equal time" to unequally substantiated viewpoints — weakens us in the face of such strategic campaigns to undercut well-established knowledge.

But the abuse of science has lately materialized in an even more disturbing form, this time within the corridors of our own government. Driven by the Bush administration and its congressional allies, the new American "science wars" have reached an alarming stage.

HOW AND WHY did the science wars move out of academia and reemerge in Washington, with political poles reversed? During the Clinton years, many of the worst science abusers — such as anti-evolution fundamentalists — remained politically out in the cold, at least at the federal level. That began to change in 1994, as the Gingrich Republicans, highly sympathetic to the party's emerging socially conservative "base" and to the interests of private industry, laid claim to Congress.

They proceeded to attack evidence demonstrating a human role in climate change, all as well as in the depletion of the ozone layer as part of a sweeping attempt to undermine environmental regulation. Simultaneously, they dismantled Congress' world-renowned scientific advisory body, the Office of Technology Assessment, which had provided our elected representatives with reliable scientific counsel for more than two decades.

Meanwhile, the focus on the academic left's undermining of science following the Sokal hoax was generating worthwhile debates and even real soul-searching. For instance, the prominent French sociologist of science, Bruno Latour, has wondered whether his earlier work questioning the objectivity of scientific knowledge went too far: "Was I wrong to participate in the invention of this field known as science studies? Is it enough to say that we did not really mean what we meant?"

In truth, there was nothing wrong with inventing science studies; the error was to leap from the valid observation that science arises in a social context to the extreme conclusion that it is nothing more than politics in disguise.

Such introspection on the academic left has been a heartening sign, and the pronouncements of extreme relativism have subsided significantly in recent years. This frees up defenders of science to combat the enemy on our other flank: an unholy (and uneasy) alliance of economically driven attacks on science (on issues such as global climate change, mercury pollution and what constitutes a good diet) and theologically impelled ones (in areas such as evolution, reproductive health and embryonic stem cell research).

The potency of this combination has become apparent during the six years of the Bush administration, as many if not most scientific agencies of our government have become embroiled in scandals involving the misrepresentation or suppression of scientific information, gag orders on scientist employees, or other interferences with the processes by which science feeds into decision-making. Tracing these intrusions back to their source, we almost always uncover the same pattern: It concerns an issue in which one of the two principal constituencies of the current administration — religious conservatives or big corporations — has a vested interest.

Perhaps they wish to disrupt the path of Plan B emergency contraception (the "morning-after" pill) through the Food and Drug Administration on its way to over-the-counter availability. Or perhaps they don't like the way global warming has been discussed in government documents.

That's at the core of a case recently investigated by the new Congress: A lawyer who had formerly worked for the American Petroleum Institute and had moved to the Bush White House's Council on Environmental Quality was accused in 2005 of editing government climate science reports in such a way as to raise doubts about global warming and downplay the strong consensus of mainstream scientists. Following the initial scandal, the lawyer went to work for Exxon Mobil Corp.

In these and countless other cases, members of the Bush administration appear to have efficiently channeled their constituents' grudges, leading to a distortion of the scientific evidence and a steady stream of scandals.

DOJ_NMG_0127385

TO ADDRESS this new crisis over the relationship between science and politics, we propose a combination of political activism and institutional reform. Congress needs to establish safeguards to protect the integrity of scientific information in Washington — strong whistle-blower protections for scientists who work in government agencies would be a good start.

We also need a strengthening of the government scientific advisory apparatus, starting with the revival of the Office of Technology Assessment. And we need congressional committees to continue with their investigations of cases of science abuse within the Bush administration, in order to learn what other reforms are necessary.

At the same time, journalists and citizens must renounce a lazy "on the one hand, on the other hand" approach and start analyzing critically the quality of the evidence. For, in the end, all of us — conservative or liberal, believer or atheist — must share the same real world. Antibiotic-resistant bacteria do not spare deniers of evolution, and global climate change will not spare any of us. As physicist Richard Feynman wrote in connection with the space shuttle Challenger disaster, "nature cannot be fooled."

To avoid nature's punishment, we must take steps now to restore reality-based government.

CHRIS MOONEY is the Washington correspondent for Seed magazine and the author of "The Republican War on Science." ALAN SOKAL is a professor of physics at New York University and the coauthor of "Fashi

At Humanity's Doorstep (NYT)

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Should Congress require any further reason to move aggressively to limit greenhouse gas emissions, it need only read Friday's report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, the world's authoritative voice on global warming.

A distillation of the best peer-reviewed science, the report expresses more than 90 percent certainty that man-made emissions from the burning of fossil fuels have caused the steady rise in atmospheric temperatures, with the destruction of tropical rain forests playing a lesser but important role.

The report warns that if society keeps to its current course, emissions will increase to twice their preindustrial levels by the end of this century, causing temperatures to rise 3.5 to 8 degrees. The consequences will include rising seas, more powerful hurricanes, disappearing coral reefs and more intensive droughts in subtropical countries.

The report also offers hope, suggesting that what humans have caused, humans can mitigate; that even though the world is committed to centuries of further warming, the process can be slowed and the worst effects averted by swift and decisive action to limit and reverse emissions.

This is the fourth in a series of studies that began in 1990. The first left open the possibility that the warming that began with the onset of the Industrial Revolution and increased in the 1950s was "largely due to natural variability." The second and third reports detected a bigger human role, and this one lays the whole problem at humanity's doorstep.

A later paper will address specific remedies. But many climate experts believe the world must embark on a swift and sustained shift in the way energy is produced and used — away from fuels like oil and coal, and toward cleaner alternatives.

That is the objective of the many global warming bills now circulating in Washington. The best of these would put a price on carbon through a mandatory cap on emissions from sources like power plants and cars, thus making coal and oil relatively more expensive while driving the market toward cleaner sources of energy.

As we have learned over the years, talk is cheap in Washington, while meaningful action is almost certain to be expensive. President Bush has brandished those very real costs of moving to a new energy-delivery system again and again to argue against mandatory caps on emissions and to make the case for his own cost-free (and demonstrably inadequate) program of voluntary reductions. Yet what the panel is telling us is that the costs of doing nothing, especially to future generations, will be far greater than the price of acting now.

This is not a report compiled by a bunch of activists or alarmists. It is a consensus document, the inherently conservative product of three years of study and debate among mainstream scientists from 150 countries with often competing agendas. And in its modesty, it is alarming enough.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

DOJ_NMG_0127386

Gang `capital' Steps Up Fight (CHIT)

By Michael Martinez, Tribune National Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, February 4, 2007

Stung by failure to quell problem, L.A. goes gung-ho

LOS ANGELES -- Here in the nation's "capital" for street gangs, Jose Aleman is an ex-gangbanger with 26 bullet fragments in his brain. Lucky to be alive and well, Aleman is eating a Mexican pasta soup in the Homegirl Cafe, run by former female gang members, when he's interrupted by an aspiring gangster half his age.

They hug. Aleman, who has spent a third of his 36 years in Folsom and other prisons, is like a mentor and confessor.

"I've got a job, man. I'm going to be working full-time now," says Richard Hernandez, 18, who for the past few months has been unemployed and painting gang graffiti with his "tagging crew." Now Hernandez is going to quit running from the police, he says.

That's good news, Aleman later remarks. It's one less recruit in a city that Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa says is "the national epicenter" for gang activity.

With one recent study enumerating 40,000 members in 700 gangs in Los Angeles, the city is the originator and exporter of dangerous gangs gone national, such as the Bloods, the Crips and Mara Salvatrucha 13 (MS-13), said FBI spokesman Kenneth Smith.

"We have Blood and Crips sets in Indianapolis and Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville--you know, that middle part of the country where people don't think they have a gang problem," said Smith, who was an Indianapolis police officer for eight years until 1997.

Chicago Crime Commission President Jim Wagner acknowledged Los Angeles as a breeding ground for gangs that are now in Chicago's western suburbs. "We are seeing in the suburban areas a growth in the presence of MS-13," he said.

After more than 20 years trying to eradicate Los Angeles' gangs--whose violence influenced American culture from video games to movies--officials were sharply rebuked for ongoing failures in a new study by a local civil rights group.

Indeed, as gang fighting has turned racial between blacks and Latinos, the mayor, Police Chief William Bratton and other local officials have launched a high-profile campaign with such blunt rhetoric that visitors and tourists may think twice about Los Angeles.

"We're the gang capital of the United States of America," Villaraigosa said in one interview.

Gangs aside, officials insist the city is as safe as it was in 1956, when Los Angeles had the same overall crime rates as in 2006. "L.A. is the second-safest city in America just behind New York," said mayoral spokesman Matt Szabo.

However, on Wednesday, local officials and the FBI office in Los Angeles will host a long-planned summit with law officials from the U.S., Canada and Central America on "transnational" gangs such as MS-13, which has ties to El Salvador. During the conference, the mayor and police chief are expected to announce anti-gang programs emphasizing prevention and intervention, officials said.

Gang crime on the rise in L.A.

To longtime Los Angeles activists, the renewed government pledges are welcomed, but the fervor appears a political response to a stinging report by civil rights lawyer Connie Rice of the Advancement Project, in which she calls for a "gang czar" and "a Marshall Plan" to end the gang epidemic.

"This is the third time that the Los Angeles City Council has officially asked the question, `Why are city gang reduction strategies failing?'" the report said.

The gung-ho response by officials appears to be a tactic to secure federal funds to combat the problem, said Rev. Greg Boyle, 52, a Jesuit priest who said over the past 19 years he has saved tens of thousands of youths and adults from gangs.

With the slogan "nothing stops a bullet like a job," Boyle oversees several employment enterprises under the umbrella group Homeboy Industries--which the mayor cited as a model program--that also includes the Homegirl Cafe. In fact, 18-year-old Hernandez's new job is mopping, sweeping and cleaning Boyle's 3,000-square-foot headquarters for $7.50 an hour. Aleman also works for Boyle as a motivational outreach speaker for $8 an hour.

DOJ_NMG_0127387

"You would ask yourself what would be the interests of the police chief and the mayor to call Los Angeles the nation's epicenter for gangs," Boyle said. "We'd think it would be a PR blunder, but if you scratch ever so slightly, you'll see that they'll be able to get federal money.

"Otherwise it would look insane: Wouldn't that upset tourists?" asked Boyle, who adds he believes that gang violence was worse in the 1990s.

Statistics, however, show a recent upswing in gang crime, though the city's overall crime rate is down, officials said.

Last year marked a 14 percent increase in gang-related offenses, and of the city's 481 homicides, more than half involved gang members, said Sgt. Lee Sands, a police spokesman.

A few of those homicides involved conflict between Latino and black gangs, especially as the city's Hispanic population grows and the African-American community doesn't.

The racial conflict isn't as prevalent as media coverage suggests, said police Lt. Paul Vernon.

He added: "We'll never arrest our way out of this.

"Society in general has to let their children know there are alternatives in life, that there isn't la vida loca. ... `Today I party and tomorrow I die.' That is not a mindset that young people in America should have."

`Hospitals, death, prison'

Overcrowded prisons, a 50 percent high school dropout rate and the lack of job training and after-school programs contribute to gang growth, officials said. Another factor is that Los Angeles is the "most underpoliced big city" in the country, with 9,000 officers compared with New York's 37,000 and Chicago's 13,500.

In the meantime, Aleman said, he's promoting Criminals and Gangmembers Anonymous, an organization that is modeled after Alcoholics Anonymous' 12-step program. In it, former gangsters help active ones to quit what Aleman calls the "addiction" of leading a violent life on the streets.

"I share everything I can in order to expose the truth that gangs never tell you: There's no future to it. There's only three dead ends to gangs: hospitals, death, prison," said Aleman, who was released from prison in 2004 after serving time for involuntary manslaughter. He credits Boyle with motivating him to quit the gangs.

---

mjmartinez@tribune.com

Gun Charges Dismissed On Suspected Hit Man (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 4, 2007

Appeals court overturns conviction of man already acquitted of two previous killings

Jason Korey, suspected by police of being a serial hit man and once described by one detective as "John Dillinger Jr." and by another as the "closest to the devil I'll ever come," again has proved a slippery target for prosecutors.

Already acquitted of two killings, and with charges of attempting a third withdrawn, he's won another legal battle.

An appellate court has thrown out a federal gun conviction that would have sent him to prison for three decades. The case was built largely on evidence from a homicide trial that the district attorney's office lost.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled last month that faulty jury instructions by U.S. District Judge Gary Lancaster might have influenced jurors to convict Mr. Korey in 2005.

The appellate court also took the unusual step of admonishing the judge for his handling of an inappropriate remark by the prosecutor. Judge Lancaster allowed an assistant U.S. attorney to launch into a speech to the jury instead of apologizing after the remark.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan is now considering whether her office will retry Mr. Korey, 24, of Baldwin Borough, whose ability to escape homicide charges has long frustrated Pittsburgh police.

He was acquitted in 2000 in the 1999 slaying of William Kuhn III, 24, a South Side cocaine dealer. The decision outraged detectives, especially because they believed that Mr. Korey had beaten another murder charge in 1999 when he was acquitted in the killing of Joseph Brucker, 17, of Whitehall.

DOJ_NMG_0127388

Police didn't give up, though, and turned instead to the federal court system.

As part of Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department crackdown on illegal guns, they teamed up with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to link Mr. Korey and the .22-caliber pistol used in the Kuhn killing.

A jury found him guilty of using a gun during a drug-trafficking crime and Judge Lancaster sentenced him to nearly 33 years in prison.

But among several challenges to the sentence, his public defenders said he was denied a fair trial because of prejudicial jury instructions and because the judge allowed Assistant U.S. Attorney James Love to issue an "apology for foul language that bolstered the prosecutor's reputation."

The appellate court said the judge was wrong to tell jurors they could find Mr. Korey guilty if they agreed with the government's contention that he accepted cocaine from drug dealer Ray Erfort as payment for killing Mr. Kuhn.

The 3rd Circuit judges said that alone wasn't enough to prove Mr. Korey was involved in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine, as required by the statute under which he was charged.

"We do not mean to suggest with our holding in this case that a hit man hired by a drug distribution conspiracy cannot be a part of the conspiracy," Judge D. Michael Fisher wrote. "Rather, we simply hold that the jury instructions in this case did not properly instruct the jury about all of the elements the government must prove to establish participation in such a conspiracy."

The appellate judges didn't rule on Mr. Korey's other challenges, but they did take Judge Lancaster to task for how he handled a testy remark by Mr. Love.

As the judge was telling public defender W. Penn Hackney that he could look over police reports he hadn't previously seen and then cross-examine homicide Detective Tom Foley, Mr. Love blurted out, "Jesus Christ."

Federal courtrooms, big on decorum, aren't good places for intemperate comments.

"What did you say?" Judge Lancaster demanded. "What did you say?"

"What did I say?" Mr. Love replied, according to a transcript.

The judge stopped the trial and demanded to see Mr. Love in chambers. When they emerged, Mr. Love gave a rambling apology to the jury in which he recounted his experience and reputation as a prosecutor.

Mr. Hackney said that wasn't fair because it influenced the jury. The appellate judges agreed.

"The resulting comments inappropriately injected the character and experience of the attorney into the trial in a manner that has worried us in the past," Judge Fisher wrote.

Mr. Love said he couldn't comment. Mr. Hackney didn't return a message, but public defenders almost never comment on cases. Chief Public Defender Lisa Freeland, who argued the appellate case, said she could not comment beyond the public record.

Pittsburgh homicide Detective Steve Hitchings, whom Mr. Korey taunted after his federal court conviction, said he couldn't talk, either, and referred questions to the U.S. attorney's office.

After the 2005 verdict came in, Mr. Korey glowered at Detective Hitchings and shouted: "It took you two trials to get me!"

"You'll get prison for life," Detective Hitchings growled back.

He didn't get life, though, and it's not clear what will happen next. The case was returned to district court last week.

"We are reviewing the appellate court's decision to determine our course of action," Ms. Buchanan said.

More legal sparring is certain if she chooses to try Mr. Korey again, because a new prosecution could be challenged on double jeopardy grounds at both the state and federal levels.

Essentially, Mr. Korey has been tried twice on the same set of facts: Mr. Kuhn's killing.

Lawyers are likely to argue that the government should not get a third crack at him.

Despite the vacated sentence, he's not going anywhere soon.

He's in state prison on a drug charge until at least August 2008 and still has to complete 33 months of federal prison time on other weapons charges to which he pleaded guilty during the 2005 trial.

One of those charges was possession of a silencer for the .22 used in the killing of Mr. Kuhn.

For Police, Ill-Gotten Gains Become Money Well Spent (NYT)

By Shelly Feuer Domash

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

IN 2001, federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents gave the Nassau County Police Department Asset Forfeiture Unit a license plate number that was registered to an elderly woman in the county. It was the only lead they had on a suspected major drug and money-laundering operation, but it paid off in arrests — and, for the Nassau police, much more.

After a two-year investigation started by that lead, the Forfeiture Unit executed six search warrants in Nassau County, New York City, Miami and Boston and seized guns, drugs, $300,000 in jewelry, $600,000 in vehicles, $750,000 in cash and $3 million in real property — assets with a total value of more than $4.6 million. Spinoff investigations are continuing, and officials expect that the total forfeitures will eventually exceed an additional $5 million.

Most of that money will wind up in the bank accounts of law enforcement agencies instead of the criminals', paying for a wide array of crime-fighting equipment.

By confiscating equipment used in a crime, like cars; the proceeds of a crime; or items purchased with those proceeds, like jewelry or houses, asset forfeiture is designed to strip criminals of their ability to continue illegal activities. But it also has financial benefits for the police and taxpayers.

Although the Suffolk County Police and some municipal departments have also received forfeiture money, the Nassau County Police have been in the forefront locally in getting it. And the payoff has been substantial.

Nassau County established its forfeiture office in 1992. Twelve years later, Suffolk County started a unit as part of its narcotics bureau.

In the last five years, Nassau County has averaged $2 million a year in seizure money, allowing major additions to law enforcement capabilities without cost to taxpayers. Among purchases made with forfeiture money were Global Positioning System devices costing about $532,000 that were recently installed in 207 county patrol cars; two fast-response boats for the North and South Shores, costing a total of $500,000; and hazardous-materials suits and tactical gas masks for every member of the department, costing $750,000.

The department's photo evidence system was replaced with digital imaging equipment at a cost of more than $1 million, and a relocated and larger police academy was opened in Massapequa — all using forfeiture money.

In addition to equipment, Detective Lt. Michael Fleming said, "We spend a significant amount of forfeiture money on training."

"Without this money, we could not have made these advances," he said.

In Suffolk County, the police commissioner, Richard Dormer, said money from the asset forfeiture program enabled his office to "enhance training, purchase equipment that an officer can use on the streets and assist communities with their efforts to fight crime."

Specifically, he said, the money has been used to lease vehicles for the gang unit and for narcotics enforcement, computers and technology upgrades.

He said that since the Suffolk forfeiture unit was created, it had, with the help of other law enforcement agencies, seized shopping centers, apartment buildings, houses and vehicles. The department expects to be credited with a total of $1.2 million as its share of seizure money, Commissioner Dormer said.

The majority of the 19 local departments in Nassau County have also received forfeiture funds. Federal and state agencies often receive a share of seized assets, too.

"The share that a law enforcement agency receives is commensurate with the amount of work they contribute to the investigation that led to the seizure," Lieutenant Fleming said.

The Hempstead Police, one of the most active departments on Long Island, uses its forfeiture funds — tens of thousands of dollars a year — for training and equipment, said Detective Lt. Joseph Wing. He said this did not include money from seizures in collaborations with federal agencies that could yield $30,000 to $50,000 for each investigation.

How much a department receives varies from year to year, making it imprudent to budget for it, police officials say. Budgeting seizure money could also be unwise "because if you do, your motive for prosecuting a case could be challenged," Lieutenant Fleming said.

DOJ_NMG_0127390

He said that the process must be closely monitored so it is not abused. A panel of senior department members oversees how forfeiture money is allocated.

"The principal objective is effective law enforcement," Lieutenant Fleming said. "Extravagant purchases are prohibited."

The forfeiture process is overseen by federal, state and local regulations. Once a prosecution begins, the forfeiture action runs parallel to it, but the distribution is not made until the criminal action is completed.

Distribution is determined by federal and state laws that first require an administrative or judicial finding that the property seized is an instrument or proceed of criminal conduct. The laws then address how the seized assets will be distributed, including the share that each law enforcement agency involved in the investigation will receive.

In November 2005, the Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section of the federal Department of Justice formed a working group to review the forfeiture program nationwide. Its purpose is to identify the program's strengths and weaknesses and develop a national strategy, working with other law enforcement agencies to develop consistent goals and policies.

The working group includes federal agencies like the F.B.I., the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the United States Marshals Service. The only state or local police department represented is Nassau County's.

Richard Weber, the chief of the Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section of the Justice Department, said he picked Nassau's department because he had worked with it and it is "a model for the country when it comes to asset forfeiture."

He cited the forfeiture unit's ability to work with other law enforcement agencies, the skills of its detectives and the "significant and complex financial investigations they had worked on with the New York asset forfeiture task force."

IMMIGRATION:

Acrobat Admits Guilt In Visa Scam (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

A former acrobat has pleaded guilty to charges of helping as many as 870 foreign nationals enter the United States illegally and making false statements in visa applications, the Justice Department said.

Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said Kristo Ivanov, 70, of Orlando, Fla., entered the plea Thursday before U.S. District Judge Donald P. Dietrich in federal court in Orlando.

In his plea agreement with federal prosecutors, Ivanov admitted that from 2001 to February 2006, he helped the illegal aliens enter or remain in the United States through fraudulent means, preparing visa applications falsely saying they were circus performers coming to work in Florida.

Mrs. Fisher said none of the aliens had been hired by any of the circuses listed in the visa applications, adding that they were "simply a means for the aliens to enter or remain in the United States." She said Ivanov charged each alien from $500 to $2,500 to prepare the applications.

"Ivanov admits to helping hundreds of illegal aliens into the United States under false pretenses so that he could benefit financially," Mrs. Fisher said. "We will not allow this type of exploitation of our immigration system, which poses a risk to the security of our nation."

A Bulgarian native who is now a naturalized American citizen, Ivanov came to the United States in 1980 as an acrobat for Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus. He has owned and operated a circus booking agency, Magic Star Entertainment, of Lake Mary, Fla., for more than five years and used that agency to sponsor illegal aliens to enter or remain in this country.

As part of his plea agreement, Ivanov agreed to forfeit $600,000 he earned in smuggling fees.

Sentencing is scheduled for next month.

"Businesses who knowingly sponsor foreign nationals under false pretenses should know that you will be caught," said FBI special agent in charge Robert Weber, who heads the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Office of Investigations in Tampa, Fla.

"The federal government will not tolerate the exploitation of our nation's visa system."

Contractors Walking Immigration Tightrope (DENP)

By Elizabeth Aguilera, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, February 4, 2007

Tony Milo of the Colorado Contractors Association says contractors are doing their best to hire within the law. He's standing near Interstate 25 and the Yosemite Bridge, part of a T-REX project he says could not have been finished without immigrant labor. (Post / John Prieto)

Facing growing public criticism from activists opposed to illegal immigration, Colorado's construction contractors have begun to shed their reluctance to debate the issue publicly.

Contractors are joining a growing chorus of business leaders - including hotels, restaurants and agriculture - who say they are trying to hire only legal workers but lack a foolproof system for confirming an employee's legal status.

A company's best option is the beleaguered Basic Pilot Program, which uses Social Security numbers to verify worker eligibility. But federal authorities acknowledge that Basic Pilot can't reliably show when someone is misusing a citizen's identity.

As a result, the state's contractors say they are left with a difficult choice: Use Basic Pilot and risk hiring undocumented workers or aggressively profile prospective employees, which could lead to legal penalties.

"Employers are walking this tightrope of anti-discrimination laws and immigration laws," said Tony Milo, executive director of the Colorado Contractors Association.

"We've certainly been feeling the squeeze. We've now got this complex web of state and federal regulations that sometimes conflict with each other."

Milo and other Colorado contractors began speaking out following a national television report on "Dateline NBC" in December that revealed how undocumented workers were employed by Roaring Fork Valley contractor Mark Gould.

Gould, who uses Basic Pilot, spoke to "Dateline" about the challenges of balancing the need to verify employees' citizenship with his need for manual labor.

His explanations, however, didn't satisfy state Sen. David Schultheis, R-Colorado Springs, one of Colorado's leading advocates for tougher immigration laws.

Schultheis says employers such as Gould can do more to avoid hiring illegal immigrants. He told The Denver Post that he wants employers to profile potential employees based on their ability to speak English.

"If the person cannot speak English, in many cases they can presume the person is fresh from the border," Schultheis said. "You have to take a little bit of a risk obviously."

What Schultheis is suggesting, however, is illegal, according to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

"Whether an accent would indicate immigration status is a matter of opinion, but it has nothing to do with the rights of workers in America," said James Ryan, spokesman for the EEOC. "It's wrong to make any kind of prejudicial assumption because a person has an accent or a certain national origin."

Gould says Schultheis' point of view is another example of the pressure and dilemma that contractors face. "People don't realize that when you have an employee in front of you, you don't get to ask more questions if they have brown skin," he said. "We are regulated in a very strict way so that we do not discriminate."

Colorado contractors, in general, support comprehensive immigration reform that includes a guest-worker program, a path to legalization for qualified illegal immigrants and a more reliable form of Basic Pilot.

"Everyone deserves a fair chance," said Mike Villia, a partner at Denver-based Paramount Construction Group, which hires contractors as partners. "We require that contractors hire legal people. I'm not sure I agree with all the laws out there, but we have to follow them."

Swift was "following ... rules"

Like contractors, meatpacking company Swift & Co. has walked both sides of the line when hiring, each time leading to federal scrutiny, observers say.

The company's efforts to confirm citizenship of its foreign applicants led to a Justice Department investigation in 2000. The company eventually paid a $200,000 settlement in 2002 and increased its reliance on the Basic Pilot Program. By 2006, however, federal authorities suspected Swift had become a job haven for illegal immigrants. In December, federal authorities raided six Swift plants and arrested 1,282 undocumented workers, many suspected of or charged with identity theft.

DOJ_NMG_0127392

"Swift Co. got into trouble ... despite the fact that it had been participating in the Basic Pilot and following all the rules," said Wayne Cornelius, director of the Center for Comparative Immigration Studies at the University of California, San Diego.

Some observers say Colorado's construction industry is equally vulnerable for such trouble. The construction industry employs about 167,000 people and demographers estimate that 10 percent to 20 percent are undocmented. The only real way to lower such high numbers of illegal-immigrant employment is to create a high-tech, universal identification card embedded with biometrics, Cornelius said.

Until then, he added, "the contractors and other employers will be dealing with a deeply flawed system of employment-eligibility verification."

Basic Pilot has "bugs"

After the "Dateline" segment, Gould received more than 1,000 calls. Some people were looking for a job; others left hateful messages.

Gould and other state contractors say they are frustrated by the negative attention from the report and are speaking out.

Former Colorado Gov. Dick Lamm, a proponent of tougher immigration laws, said everyone should go through the same screening process, and it would be unfair to do otherwise.

"If (employers) are using the Basic Pilot program, that is all they should need to do," Lamm wrote in an e-mail. "There are bugs in that system, but they are being worked out. ... There is only so much I would want to put on the employer."

Staff writer Elizabeth Aguilera can be reached at 303-820-1372 or eaguilera@denverpost.com.

The Price Of Citizenship (NYT)

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

With one hand, Lady Liberty lifts her lamp beside the golden door. With the other, she roots around in an immigrant's wallet, plucking out bills. It's not an appealing image, but that's where we are, now that Citizenship and Immigration Services, the beleaguered federal bureaucracy that makes new Americans, has announced plans to increase fees sharply to cover its costs.

The agency is distinctive in the federal government for being entirely dependent on fees it collects. It is also notable for backlogs and what its director, Emilio Gonzalez, acknowledges are "dingy buildings" and "rude employees." Mr. Gonzalez promises that if the agency is granted an average increase of 66 percent in the price of visas and citizenship papers, it will process applications more quickly and take other steps to fulfill its responsibilities, the costs of which have risen sharply since 9/11.

What this means for aspiring immigrants is simple: more cash upfront. The application fee for citizenship would rise to $595 from $330. The fee for permanent residency would increase to $905 from $325, and charges for bringing in a foreign spouse or employee would more than double. Refugees and victims of human trafficking or sex crimes would still have their fees waived, and other applicants could request hardship waivers.

There are no easy formulas for pricing services like these, but advocacy groups on both sides of the immigration debate agree that the increases are exorbitant, and we agree. The proposed fees would become a means test for new Americans, slamming the door on many people who desperately want to be part of this country and have much to contribute.

The blame clearly lies with Congress, which has required the agency to support itself entirely with fees. Congress should abandon this misguided rule and allocate the money to run the agency adequately and efficiently. All Americans benefit from the healthy, invigorating flow of naturalized citizens, and all Americans — not just the newest, least powerful ones — should help pay for it.

TAX:

Court Upholds Evasion Ruling In A Tax Case (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

DOJ_NMG_0127393

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

The federal tax court has ruled in favor of the Internal Revenue Service in a 14-year-old evasion case involving a now-dead lawyer who was one of the nation's leading tax advisers, millions of dollars in reported real estate kickbacks and a Supreme Court ruling that ended a longstanding practice of secrecy in tax court.

In the decision last week, Judge Harry A. Haines of the United States Tax Court ruled that the lawyer, Burton W. Kanter, and two associates had accepted kickbacks from the Pritzker family of Chicago, which owns the Hyatt hotels, and then evaded taxes on the payments.

Lawyers for the three said they were stunned by the decision and would appeal it, expecting it to go to the Supreme Court for a second time.

They said the decision ran counter to the findings of a special trial judge who heard the case in 1994. That judge, they said, determined that small amounts of tax were due because of technical violations but that there was no civil fraud.

The two associates are Claude M. Ballard, a former general partner at Goldman Sachs who before that was a real estate executive at Prudential Insurance, and Robert W. Lisle, a Prudential real estate executive who died before the original trial. Mr. Kanter died in 2001.

The case involved a San Francisco hotel that Mr. Lisle had Prudential, now Prudential Financial, build in 1973. He then steered the management contract for the hotel, which became the Hyatt Embarcadero, to the Pritzkers in 1973. In return, court papers say, A. N. Pritzker, the family patriarch, agreed to pay 10 percent of the hotel's profit to the three men and two others, who soon left the deal. The I.R.S. audited the deal, leading the three men to sue the I.R.S., resulting in a 1994 trial before the special trial judge, D. Irvin Couvillion.

Five years later, a regular tax court judge, Howard A. Dawson Jr., issued the formal judgment, describing Mr. Kanter as the architect of a long-running scheme to evade taxes.

Judge Couvillion had reached the opposite conclusion, but the tax court maintained that the original report could not be disclosed.

The Supreme Court held otherwise in 2005, ending the tax court's practice of withholding such findings. When the report was made public, it showed that the trial judge had found no fraud. Mr. Kanter regarded himself as the nation's premier expert at legally eliminating taxes, his son Josh and several lawyers said Friday. If the decision stands, Mr. Kanter's estate will owe about $20 million.

The Netherlands, The New Tax Shelter Hot Spot (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Oh, a storm is threat'ning
My very life today
If I don't get some shelter
Oh yeah, I'm gonna fade away
"Gimme Shelter," The Rolling Stones

Amsterdam

LAST spring, Keith Richards, the craggy-faced and hard-partying lead guitarist for the Rolling Stones, fell from a tree at a beach resort in Fiji, slamming his head against the trunk on his way down. Mr. Richards was flown to New Zealand, where a surgeon provided emergency care to treat swelling in his brain. While the accident forced the Rolling Stones to cancel part of their summer tour, Mr. Richards, 62, handily survived his plunge.

"It's not the first brush with death I've had," Mr. Richards later told Rolling Stone magazine. "I guess what I learned is, don't sit in trees anymore."

What two of the other three Rolling Stones apparently learned, including Mick Jagger and Charlie Watts, was that Mr. Richards's near-death experience meant that it was time to think about their heirs. For that, the aging rockers turned to a reclusive Dutch accountant, Johannes Favie, whose company, Promogroup, has helped them minimize their tax bills for more than 30 years. (The fourth Rolling Stone, Ron Wood, handles his finances apart from Promogroup.)

DOJ_NMG_0127394

And so, last August, according to details disclosed in documents maintained by the Handelsregister, the trade registry of the Netherlands, Promogroup helped the three performers set up a pair of private Dutch foundations that will allow them to transfer assets tax-free to heirs when they die. Other Dutch shelters that Promogroup has arranged for the three have already paid off handsomely; over the last 20 years, according to Dutch documents, the three musicians have paid just $7.2 million in taxes on earnings of $450 million that they have channeled through Amsterdam — a tax rate of about 1.5 percent, well below the British rate of 40 percent.

The Rolling Stones are not the only celebrities sheltering income in the land of tulips, windmills and Rembrandt. The rock powerhouse U2 has transferred lucrative assets to Amsterdam, as have other pop singers and well-known athletes, all of whom have used or continue to take advantage of the Netherlands' tax shelters, according to a Dutch tax lawyer who requested anonymity because of client confidentiality agreements.

Entertainment companies and others that benefit handsomely from the Dutch shelters include EMI, the giant record label, and CKX Inc., the entertainment company that owns stakes in "American Idol," the Elvis Presley estate and the soccer pin-up idol David Beckham.

When it comes to attracting celebrity wealth seeking shelter from taxes, the Cayman Islands and other classic Caribbean tax havens are receding in favor like so many waves on the beach, according to tax experts here and overseas. While old-school, offshore tax havens — the warm ones with tropical fish, off-the-shelf holding companies sporting post-office-box addresses, and scant regulation or transparency — still attract money, they are largely patronized, tax lawyers and entertainment bankers say, by hedge funds and private equity firms looking to protect lush trading profits from taxes.

But for earnings derived from intellectual property such as royalties, the Netherlands has become a tax shelter of choice. With celebrities lending their names and images to clothing lines, licensing their hit songs to corporate sponsors, seeking roles in Hollywood and engaging in other ventures that generate significant taxable income, the Dutch system, which does not tax royalties, offers a nifty shelter.

As they flock to Amsterdam, celebrities are taking a leaf out of the playbook of major corporations that also use Dutch tax shelters to help reduce or eliminate the royalty taxes on patents, another form of intellectual property.

"The Caribbeans are thinking about trading profits, not royalties, so the smaller European countries like Holland have had to be creative, tax-wise," said David Pullman, an investment banker in New York who caters to entertainers and athletes. "They are going for the high-end stuff and don't want to be seen as shady like some Caribbean haven."

Many of the world's multinational corporations, like Coca-Cola, Nike, Ikea and Gucci, have set up holding companies here in recent years to take advantage of tax shelters nearly identical to the ones that the Rolling Stones and U2 use. An additional draw is the Dutch Finance Ministry's recent willingness to issue advance rulings that effectively bless the tax shelters, a fast-track process that has lured in companies and individuals seeking to use the Netherlands as a tax shelter.

Sun Microsystems, the giant American software and computer manufacturer, operates Dutch holding companies and is candid about why it does so. Until recently, on the Web site of the Netherlands Foreign Investment Agency, www.nfia.com, Sun offered the following blurb about the country's accommodating tax laws: "Let's face it: ask foreign companies why they're really located here, and nearly everyone will reply that it's because of the favorable tax ruling. The combination of this with the country's political stability, well-trained labor force, their linguistic skills and international attitude as well as the stable infrastructure for roads and telecommunications — this is why we're here." (A Sun spokeswoman declined to comment.)

The Netherlands is home to almost 20,000 "mailbox companies," Dutch shorthand for corporate shells set up by foreign companies and wealthy foreigners who use them to relieve taxes on royalties, dividends and interest payments, according to a report last November by SOMO, the Center for Research on Multinational Corporations, a nonprofit group in Amsterdam that monitors the business practices of large companies. Globally, some 1,165 companies use Dutch tax shelters to reduce or eliminate taxes on royalties and patents, according to SOMO.

The report, which is critical of the emergence of the Netherlands as a tax haven, says that the number of mailbox companies "has been increasing rapidly in recent years" and that the shelters undermine efforts by governments worldwide to

DOJ_NMG_0127395

"ensure that a level playing field is created where each country receives the fair taxation due to it as a result of the commercial activities undertaken within its borders."

OFTEN mentioned as a candidate to receive the Nobel Peace Prize, or, perhaps less seriously, to run the World Bank, U2's 46-year-old lead singer, Bono, has toured Africa with senior American officials to campaign against AIDS, and hobnobbed with financiers and policymakers while speaking out on global poverty issues at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. He even mugged for the cameras in 2000 with Pope John Paul II, who tried on his sunglasses.

U2's riches are equally well-traveled and, like the Rolling Stones, the band has become sophisticated about finding overseas shelters for its money. When Ireland announced last spring that it would sharply curtail a lucrative tax break for musicians, painters, writers and sculptors, the shift posed a financial threat to U2, which has made the Emerald Isle its financial power base for nearly three decades. The Dublin-born-and-bred rockers built their fortune on hit songs and, in part, on Irish laws that forgive taxes due on royalties.

As of last year, U2 had amassed a net worth of 629 million euros — around $908 million — according to the annual "Rich List" of top earners in The Sunday Times of Britain. Royalties are the income that artists and athletes earn from recordings, performances, trademarks, brands, patents, copyrights, film rights, product endorsements, videos, films and the ever-extending commercialization of those assets — in short, the major portion of an artist's or an athlete's income.

Last June, with the Irish tax break about to shrink, U2 heeded the advice of its longtime business manager, Paul McGuinness, and moved its most lucrative asset — a song-publishing catalog with hits like "Where the Streets Have No Name" and "It's A Beautiful Day" — from Mr. McGuinness's firm, located near the Liffey River in Dublin, to Promogroup, which operates beside the elegant Herengracht canal in the heart of elegant, old Amsterdam.

Promogroup's headquarters are in a maroon-brick town house built four centuries ago for slave traders and spice merchants. Mr. Favie did not respond to repeated requests for an interview. To date, his company has not filed any information on funds flowing through U2 Ltd., the Dutch entity that holds U2's song catalog.

In another Amsterdam neighborhood known as the Financial Mile, not far from Promogroup's headquarters, Dutch firms like TMF, EQ Management Services, and Fortis Intertrust also cater to this high-end niche of tax-shelter devotees.

On its Web site, Fortis boasts that its clients are "the world's top composers, performing artists and personalities such as classical musicians, pop artists, DJs, and fashion models." The firm says it specializes in offering the "tax efficient exploitation of image rights," among other things.

"A lot of sponsor-sensitive sports people are also doing this — tennis players, golf players, soccer players," said Frank Lhoëst, an intellectual-property specialist at Fortis. The Dutch government is also in on the act, drafting an extensive network of tax treaties with countries worldwide that make it easy to shuffle money from Dutch companies to foreign subsidiaries, and creating other tax incentives.

"For non-U.S. musicians that receive a substantial portion of their income from non-U.S. source royalties, the use of a back-to-back licensing arrangement in the Netherlands provides significant tax savings," said Jeffrey L. Rubinger, a tax lawyer in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., at Holland & Knight.

The Dutch shelter is simple: royalties that flow into or out of a Dutch holding company are exempt from taxes. Although the nominal corporate tax rate in the Netherlands is around 30 percent, analysts say that domestic tax shelters bring that rate down substantially.

"For 90 percent of the people who do this, the motivation for using these structures is tax minimization, or avoidance," said Ton Smit, a tax lawyer at Tax Consultants International in Rotterdam, a firm that caters to celebrities, athletes and multinational corporations seeking to minimize their taxes.

HISTORICALLY, of course, the Netherlands has always looked outward, building global trading links and establishing the world's first stock exchange in the 17th century. That outlook has spawned legendary leniency, generosity and openness. Prostitution and some drugs are regulated but legal. State-funded benefits are substantial. Even witches are treated well: the government offers tax breaks to students studying witchcraft.

"It's not only tax-motivated, it's our culture — Dutch people are traders all over the world," Mr. Smit said.

DOJ_NMG_0127396

Some experts see a darker side to the emergence of the Netherlands as a sought-after tax shelter. In 2000, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, based in Paris, black-marked the country as one of the world's top five industrialized tax havens for promoting "treaty shopping" for low-tax jurisdictions. The Netherlands tightened certain rules, requiring more substance for Dutch companies set up solely to reduce or eliminate taxes. But some analysts say that troubles persist.

In its report last fall, SOMO, the research group, said the Dutch shelters affect "both the capacity of developing-country governments to supply essential services to their populations and the capacity of developed-country governments to provide finance for development in the form of debt relief and official development aid." The report also said that "tax haven features of the Netherlands also facilitate money laundering and attract companies with a dubious reputation."

While no one has suggested that any of the entertainers, athletes or celebrities making use of Dutch shelters are laundering illicit funds or engaging in illegal acts, the fact that some of them are gaming the tax system has invited criticism.

When news of the Rolling Stones' Dutch tax shelter first emerged last summer in Dutch and German newspapers, it did not particularly roil fans or the British tax authorities. After all, the Rolling Stones are widely regarded as one of the world's most commercial bands, with hundreds of officially licensed products ranging from Mick Jagger "quality resin" bobble-head dolls, Rolling Stones "Classic Rock" twin-bell alarm clocks, and "It's Only Rock and Roll" lava lamps to Rolling Stones Zippo lighters, Rolling Stones lounge pants and lingerie, leather jackets, diamond-encrusted gold and silver jewelry, and the band's ubiquitous trademark and calling card, the thick red Rolling Stones tongue.

But critics say that U2's tax move to Holland is threatening to tarnish the halo surrounding the well-regarded, affable and articulate Bono, by lending him a whiff of hypocrisy. After all, unlike Bono, Mr. Jagger is not out campaigning against third-world debt, or writing a foreword for "The End of Poverty," the most recent book by the prominent economist Jeffrey D. Sachs.

"Bono is a worldwide advocate for greater aid to the developing world, and I applaud him for that," said Joan Burton, the spokesperson for the Irish Labor Party's finance unit and a former cabinet minister, in a telephone interview. "But obviously the money for that comes from taxation, so it's very difficult to ask other people to pay tax to contribute to something very worthwhile while at the same time not paying taxes in a very modest environment."

IRELAND'S taxation of artists is, indeed, modest. Ireland currently allows unlimited tax-free earnings for artists from the sale of their work, but not from licensing or merchandising deals. The government set it up in 1969 to benefit resident struggling artists for whom books like "Blessed Art Thou a Monk Swimming" and "The Wild Red Deer of Killarney" — to name just two titles protected under the exemption — are unlikely to generate big licensing deals.

Next January, Ireland will cap the benefit at 250,000 euros, or around $319,000, after which a sliding tax scale sets in. The country already has a low corporate income tax rate of 12.5 percent.

Some tax advisers in Holland relish extolling the benefits of their service when compared with classic Caribbean tax regimes. In a pitch for the merits of the Dutch tax system, Gerwin de Widle, a tax lawyer at Greenberg Traurig in Amsterdam, observed that "it's better to be here than sit on an island, where they don't even take euros."

Amid such jousting, the fact that U2 is financially decamping to Holland has raised some eyebrows.

Jeff Swystun, a global director at Interbrand, a brand consulting firm based in New York, said that "the Stones will always be credible because of a very simple proposition: we want to have a great party." But U2, he said, "almost project themselves as a nonprofit, so the tax move doesn't really fit with the brand values that they're trying to communicate."

Not so, says U2.

"U2 is a global business and it pays taxes globally," said Mr. McGuinness, the band's business manager, who, in an unusual arrangement, shares equally in the band's earnings. "At least 95 percent of U2's business — including record and ticket sales — takes place outside of Ireland and as a result the band pays many different kinds of taxes all over the world. U2 is fully compliant with all Irish tax laws."

Mr. McGuinness said that Bono and U2 "continue to remain Ireland-based and are personal investors and employers in the country."

"Innovative tax policies have been the bedrock of Ireland's current prosperity," he added. "Like any other business, U2 operates in a tax-efficient manner."

DOJ_NMG_0127397

A spokeswoman for the Rolling Stones, Fran Curtis, declined to comment, other than to say that the band members "don't like to talk about their business." But Mr. Jagger, in a declaration filed last June in a civil lawsuit against his band in an unrelated matter, offered a glimpse of some of the machinery that supports the Rolling Stones' money machine.

In the declaration, Mr. Jagger noted that some of the revenue from his group's recordings flows through the Netherlands. He pointed out that "the recording services of the Rolling Stones are provided by companies that have the right to such services to Promotone B.V., which in turn owns the recordings of the Rolling Stones. My understanding is that Promotone licenses exploitation of those recordings to EMI Music Netherlands B.V., which releases and distributes those recordings through other companies in the United States."

A spokeswoman for EMI declined requests for comment.

According to documents from the Dutch trade registry, Promogroup's Mr. Favie, the principal director of the Stones' holdings in the Netherlands, is now also the main director of U2 Ltd., the Dutch-based entity that holds the lucrative master tapes to U2's song library. Song catalogs typically account for a large portion of successful band's royalty income, so U2 Ltd. is likely to be the recipient of a major piece of U2's income, analysts say. Likewise, U2's financial move to the Netherlands is likely to save it substantial sums it might otherwise have paid in royalty taxes.

Not everyone has access to Dutch shelters. Dutch tax benefits are typically available only to artists who are not citizens of the United States. While the Netherlands does not tax royalties going in or out of a Dutch company, the Treasury Department in the United States typically levies its standard corporate income tax rate of 35 percent on royalties coming into America from a Dutch entity.

Dutch holding companies set up to protect royalties often work in tandem with offshore Caribbean companies, shuffling money around to escape taxes, analysts say. For example, part of the Rolling Stones' Dutch-run assets are funneled through the Netherlands Antilles, a Dutch protectorate and a classic Caribbean tax haven, according to company registration documents.

"Ethically in my opinion, Bono's tax arrangements are entirely inconsistent with his calls upon government to support anti-poverty drives," said Richard Murphy, who runs Tax Research LLC, a research institute based in Norfolk, England, and was one of three co-authors of the SOMO report on Dutch tax shelters. "You cannot be demanding that resources be allocated to anti-poverty drives and then deny those resources to government."

Other tax experts say that such views are overly prim and that rock stars are simply following the leads of some of the world's biggest companies. U2 and the Stones "are taking advantage of this in the same way that all the drug companies are putting all their patents in favorable tax jurisdictions," said Prof. Michael J. Graetz of Yale, an authority on tax shelters and a self-described die-hard Rolling Stones fan. "I wouldn't go so far as to say it's fair, but it's not shocking either."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Budget's Ups And Downs Leave Big Chunk For War (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Pentagon is the big winner in President Bush's proposed budget for next year, while domestic items such as aid to schools and grants to local governments will get slight increases.

Medicare and Medicaid, the health program for the poor and disabled, would shoulder modest but politically difficult cost curbs in the budget the White House is submitting to Congress on Monday.

Some $18 billion in budget savings would come from farm programs over five years.

Bush's spending plan totals almost $3 trillion for the budget year starting October 1. It would produce a surplus in five years, helped by steady revenue growth and a squeeze on the one-sixth of the budget that covers domestic agencies such as the departments of Education, Energy and Health and Human Services.

Domestic agencies would not face an outright cut, as proposed last year, but would see increases averaging 1 percent, White House Budget director Rob Portman said. That is less than anticipated inflation, but higher costs for veterans' health care probably would result in a larger than average increase.

DOJ_NMG_0127398

The Pentagon, which also consumes one-sixth of the overall budget, would get an 11 percent increase, to $481.4 billion in its core budget. And that is before accounting for an additional $235 billion in war costs over the next year and a half.

Bush's plan will get a skeptical reception from the Democratic-controlled Congress. Democrats say it meets the president's promise to balance the budget by 2012 by omitting war costs and expensive changes to the alternative minimum tax and assuming politically untenable cuts in payments to doctors under Medicare.

"There's this continuing deception about our real fiscal condition," the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee said in an interview Saturday. "Over and over again we see things left out of his budget that we know are going to have to be dealt with," said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-North Dakota.

Democrats also say Bush's estimated cost of about $6 billion for increasing U.S. combat troop strength in Iraq greatly understates the likely total.

For months, Conrad has worked in back channels to establish a group of administration officials and lawmakers who would try to rein in costly benefit programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. But the president's refusal to consider some tax increases has scuttled the idea, at least for now.

Bush pushed the balanced budget idea -- to applause -- before a meeting Saturday with House Democrats in Virginia. But he seemed to acknowledge that a large-scale budget agreement with Democrats is a long shot.

"I'm under no illusions of how hard it's going to be," Bush said. "The only thing I want to share with you is, is my desire to see if we can't work together to get it done."

There is room for some modest steps such as an increase in the maximum Pell Grant for low-income college students to $4,600, $550 more than the current cap. House Democrats last week passed an increase in the maximum grant to $4,310.Health care spending likely to be debated

The federal contribution to the popular State Children's Health Insurance Program would rise slightly to address chronic shortfalls. States, however, would get less money to cover children in families at twice the poverty level or more. Democrats are pressing for far greater increases in the children's health program.

The White House's budget also would trim $12 billion from Medicaid, mostly through lower payments to states for administrative costs. About $5 billion or so would go toward addressing shortfalls in the State Children's Health Insurance Program, according to the White House budget office.

The proposed cuts to Medicare and Medicaid are relatively modest, given the overall size of the programs. The Medicare reductions would come in part from smaller inflation adjustments for hospitals, nursing homes, home health care providers and hospices. More higher-income older people would face increased premiums.

Hospitals in particular are a powerful lobbying group and often are some of the leading employers in lawmakers' districts and states. Smaller Medicare cuts of $36 billion proposed last year went nowhere in a GOP-led Congress, and Democrats quickly pounced on the new proposal.

"I think that sounds like the president is declaring war on us and the poor people in this country," said Rep. Pete Stark, D-California.

Stark and other Democrats probably will go after what they see as excessive payments to private managed care plans that provide care to about 8 million Medicare beneficiaries.

Democrats also must deal with a scheduled 8 percent cut in Medicare payments to doctors, a byproduct from a 1997 budget bill. Bush's budget would leave the cut in place, though Congress is virtually certain to provide relief as it has since 2003 with other scheduled payment cuts. Such a move would eat up Bush's proposed Medicare savings and then some.

All told, Bush is seeking $96 billion over five years from mandatory programs providing fixed benefits such as Medicare, farm subsidies and Medicaid and whose spending rises each year.

"Unless we act, we will saddle our children and grandchildren with tens of trillions of dollars of unfunded obligations," Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address. "They will face three bad options: huge tax increases, huge budget deficits or huge and immediate cuts in benefits."

Bush’s Medicare Budget Would Raise Premiums (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0127399

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3 — More and more Medicare beneficiaries would have to pay higher premiums for coverage of prescription drugs and doctors' services under President Bush's 2008 budget, to be unveiled on Monday.

Single people with annual incomes over $80,000 and married couples with incomes over $160,000 already have to pay higher premiums for the part of Medicare that covers doctors' services. The income thresholds rise with inflation.

Budget documents show that Mr. Bush will propose a similar surcharge on premiums for Medicare's new prescription drug benefit. In addition, the president will ask Congress to "eliminate annual indexing of income thresholds," so that more people would eventually have to pay the higher premiums.

The proposal, expected to raise $10 billion over the next five years, is one of many advanced by Mr. Bush in a $2.8 trillion budget that aims to eliminate the deficit by 2012.

In his budget request, Mr. Bush expresses alarm about what he calls "the unsustainable growth of federal entitlement programs," and he proposes savings in Medicare and Medicaid that far surpass what he or any other president has sought.

The president contends that he can make the rule changes without any action by Congress. But Congress could try to block some or all of the changes.

Democrats immediately denounced the proposals. "This is exactly the wrong approach," said Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who cited the proposals as evidence of what she called "the president's misplaced priorities."

Many Republicans like the idea of an "income-related premium," saying affluent beneficiaries can afford to pay a larger share of Medicare's costs. Democrats are divided. Some see it as a progressive way to finance the program. But others say it is fundamentally at odds with the idea of social insurance, and they fear that it could prompt some wealthy people to leave Medicare.

Administration officials said earlier this week that Mr. Bush would ask Congress to squeeze more than $70 billion from Medicare and Medicaid over five years. But the budget documents show that the actual figure is much larger: $101.5 billion of savings over five years.

The president's budget includes legislative proposals that would save $78.6 billion over the next five years — $65.6 billion in Medicare and $13 billion in Medicaid.

In addition, the budget documents say that Mr. Bush will propose changes in federal regulations to save $22.9 billion more over the next five years: $10.2 billion in Medicare and $12.7 billion in Medicaid.

Lobbyists for hospitals, nursing homes and other health care providers plan a huge campaign to kill the president's proposals, which they say will ultimately harm beneficiaries.

Mr. Bush said his proposals would just slow the programs' growth. "Our budget reduces Medicare's average annual growth rate over five years to 5.6 percent, from 6.5 percent," Mr. Bush said, while Medicaid would grow 7.1 percent a year, instead of 7.3 percent.

In the past, Mr. Bush has proposed trimming Medicare payments to health care providers for a few years, but now he proposes to make the cutbacks permanent, so that hospitals and nursing homes would never receive a full update for inflation.

For the Children's Health Insurance Program, Mr. Bush requests $5.4 billion in 2008, a reduction of $223 million, or 4 percent, from this year's level. Beyond the current levels of spending, the White House is seeking an "additional allotment" of $5 billion over the next five years, which is less than half of what would be needed to maintain coverage for children currently enrolled.

Mr. Bush said he wanted to return the program to its "original objective" of covering children with family incomes less than twice the poverty level. Budget documents note that 16 states cover children above that level, and "one state, New Jersey, covers children up to 350 percent of the federal poverty level." A family of four is considered poor if its annual income is less than $20,650.

In a visit to the National Institutes of Health last month, Mr. Bush said, "The N.I.H. is one of America's greatest assets, and it needs to be nourished," adding, "It makes sense to spend taxpayers' money on cancer research."

DOJ_NMG_0127400

But the president's budget for biomedical research is basically flat. He is requesting $28.9 billion for the health institutes in 2008, an increase of $232 million, or less than 1 percent. For the National Cancer Institute, Mr. Bush is requesting $4.8 billion, which is $9 million less than this year's level.

To fight childhood obesity, Mr. Bush asks Congress to set aside $17 million for a new program to promote "healthy behavior" among adolescents. But at the same time, he asks Congress to eliminate the preventive health services block grant, which provides $99 million a year to help states prevent obesity and other chronic conditions.

Mr. Bush proposes an 18 percent cut in the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program, which provides $2.2 billion to help people pay heating bills this year. At a time of high fuel prices, many lawmakers are likely to resist the cut.

Lawmakers See Pot Of Gold In Tax Gap (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — For members of Congress, thinking up bright ideas for spending tax dollars comes as naturally as breathing. But, constrained by big deficits and a pledge not to make them any bigger, lawmakers find themselves in an uncomfortable bind.

That's why Washington has suddenly discovered a new buzzword — the "tax gap" — and the roughly $300-billion pot of untouched gold that it promises. That's how much the Internal Revenue Service says taxpayers owe the government annually but, for various reasons, never pay.

The chances of significantly narrowing that gap appear slim. But as Congress gets ready to receive President Bush's 2008 budget Monday, Democrats and Republicans alike are talking it up as a way to fund politically appealing initiatives — and bring down the deficit to boot.

"Closing the tax gap has got to be one of our top priorities," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.).

The IRS is probably low-balling its estimate of the tax gap, he said, and there should be more than $300 billion available.

To boost efforts to harvest it, the chairman and the top Republican member of the Senate's tax-writing finance committee, Sens. Max Baucus of Montana and Chuck Grassley of Iowa, took the unusual step last week of visiting the IRS and asking some of its top bureaucrats about the tax gap — and presumably ways it might be closed.

Though the existence of the tax gap is real enough, the likelihood that any substantial part of it can be collected is more hope than fact. The gap has been around as long as there have been taxes, and past efforts to close it have yielded meager results.

"If the tax gap was easy to close, the IRS would already have done it," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com.

For one thing, the IRS would have to use tougher tactics to get more revenue — and that would make taxpayers squawk. The last time Congress addressed the subject of tax collection methods, in 1998, it reined in overzealous IRS agents.

"The 1998 act tilted the table in tax disputes in favor of taxpayers suspected of noncompliance," wrote Max B. Sawicky, an economist at the Economic Policy Institute, in his book "Bridging the Tax Gap."

Collecting more would also require spending more for audits and investigations. In fact, the IRS last year had a smaller enforcement staff, and it conducted fewer audits — fewer than one individual return in 100 — than a decade earlier.

"You can ask for more audits, income-tax withholding and reporting of income to the IRS," said Mel Schwarz, a partner in the Washington office of the accounting firm Grant Thornton. "All of this would be invasive on a lot of taxpayers, many of whom already pay their taxes."

And as Robert D. Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute, pointed out, a lot of the money is owed by people who have gone bankrupt or moved overseas to escape the IRS' reach.

Also largely beyond the tax collectors' grasp is the huge underground cash economy, whose transactions go unreported to any financial authorities. It would take an American equivalent of the KGB to bring that into compliance with the U.S. tax code.

DOJ_NMG_0127401

Measuring the tax gap is as much art as science. To find out what taxpayers should have paid on their 2001 income, the IRS conducted reviews of a random sample of 46,000 individual returns.

The IRS estimates that taxpayers still owed $345 billion after most 2001 tax payments were due. A combination of voluntary late payments and IRS enforcement actions shaved that figure to $290 billion. That means taxpayers paid 86.6% of the $2.157 trillion they owed — the vast majority of it voluntarily.

Like just about everything else with a dollar sign in front of it, the $290-billion tax gap has probably grown since 2001. Even if it stayed the same, it would be enough to balance this year's budget, with about $50 billion left over.

Underpayment of individual income taxes dominates the tax gap. The IRS estimated that individuals accounted for 71% of the 2001 tax gap, with the rest coming from underpayments of corporate income taxes, payroll taxes for Social Security and Medicare, and estate taxes.

The IRS traced most of the gap to taxpayers who underreported their taxable income, either by failing to report some income or by taking more deductions and credits than they were entitled to. Failure to file tax returns and failure to pay taxes owed accounted for much less.

Some of the tax gap is the result of honest mistakes on tax forms, which grow more complex every year as Congress adds new wrinkles to the tax code. The IRS can't say how big this category is.

But one thing is apparent from the IRS' research: The government has a much better chance of collecting the money it is owed if a portion of it is withheld in advance and if the income is reported by two sources — taxpayers and their employers.

In 2001, for example, taxpayers failed to pay taxes on only 1.2% of income in cases in which employers reported substantial information to the IRS and withheld at least some taxes from their workers' paychecks. But when substantial information was reported to the IRS but no taxes were withheld — as with interest and dividend income — the noncompliance rate nearly quadrupled, to 4.5%. And when the IRS received little or no independent information, the noncompliance rate was 53.9%, meaning it received less than half the taxes owed.

More withholding, or at least more reporting when money changes hands, would undoubtedly mean a smaller tax gap. But it wouldn't always be easy to arrange. It's one thing to ask a huge corporation to withhold taxes from its employees; it has a brigade of accountants to take care of that.

But the IRS would set off the modern equivalent of the Boston Tea Party if it required families to withhold taxes or file a report with the IRS every time they paid the plumber or bought an apple at the corner market. Short of a technological breakthrough, it will be the responsibility of the plumber and the corner grocer to report their full income.

Of course, tax cheating can grow to a scale far beyond the local plumber or grocer.

Two recent examples: A North Carolina man was sentenced to 41 months in prison for not reporting $850,000 in commissions that he paid himself for investments he solicited in a company he started. And a Washington state man got a year and a day in prison for failing to report at least $1 million in income from the U.S. Postal Service for installing and maintaining mailboxes.

A favorite tax dodge involves transferring funds to banks in countries with little or no income taxes and arranging the books so that all the profits seem to have been made there. Sen. Conrad said a single five-story building in the Cayman Islands, a notorious tax haven, was listed as the local address of 12,000 U.S. companies.

Conrad said that while he was North Dakota's tax commissioner, he found an oil company that showed losses at every step of the marketing chain in the United States — but made up for it and then some in the Cayman Islands, even though it has only one employee there.

"That man is really a hard worker," Conrad said. "He's down there producing millions in profits when thousands of employees in the United States produce none."

Facing Inequality (WP)

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

THERE WAS a flurry of excitement when President Bush allowed the words "global climate change" to escape his lips in his State of the Union address. He didn't propose any useful response to the problem, but somehow we were supposed to feel grateful that in his seventh year in office he finally had acknowledged the phenomenon's existence. Last week came a similar epiphany, when Mr. Bush went to Manhattan and acknowledged for the first time the reality of income inequality.

DOJ_NMG_0127402

"The fact is that income inequality is real," Mr. Bush pronounced. Not only that, but "it's been rising for more than 25 years." The historical addendum no doubt was intended to insulate the president from any blame in the matter. But it has the opposite effect. If rising income inequality was already a problem when Mr. Bush took office, his regressive reshaping of the tax code becomes even less excusable.

Mr. Bush is right on his history. Post-tax income of the top fifth of households was 6.7 times higher than incomes of the bottom fifth 25 years ago; the multiple has risen to 9.8. That wouldn't be so terrible if everyone's incomes were rising at a healthy clip, but between 1980 and 2004 wages of the typical worker actually fell slightly, when adjusted for inflation. Mr. Bush says that "the reason is clear," which must come as alarming news to an army of economists who make their living debating the relative importance of globalization, technology and other factors. Mr. Bush's diagnosis -- "we have an economy that increasingly rewards education" -- leads to a useful prescription, namely, as he said, "strengthening public education."

But as everyone knows, that's a tall order, and one in which the federal government has only a modest say. The federal government could make college more accessible and expand access to Head Start and similar early-childhood programs, which would improve equality of opportunity. But as we argued in a series on inequality last year, there's also much the federal government could do to address the problem more directly. The federal mortgage-interest deduction, for example, overwhelmingly benefits top earners; so do tax incentives to promote retirement savings and (as Mr. Bush, to his credit, recently pointed out) health insurance. In 2004, for example, the richest one-tenth of households reaped 49 percent of the tax subsidies for IRAs, 401(k)s and other defined-contribution pensions. All of these tax benefits could be reformed, without being abolished, to tilt a bit less in the direction of the wealthy.

The government can't solve the problem of inequality by taking from the rich and giving to the poor, and it shouldn't try. If a tax system becomes too onerous for top earners, it discourages innovation, entrepreneurship and the economic growth on which everyone depends. But in an era when largely uncontrollable forces are pushing against equality and fairness, the government shouldn't be needlessly pushing in the same direction. This week Mr. Bush will insist in his proposed budget that all of his tax cuts be extended. Those have proved enormously more beneficial to the super-rich than to anyone else. Given the reality that Mr. Bush has at last taken note of, such a policy just makes no sense.

In Washington, Contractors Take On Biggest Role Ever (NYT)

By Scott Shane, Ron Nixon

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3 — In June, short of people to process cases of incompetence and fraud by federal contractors, officials at the General Services Administration responded with what has become the government's reflexive answer to almost every problem.

They hired another contractor.

It did not matter that the company they chose, CACI International, had itself recently avoided a suspension from federal contracting; or that the work, delving into investigative files on other contractors, appeared to pose a conflict of interest; or that each person supplied by the company would cost taxpayers $104 an hour. Six CACI workers soon joined hundreds of other private-sector workers at the G.S.A., the government's management agency.

Without a public debate or formal policy decision, contractors have become a virtual fourth branch of government. On the rise for decades, spending on federal contracts has soared during the Bush administration, to about $400 billion last year from $207 billion in 2000, fueled by the war in Iraq, domestic security and Hurricane Katrina, but also by a philosophy that encourages outsourcing almost everything government does.

Contractors still build ships and satellites, but they also collect income taxes and work up agency budgets, fly pilotless spy aircraft and take the minutes at policy meetings on the war. They sit next to federal employees at nearly every agency; far more people work under contracts than are directly employed by the government. Even the government's online database for tracking contracts, the Federal Procurement Data System, has been outsourced (and is famously difficult to use).

DOJ_NMG_0127403

The contracting explosion raises questions about propriety, cost and accountability that have long troubled watchdog groups and are coming under scrutiny from the Democratic majority in Congress. While flagrant cases of fraud and waste make headlines, concerns go beyond outright wrongdoing. Among them:

-Competition, intended to produce savings, appears to have sharply eroded. An analysis by The New York Times shows that fewer than half of all "contract actions" — new contracts and payments against existing contracts — are now subject to full and open competition. Just 48 percent were competitive in 2005, down from 79 percent in 2001.

-The most secret and politically delicate government jobs, like intelligence collection and budget preparation, are increasingly contracted out, despite regulations forbidding the outsourcing of "inherently governmental" work. Scott Amey, general counsel at the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group, said allowing CACI workers to review other contractors captured in microcosm "a government that's run by corporations."

-Agencies are crippled in their ability to seek low prices, supervise contractors and intervene when work goes off course because the number of government workers overseeing contracts has remained level as spending has shot up. One federal contractor explained candidly in a conference call with industry analysts last May that "one of the side benefits of the contracting officers being so overwhelmed" was that existing contracts were extended rather than put up for new competitive bidding.

-The most successful contractors are not necessarily those doing the best work, but those who have mastered the special skill of selling to Uncle Sam. The top 20 service contractors have spent nearly $300 million since 2000 on lobbying and have donated $23 million to political campaigns. "We've created huge behemoths that are doing 90 or 95 percent of their business with the government," said Peter W. Singer, who wrote a book on military outsourcing. "They're not really companies, they're quasi agencies." Indeed, the biggest federal contractor, Lockheed Martin, which has spent $53 million on lobbying and $6 million on donations since 2000, gets more federal money each year than the Departments of Justice or Energy.

¶Contracting almost always leads to less public scrutiny, as government programs are hidden behind closed corporate doors. Companies, unlike agencies, are not subject to the Freedom of Information Act. Members of Congress have sought unsuccessfully for two years to get the Army to explain the contracts for Blackwater USA security officers in Iraq, which involved several costly layers of subcontractors.

Weighing the Limits

The contracting surge has raised bipartisan alarms. A just-completed study by experts appointed by the White House and Congress, the Acquisition Advisory Panel, found that the trend "poses a threat to the government's long-term ability to perform its mission" and could "undermine the integrity of the government's decision making."

The House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, whose new Democratic chairman, Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, added the word "oversight" to signal his intentions, begins a series of investigative hearings on Tuesday focusing on contracts in Iraq and at the Department of Homeland Security.

"Billions of dollars are being squandered, and the taxpayer is being taken to the cleaners," said Mr. Waxman, who got an "F" rating last year from the Contract Services Association, an industry coalition. The chairman he succeeded, Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, earned an "A."

David M. Walker, who as comptroller general of the United States leads the Government Accountability Office, has urged Congress to take a hard look at the proper limits of contracting. Mr. Walker has not taken a stand against contractors — his agency is also dependent on them, he admits — but he says they often fail to deliver the promised efficiency and savings. Private companies cannot be expected to look out for taxpayers' interests, he said.

"There's something civil servants have that the private sector doesn't," Mr. Walker said in an interview. "And that is the duty of loyalty to the greater good — the duty of loyalty to the collective best interest of all rather than the interest of a few. Companies have duties of loyalty to their shareholders, not to the country."

Even the most outspoken critics acknowledge that the government cannot operate without contractors, which provide the surge capacity to handle crises without expanding the permanent bureaucracy. Contractors provide specialized skills the government does not have. And it is no secret that some government executives favor contractors because they find the federal bureaucracy slow, inflexible or incompetent.

DOJ_NMG_0127404

Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, which represents government contractors, acknowledged occasional chicanery by contractors and too little competition in some areas. But Mr. Soloway asserted that critics had exaggerated the contracting problems.

"I don't happen to think the system is fundamentally broken," he said. "It's remarkable how well it works, given the dollar volume."

Blurring the Lines

Wariness of government contracting dates at least to 1941, when Harry S. Truman, then a senator, declared, "I have never yet found a contractor who, if not watched, would not leave the government holding the bag."

But the recent contracting boom had its origins in the "reinventing government" effort of the Clinton administration, which slashed the federal work force to the lowest level since 1960 and streamlined outsourcing. Limits on what is "inherently governmental" and therefore off-limits to contractors have grown fuzzy, as the General Services Administration's use of CACI International personnel shows.

"Hi Heinz," Renee Ballard, a G.S.A. official, wrote in an e-mail message to Heinz Ruppmann, a CACI official, last June 12, asking for six "contract specialists" to help with a backlog of 226 cases that could lead to companies being suspended or barred from federal contracting. The CACI workers would review files and prepare "proposed responses for review and signature," she wrote.

Mr. Amey, of the Project on Government Oversight, which obtained the contract documents under the Freedom of Information Act, said such work was clearly inherently governmental and called it "outrageous" to involve contractors in judging the misdeeds of potential competitors. CACI had itself been reviewed in 2004 for possible suspension in connection with supplying interrogators to the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. The company was ultimately cleared, though the G.S.A. found that CACI employees had improperly written parts of the "statements of work" for its own Iraq contract.

The price of $104 an hour — well over $200,000 per person annually — was roughly double the cost of pay and benefits of a comparable federal worker, Mr. Amey said.

Asked for comment, the G.S.A. said decisions on punishments for erring contractors "is indeed inherently governmental." But the agency said that while the CACI workers assisted for three months, "all suspension/debarment decisions were made by federal employees." A CACI spokeswoman made the same point.

The G.S.A., like other agencies, said it did not track the number or total cost of its contract workers. The agency administrator, Lurita Doan, who previously ran a Virginia contracting firm, has actively pushed contracting. Ms. Doan recently clashed with her agency's inspector general over her proposal to remove the job of auditing contractors' proposed prices from his office and to hire contractors to do it instead.

On some of the biggest government projects, Bush administration officials have sought to shift some decision making to contractors. When Michael P. Jackson, deputy secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, addressed potential bidders on the huge Secure Border Initiative last year, he explained the new approach.

"This is an unusual invitation," said Mr. Jackson, a contracting executive before joining the agency. "We're asking you to come back and tell us how to do our business."

Boeing, which won the $80 million first phase of the estimated $2 billion project, is assigned not only to develop technology but also to propose how to use it, which includes assigning roles to different government agencies and contractors. Homeland Security officials insist that they will make all final decisions, but the department's inspector general, Richard L. Skinner, reported bluntly in November that "the department does not have the capacity needed to effectively plan, oversee and execute the SBInet program."

A 'Blended Work Force'

If the government is exporting some traditional functions to contractors, it is also inviting contractors into agencies to perform delicate tasks. The State Department, for instance, pays more than $2 million a year to BearingPoint, the consulting giant, to provide support for Iraq policy making, running software, preparing meeting agendas and keeping minutes.

DOJ_NMG_0127405

State Department officials insist that the company's workers, who hold security clearances, merely relieve diplomats of administrative tasks and never influence policy. But the presence of contractors inside closed discussions on war strategy is a notable example of what officials call the "blended work force."

That blending is taking place in virtually every agency. When Polly Endreny, 29, sought work last year with the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration, she was surprised to discover that most openings were with contractors.

"The younger generation is coming in on contracts," said Ms. Endreny, who likes the arrangement. Today, only the "Oak Management" on her ID badge distinguishes her from federal employees at the agency's headquarters.

She said her pay was "a little higher" than that of comparable federal workers, and she gets dental coverage they do not. Such disparities can cause trouble. A recent study of one NOAA program where two-thirds of the work force were contractors found that differences in salary and benefits could " substantially undermine staff relations and morale."

The shift away from open competition affects more than morale. One example among many: with troops short in Iraq, Congress in 2003 waived a ban on the use of private security guards to protect military bases in the United States. The results for the first $733 million were dismal, investigators at the Government Accountability Office found.

The Army spent 25 percent more than it had to because it used sole-source contracts at 46 of 57 sites, the investigators concluded. And screening of guards was so lax that at one base, 61 guards were hired despite criminal records, auditors reported. Yet the Army gave the contractors more than $18 million in incentive payments intended to reward good performance. (The Army did not contest G.A.O.'s findings and has changed its methods.)

A Coalition for Contracting

Mr. Soloway, of the contracting industry group, argues that the contracting boom has resulted from the collision of a high-technology economy with an aging government work force — twice as many employees are over 55 as under 30. To function, Mr. Soloway said, the government must now turn to younger, skilled personnel in the private sector, a phenomenon likely to grow when what demographers call a "retirement tsunami" occurs over the next decade.

"This is the new face of government," Mr. Soloway said. "This isn't companies gouging the government. This is the marketplace."

But Paul C. Light of New York University, who has long tracked the hidden contractor work force to assess what he calls the "true size of government," says the shift to contractors is driven in part by federal personnel ceilings. He calls such ceilings a "sleight of hand" intended to allow successive administrations to brag about cutting the federal work force.

Yet Mr. Light said the government had made no effort to count contractors and no assessment of the true costs and benefits. "We have no data to show that contractors are actually more efficient than the government," he said.

Meanwhile, he said, a potent coalition keeps contracting growing: the companies, their lobbyists and supporters in Congress and many government managers, who do not mind building ties to contractors who may hire them someday. "All the players with any power like it," he said.

That is evident wherever in Washington contractors gather to scout new opportunities. There is no target richer than the Homeland Security Department, whose Web site, in a section called "Open for Business," displays hundreds of open contracts, including "working with selected cities to develop and exercise their catastrophic plans" ($500,000 to $1 million) and "Conduct studies and analyses, systems engineering, or provide laboratory services to various organizations to support the DHS mission" ($20 to $50 million).

One crisp morning in an office building with a spectacular view of the Capitol, Alfonso Martinez-Fonts Jr., the agency's assistant secretary for the private sector, addressed a breakfast seminar on "The Business of Homeland Security." The session drew a standing-room crowd.

Mr. Martinez-Fonts, a banker before joining the government, said he could not personally hand out contracts but could offer "tips, hints and directions" to companies on the hunt.

Joe Haddock, a Sikorsky Helicopters executive, summed up the tone of the session. "To us contractors," Mr. Haddock said, "money is always a good thing."

Capitol's Newcomers Try A Little Openness (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0127406

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Jon Tester stands out from the other 99 members of the Senate in these ways:

The organic farmer wears cowboy boots with his dark business suits. He sports a buzz haircut that is more Marine drill sergeant than wavy-haired senator. He passes more people on his five-block walk from his Washington apartment to the Capitol than he might see in a week in Montana.

And then there's this: He posts his daily schedule on his Web site for all the world to see.

In a culture where lawmakers spend hours in closed-door meetings, and their activities out of the public eye are considered proprietary, Tester is a trailblazer bent on opening up the inner workings of his office. His radical practice comes after irate voters in November tossed out longtime incumbents implicated in lobbying scandals and as public interest groups clamor for more transparency in the way Congress does business.

Tester's early days in office have been filled by half-hour meetings that start at 8 a.m. and stretch until sundown. He's hosted the Montana Wheat & Barley Committee and Big Timber Montana. He sat down with the Burlington Northern Santa Fe, the major freight railroad in the West, as well as the union which represents its labor force, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Trainmen. One day, he had three separate meetings with three different Indian tribes.

Every session with lobbyists, constituents and other lawmakers is conscientiously recorded, including names, affiliations and the duration of the meeting.

"I just wanted to give people an opportunity to see who I meet with," said Tester, a freshman Democrat who unseated three-term Republican Conrad Burns, helping the Democrats win control of the Senate. "I believe in transparent government and this is my effort."

Before the newcomer's staff got his Web site up and running, they taped a paper copy of his daily schedule to his office door. "But we realized that doesn't do a lot of good for the people back in Montana," said Matt McKenna, his communications director.

Tester's schedule is quite detailed, including entries describing his visits to the Senate gym and dinners with his wife, Sharla. "I just thought it would be easier than trying to explain gaps in time," he said.

In the House, Rep. Kirsten Gillibrand, a freshman Democrat from Upstate New York, is doing something similar. Although she gives less detail than Tester, Gillibrand lists her work-related meetings each day on her Web site.

"I was trying to think what are ways to restore public's confidence that special interests don't have overwhelming influence," said Gillibrand, who promised during her campaign to publicize her schedule. "And I figured the best way is to provide information about who members are meeting with."

She does not describe the duration of meetings or include personal appointments. "If I have lunch with a girlfriend, I don't want that on the schedule," Gillibrand said. "This is not Reality Congress, where you live the life of a congressman. I'm not going to post how many calories I eat today. This is about ethics reform, letting people know who's bending your ear."

Richard A. Baker, the Senate historian, cannot find a precedent for what Tester and Gillibrand are doing. Former Democratic senator Bob Graham of Florida was known for his eccentric habit of keeping a running log of his every waking activity, including the brand of breakfast cereal he consumed, but he never published the 4,400 notebooks he filled over 26 years of scribbling.

During her campaign for office, Gillibrand signed a pledge circulated by the Sunlight Foundation, a nonpartisan organization dedicated to bringing greater transparency to government. Of the 92 congressional candidates nationwide who agreed to the pledge, Gillibrand was the only one to win office.

"This is a recognition that 60 percent of Americans punch a clock, report on time sheets how much time they work and how they spend at time," said Ellen Miller, executive director of the foundation, which would like nothing more than a law requiring lawmakers to make their schedules public. "Why shouldn't members of Congress do the same?"

The Sunlight Foundation is archiving Tester's and Gillibrand's daily schedules at http://www.congresspedia.com in a format to allow searches and analysis.

DOJ_NMG_0127407

Bill Frenzel, a scholar at the Brookings Institution who was a Republican member of Congress for 20 years, takes a dimmer view. "It sounds pretty silly," said Frenzel, who represented a Minnesota district. "People don't need to know who you're meeting with, they need to know whether you're available to meet with them."

He said he was reminded of former senator Richard Stone of Florida, who took the door to his office off its hinges to emphasize his own transparency. "Grandstanding is what you'd call it in minor league baseball," Frenzel said.

Tester and Gillibrand said their constituents like the public schedules and none of the lobbyists have grumbled about them. "If they're nervous about it it's probably someone I shouldn't be meeting with," Tester said.

According to his schedule, Tester sat down with AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney and the union's legislative director, William Samuel on Jan. 24 for a half-hour. "I'm fine with it," Samuel said. "Unlike others in Washington, we have no interest in covering our tracks . . . We might have known more about how the Republicans were coming up with energy plans and prescription drug plans if we knew how much time they were spending with their corporate lobbyists."

Tester and Gillibrand both rode to office emphasizing corruption scandals and the need to bring new openness to Washington.

Tester, who was president of the Montana Senate in a Republican-leaning state, hammered on the fact that Burns accepted $150,000 in campaign contributions from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, his firm and his clients. Burns later returned the money but Tester made Burns's connection to Abramoff a major part of the campaign. Tester was heavily outspent by Burns but won by 2,565 votes.

Gillibrand won her seat after painting her rival, Republican John E. Sweeney, as ethically troubled. Sweeney, an eight-year House veteran, took a trip to the Northern Mariana Islands with an Abramoff associate. Late in the campaign, it became public that police responded to a domestic violence call involving Sweeney and his wife.

Miller said the Sunlight Foundation plans to lobby other members of Congress to post their schedules. But with just two of 535 participating, there is a lot of work ahead.

Gillibrand said she wants to create a special caucus of like-minded members. She already has a name -- the Sunshine Caucus. Now all she needs are members, she said.

Balking On Bundling (WP)

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

DISTURBING, though not particularly surprising, rumblings are emanating from the House of Representatives to the effect that some Democrats are balking at requiring lobbyists to disclose the campaign contributions they arrange or collect for lawmakers.

This important requirement was included in the lobbying and ethics package that recently passed the Senate; Reps. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.) have introduced the same measure in the House and want to see it included in the lobbying legislation that the House plans to take up in the next few months. A similar provision was overwhelmingly approved by the House Judiciary Committee last year but unceremoniously disappeared from the final version of the legislation, which never became law in any event.

The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported last week that some Democratic House members, egged on by K Street lobbyists, are agitating to have the provision removed. That can't be allowed to happen. Mr. Van Hollen, who's responsible for helping to raise big money from K Street and elsewhere as the new head of the House Democrats' campaign arm, nonetheless understands that providing accurate information about the real influence of lobbyists is a critical piece of reform.

As it stands, lawmakers who happily take the cash and the lobbyists who harvest it for them are all too aware of how much the former are indebted to the latter. The public is left in the dark. If House leaders want to have credibility on cleaning up the "culture of corruption" they decry, they will see to it that the lobbying package that passes the House is as strong on this score as the Senate version.

Cardin Finds Passion For Speeches (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127408

There were jokes on the Maryland campaign trail last year that Benjamin L. Cardin would easily win the race to succeed longtime Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes because voters thought they were the same man.

Both are liberal Democrats, studious, reserved and -- after each spent years in the Maryland legislature and Congress -- prone to long-winded discourses on policy intricacies.

Neither was known for inspired oratory.

Since he took the oath last month as Maryland's freshman senator, however, Mr. Cardin has distinguished himself from his predecessor with bold words and an aggressive style.

In his first speech on the Senate floor, delivered a week after taking office, Mr. Cardin denounced President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq and called for the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

"We need a surge in U.S. troops coming home, not a surge in those going to war," said Mr. Cardin, adding that the plan wasn't new but more of the same, "just now with more American troops in harm's way."

Mr. Cardin, 63, also spoke passionately about global warming as a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee.

"The impact of global warming is real and right before our eyes," he said. "It's a crisis that affects every human being on this Earth, and we must take action now."

He rose on the Senate floor in support of increasing the federal minimum wage, saying, "I believe it is wrong that millions of hard-working Americans who play by the rules still live in poverty and are unable to provide for their families."

Mr. Cardin's quick transition from 20-year House veteran to up-and-coming freshman senator has not gone unnoticed by his colleagues.

"He brings a fresh spirit to the Senate," said Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, a Democrat who for two decades has been Maryland's firebrand senator beside the stately Mr. Sarbanes, now retired.

"Ben Cardin certainly shares Paul Sarbanes' integrity and dedication to the state of Maryland," Miss Mikulski said, "but Ben is his own man and will create his own legacy."

Mr. Cardin told The Washington Times that he is still finding his way as a senator, and he confided that "it is a thrill" every time he performs the freshman duty of presiding over the Senate.

"I still wake up every morning very thankful for the opportunities I have being a United States senator," he said. "I still have a smile on my face."

He also said he welcomed comparisons to Mr. Sarbanes and Miss Mikulski, two lawmakers he emulates. Still, Mr. Cardin said he would continue to build his own reputation.

"I have my own way of doing business," he said. "I call it my own brand name. I think I've developed a reputation of my own, and that's what I want. ... I've got a little Mikulski and Sarbanes in me, as well as a lot of other people. Certainly, there's a lot of my mother and father in me."

Pathologists Protest Defense Site's Closure (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Medical specialists and former military officials are protesting the planned dismantling of a Defense Department health agency whose origin dates to the Civil War, saying the move would eliminate an invaluable tool in the diagnosis and understanding of disease.

The Armed Forces Institute of Pathology is scheduled to be broken up as part of the federal base-closing process that will shutter Walter Reed Army Medical Center by 2011. The AFIP board of governors will meet today to make final recommendations about how to proceed.

The institute is a descendant of the Army Medical Museum, created in 1862 to be a repository for tissue specimens from injured and diseased Civil War soldiers. With more than 800 employees, the AFIP provides pathology consultation, research and medical education for the military, other federal agencies and the civilian medical community. It has a repository of 95 million tissue samples that helps government scientists track disease and provide second opinions in difficult pathology cases.

DOJ_NMG_0127409

"It's sort of like the Supreme Court for pathology," said Gretchen Schaefer, a spokeswoman for the College of American Pathologists.

The institute made headlines last year when a team reconstructed the virus behind the 1918-19 Spanish flu, which killed 50 million people worldwide. The team used material from the AFIP collection -- tiny dried pieces of lung tissue from two soldiers who had died in the pandemic -- as a source of virus fragments, which were then amplified and reassembled into a working virus. The project is helping scientists understand what made the 1918 flu so contagious and so fatal as they seek ways to combat future pandemics.

But agency officials and outside experts say work of that caliber will no longer be possible after the breakup of the institute, with some functions moving to other Defense Department facilities and others discontinued. In particular, they object to plans to outsource to civilian laboratories the 55,000 second-opinion pathology consultations AFIP specialists provide each year, along with some initial-diagnosis work, and to move the tissue repository to another Defense facility in the Washington area. More than 400 support staff members and scientists would lose their jobs, said Prakash Jha, a pathologist at the agency.

The pathologists and other scientists at the institute have unmatched expertise and routinely handle the hardest cases, such as determining whether biopsied bone tissue is cancerous, said Vernon W. Armbrustmacher, the retired Air Force colonel who headed the agency from 1991 to 1995.

"There's a great variety in the way these things present, and to give a reliable answer requires a lot of experience," he said. "I don't think there's a comparable organization that looks at these kinds of problems in that depth."

Moreover, the repository -- which government scientists draw upon in analyzing new samples and add to in the course of their work -- will stagnate "like a library that can't get new books," he said.

Stephen L. Jones, principal deputy assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, said that the agency has done "tremendous work" but that commercial laboratories are capable of doing the civilian pathology consultations. He said the base-closing process and reviews by the institute's governing board have ensured that critical functions will be preserved.

Between the work of the Base Realignment and Closure Commission and the institute's board, Jones said, he thinks "we will not lose any capabilities that are necessary for national security purposes."

Jones said the department is studying ways to ensure that the tissue repository remains useful. "We want to make maximum benefits of any assets that it may have, from a research or an advancement-of-science standpoint," he said.

The agency's advocates, unconvinced, have urged the Defense Department to consider transferring the pathology services and other functions to the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences in Bethesda, a move that would keep the scientific expertise in-house and ensure continued growth of the tissue repository. That idea has been backed by 30 groups, including the American Medical Association, the American Society for Clinical Pathology and the National Association of Medical Examiners, and by at least seven Democratic lawmakers, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.).

BearingPoint, hired by the Defense Department as a consultant, also recommended that course in a report last year, concluding that retaining the pathology functions would help with homeland security missions such as rapidly responding to bioterrorism. That option would cost $18.2 million, however, compared with about $5 million for outsourcing the work, according to BearingPoint.

Health Coverage's Momentum (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Piece by piece, the stage is being set for the long-overdue effort to rebuild America's creaky health-care system into one that can meet the needs of the 21st century. It probably won't happen until 2009, but the outlines of the big change are starting to become clear.

As is always the case, the driving force is coming from the people. More and more families are experiencing the terror of living without health insurance -- about 47 million uninsured at last count. And additional millions are facing rising premiums and co-payments that strain family budgets.

DOJ_NMG_0127410

As the costs rise, more and more employers are bailing out of providing health coverage, and the pressure for help from government is rising. With Congress wary of systemic reform after the collapse of the Clintons' initiative in 1994, states are being forced to improvise their own solutions.

Last year, Massachusetts, with Republican Gov. Mitt Romney and the Democratic legislature collaborating, devised a plan to provide coverage for all its residents. Now, the first cost estimates have come in, and monthly premiums are projected to be almost twice as expensive as Romney predicted. It's not clear whether the plan can go forward.

Meantime, California's Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has offered his own universal coverage proposal -- based on the Massachusetts model -- to tackle the much larger challenge of his state's millions of uninsured. The Democratic-controlled Legislature is studying it, and its fate is uncertain.

Both the Massachusetts and California plans step away from the 65-year-old pattern of tying health insurance to the place of employment, a historical oddity now visibly failing in this far more mobile society. Instead, these plans require every individual to purchase health insurance, with subsidies as needed to be financed by government, business and, in Schwarzenegger's plan, hospitals and doctors.

A major barrier to all such schemes is the feature of the federal tax code that subsidizes job-based health insurance by making its cost deductible to the business and tax-free to the employee. As C. Eugene Steuerle of the Urban Institute testified to Congress last week, this represents a $200 billion-a-year subsidy, with most of the benefits going to the well-to-do -- a sum that could be much better spent on helping the uninsured.

President Bush has proposed a partial remedy for that problem, substituting a flat deduction for the value of every health insurance policy costing the employer and worker up to $7,500 a person. He would use the savings to help lower-income workers buy policies.

Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the ranking Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, joined many Democrats in saying that Bush's proposal can be improved by using tax credits, rather than deductions, to distribute the benefits.

But the door has been opened by the president to a negotiation that could lead to a conversion to individual insurance, along with a guarantee of universal coverage. Democratic Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon, who has written and vetted a plan for doing just that, told me last week that his conversations with some Republican colleagues convinced him that "there may be a window this year" for moving such a bill.

Chances are, however, that this session, Congress will simply renew and expand the existing program that provides health insurance for children. There is bipartisan support for that measure, and one of the newly formed coalitions of business, labor, consumer and provider groups has called for that as a first step toward covering everyone.

The emergence of these coalitions -- at least two of them are active -- is one more sign of the growing momentum for systemic reform.

Last October, health-care experts Drew Altman and Robert Blendon wrote in the journal Health Affairs that "the presidential candidates' level of attention will be decisive to where health ranks on the national agenda going into the 2008 election and the 2009 Congress. If they do play a leadership role on health, the media will follow, and the agenda-setting power of a debate driven from the top will meet the public's concern rising up from the bottom like two weather fronts colliding."

Exactly that is happening. As he seeks the GOP nomination, Romney is touting his plan for universal coverage, and last month Democratic Sen. Barack Obama committed to the same goal -- without saying how to get there. On her first trip to Iowa, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton showed her mastery of the subject, explaining what had gone wrong in 1994 and the lessons learned.

The bar has been raised to the point that any presidential candidate in either party without a plan for universal coverage may be seen as falling short. And that in turn could make 2009 the long-awaited breakthrough year.

A Billion-Dollar Election Warning (NYT)

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Once upon a time, Washington managed to fully confront a corruption scandal and invent a government solution that actually worked for 30 years. The scandal was Watergate. The solution was the innovative option of providing public financing to presidential campaigns as a means of curbing the influence of big money donors like those who ran amok in President Richard Nixon's 1972 re-election.

DOJ_NMG_0127411

Since then, candidates opted for the subsidies — and the spending limits that come with them — in every general election. And most did in the primary elections, too. But not next time. Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and John McCain have already signaled their intentions to make a shameful and lucrative retreat to private fund-raising. The Clinton camp is creating a new honored donor category for those who bag at least a million dollars each, with strategists mirthfully debating whether to dub these fat-cat groomers "Pathfinders" or "Hillraisers." We suggest Recidivists.

Whoever the two nominees are, they will very likely ring up the first $1 billion presidential cycle between them. All of this is because past Congresses failed to update the public financing option to keep pace with the costs of running a modern campaign.

The new Congress already has a bipartisan proposal in the works to update the public financing formula in time for 2012. It roughly triples subsidies for a participating candidate to $150 million in the primaries, and increases them by a third, to $ 100 million, in the general election. There would be a four-to-one match of donations up to $200 instead of the current one-to-one, plus an extra subsidy if a privately funded candidate's checkbook overwhelms competitiveness. Funds would be available earlier for the ever-earlier primary cycle.

Public financing served the nation well. In three of six races in which an incumbent president ran, the challenger won — a healthy dynamic in a capital city where only one in 20 House incumbents is toppled by a challenger.

The new Congress pledged to clean up big-money corruption; it can make a good start by rescuing the good that came of Watergate.

Farm Bill Doesn't Go Far Enough (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

THINKING ABOUT HOW much money Congress is gearing up to waste in the next farm bill makes us yearn for some help from on high. Not from heaven, mind you, but Canada.

The Bush administration last week unveiled its proposal for the 2007 farm bill, a blueprint spelling out U.S. agricultural subsidies and food stamp payments for the next five years. For anybody interested in fairness, government waste, free trade or economic growth, it was a deeply disappointing document, even if it is a major improvement over the trade-distorting porkapalooza that was the 2002 farm bill.

The trouble is, even this modest fix is being heavily resisted by the farm lobby and its backers in Congress.

Canada to the rescue, to cite a rarely uttered line. The Canadian government could prove to be the U.S. taxpayers' best friend in the upcoming legislative battles. That's because Ottawa has taken the initial steps toward a complaint against Washington at the World Trade Organization, claiming that U.S. corn subsidies violate international trade laws.

The corn case comes on the heels of a 2004 WTO decision, in a case filed by Brazil, that some U.S. cotton subsidies were illegal and ordered dismantled. Though the U.S. has been flouting the ruling, the Bush administration does seem more committed than Congress to making sure that farm subsidies don't run afoul of international trade rules.

Farm subsidies are a New Deal legacy once aimed at helping poor farmers. The program has become a form of corporate welfare for big agribusiness. The problem isn't just that these subsidies are unfair to farmers in other countries that aren't insulated from market realities by their governments. It's that many farm subsidies, with their built-in price supports, pervert those markets by stimulating inefficient production that affects global prices.

Say the price target for corn is $3 a bushel, but the actual price suddenly drops to $1 (and say the cost of production is $1.50 a bushel) because there's a glut. Normally, that would send a signal to farmers that they should stop growing corn and plant something else. But if the government makes up the $2 difference, they're encouraged to keep growing corn at an artificial profit. All that excess has to be sold on the world market at low prices. U.S. farmers don't care because they've got their subsidies, but corn growers overseas are wiped out.

So why should Americans care? First, because other nations retaliate against U.S. exports. Second, because subsidies kill competition with foreign growers that would ultimately lower prices on some produce in this country. Third, because taxpayers are shelling out roughly $20 billion a year in subsidies to an agribusiness juggernaut that neither needs nor deserves the money at a time of ballooning deficits. And fourth, because the poor countries most harmed by our trade policies are the ones most likely to become failed states, embittered by our hypocritical preaching on the merits of "free trade."

DOJ_NMG_0127412

Members of the WTO have been trying since 2001 to pass a multilateral deal under the Doha round of trade talks that would lower trade barriers around the world, but the prime sticking point is high agricultural subsidies in the U.S. and, more so, in Europe.

Bush's farm bill doesn't go nearly as far as it should to spur a successful Doha round. It would cut farm subsidies by about $4.5 billion over the next 10 years, hardly enough to generate excitement among our trading partners. But it does do away with some of the more outrageous inequities of the current bill, such as paying corporate welfare to farmers making more than $200,000 a year, and it de-emphasizes price supports in favor of direct payments to farmers, which are far less trade-distorting and bring the country under compliance with WTO rules.

Most U.S. business interests would benefit from a relaxation of trade barriers worldwide, but the entrenched farm lobby is gearing up for a fight to protect its pork and to imperil Doha. So bring it on, Canada.

OTHER NEWS:

Giuliani On 2008 Bid: "A Real Good Chance" (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani appeared to move a step closer to announcing his presidential ambitions yesterday, saying after an appearance in South Carolina that “there’s a real good chance” he will run.

Mr. Giuliani’s intentions have been all but taken for granted by most political observers. He has made two trips to New Hampshire — home of the nation’s first primary — and has promised to make more. He has formed an exploratory committee, hired campaign workers and moved to divest himself from a large chunk of his consulting business to avoid conflicts in the event of a presidential bid.

But on the nascent campaign trail itself, the former New York City mayor has coyly stepped around the question of “Will he or won’t he?”

After a 30-minute speech before Republican Party leaders in South Carolina, Mr. Giuliani fielded the question again, but this time came closer than he had before to giving a definitive response in public. “There’s a real good chance,” he told an Associated Press reporter.

Mr. Giuliani’s aides declined to comment further on the remark.

Other signals of his impending bid can be seen in his tightly packed schedule of appearances and fund-raisers in the days and weeks to come. According a source close to the campaign, the itinerary includes fund-raisers in Florida on Tuesday followed by more stops across the country before appearing as the keynote speaker at the California Republican Convention in Sacramento on Saturday.

Mr. Giuliani is not alone among potential Republican White House contenders who have yet to formally declare their intentions. Others include Senator John McCain of Arizona and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts.

But Mr. Giuliani’s delay has caused some political analysts to wonder if he is waiting too long, although others have said his name recognition gives him extra time before deciding to get into the race.

Patrick Dorinson, spokesman for the California Republican Party, said if Mr. Giuliani is thinking about announcing anytime soon, the convention in Sacramento could be an ideal setting.

“It’s going to be very well attended,” Mr. Dorinson said. “We’ve received a lot of media interest and members of the party are very excited about seeing Giuliani, so if he wanted to make an announcement, it certainly could be a place to do it.”

In addition, Mr. Dorinson said, Mr. Giuliani will be the only potential presidential candidate speaking at the convention, so he will have the floor to himself.

DOJ_NMG_0127413

The state party that propelled Arnold Schwarzenegger to the governor's mansion might also provide a warmer reception to Mr. Giuliani than, say, Iowa or South Carolina, where his moderate stands on abortion, gay rights and gun control are likely to find stiff resistance from social conservatives.

Mr. Dorinson said he had not heard any speculation that Mr. Giuliani would announce there and had not seen an advance copy of his speech. If it did happen, it would coincidentally come on the same day that Senator Barack Obama, a Democrat, has said he will formally declare his candidacy in Illinois.

"There's been so much talk about the Democratic race," Mr. Dorinson said. "We're just excited California Republicans will get to see a potential Republican candidate."

Rudy Giuliani Seriously Considering Presidential Bid (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

COLUMBIA, South Carolina (AP) — Former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani said Saturday he will probably run for president in 2008.

"There's a real good chance," Giuliani, a Republican, said after a 30-minute speech and question-and-answer session with party leaders in South Carolina.

On Giuliani's first visit to New Hampshire last weekend since setting up the committee, he told reporters he had received a tremendous amount of enthusiasm and support from people.

But he said he had not yet decided whether he could make a "unique contribution" toward strengthening the United States that would justify a run for president.

He has emphasized his steady hand dealing with the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks. However, his moderate stances on gun control, abortion, gay rights and other social issues could be liabilities for him in a Republican presidential primary that includes hard-core conservatives as a central voting group.

For instance, in November, South Carolina voters overwhelmingly approved a constitutional ban on same-sex unions.

"The fact is I appeal to conservative Christians the way I appeal to everyone else," Giuliani said at a news conference. "I don't think you have separate appeals to people."

Giuliani formed a presidential exploratory committee in November to prepare for a possible bid for the Republican nomination in 2008. It lets him raise money and travel the country, gauging how much support there could be for him.

In his few first weeks, Giuliani took in $1.4 million. He collected donations online, and held a major fundraising event in New York in December.

Financial documents show that by the start of this year Giuliani had about $1 million available, having spent money to set up campaign headquarters, buy equipment and hire workers.

The Republicans' top tier of candidates for 2008 includes Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback.

Inspiring Strong Emotions, And Very Mixed Ones, Too (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Flawed or flawless?

That is the subtitle of a new oral biography of Rudolph W. Giuliani. The book may not change the minds of readers who believe he is one or the other, but some of the insights of friends, former friends, and unforgiving foes — most of whom were interviewed by Deborah Hart Strober and Gerald S. Strober — are nonetheless revealing about the former mayor and about New York politics.

Some were glowing, some vitriolic. In "Giuliani" (John Wiley & Sons), they combine into what Mr. Strober described as "a mixed bag." Here are excerpts.

Did race play a role in the 1989 election, when David N. Dinkins, a Democrat, barely defeated Mr. Giuliani to become the city's first black mayor? Mr. Dinkins suggested that was a possibility: "How does one figure? Whatever frailties, whatever shortcomings I had were certainly not evident at that point, and whatever greatness there was in Rudy had not yet been revealed. So how come 1.9 million votes, and I win by the skin of my teeth?"

DOJ_NMG_0127414

Mr. Giuliani and former Mayor Edward I. Koch are both larger than life. How did working for them compare? Henry J. Stern, the former parks commissioner, replied:

"Koch was more collegial than Giuliani, but people knew that if they disagreed with Koch they would pay a price."

Lillian Barrios-Paoli, who also served under both mayors, was Mr. Giuliani's welfare commissioner, among other jobs. She offered another perspective. If Mr. Koch said to his advisers that he wanted to kill all 12-year-olds, she said: "I can think of 10 people who would say, 'Please, get a life! What, are you crazy? No way!' And there'd be a big argument and at the end of the day, somebody's judgment would prevail.

"If Rudy would say, 'Let's kill 12-year-olds,' there would be deep silence in the room, and then somebody would say, 'That's brilliant!' And then somebody else would say, 'Have you thought of 13-year-olds, too?' "

Mr. Giuliani refused to meet with a number of prominent black leaders, including the Rev. Al Sharpton. Rudy Washington, who as deputy mayor was the highest-ranking black member of the Giuliani administration, explained why:

"Rudy didn't play that game: You don't call me a racist, Al Sharpton, and then expect to meet me and work out a deal. You declare me your enemy, fine. I'm going to be your enemy."

Mr. Giuliani's refusal to meet with certain black elected officials, even after the police shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed immigrant from Guinea, angered Mr. Koch so much that, he recalled, he even decided to participate in a demonstration.

"And so — only in New York City can this happen — I called Al Sharpton, who was in charge of the picketing in front of Police Plaza, and I said, 'I want to get arrested. I have to get arrested early,' because I was teaching at a college near Boston, Brandeis, and it was on a Monday, the one day I went there. 'Can you arrange to get me arrested at 10 o'clock?' "

Why was Mr. Giuliani's second term disappointing to some? Fran Reiter, a deputy mayor, said that Mr. Giuliani was not jubilant about his re-election in part because he realized that term limits made him a lame duck.

"Psychologically, it makes for a very difficult approach to governing. This weighed very, very heavily on him and influenced how he governed in that second term. He seemed to lose his passion for the big projects. He got nitpicky."

Mr. Giuliani also was having marital problems, which he handled awkwardly. Herman Badillo, a mayoral adviser, said:

"As a matter of courtesy, you go and talk to your wife and say, 'I want a divorce.' You don't have a press conference to announce it."

His performance on and after 9/11 redeemed him in the eyes of many people. Some politicians, including Mr. Koch, criticized Mark Green, who was seeking the Democratic mayoral nomination in 2001, when he said he could have done the job as well as Mr. Giuliani or better. In the biography, Mr. Koch said:

"Nobody could have done it better than Rudy. But I believe that many, if not most, mayors would have done it as well because that's your job. And that saved Rudy's reputation: He became Mayor for the world, and you should not take any credit away from him. But to say that what he did was unique would be wrong."

Time may have altered Mr. Green's perspective on how he or his fellow Democrats might have performed:

"I can see some public officials overplaying the tough card, but I saw him up close during the weeks after 9/11, and he struck just the right note of toughness and compassion."

"Would someone else — Ruth Messinger or me or Dinkins — have done as well because the situation required that? I couldn't, and I wouldn't, say. You don't know until it happens."

Will Mr. Giuliani run for president? Interviewed in 2005, Mr. Sharpton said no.

"He knows that the honeymoon he's had with the media since 9/11 would be over if he ran and had to defend things that they don't now bring up."

"It's better to live the reinvention than to have somebody move the veil and see that the wizard really isn't the wizard. So right now, he can lead all the media and the national pundits on the Yellow Brick Road. He'd better never let us get near that veil. I know what's back there; I've pierced it before."

DOJ_NMG_0127415

Suppose he runs and wins? Mr. Dinkins replied: "Rudy as president is kind of frightening. My question would be, Will I move to Bermuda? Where will I go?"

Saikou Diallo, Amadou's father, was equivocal: "He's a good leader, a very good leader, and very intelligent. If he changes his character, he may be a good president. But he has to change."

Frank Luntz, Mr. Giuliani's second mayoral campaign pollster, offered another perspective on the former mayor's personality:

"No one in New York, not even Ed Koch, could equal Rudy in the phrase, 'He says what he means and means what he says.'

"That's one of the reasons he won so overwhelmingly in that election. It wasn't about policy or issues. It was about character."

McCain's Advisers Once Made Ads That Drew His Ire (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Senator John McCain, intent on succeeding where his freewheeling presidential campaign of 2000 failed, is assembling a team of political bruisers for 2008. And it includes advisers who once sought to skewer him and whose work he has criticized as stepping over the line in the past.

In 2000, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, said the advertisements run against him by George W. Bush, then the governor of Texas, distorted his record. But he has hired three members of the team that made those commercials — Mark McKinnon, Russell Schriefer and Stuart Stevens — to work on his presidential campaign.

In 2004, Mr. McCain said the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth advertisement asserting that Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts had not properly earned his medals from the Vietnam War was "dishonest and dishonorable." Nonetheless, he has hired the firm that made the spots, Stevens Reed Curcio & Potholm, which worked on his 2000 campaign, to work for him again this year.

In October, Mr. McCain's top adviser expressed public displeasure with an advertisement against former Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., Democrat of Tennessee, that some saw as having racist overtones for suggesting a flirtation between Mr. Ford, who is black, and a young, bare-shouldered white woman, played by a blond actress.

The Republican committee that sponsored the spot had as its leader Terry Nelson, a former Bush campaign strategist whom Mr. McCain hired as an adviser last spring. In December, just weeks after the Ford controversy broke, Mr. McCain elevated Mr. Nelson to the position of national campaign manager.

Taken together, the moves provide the strongest indication yet that Mr. McCain intends to run a far tougher campaign than the one he ran in the 2000 primary. And they come as he transitions from being a onetime maverick to a candidate seeking to gather his party around him and create an air of inevitability about his prospects for winning nomination.

As Mr. McCain assembles his team, he is also making it that much harder for his Republican challengers by scooping up a significant circle of the party's top talent.

In recent years, Mr. McCain has made a concerted effort to mend fences with Mr. Bush and reassure the Republican base that he is a reliable conservative. But his moves have focused new attention on the extent to which he may risk sacrificing the image he has long cultivated of being his own man, driven by principle rather than partisan politics.

Mr. McCain's advisers said he was not changing. But they were unapologetic about putting together a group dedicated to doing what it takes to reach the White House and employing lessons from his defeat at the hands of Mr. Bush in 2000.

"This is about winning at the end of the day," said John Weaver, Mr. McCain's longtime senior strategist. "I don't want to be in a knife fight ever again, but if I am, we're going to win it."

Mr. McCain's representatives said he would not provide an interview.

Seven years ago, Mr. McCain charmed the news media and the public with his Straight Talk Express bus tour. He had a lean operation befitting an upstart candidacy, and he regularly spoke out against attack advertising, a quaint notion in retrospect.

DOJ_NMG_0127416

In the end, he ran his share of confrontational advertisements, once even leveling the ultimate Republican-to-Republican insult: that Mr. Bush was as dishonest as Bill Clinton. But he was perceived as having been knocked back on his heels by the rougher, tougher Bush campaign.

Now Mr. McCain is building a larger organization, bringing together the heart of the bare-knuckled Bush crew once overseen by Karl Rove while keeping most of the advisers who ran his shoestring effort of 2000.

"It's like an all-star World Wrestling Federation cage match, except that instead of fighting one another, all of the brawlers are on the same team," said Steve McMahon, a strategist for the Democratic National Committee. "There are very few people who play this game at the highest level, and on the Republican side these guys are among the best."

Mr. McCain has also hired Brian Jones, an adviser to Mr. Bush's 2004 campaign; Fred Davis, a media consultant for Mr. Bush in 2004; and Steve Schmidt, who oversaw Mr. Bush's 2004 war room, exploiting any tidbit that could help paint Mr. Kerry as a "flip-flopper."

The hires are another signal that the 2008 primary campaign could be a combative one all around.

On the Democratic side, John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina, has wasted no time attacking Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's position on Iraq. And Mrs. Clinton's team includes strategists who invented the concept of the modern campaign war room for her husband 15 years ago. But Senator Barack Obama of Illinois drew cheers at a party gathering on Friday when he warned his fellow candidates against attacking one another.

Mitt Romney, a Republican and the former governor of Massachusetts, has hired Alex Castellanos, a onetime Bush strategist who also famously produced the 1990 commercial for Jesse Helms, the former North Carolina senator, in which a pair of white hands crumpled a rejection letter as a narrator said, "You needed that job and you were the best qualified, but it had to go to a minority because of a racial quota."

Given Mr. McCain's history with some of the people on his team, the evolution of his staff may present an early challenge: How does he stay true to the "Straight Talk" spirit of his 2000 campaign, which helped him win the stature he has now, while also engaging in the political brinkmanship it can take to win?

The Democratic National Committee is already criticizing Mr. McCain for his hires, issuing a statement this week calling them "a testament to how far he's gone down the do-anything-to-win path."

Tony Fabrizio, a Republican pollster who is not yet allied with a candidate, said Mr. McCain was running the risk of looking "politically expedient" and of blunting his brand as "Senator Straight Talk." He said the risk was highlighted by Mr. McCain's recent suggestions that he may not use the campaign finance system he has long championed.

In 2000, Mr. McCain received money from the system, which gives public financing to candidates who agree to strict spending limits. Mr. Weaver, the senior strategist, said Mr. McCain was keeping his options open because others, including Mrs. Clinton, were planning to work around the system.

As Mr. McCain's aides often point out, for all its appeal, the McCain 2000 campaign was a losing one. And they said it would be unfair to suggest that because Mr. McCain was augmenting his team he was somehow preparing to change who he was.

"There are no negotiations regarding his principles," Mr. Weaver said.

In an interview on Friday, Mr. Jones, the campaign communications director, said Mr. McCain was not allowing his distaste over the Swift Boat commercials to interfere with his relationship with Stevens Reed Curcio & Potholm, with whom Mr. McCain has his own decade-long association. In addition, he said, Mr. McCain hired Mr. Nelson because of his breadth of experience in national campaigns. "The campaign," Mr. Jones said, "is not going to let past contests on the battlefield limit how it's going to go after talent."

Presidential politics are rich in fungible allegiances. James A. Baker III ran the primary campaigns of Gerald Ford and the elder George Bush against Ronald Reagan, only to become Mr. Reagan's chief of staff. This year, David Axelrod is serving as a senior strategist for Mr. Obama; he was a senior strategist to Mr. Edwards in his 2004 campaign.

"You could dissect any campaign this way: this guy did this ad this one time," said Mr. Schriefer, the former Bush media strategist, who will run Mr. McCain's advertising team. "There's a tremendous history of foes becoming allies."

DOJ_NMG_0127417

Mr. McKinnon, who led Mr. Bush's advertising group in 2004, said he saw no inconsistency in working for Mr. McCain. Mr. Bush was right for 2000, he said, and Mr. McCain is right for 2008. "At the end of the day, the campaign will be won or lost on the character of the candidate and his or her core message," Mr. McKinnon said. "Of course, I believe that will be John McCain."

Asked if the senator would avoid the attacks he criticized in 2000, Mr. Jones said that while Mr. McCain had yet to declare his candidacy, any campaign he ran would be "consistent with his beliefs and values."

Romney Targeting McCain (TSSC)

By Lee Bandy

The State, February 4, 2007

Mitt Romney's assignment in the 2008 S.C. Republican presidential primary is simply this: Derail John McCain's "Straight Talk Express."

If there were any doubts about Romney's mission, they were erased during the former Massachusetts governor's two-day visit to the state last week.

Romney attracted large, enthusiastic crowds at stops in Charleston, Aiken and Columbia. It was a shot in the arm for his campaign.

Romney's chief rival in South Carolina is McCain, the U.S. senator from Arizona who leads in the polls here and enjoys the backing of the state's GOP establishment.

Romney isn't impressed.

Endorsements never elected anybody, he says.

"A message is what people want to hear. When you decide who you want to vote for, you don't say, 'Gosh, I wonder what my city counselor is going to do.'"

In the 2000 S.C. Republican presidential primary, McCain won 43 percent of the vote, losing to then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush.

Today, McCain is polling about 38 percent against Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Romney suggested his business experience better prepares him for the White House than the backgrounds of his two rivals.

"I come from a private sector, where talk is worth nothing and action is everything," said Romney, who spent 25 years managing businesses and making investments around the world.

He tends to dismiss the experience of his primary challengers.

Giuliani was a mayor and a prosecutor — "a very different experience," Romney said.

And McCain?

Oh, he has been a U.S. senator for a decade or more, Romney said.

Then he pointed out his differences with McCain.

Romney noted his foe from Arizona wrote the McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform law that restricts certain types of contributions.

"That's a terrible piece of legislation," Romney said. "It hasn't taken the money out of politics. ... (But) it has hurt my party."

Conservative Christians, who make up a third of the GOP primary vote, oppose McCain-Feingold.

But that's not all.

McCain opposed President Bush's tax cuts, Romney noted.

"I supported them," the former governor said.

McCain believes the president's interrogation of terrorist detainees was a violation of the Geneva Accords.

"I disagree with him," Romney said.

Of the McCain-Kennedy immigration bill, Romney said, "I think it was a mistake."

The former governor couldn't have been any clearer in pointing out his differences with McCain.

He let Giuliani slide.

Perfectly understandable; his S.C. mission is to "stop McCain."

DOJ_NMG_0127418

Mavericks Both, But Different Iraq Paths (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The first time Senator John McCain ran for president, few allies were more loyal than Senator Chuck Hagel, a fellow Vietnam veteran and co-chairman of his campaign, whose independent streak ran nearly as thick as Mr. McCain's.

Even after Mr. McCain lost that race seven years ago, the two friends seemed to revel in rankling the Republican establishment, often infuriating the White House from their side-by-side suites in the Russell Senate Office Building. A photograph in Mr. Hagel's office shows President Bush standing between the men, his arms slung around their necks.

Below the picture, the president scribbled, "Chuck, is it a rose between two thorns?"

But at the dawn of the 2008 presidential campaign, as a debate over the administration's Iraq policy intensifies on Capitol Hill, Mr. Hagel is standing alone.

Mr. McCain is perhaps the most influential and outspoken supporter in Congress of the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq. Mr. Hagel is the most outspoken critic of the war among Senate Republicans. Mr. McCain has moved to court conservatives. Mr. Hagel, conservative by any measure, seems to have assumed Mr. McCain's former role as their party's leading maverick.

And Mr. McCain is unambiguously running for president. Mr. Hagel is still trying to make up his mind.

The gulf between them is a personal manifestation of the broader national debate over the war and, to some degree, the legacy and lessons of Vietnam. It also speaks to the deep divisions among Republicans as they confront the political fallout from the war, the need to develop a post-Bush posture on national security and the fight over who should lead their party and the country.

The men's diverging views on Iraq set the parameters for the debate scheduled to unfold next week as the Senate opens its most extensive deliberations of the war since it began.

Mr. Hagel is a lead sponsor of a resolution intended to rebuke the president; Mr. McCain has offered a plan to give the administration one more chance in Iraq.

While the two senators may not talk as often as they once did, associates of both ascribed that to their chaotic schedules, particularly that of Mr. McCain, who often zips away on a political trip the moment the Senate is out of session. And both men insist their bond is rooted deep enough to withstand any dissension.

Mr. McCain, who once referred to Mr. Hagel as "a John McCain without the attitude problem," said his feelings had not changed. "You can disagree on an issue," he said, "without having it affect your relationship of many, many years."

Mr. Hagel, who once seemed certain to endorse his friend's candidacy if he did not seek the presidency himself, declined to say whether their differences on Iraq would keep him from supporting Mr. McCain. But, he added, "John McCain will always be one of my dearest friends, regardless of where this presidential campaign goes."

So how can two men, similar in temperament and background, come to such a different conclusions over military strategy in Iraq? Friends of both men say they believe that the respective Vietnam experiences of Mr. McCain, a prisoner of war for five years, and Mr. Hagel, an enlisted man on the front lines, offer a window into their diverging views.

"John McCain was a prisoner of war; I respect what he had to go through," said Senator Jim Webb, Democrat of Virginia and a combat veteran of Vietnam. "He did not see the ground environment, how difficult things really are on the ground. He did not really see how bad this country was torn apart by the war, for the unfortunate reason that he was in prison."

Mr. Webb, who opposes the plan to send more troops to Iraq, said he respected Mr. McCain immensely. But, he added, "Chuck Hagel and I both intrinsically understand how difficult it is in an infantry environment to carry out some of these goals and we both experienced what it was like to come back to a pretty hostile peer group."

Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican who is close to Mr. Hagel and Mr. McCain, said that political calculations did not play a role in the views of either.

"It is not popular for a Republican to be doing what Senator Hagel is doing; it is not popular for somebody who wants to be president and trying to capture the independent vote to be doing what Senator McCain is doing," Mr. Graham said. "Both of them have come to different conclusions about the long-term national security interests of the country. They have polar opposite views of how to proceed, but the commonality is that they're not worried about the political moment."

DOJ_NMG_0127419

Unlike Mr. Hagel or other combat veterans in the Senate, Mr. McCain seldom draws comparisons to his own decorated military service when he discusses Iraq strategy.

"What drives my decisions is not experiences that I've had a generation ago," Mr. McCain said. "What drives my decisions is my knowledge, information, study, consultation that makes me decide on any issue. My views on the world and life are not driven by my experience in Vietnam."

Not so for Mr. Hagel, who has been a vocal critic of the administration's Iraq strategy since the start. Four years ago, he said the mission had similarities to his war from a generation ago, but since then he has denounced the Iraq war as "an absolute replay of Vietnam."

"I think I'm the only member of the Senate who was an enlisted man on the ground, who went over to Vietnam as a rifleman, a private, and I saw that war from the bottom up — really from the bottom up," Mr. Hagel said. "I saw the human dynamic of war that has stuck with me."

This week, on the same day that Senate leaders jockeyed over how to proceed with a bipartisan Iraq resolution, Mr. Hagel left the capital and flew back to Nebraska to attend the funeral of First Lt. Jacob N. Fritz, 25, who was abducted and killed on Jan. 20 in Karbala. Mr. Hagel appointed Lieutenant Fritz to the United States Military Academy at West Point.

In response to his forceful criticism, Mr. Hagel said, he has received letters calling him a "traitor" and "a yellow-chicken senator."

"I'm called 'a disloyal Republican' and I'm called 'not a real conservative Republican,' " Mr. Hagel said. "So conservative Republicans support the war and liberal Democrats don't support war? You see how silly all that is? Republicans and Democrats both die in war."

By being the fiercest Republican skeptic of the White House, Mr. Hagel acknowledged that his ambitions were also enmeshed in the politics of Iraq. He said he would decide in a few weeks whether he would run for president, re-election to the Senate or neither. If he seeks the presidency, he said, his views on Iraq will become suspect.

"Once you commit to being a candidate, your motives are impugned," Mr. Hagel said. "Is that a reason not to do it? Yes, it is."

A Bar, A Brew, A Drifting Senator (HARTC)

By Mark Pazniokas

The Hartford Courant, February 3, 2007

TORRINGTON -- Ollie's Café usually doesn't open until 3 p.m. on Fridays, when karaoke is the regular attraction. But two dozen patrons waited inside the dark, tiny bar at noon for a long-awaited beer with Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman.

Lieberman was a Democrat the last time he stood in Ollie's, asking conservative Democrats to stick with him in a tough re-election, when 65 percent of Democrats eventually would reject him over the war in Iraq. His supporters are still with him now, even as Lieberman drifts further from his old party.

He calls himself an independent, though he remains a member of the Senate Democratic caucus, giving it a one-vote majority. He publicly flirts with voting Republican for president in '08 - prompting speculation he might join Republican Sen. John McCain on a fusion ticket.

"No, that's not going to happen," Lieberman said Friday on his way into Ollie's. "My days of seeking national office are over. I'm very happy, particularly after what I went through last year to be the senator from Connecticut. I want to do the best job I can at that."

In Washington, six of the nine Democratic presidential hopefuls - including Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, D-Conn. - spent the morning addressing the Democratic National Committee. Dodd crowed that the Democratic takeover of Congress last fall represented a win by "the Democratic wing of the Democratic Party."

Outside Ollie's, Lieberman smiled when asked if he eventually might support Dodd, who opposes increasing U.S. troop levels in Iraq, a move that Lieberman supports.

DOJ_NMG_0127420

"I am going to support the presidential candidate that I think is best for our country at a very tough time in our country's history," Lieberman said.

He said he would not rule out supporting a candidate who opposes the war, saying he would weigh a range of issues. Connecticut voters re-elected him, even though a majority disagree with him over the war.

"On matters of domestic policy I agree more often than not with Democrats," Lieberman said. "On matters of foreign and defense policy these days, I seem to agree more often than not with Republicans."

Nancy DiNardo, the Democratic state chairwoman, doesn't know what to make of Lieberman, her party's 2000 nominee for vice president and, briefly, a presidential candidate in 2004.

Reached by phone at the Democratic National Committee meeting in Washington, DiNardo said she and Lieberman have yet to discuss his place in the party.

DiNardo supported Lieberman in the primary, then backed the eventual Democratic nominee, Ned Lamont, in the general election. It was a stance taken by Dodd and most other prominent Democrats.

"It has been awkward," DiNardo said of the three months since the election. "I think there have been bruised feelings on both sides."

DiNardo said she has found no road map, no precedent for how to deal with a major figure in the party who has one foot out the door, yet won't quite leave.

At Ollie's, no one found Lieberman's status awkward. He is the winner of the 2006 election, a hawk like them who came Friday to deliver on a promise to share in a celebratory beer.

"I am full of gratitude, I really am, to people who stuck with me last year and gave me the chance to continue to serve," Lieberman said. "So it's important for me to come back and say thank you - and also come back and listen."

Bill Battle and Lieberman threw their arms around each other inside the bar, which erupted in cheers. Battle stuck with him after the primary, quitting the Democratic town committee so he could run Lieberman's petitioning effort in Torrington, a community that went for Lieberman.

"What we have here is a robust common sense," Battle said.

The view at Ollie's is that America cannot afford to lose in Iraq.

Lieberman accepted a Samuel Adams winter lager in a frosted glass, then circled his way around the bar, pausing for photos and good wishes. He fell into a happy conversation by the door with Battle.

His driver reminded him of an interview he promised with National Public Radio.

Lieberman sipped a beer. Smiling, he shook his head and told his aide, "NPR will have to wait."

GOP's Conservatives Strain For Leadership (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

BALTIMORE -- Conservative House Republicans are disappointed that their leaders have no strategy to win back in 2008 the majority they lost in November.

"We think they need to be a lot more aggressive than they are," Rep. Steve King of Iowa said. "They don't seem willing to have blood on the floor, and there's got to be blood on the floor."

He and other House conservatives who came here from Washington for an annual meeting say they are united in thinking that the United States must win the war in Iraq.

That view, however, puts them at odds with the majority of voters, who say in poll after poll that they no longer support the war, think victory is unachievable and is not worth the cost in money or lives.

"We are united in understanding that we have to win the war," Rep. Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia said. "Our goal is to make sure we do whatever is necessary to strengthen and hold up Iraq's government and get that nation off on its own."

The 48 conservative lawmakers who met here for the annual House Republican Study Committee (RSC) retreat generally agreed that their 2008 presidential nominee would be Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney or former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

DOJ_NMG_0127421

"I don't see any one of them being singled out as a great front-runner by the House Republican members or any one of them being singled out as a 'no-go,' " Rep. Tom Price of Georgia said. "But whichever one of the three gets the nomination is going to have to have some link to the South, which is the bedrock of the Republican Party."

But the legislators also agreed they were not inclined to coalesce behind any one of the three and thought each of them fell short of the highest conservative standards.

Though the Heritage Foundation, sponsor of the annual retreat, had invited all three of the men to speak, only Mr. Romney showed up.

The lawmakers gave him a cordial hearing during his luncheon speech Friday, after which he took generally friendly questions from the members.

Mr. Romney said that while "no one wants to be at war with Iran," it's critical to make sure Iran "doesn't develop nuclear technology." He said engaging Iran in negotiations "is not the way to go."

On the divisive issue of illegal aliens, guest workers and amnesty, Mr. Romney said he eventually will take a position on whether citizenship should continue to be given automatically to anyone born on U.S. soil to parents who are not U.S. citizens. He also said that in approving immigration applications, U.S. officials should consider whether "someone has a high school or college degree and can bring skills to make them greater contributors to our society."

Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay addressed the group Friday morning, but the most impressive performer, members said, was former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who gave the dinner speech Thursday.

"We have to act independently of the White House. You do not serve the president, you serve with the president," Mr. Gingrich said, according to a Republican present at the dinner, which was closed to the press.

"Newt blew the group away," said another Republican who attended the dinner. "He is on such a different intellectual plane. He warned that the conference moves too slow and the RSC should be outmaneuvering the conference. He also said that the Republicans should neither blame nor support President Bush on issues that divide the Republicans from their base."

Underdogs Demand Iraq War's End, Troops Home (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

Democratic candidates whom many consider underdogs for the presidential nomination in 2008 continued their party's attacks on the Iraq war yesterday, demanding it be ended and the troops brought home immediately.

"We must stop this war," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware declared on the final day of the Democratic National Committee's (DNC) three-day winter meeting here.

Democrats at the meeting approved a party resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq, calling instead for a "broadening of diplomatic initiatives" to end the conflict.

Mr. Biden, who is making a second bid for his party's nomination, said reducing the number of troops in Iraq, "not escalating America's troops, is the only way to force Iraq's leaders to seek a political settlement." "The surge in troops is not a solution," said Mr. Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "It is a tragic mistake, and I will do everything in my power to stop it."

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack went further than many of his Democratic rivals who are calling for a phased troop withdrawal from Iraq over the next year or two. He said that reducing the number of U.S. forces in Iraq over time would not represent "a real change" in policy on the war.

"The real change is we want our troops out now. The war must end, and our troops must be brought home now, not eventually but immediately," Mr. Vilsack said.

The two-term governor also reminded DNC members that the only Democrats to win the presidency in recent decades were governors who ran against the Washington establishment.

Identifying himself as "an outsider" who has run a government, balanced a budget and managed a state economy, Mr. Vilsack said "we win as outsiders." Though he did not mention any names, his remark was a reminder to his audience that a half-dozen of the party's presidential contenders -- including front-runners Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois -- are members of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0127422

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, the only other state chief executive seeking the Democratic nomination, also raised the end-the-war ante against his party's pack of candidates in a speech that pointedly criticized the Democrats' pending nonbinding Senate resolution against Mr. Bush's troop surge.

"As someone who served in Congress for 14 years, I know the power they hold, should they choose to wield it. The Congress passed a resolution authorizing the war. They need to pass another that overturns that authorization ... and brings our troops home by the end of the year," he said.

And in an unusual twist in the increasingly heated debate over the war, Mr. Richardson offered an assessment with which even Mr. Bush might partially agree.

"The reality is, we have done in Iraq what we said we would do. We have rid the world of a brutal dictator. We have brought about free and fair elections three times over," he said. "The Iraqis now have a constitution, over 200,000 armed soldiers and they have oil revenue. It's time for our troops to leave with honor."

Moreover, at a time when foreign policy and national security have become central issues, the former U.N. ambassador who has brokered foreign policy disputes around the world, implicitly raised the lack of foreign policy experience among most of his party's candidates.

"I know the usual rap on governors -- that we don't know anything about foreign affairs," Mr. Richardson said. "Well, maybe you can say that about governors from Texas, but not this governor."

Democrats Split On How To End The War (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The war in Iraq is shaping the opening stages of the contest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, just as it did in the 2004 campaign.

After 10 candidates' speeches over two days at the winter meeting of the Democratic National Committee in Washington, the war proved again to be the central point of differentiation among the party's presidential contenders.

What emerged was a division over how to stop the war, one likely to intensify as Congress debates measures ranging from a nonbinding resolution condemning President Bush's proposal to send more troops to Iraq to more controversial legislation that would restrict or cut off funds for the military mission.

Four years ago, former Vermont governor Howard Dean tapped into the growing opposition to the war among party activists and turned a long-shot candidacy into a force to be reckoned with until his campaign imploded in Iowa.

Now everyone running opposes the war, but the self-styled outsiders in the race -- those not in the Senate -- see political gain in pressing for a speedy end to the war, and in the process they are putting pressure on prominent candidates such as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) to follow suit.

"As someone who served in Congress for 14 years, I know the power they hold, should they choose to wield it," New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson told the DNC yesterday at the Hilton Washington hotel. "The Congress passed a resolution authorizing war. They need to pass another one that overturns that authorization and brings our troops home by the end of the calendar year."

Former senator John Edwards (N.C.) was equally adamant on Friday that members of Congress stand up against the president. "It is a betrayal not to stop this president's plan to escalate the war when we have the responsibility, the power and the ability to stop it," he said. "We cannot be satisfied with passing nonbinding resolutions that we know this president will ignore."

Edwards favors an immediate withdrawal of up to 50,000 troops, with the rest brought home within 18 months.

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack was just as pointed in calling for congressional Democrats to act boldly to stop the war. "I think Congress has a constitutional responsibility and a moral obligation to do it now," he said yesterday. "Not a cap, an end. Not eventually, immediately. Those who voted for the war, those who voted to continue to support the war, those who voted to continue funding the war can surely vote to stop the war."

DOJ_NMG_0127423

Clinton on Friday defended her support for a nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of the plan to send more troops to Iraq, but she made a point to say that she is now ready to press for tougher action.

"I want to go further," she told the audience of Democrats who will be delegates at the party's national convention in 2008. She outlined other steps she has proposed to cap the number of U.S. troops in Iraq and pressure the Iraqi government. But she has so far resisted embracing any timetable for bringing home the troops.

Obama, who is to formally launch his candidacy Saturday in Illinois, opposed the war initially and last week moved past Clinton with a proposal to withdraw virtually all U.S. forces by March 31, 2008.

But in his speech on Friday, Obama was less explicit than other Democrats about the way forward. Calling the war "a tragic mistake," he said, "We all have a responsibility now to put forth a plan that offers the best chance of ending the bloodshed and bringing the troops home."

Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, condemned Bush in harsh language yesterday. "Mr. President," he said, "the majority of Americans who oppose you in Iraq are not the ones emboldening the enemy. That's the one mission you have accomplished."

Biden said he would do "everything in my power" to block the president's decision to deploy more troops. His broader proposal calls for a political solution that would provide regional autonomy for Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds and guarantees by the central government that Sunnis would share in the country's oil revenues. He wants to draw down U.S. forces.

The weekend of speeches did little to reorder the Democratic race, with Clinton seen as the early front-runner and Obama and Edwards viewed as her most serious rivals starting out.

Based on conversations with DNC members and others who attended the meeting, Edwards and Richardson helped themselves more than any of the other candidates did. Edwards won repeated applause with his speech, and Richardson drew strong reviews for his.

Former senator Mike Gravel (Alaska), the fourth speaker at yesterday's session, was perhaps the harshest of any of the candidates in denouncing those Democrats who supported the war initially. But he did little to advance his dark-horse candidacy, according to party activists, by delivering a 25-minute speech, the longest of the weekend and 18 minutes longer than the routinely ignored seven-minute time limit imposed by the DNC.

By that measure, Biden was the big winner. The normally windy senator delivered the shortest speech of the weekend. He opened with another apology for describing Obama as an African American who is "articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," a comment that ruined the opening day of his campaign Wednesday.

"So, how was your week?" he began, to laughter. He quickly turned contrite: "I want to say that I truly regret that the words I spoke offended people I admire very much."

Richardson To Democrats: Bring Troops Home Now (ABQ)

By Woody Brosnan

Albuquerque Tribune, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Gov. Bill Richardson told Democrats here today that Congress should repeal the authorization for the Iraq War and "bring our troops home by the end of this year."

Like the other Democrats running for president, Richardson used the two-day meeting of the Democratic National Committee Friday and Saturday to stake out his position on the central issue of the campaign.

Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Joe Biden of Delaware are supporting a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush on sending a surge of troops to Baghdad.

Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd said that's not enough. Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards said Congress should block the escalation. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois wants to set a March, 2008 deadline for withdrawing troops. Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio wants to cut off funds for the war.

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is urging state legislatures and city councils to pass resolutions opposing the surge, but leave a combat force in northern Iraq.

"Those who voted for the war, those who voted to continue the war, can surely vote to end the war," Vilsack said today.

DOJ_NMG_0127424

Richardson, who initially supported the war but now says it was a mistake, said the United States has accomplished its mission of getting rid of Saddam Hussein, bringing about elections and creating an Iraqi army.

"It's time for our troops to leave with honor," said Richardson. "A struggle between a country's warring factions, where both sides hate the United States, is not worthy of one more lost American life."

The speaking times of the candidates Friday and Saturday were chosen by lot, as were the delegates introducing them. But Richardson's introduction was written by Linda Lynch, wife of journalist Paul Salopek, who was released from a Sudanese jail through Richardson's intervention.

"He brought my Paul home," wrote Lynch.

Candidates were supposed to speak for only seven minutes, but only Biden, often criticized for talking too much, did so.

Richardson spoke for 24 minutes, using much of his speech to talk about his record in New Mexico, tailoring his remarks to appeal to the delegates.

Richardson drew applause when he bragged about reinstating collective bargaining for public employees, for raising teacher pay in New Mexico from 48th in the country to 27th, for passing a state hate crimes law and adopting policies to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

"Every one of these accomplishments can be done at the national level," he said.

Richardson also touted his experience as a negotiator with North Korea and Sudan.

"I know the usual rap on governors - that we don't anything about foreign affairs. Well, maybe you can say that about certain governors from Texas. But not this governor," said Richardson, drawing an appreciative laugh from the audience.

Richardson also called on all Democratic candidates to not attack each other and asked the DNC to pass a resolution to that effect. But DNC chairman Howard Dean said it would have to be taken up at their June meeting.

Richardson ended the speech by acknowledging his low standing in the polls but he asked the Democrats to "stay loose" and watch the campaign. Later, he told reporters, "I'm right where I want to be."

The state committee members represented at the meeting will automatically qualify as super-delegates, which also means most can wait until the primaries and caucuses are well underway before they commit to a candidate.

Former Mississippi Gov. Ray Mabus, who's backing Vilsack, said the advantage for candidates like Vilsack and Richardson is that all the attention on the so-called top three - Clinton, Edwards and Obama - allows them to get their "sea legs" in the race.

"It's all a beauty contest which means they (the top three) have nowhere to grow," said Richardson volunteer Kenneth Bulko, of Albany, N.Y., as he passed out bumper stickers and folders at the Richardson table.

Dustin Taylor, a 26-year-old University of New Mexico student, passed out stickers for Richardson along with a dozen or so other 20-somethings. Taylor, who is interning for Rep. Tom Udall, Santa Fe Democrat, said Richardson is "the most electable candidate."

Vilsack Calls For End To Financing Of Iraq War (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 4, 2007

Washington, D.C. – Presidential candidate and ex-Gov. Tom Vilsack painted himself as an outsider and a truth-teller before members of the Democratic National Committee here today, calling for an immediate end to financing of the war in Iraq.

While some contenders for the Democratic nomination have advocated a cap on troops, the Iowa Democrat said that represents staying the course rather than real change. As president, he would withdraw the troops and force Iraqis to take charge, he said.

"Congress has the constitutional responsibility and a moral obligation to do it now," Vilsack said, to cheers, in a clear shot at opponents such as Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York, who said Friday that there aren't the votes in Congress for a speedy pullout.

"Those who voted for the war, those who voted to continue to support the war, those who voted to continue funding the war, can surely vote to stop the war," said Vilsack. "As an insider it's difficult to effect change . . . as an outsider we can change things . . . we win as outsiders."

DOJ_NMG_0127425

Vilsack was the last of 10 presidential candidates to speak over two days to key Democrats from across the country shopping for their next nominee. His speech came amidst a busy weekend in the capital, with an appearance on MSNBC early today and an interview Sunday with Wolf Blitzer on CNN's "Late Edition."

Looking on was Democrat Anne Dowling of Canterbury, N.H., who said she already had seen Vilsack at a breakfast in her early-primary state. "I like him," she said. "He's very organized in his thinking, and he communicates well."

While her mind is not yet made up, she said Vilsack remains a possibility. "I think he has a nice calm about him," Dowling said.

Preceding Vilsack in today's lineup were Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel. Biden gained unwelcome and widespread attention earlier this week when he described Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois as "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean."

Biden opened his remarks today by asking: "So, how was your week?" as the hall rocked with laughter. But on a more serious note, he said that "I truly regret the words I spoke of people I respect very much."

On Iraq, he said the proposed increase in troops is a "tragic mistake" and "I will do everything in my power to stop it."

Richardson, the only other governor in the race, like Vilsack cited his success as the chief executive in a state and called on Democrats to approve a resolution calling on all the candidates to run clean campaigns.

"The American people need to know we're standing up for them and that we can get the job done," said Richardson, who also urged Democrats to "stay loose" and consider all the candidates.

Trent Armitage and Cameron Patterson, both 19 and students at Longwood University in Farmville, Va., said they are undecided on their first votes ever for a presidential candidate.

"I definitely want a strong Iraq war policy," said Armitage. "And I do really want a person who's going to do a lot for universal health care."

Patterson said he is leaning toward supporting Richardson or John Edwards, but "I'm willing to give Governor Vilsack a look," he said. "The fact he's a former governor would be a tremendous help, because he has strong executive experience."

Democrats Endorse Voting Measure (WP)

By Robert E. Pierre

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The District's effort to win a full seat in the House of Representatives won unanimous support yesterday from the Democratic National Committee.

It was the first step in a national lobbying campaign that will ask each of the presidential candidates to embrace the idea and will include grass-roots efforts in such early-voting states as Iowa and New Hampshire. The goal is to persuade members of the Democratic-controlled Congress to pass legislation by summer.

"We're very excited," said the DNC resolution's author, Donna Brazile, who ran Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign. "This is the beginning of a 50-state campaign."

For decades, the District has fought for a voting seat in Congress. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.), can vote only in committees and on amendments to legislation. But legislation introduced last month would add a full seat in Congress for the heavily Democratic District and one for Utah, which is solidly Republican.

Passage is far from certain. Republicans are divided on the issue, and the measure would need 60 votes in the Senate to avoid a filibuster. Democrats, who have concerns of their own, hold a one-vote majority. Brazile remained optimistic about gaining traction.

Local activists and elected leaders, including D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D), are also ramping up their efforts. On two days of lobbying and protest, one Feb. 15 and another in April, D.C. residents will take their message to Capitol Hill.

Biden Says He Regrets Remarks On Obama (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127426

WASHINGTON -- Senator Joseph Biden tried yesterday to stem the damage from the botched launch of his presidential campaign as underdog candidates in the Democratic field looked to gain momentum from the party faithful.

The Democratic National Committee wrapped up a three-day winter meeting that offered speeches from all 10 candidates already in the race or considering a bid. Those leading in the polls all appeared Friday.

The crowd thinned to less than half yesterday, but those in attendance were no less enthusiastic. Governor Bill Richardson of New Mexico stirred them by calling for a primary without negative campaigning and saying he would bring troops home from Iraq by the end of the year.

"Maybe I'm not up there in all these polls, but you are the deciders, not the man in the White House," Richardson said to cheers. "I say to you today, stay loose. We've got a year to go."

Tom Vilsack, former Iowa governor, positioned himself as a Washington outsider with a record of real change. He criticized senators in the race who refuse to cut the money that is paying for troops in Iraq.

Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York are advocating a cap to the number of troops and their eventual withdrawal.

"The reality of capping troops or reducing the number of troops at some point in the future is not real change," Vilsack said. "It is time for us to clearly say the war must end and our troops must be brought home now."

Biden got right to the matter that has threatened his candidacy before it even gets off the ground.

The Delaware senator spent his first day as an official candidate Wednesday explaining his statement that Obama is "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean," raising questions about how he viewed other black candidates.

"I want to say that I truly regret that the words I spoke offended people that I admire very much," Biden said.

Nominate Biden: America Needs The Comic Relief (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 4, 2007

The United States is pretty stressed out right now. Iraq is going terribly, Boston was shut down by a bomb scare, famous people keep using the n-word as if it were 1860 again, and global warming's Chicken Littles are terrifying everyone with their cries of doom. Like never before, America needs Sen. Joe Biden.

Last week Sen. Blowhard said this of his rival for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Barack Obama: "I mean, you got the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

The very first? Wow.

That was after Biden ripped a few of his Democratic opponents' Iraq plans, calling Hillary Clinton's plan "nothing but disaster," and saying of John Edwards' proposal, "I don't think John Edwards knows what the heck he is talking about."

And that was after Biden said of Indian immigrants last summer, "You cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent. I'm not joking."

And all of that was after Biden dropped out of the 1988 Presidential race for plagiarizing a speech by a British politician.

This guy is a one-man laugh factory.

Despite his lack of tact, we don't think Biden really is a bigot. He is, however, the court jester of the U.S. Senate. Bringing his act on the road would provide some much-needed stress relief for the American people.

If Democrats really cared about providing relief to the American people, they'd nominate a walking punch line so we could all spend the bulk of the election year laughing at the ineptitude of their candidate -- just like in 2004.

If we get really lucky, Biden will get the nomination and pick Dennis Kucinich as his straight man/running mate.

Twisting In Their Own Windiness (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Ladies and gentlemen of the jury of public opinion, I rise not to defend Joe Biden, Jacques Chirac and Bob Gates but to draw your attention to extenuating circumstances that may have caused these accused and other gaffe-prone speakers to plant their feet deeply in their mouths in recent days.

DOJ_NMG_0127427

What's that? Oh, yes. In the case of Gates, the new defense secretary, it should be made clear that he received help from Karl Rove and the White House in stumbling over his own infelicitous words. We will come to that shortly.

This outbreak of global political buffoonery is no accident. It spins out of a whirlwind of campaigns, elections and leadership changes sweeping across Britain, France, Russia, the United States and who knows where else over the next two years.

In a globalized world, if you will, a permanent campaign is underway somewhere and everywhere all the time. Politicians get endless opportunities to say dumb things into tape recorders and cameras. That provides endless material for the new savants of the age of interconnectivity, the snark artists of television's false news shows, talk radio, blogs and, yes, newspapers, bless their fearful, tarted-up souls.

Sorry. I digress. But context is everything in the case of Joe Biden making the evening news by praising Sen. Barack Obama for being, well, " clean." Reporters who long ago learned to concentrate on Biden's ideas rather than on his ill-assorted nouns, verbs and adjectives had to treat this gaffe as momentous: Against much of the available evidence, Biden had just declared that he was a serious presidential contender.

The Delaware senator is a thoroughly decent, hardworking and thoughtful legislator. But I found it unnerving in his previous bid for the Democratic nomination, in 1988, to have him frequently deliver a loosely connected set of ideas during an interview and then look up to ask: "Am I making sense here?" So I say, plus Ã§a change.

Yes, this French adage moves us to President Chirac, who also made the front page of the New York Times on Thursday by furiously trying to deny and then retract words he had said to three reporters and a tape recorder. After months of formally declaring that Iran must not be allowed to develop nuclear weapons, Chirac confided that an Iran possessing one or two nuclear weapons would not be so dangerous after all, since Tehran could be razed in retaliation for inappropriate behavior.

Hmmm. Well, doesn't he have a point there? And this is familiar behavior, too. Chirac made unsettling remarks about Germany and Israel to the Washington Times back in 1986 and then firmly denied making them until his questioner produced an unexpected tape recording.

Interviewing Chirac has always been a constant struggle to identify what he intends as policy pronouncements, as his version of clever repartee to lighten the atmosphere or as just plain banality. This, after all, is a politician nicknamed "the brother-in-law." His bonhomie is often forced and capable of leading him astray.

One would never say that of Bob Gates, who interrupted his skillful effort to smooth all Washington feathers ruffled by Don Rumsfeld by calling a news conference Jan. 26 to warn darkly that congressional opposition to U.S. troop increases in Iraq "emboldens the enemy and our adversaries."

There is cause for legitimate concern on that score. But this is also language out of the White House political playbook for turning arguments about Iraq strategy into arguments about patriotism. And yes, you will hear people with great connections in this administration say that Rove and communications czar Dan Bartlett encouraged Gates in this mission. At least, I have heard that.

But Gates denies it. And you must consider who is damaged most by this poisonous approach. First of all, Gates. It revives the fading criticisms from his CIA days that he politicized national security judgments to please his political masters. It is not in his interest to have those memories recalled.

Second, this was nothing less than a thinly veiled attack on GOP icon Sen. John Warner and his dissent on Iraq. A White House assault on Warner's responsible effort to reduce polarization on Iraq risks destroying what remains of the unity of the Republican Party's foreign policy establishment. Heck, it threatens to destroy that establishment altogether. I would be amazed if Warner were not stung by "what they are putting Gates up to," as one Warnerite puts it.

So surely, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, you will see that Bush White House politicos would never risk such damage for short-term political gain. That would make them seem even more ridiculous than the most snarky parodymeisters ever could. And who could possibly want that?

Joe Biden's Just A Barrel Of Gaffes (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

DOJ_NMG_0127428

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

DELAWARE Sen. Joe Biden has been telling people for months that he's going to run for president, as if nobody could actually believe it. Even when he formally announced last week, I still didn't believe it. In fact, I'm not quite sure what it would take to make me believe it. If I turned on the television and watched Biden formally accepting the nomination at the Democratic National Convention, I might believe it then. (On the other hand, I'd probably figure I was suffering some hallucinatory episode and check myself into a hospital.)

I'm not saying Biden shouldn't be president. I have tons of respect for him, and I think he'd do a terrific job if he could get it. I just find it amusing that he thinks there's some chance he could actually become president. It's a case study of that bizarre mental affliction that strikes so many senators. They see younger, less-experienced Senate colleagues — who are far less esteemed than they are — running for president, and they're offended. If the 100 senators were the only ones who could vote, Biden would probably beat Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama. Unfortunately for Biden, that's not how it works.

Biden's charming cluelessness was on display in a recent ABC news interview. The famously verbose senator was asked to state in 25 words or less why Democrats should nominate him. His response was 45 words. I suppose that, by Biden's standards, coming in at just under twice his allotted length counts as a victory of sorts. Biden then explained why he could win: "If people learn my story, learn my record, I think I can compete. The question is, can I raise the money?" This is sort of like me saying that I think I can compete for a starting NFL quarterback job, but the question is, can I avoid injuries? It's a question, but it's certainly not the question.

In addition to his uncontrollable verbosity, Biden is a gaffe machine. He ran for president 20 years ago but had to abandon his campaign when it was discovered that he had plagiarized speeches from a British politician, substituting in key details to make the story his own.

In his latest effort, Biden wasted no time subverting his already microscopic chances. On the day of his announcement, he mused about Illinois Sen. Obama: "I mean, you got the first mainstream African American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

In Biden's defense, the quote was widely misunderstood. Having listened to it, it's obvious that Biden was not saying Obama is the first mainstream African American candidate who is also articulate and so on. He was saying he's the first mainstream candidate — meaning ideologically mainstream, unlike Carol Moseley Braun, Al Sharpton or Jesse Jackson — and that he's articulate and so on. He wasn't calling Jackson or the others inarticulate. To be sure, this is still a pretty cringe-inducing way for white people to talk about African Americans. There's a famous Chris Rock routine in which he complains about how people describe Colin Powell as "articulate," as if it were a surprise that a secretary of State can speak well.

And, of course, last summer Biden attempted to endear himself to an Indian American supporter by telling him that in Delaware, "you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent." Not only was this an offensive line, it didn't even make any sense: The observation, familiar to anybody who watched a comedian on cable television 15 years ago, is that Indian Americans are the only ones who work in convenience stores, not that they're the only ones who shop there. The man can't even keep his condescending cliches straight.

Biden looks as if he's the product of a laboratory experiment designed to create the world's worst presidential candidate. If the Obama gaffe doesn't knock him out of the race, something else will. I doubt he makes it to Iowa.

Yes, Biden's very knowledgeable and dedicated. But to win the presidency, you actually have to be good at mass politics. Why is Biden not smart enough to recognize that?

The Racial Politics Of Speaking Well (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

SENATOR JOSEPH R. BIDEN'S characterization of his fellow Democratic presidential contender Senator Barack Obama as "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy" was so painfully clumsy that it nearly warranted pity.

DOJ_NMG_0127429

There are not enough column inches on this page to parse interpretations of each of Mr. Biden's chosen adjectives. But among his string of loaded words, one is so pervasive — and is generally used and viewed so differently by blacks and whites — that it calls out for a national chat, perhaps a national therapy session.

It is amazing that this still requires clarification, but here it is. Black people get a little testy when white people call them "articulate."

Though it was little noted, on Wednesday President Bush on the Fox News Channel also described Mr. Obama as "articulate." On any given day, in any number of settings, it is likely to be one of the first things white people warmly remark about Oprah Winfrey; Richard Parsons, chief executive of Time Warner; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Deval Patrick, the newly elected governor of Massachusetts; or a recently promoted black colleague at work.

A series of conversations about the word with a number of black public figures last week elicited the kind of frustrated responses often uttered between blacks, but seldom shared with whites.

"You hear it and you just think, 'Damn, this again?' " said Michael Eric Dyson, a professor of humanities at the University of Pennsylvania.

Anna Perez, the former communications counselor for Ms. Rice when she was national security adviser, said, "You just stand and wonder, 'When will this foolishness end?' "

Said Reginald Hudlin, president of entertainment for Black Entertainment Television: "It makes me weary, literally tired, like, 'Do I really want to spend my time right now educating this person?' "

So what is the problem with the word? Whites do not normally object when it is used to describe them. And it is not as if articulate black people do not wish to be thought of as that. The characterization is most often meant as a form of praise.

"Look, what I was attempting to be, but not very artfully, is complimentary," Mr. Biden explained to Jon Stewart on Wednesday on "The Daily Show." "This is an incredible guy. This is a phenomenon."

What faint praise, indeed. Being articulate must surely be a baseline requirement for a former president of The Harvard Law Review. After all, Webster's definitions of the word include "able to speak" and "expressing oneself easily and clearly." It would be more incredible, more of a phenomenon, to borrow two more of the senator's puzzling words, if Mr. Obama were inarticulate.

That is the core of the issue. When whites use the word in reference to blacks, it often carries a subtext of amazement, even bewilderment. It is similar to praising a female executive or politician by calling her "tough" or "a rational decision-maker."

"When people say it, what they are really saying is that someone is articulate ... for a black person," Ms. Perez said.

Such a subtext is inherently offensive because it suggests that the recipient of the "compliment" is notably different from other black people.

"Historically, it was meant to signal the exceptional Negro," Mr. Dyson said. "The implication is that most black people do not have the capacity to engage in articulate speech, when white people are automatically assumed to be articulate."

And such distinctions discount as inarticulate historically black patterns of speech. "Al Sharpton is incredibly articulate," said Tricia Rose, professor of Africana Studies at Brown University. "But because he speaks with a cadence and style that is firmly rooted in black rhetorical tradition you will rarely hear white people refer to him as articulate."

While many white people do not automatically recognize how, and how often, the word is applied, many black people can recall with clarity the numerous times it has stopped them in their tracks.

Melissa Harris-Lacewell, professor of politics and African-American studies at Princeton University, said her first notable encounter with the word was back in high school in Chester, Va., when she was dating the school's star football player. In post-game interviews and news stories she started to notice that he was always referred to as articulate.

"They never said that about the white quarterback," she said, "yet they couldn't help but say it about my boyfriend."

William E. Kennard, a managing director of the Carlyle Group and a former chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, recalled that in his days as partner at a Washington law firm in the early 1990s written reviews of prospective black hires almost always included the words, "articulate and poised." The characterization was so consistent and in such stark contrast to the notes taken on white job applicants that he mentioned it to his fellow partners.

DOJ_NMG_0127430

"It was a law firm; all of the people interviewing for jobs were articulate," said Mr. Kennard, 50, who is also on the board of The New York Times Company. "And yet my colleagues seemed struck by that quality in black applicants."

The comedian and actor D. L. Hughley, a frequent guest on HBO's "Real Time With Bill Maher," says that every time he appears on the show, where he riffs on the political and social issues of the day, people walk up to him afterward and tell him how "smart and articulate" his comments were.

"Everyone was up in arms about Michael Richards using the N-word, but subtle words like this are more insidious," Mr. Hughley said. "It's like weight loss. The last few pounds are the hardest to get rid of. It's the last vestiges of racism that are hard to get rid of."

Sometimes the "articulate" moniker is merely implied. My colleague Rachel Swarns and I chuckle wearily about the number of times we have finished interviews or casual conversations with people — always white, more often male — only to have the person end the meeting with some version of the statement, "something about you reminds me of Condoleezza Rice."

Neither Rachel nor I look anything like Ms. Rice, or each other for that matter, so the comparison is clearly not physical. The comment seems more a vocalized reach by the speaker for some sort of reference point, a context in which to understand us.

It is unlikely that whites will quickly or easily erase "articulate" and other damning forms of praise from the ways in which they discuss blacks. Listen for it in post-Super Bowl chatter, after the Academy Awards, at the next school board meeting or corporate retreat.

But here is a pointer. Do not use it as the primary attribute of note for a black person if you would not use it for a similarly talented, skilled or eloquent white person. Do not make it an outsized distinction for Brown University's president, Ruth Simmons, if you would not for the University of Michigan's president, Mary Sue Coleman. Do not make it the sole basis for your praise of the actor Forest Whitaker if it would never cross your mind to utter it about the expressive Peter O'Toole.

With the ballooning size of the black middle and upper class, qualities in blacks like intelligence, eloquence — the mere ability to string sentences together with tenses intact — must at some point become as unremarkable to whites as they are to blacks.

"How many flukes simply constitute reality?" Mr. Hudlin asked, with amused dismay.

Well said.

Clinton Camp Hasn't Written Off Fundraising Couple Who Helped Competitor (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The life of a big-dollar Democratic donor isn't always easy. In between attending lavish parties and being wined and dined by various luminaries, sometimes you have to make tough choices.

Take Beth and Ron Dozoretz. The power couple are longtime heavyweights in national Democratic money circles; he is a health-care executive, she a former finance chairman for the Democratic National Committee.

They also happen to be close friends with the Clintons. The Dozoretzes were frequent guests at the Clinton White House, helped collect cash for the Clinton Presidential Library in Little Rock and chose Bill Clinton as the godfather for one of their children.

But, when the couple opened their Washington, D.C., manse on Friday for a fundraising event, it was New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, not New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, being feted.

"This is an opportunity for individuals to meet Governor Bill Richardson," reads a copy of the invite obtained by the Fix. "A contribution is not required to attend." Of course, if attendees do want to give money, the invite notes that checks can be written to the "Bill Richardson for President Exploratory Committee, Inc."

"They and the governor are longtime friends," Richardson communications director Pahl Shipley explained.

So does this mean that the Dozoretzes have picked their horse? Accounts vary. Some suggest that the couple has indicated privately that they will be with Richardson. Clinton communications director Howard Wolfson begged to differ.

DOJ_NMG_0127431

"Beth Dozoretz is a good friend of the campaign, and she has made a major commitment to help Hillary," he said. "We appreciate her strong support."

Reached at home, Beth Dozoretz chose not to comment. The plot thickens. . . .

CLUB FOR GROWTH ON '08

The Club for Growth wants to play a role in the 2008 GOP presidential primary. Anyone who doubts the implications, give former senator Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) a call.

A political group for fiscal conservatives, the club has become a force in congressional elections, taking aim at moderate Republicans who don't support conservative causes such as tax cuts and spending discipline. Some GOP lawmakers privately blame the group for the party's loss of Senate control in November. The Club for Growth threw substantial resources behind a primary challenge to Chafee that wound up weakening the longtime incumbent financially and politically.

Chafee survived the primary but lost in the general election to Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse. Seven Club-backed conservatives, however, won House races in November. Despite the grumbling from some GOP quarters, the group has plenty of conservative admirers for its refusal to compromise its principles.

In the coming months, those unyielding standards will be applied to Republican White House hopefuls. The Club for Growth intends to scour every contender's record and advise its 40,000 members on who passes ideological muster.

One will not be Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor and the subject of "Presidential White Paper #1." Acknowledging that Huckabee pushed major tax cuts through his state legislature, the Club for Growth lists seven tax increases that he also supported, along with spending increases and a mixed record on school choice. "Calling oneself an economic conservative does not make one so," the paper concluded.

Tim Russert cited the findings on "Meet the Press" last week, after Huckabee announced his candidacy. "That's a tough record to sell to a Republican audience in primary states," Russert noted. "It shouldn't be if they look at the real record," Huckabee shot back.

Richardson Touts Unique Qualifications (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 3, 2007

KHARTOUM, Sudan - It's been said that Bill Richardson would negotiate with the devil. And by some definitions, he has — several times.

New Mexico's Democratic governor has bartered with some of the most notorious rulers of modern times: Iraq 's Saddam Hussein , Yugoslavia's Slobodan Milosevic , Cuba's Fidel Castro , Kenya's Daniel Arap Moi, Zaire's Mobutu Sese Seko, Nigeria's Sani Abacha and most recently, Sudan's Omar al-Bashir. Richardson has compared himself to Red Adair, renowned for his ability to put out erupting oil well fires.

Richardson has more international experience than just about anyone else in the 2008 field. The 59-year-old was ambassador to the United Nations in the Clinton administration, served on the intelligence committee during his 14 years in the House and has done international work from his perch as a small-state governor.

"I have good news," Richardson told al-Bashir after four days of back-to-back meetings with all sides in the conflict, including two rare hourlong sessions with the elusive president. "We are going to leave today."

"With all that, we expect you to be the president of the United States!" he said in English, after speaking Arabic for the earlier discussions.

"I'm not one for tight bows or formal handshakes when a bear hug or a gentle fist on the shoulder is an available option," Richardson wrote in his autobiography, "Between Worlds."

Richardson had gone to Baghdad in 1995 at the request of the Iraqis to negotiate with Saddam for the release of two U.S. oil mechanics who had wandered over the border with Kuwait. Richardson has an impressive track record in convincing dictators that they should free U.S. prisoners from countries as isolated as North Korea , Cuba and Sudan.

After Saddam agreed to return, Richardson decided not to apologize but to continue making his case with respect and his feet firmly planted on the floor. Saddam authorized the mechanics' release after an hour of discussion.

DOJ_NMG_0127432

Richardson can be prickly and demanding of his staff. But he also likes to lighten the mood by having fun with people's names and their backgrounds.

Richardson bonded with Castro over their shared love of baseball and with Iraq's then-Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz over their shared Catholic faith and penchant for cigars. As U.N. ambassador, Richardson took his colleagues from around the world to a game between the New York Yankees and Mets.

Richardson emerged from his diplomatic meetings with clear impressions. He has written:

_Castro had horrible dandruff, but was humorous, personable and extremely well-informed about U.S. politics and geopolitical issues.

_Mobutu was dignified and regal despite overseeing vast corruption. His successor, Laurent Kabila was street-smart and had no scruples.

_Saddam had a twitch on the right side of his face and made Richardson sweat by staring him down.

Richardson's first visit to Sudan was in 1996, when he went to free three Red Cross workers held by Marxist rebels.

Richardson learned the rebel leader had recently lost a daughter and a son was on his death bed in the rebels' disease-ridden camp. The rebel leader wanted $10 million. Richardson appealed to him by saying he could get him medicine, rice, vehicles and other aid so other children did not have to die.

Some criticized Richardson's effort because he violated a cardinal rule of hostage negotiators: never bargain for their release.

"If you give them money, that is negotiating with a terrorist," Richardson said in a recent Associated Press interview. "But a couple of Jeeps, a health study, medicine, that's what made it happen. It was a human connection with that rebel.

"I don't mind saying I try to psychologically go into their heads and see what's on their mind and what's important to them at the time," he said. "I do study my subject pretty intensely."

Richardson's freelance diplomacy has gotten mixed reaction from the White House over the years. President Clinton gave his private blessing to the Iraq trip, whispered to Richardson as the two were watching the premiere of the Spanish-language movie "Mi Familia."

David Goldwin, who worked in the Clinton State Department and later became Richardson's national security aide at the U.N., said the administration also was appreciative that Richardson negotiated for the release of two downed Army helicopter pilots in December 1994 in North Korea.

"They had no real diplomatic access in North Korea," Goldwin said. "He had good access first person. ... He's delivered them bad news every time he's dealt with them. But they feel listed to and respected by him and so they are willing to take that message."

James Dobbins, who worked for President Bush and his father as well as in the Clinton administration, said he does not recall anyone at the White House complaining about Richardson acting as a free agent.

"He was by and large taking missions that the president was happy to have him take," Dobbins said. "There have been many occasions where congressmen have been encouraged to go places where we have a difficult relationship or no relationship at all to see what develops."

Richardson writes in his book that Clinton administration officials urged him not to travel to Haiti to negotiate a peaceful transfer of power in July 1994, as Clinton was threatening military action.

Richardson went anyway, although it was Clinton's approach that eventually forced the military rulers to step down.

Upon his confirmation as Clinton's nominee for U.N. ambassador, Richardson wrote that incoming Secretary of State Madeleine Albright ordered him to stop all independent diplomacy and warned him that others had been fired for trying to negotiate side deals.

Interest in different cultures is rooted in Richardson's childhood. He is the son of an American businessman father and a Mexican mother. He grew up in Mexico City and is fluent in Spanish. His father sent him to high school in the United States and Richardson has said he often felt trapped between two worlds.

Michael Dukakis, the former Massachusetts governor who was the 1988 Democratic nominee for president, said Richardson's combination of foreign policy and executive experience should be an asset in the 2008 race.

DOJ_NMG_0127433

Governors often make stronger presidential candidates but can suffer from criticism that they are light on foreign affairs.

"Bill's foreign policy experience is a big plus for him," Dukakis said. "He has a lot more than most of us who began in state politics and came up through the ranks and became governors. ... And I think foreign policy is going to be a big issue in this campaign, especially in the Democratic primary."

Bill Weld, a Republican who was Massachusetts governor, was three years ahead of Richardson at the Middlesex School, a boarding school in Concord, Mass. Weld said Richardson does not need to prove himself like other governors who get most of their international experience through trade missions.

Richardson's experience in single-handedly brokering high-profile diplomatic deals and his time in the statehouse "is a very attractive combination," Weld said.

That is not to say all of Richardson's travels are successful.

Richardson was not able to achieve one his top goals on the trip to Sudan — persuading al-Bashir to allow U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur. But he persuaded al-Bashir to agree to a 60-day cease-fire with rebel armies while peace talks could be arranged. It didn't hold.

On The Run (NYT)

By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times Magazine, February 4, 2007

Q: As the popular governor of New Mexico but one of the less-popular candidates seeking the Democratic nomination for president, did you enter the race to actually win or merely to angle for another position at the national level? I want to be president. If I don't win the presidency, I am not interested in the vice presidency or in being secretary of state.

Why not? As a former ambassador to the U.N. under President Clinton, as well as a self-appointed global trouble-shooter, you seem like a natural for secretary of state. I can be a governor who practices foreign policy, as I do.

Right, just last month you toured a refugee camp in Darfur and went on to Khartoum, where you were able to arrange a 60-day cease-fire between rebel groups and the Sudanese dictator, Omar Hassan al-Bashir. What is he like? I met with him twice on that trip. He is very pragmatic and also very isolated. I got an American journalist out late last year, and as the American ambassador said, he likes me, Bashir. So I used that. That was the reason the Save Darfur Coalition asked me to go to try to get him to do a cease-fire.

How do you think Condoleezza Rice and the rest of the State Department view your interventions into foreign affairs? I am sure she would prefer that I not be involved, that her own diplomats take care of things.

So you think she considers you annoying? I would think so.

Do you hold her responsible for the unilateral thrust of this administration's policies? No, I believe it is President Bush, who is saying, "I don't talk to countries that exhibit bad behavior." And pretty soon, with that standard, we're only going to be talking to the Vatican.

In recognition of your diplomatic efforts in various countries including North Korea, you've been nominated four times for the Nobel Peace Prize. Have you lobbied for it? No, you're told that is the worst thing to do. Don't lobby, don't make public statements.

I once read somewhere that people who are obsessed with making peace between warring camps tend to have grown up in homes where there was a lot of arguing between the parents. Was that true in your case? In my case, my parents sent me away at a very early age. So I don't know if they fought. I was 12, and I was gone. I think I have tried to be a negotiator because of my bicultural background.

Your father was an American banker, and your mother was from Mexico, where you spent most of your boyhood. As the first Hispanic major-party candidate to seek the presidency, do you think this country should officially be bilingual? No.

Many people in New Mexico say they knew you were running for president a few months ago, when you suddenly began to shed pounds, which you seem to do every time you're seeking office. I think the American people want their leaders to be and look healthy. I've lost about 30 pounds in five months. I need to come down another 10 pounds.

DOJ_NMG_0127434

Why do I keep hearing about you and speeding tickets? We never did get a ticket, but I was speeding. I'm impatient. I try to get too many things done. But it happened twice, and then it became part of the lore.

Well, at least you drive your own car, instead of being chauffeured around town. No, I wasn't driving. The state police drive me. But it was my fault.

On what basis, other than your record-breaking speed, do you think you can win the presidency? A lot of other candidates can give speeches about renewable energy and Iraq and creating jobs. I've got the experience. I've got the background. I've got the training. I believe as a negotiator I can bring people and the country together.

Doesn't Hillary Clinton, for instance, also have experience? I don't want to get into that. I'm going to be positive in this campaign.

Obama Mentor Rallies Black Support (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 3, 2007

A key supporter of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama urged united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still "owe" Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support, according to several people who attended a meeting of black Democratic politicians.

The comments by Illinois Senate President Emil Jones Jr., which he confirmed Saturday, angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists.

"How long are you going to owe?" politicians for past favors, Jones asked in a speech Friday to more than 100 members of the Democratic National Committee's black caucus and other political operatives gathered at the Washington Hilton for the winter meeting of the DNC, according to people who were there.

Jones, a veteran black legislator, implored the black officials and operatives not to act like "crabs in a barrel' " the attendees said, and drag down a successful member of their community.

Jamal Simmons, a political consultant who was at the caucus meeting, said Jones' words and the heated response that followed highlighted the difficult, personal choice facing many black Democrats.

"The one thing that was extraordinarily clear this weekend is that many African-American political operatives are very conflicted internally about whether to support Obama or Clinton," he said.

Jones spoke after the DNC's chief of staff, Leah Daughtry, told the group that she and the DNC would remain neutral in the 2008 presidential nominating contests.

"This is no time for neutrality," Jones said in an interview Saturday. "We have a well qualified candidate, and I urged them to get behind his candidacy."

"I didn't mention Clinton by name," he said.

But the remarks by one of Obama's longtime political mentors in Illinois was widely taken to refer to a debt felt in the black political community to Bill Clinton, who enjoyed deep black support in the White House and rewarded black allies.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, N.Y., who is now mounting her own campaign for the presidency, is trying to collect that debt by pushing hard for the endorsements of black political leaders, an effort that could force Obama onto an explicitly racial terrain that clashes with his national image as a figure of new, post-racial unity.

But while Hillary Clinton continues to lead in polls of African-American voters, Obama's extraordinary potential as a black presidential candidate has a powerful appeal to many black voters and officials.

Jones concluded his speech with a reference to the jobs and appointments Bill Clinton had given blacks, including many people in the room, and asked when they would stop owing the Clintons for that patronage, attendees said.

"You could hear a pin drop," said one person in the room who doesn't currently support either Obama or Clinton. "It was one of those moments when you say, 'I can't believe he just said that.'"

Jones' call was received frostily by Clinton allies, including Minyon Moore, the former White House aide who now heads Hillary Clinton's black outreach, and former Clinton and Gore campaign aide Donna Brazile, according to some attendees.

Moore walked out of the room when Jones stopped speaking, according to two people who were there.

DOJ_NMG_0127435

Neither Moore nor Brazile could be reached for comment. But another Clinton supporter who was who at the meeting said Clinton's camp took Jones' remarks as an affront.

"The feeling was, 'Who is [Jones] to tell us how to be black?' " said the Clinton supporter, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity of the issue.

Obama spokesman Bill Burton said Jones is "a mentor of the senator" but wouldn't comment on the substance of his speech. Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson declined to comment.

But there was no doubt in the Washington Hilton that Jones struck a nerve. Black Democrats were walking around the hotel Saturday repeating - in jest, but not without an edge - Jones' refrain of "How long? How long?"

Obamarama (NYT)

By William Safire

The New York Times Magazine, February 4, 2007

"Politics has become so bitter and partisan," Senator Barack Obama said, "so gummed up by money and influence. . . ." Though the rest of his sentence petered out into a bureaucratic "big problems that demand solutions," what struck me was the forceful word picture evoked by the verb phrase gummed up. Here was a presidential candidate unafraid to use a slang verb with verve.

It's an Americanism in the sense of "spoiled," first cited by the O.E.D. in the college slang at Yale in 1901. Rudyard Kipling helped it along to trans-Atlantic status with a pregnant observation in a 1932 short story: "Research is gummed up with thinking." (If you dare to hang that Kipling aphorism on the wall of a stiff-necked research institution or Washington think tank, then you're a man, my son.) Senator Bob Dole in 1982 cautioned against undue optimism about passage of an extension of the Voting Rights Act with "the works around here get gummed up pretty easily," and lest we forget, that senator went on to win the Republican nomination for president.

Obama, often described as a "media darling" (just as Senator John McCain was in 2000), is a politician who apparently chooses his words with care. Consider the adjective he chose to deal with questions about his purchase of a strip of land adjacent to his home from Tony Rezko, his longtime friend indicted (not convicted) last fall on charges of extorting kickbacks from companies seeking state business. At first, Obama acknowledged that "it was stupid," a harsh admission, but later found an adjective better suited to a candidate for high office: "I am the first one to acknowledge that it was a boneheaded move for me to purchase that strip from Rezko, given that he was already under a cloud of concern." (The usual metaphor is "cloud of suspicion"; Obama softened it to concern.)

Boneheaded was a perfect choice: not as condemnatory or self-flagellating as stupid, nor as dismissive as foolish, nor as formal as ignorant, nor carrying a secondary drug connotation as dopey, nor as frivolous as silly, nor as inapt as dumb (considered a slur by the speech-impaired). The successor adjective to blockheaded and woodenheaded, both in lexical desuetude, became fixed in American slang on or soon after Sept. 23, 1908, with the New York Giants facing the Chicago Cubs in the game that would ultimately decide which team would win the National League pennant.

In the bottom half of the ninth inning, with the score tied and Giants on first and third, the batter hit a single and the runner from third seemed to score with what should have been the winning run. But 19-year-old Fred Merkle, running from first, didn't bother to touch second. The Cubs' shrewd second baseman, Johnny Evers (remembered as the pivot man in Tinkers-to-Evers-to-Chance double plays), called the umpires' attention to this oversight; the game was ruled a tie and replayed at the end of the season, and the Giants lost. Merkle's innocent blunder became known as "the Great Bonehead Play."

Mixed Race

In a more serious vein, how does Senator Obama identify his personal racial mixture? The golf champion Tiger Woods told Oprah Winfrey that he likes to call himself a "Cablinasian," an amalgam of "Caucasian, black, American Indian and Asian," but perhaps that was jocular. Obama is the son of a white mother from Kansas and a black father from Kenya. The columnist Clarence Page, who is black, notes that the Illinois senator does not run away from the "black" label: "I can tell you a substantial number of black voters are mightily suspicious and even personally offended by black folks who don't want to be called 'black.' " In his recent book, "Audacity of Hope," the senator identifies himself as "a black man of mixed heritage."

DOJ_NMG_0127436

Mixed-race is a coinage first spotted by the O.E.D. in The Guardian in 1971, when the British newspaper referred to "a delegation of six mixed-race Rhodesians." That new usage was acceptable to many in South Africa categorized as colored, but that description fell out of favor there as well as in the U.S. as recalling the era of apartheid and segregation. Colored had one sense of "neither all black nor all white" and another sense of a euphemism for Negro. Colored is now taken by many to be offensive, but people of color is embraced proudly. In the U.S., black is now widely acceptable, especially in a second reference to African-Americans. Nonwhite is acceptable to demographers but will likely wither as suggesting that whiteness is the norm. Mixed heritage, Obama's usage following black, suggests ethnicity more than race — like the offspring of British and Russian parents — which is why mixed-race is the compound adjective to keep your eye on.

Media Darling

One way to zap a hitherto little-known person getting a rush of publicity is to afflict him with the bogus title media darling. That's because media, when construed as singular — especially as mass media and mainstream media — connotes to its crowd of critics some manipulative monolith whose control of communication is to be resisted.

In sports, "the hottest rookie in pro football" in 1983 was, according to The Boston Globe, Dan Marino, "embraced as the universal media darling." In business, The Times hailed Steve Jobs as "reinventing Apple Computer as a media darling with its popular iPod." (The Los Angeles Times updated the phrase by calling YouTube "a new-media darling.") In April 1976, Clifford Terry wrote in The Chicago Tribune about the actress Louise Lasser, whose role in the TV series "Mary Hartman, Mary Hartman" was "becoming a media darling, sort of the Margaux Hemingway of the Crock Pot set."

A Google search shows about 50,000 matches of the phrase with Barack Obama. One is this headlined prophecy from The Chicago Sun-Times: "Obama's sticky switch from media-darling to media-hounded."

Call It The "Andy Amendment" (LAT)

By Richard S. Tedlow

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

ANDY GROVE fled Hungary at the age of 20 in 1956, shortly after Soviet tanks rolled into Budapest to put down any illusion that freedom could flourish behind the Iron Curtain. He made his way to the United States and enrolled at the City College of New York, graduating first in his engineering class in 1960. He then went to UC Berkeley for his PhD in chemical engineering.

Grove's enthusiastic attachment to the U.S. began before he left his native country. There was never any question of his remaining in Europe once he escaped from communism. If ever there were a destination shopper in this life, it was Grove, and he pre-purchased the United States. He became a citizen in 1962, and he managed to extricate his parents from Hungary and bring them here as well.

Like millions of other naturalized Americans starting anew in this meritocratic nation of immigrants, Grove made the most of the opportunity this nation afforded him. In addition to becoming a wealthy man, Grove repaid his adopted nation nearly $2 00 billion, the increase in Intel's market capitalization during his tenure as chief executive of the microprocessor giant from 1987 to 1998.

Grove is one of three people most responsible, along with Bill Gates and Steve Jobs, for putting computers on our desks. Without Intel's chips, the computer revolution wouldn't have happened, and without Grove, Intel never would have managed the chip revolution as masterfully as it has. It was Grove who made Intel realize that "the PC is it," and it was his combination of managerial and technical expertise that put Intel inside so many PCs around the world.

Thankfully, no one questioned the depth of Grove's "Americanness" before he was entrusted with the responsibility of leading Intel. And no law prevented it.

The Constitution does not prohibit foreign-born individuals from leading a U.S.-based company. But what if it did? What if our Constitution had told Grove: "You can't change the world because you come from Hungary." Sound ridiculous? Of course it does. Imagine what else would have been lost if we faced such constraints in the business world.

What if the Constitution said:

• Pierre Omidyar, you can't found EBay here because you were born in France.

• Sergey Brin, you can't co-found Google here because you were born in Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0127437

• Jerry Yang, you can't co-found Yahoo here because you were born in Taiwan.

And what would happen to that most American of industries, soft drinks? The chief executive of PepsiCo, Indra Nooyi, was born in India. The chief executive of Coca-Cola, E. Neville Isdell, was born in Ireland. He follows in the footsteps of Cuban-born Roberto Goizueta.

We are not just talking about entrepreneurs from recent years. Levi Strauss was born in Bavaria. Andrew Carnegie was born in Scotland. U.S. business has flourished in no small part because of the vitality and imagination of individuals among the "huddled masses" assimilated into this country.

It is odd that this freedom to harness the best and the brightest Americans, including immigrants, is a guiding principle at every address in our nation except for one: 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. Because he was born abroad, Grove is prohibited from serving as president, even though he has made significant and enduring contributions to U.S. business and society for decades. Although the Clintons and Bushes are the only dynasties threatening to control our government these days, we cling to an 18th century measure aimed at keeping European monarchs from scheming to control the then-young republic.

A noteworthy example of what the United States gained by its openness in business, but may have sacrificed because of this presidential prohibition, is the case of a man named James Couzens. Couzens was born the son of a grocery store clerk in Chatham, Canada. Some believe that he was the real brains behind the success of the early Ford Motor Co. a century ago. It was the United States' inclusiveness that allowed him to cross the border and play such a vital part in putting the nation on wheels.

Eventually, sick of Henry Ford's increasing megalomania, Couzens left the company for public service. He became mayor of Detroit in 1919 and represented Michigan in the U.S. Senate soon thereafter. After his death in 1936, Couzens was described by President Franklin D. Roosevelt as "a leader whose convictions were a part of the best [to which] America aspires." But this "Americanness" notwithstanding, Couzens could never become president of the United States because he was born on the wrong side of the border. He knew it and didn't like it, even as a youth.

"I can never become king of England," he said sharply to his parents, "but if I had been born in the United States, I could be president."

The prohibition against naturalized citizens becoming president of the United States is as counterproductive as a similar prohibition on their becoming chief executives of major corporations would be. It is telling that no other governmental position in the country is similarly restricted. The other branches of government all welcome naturalized citizens. Foreign-born U.S. citizens have served with great distinction in the Cabinet, from Alexander Hamilton, President Washington's brilliant and indispensable secretary of the Treasury, who was born in the West Indies, to Prague-born Madeleine Albright, President Clinton's secretary of State.

Is a person who happens to be born on U.S. soil somehow more capable, more trustworthy or more dedicated to upholding the principles of this nation than those born elsewhere? The record of countless naturalized Americans who have been leaders in business, government and other areas of our society says no.

Permitting a naturalized American, whether it be Silicon Valley entrepreneurs such as Grove or governors such as Arnold Schwarzenegger and Canadian-born Jennifer Granholm of Michigan, to become the nation's ultimate chief executive would be an important way to reaffirm that openness. Let's allow voters to pick the best American for the job, wherever he or she was born.

Iran Has Guests In To See, But Not Inspect, Nuclear Site (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

ISFAHAN, Iran, Feb. 3 — Iran opened one of its nuclear sites to a large number of local and international reporters and a delegation of foreign ambassadors on Saturday in an effort to show the transparency of its program before a United Nations Security Council deadline this month.

Delegations from the Non-Aligned Movement, Group of 77 and League of Arab States arrived at the Isfahan Uranium Conversion Facility in central Iran with nearly 100 reporters. The delegation included representatives from the United Nations nuclear agency from Algeria, Cuba, Egypt and Malaysia, though none were official inspectors.

DOJ_NMG_0127438

Iran has kept up efforts to give the Isfahan facility more publicity, and a senior tourism official said late last year that Iran planned to open it and other nuclear sites to foreign tourists.

Iran's ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, said Saturday that the purpose of the tour was to assure the world that Iran's program was peaceful.

"In fact we have representatives from all over the world," Mr. Soltanieh said. "We decided to have them come here and see for themselves." He emphasized that surveillance cameras of the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency were in place there.

Photographers and video camera operators were not allowed to take pictures in the outside area of the compound. But the visitors were given special clothes, gloves and masks to protect them from radiation and toured the main facility for nearly an hour.

The Isfahan site is where uranium ore is converted into yellowcake and gas. The gas is then transferred to a more sophisticated facility in Natanz, where it could be enriched with centrifuges.

Reporters on Saturday passed the Natanz enrichment facility but were not permitted to tour the site, where Iran recently said it was installing 3,000 centrifuges. The facility is near the main road, and like Isfahan, it was surrounded by antiaircraft artillery. The Isfahan site also had air-raid bunkers.

Iran insists that its program is for electricity production, but the United States and European countries contend that it is part of an effort that eventually could produce enough highly enriched uranium to make nuclear weapons.

The tour occurred as a United Nations deadline neared this month for Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment program or face tougher economic sanctions. The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 banning the trade of goods and technology related to Iran's nuclear program.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has brushed off the sanctions as insignificant and has vowed to continue with the program.

Iran Shows Nuclear Facility To Diplomats (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

Iran on Saturday opened the gates to a key uranium conversion facility to visiting diplomats and journalists in an effort to show that its disputed nuclear program is peaceful and not a cover for nuclear bomb making.

The visit to the Isfahan plant in central Iran was the first such tour since Iran resumed uranium conversion in August 2005. The U.N. Security Council slapped economic sanctions on Iran on Dec. 23 over the country's refusal to halt uranium enrichment, which can be used for making weapons.

The visit also came ahead of a U.N. deadline for Iran to stop the enrichment. If Tehran doesn't comply by the end of the 60-day period stipulated by the U.N., the Security Council will consider new measures beyond the economic sanctions.

The United States and several of its Western allies believe that Iran is using the nuclear program to produce an atomic weapon — charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity.

The diplomats visiting the plant came from Sudan, Cuba, Egypt, Malaysia and Algeria. They represented the Arab League and two groups of developing nations known as the Nonaligned Movement and the G-77 — organizations that have asserted the rights of members to pursue national interests unfettered by Western countries.

The plant at Isfahan, 255 miles south of Tehran, is responsible for an early stage of the nuclear fuel cycle, turning yellowcake uranium into uranium hexaflouride gas, or UF-6, the feedstock for enrichment.

International concerns have recently focused more on the facility in Natanz, where uranium can be enriched using cascades of centrifuges. Only highly enriched uranium can be used for bomb-making.

But Iranian officials on Saturday's tour talked only of the program's peaceful purposes, which Iran is determined to pursue.

Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, head of Iran's delegation to the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency — the International Atomic Energy Agency — said the message of the visit was to show "that Iran is determined to continue its peaceful nuclear activities."

DOJ_NMG_0127439

"This is an opportunity to see for yourselves what is going on and get first hand information about the activities here," Soltanieh told the diplomats and dozens of reporters.

The visitors saw several areas of the Isfahan facility, including two cameras installed by the IAEA to monitor activity where uranium gas is produced.

Soltanieh said the two cameras, which take photos every two minutes, are in place according to Iran's obligations under the Nonproliferation Treaty.

They are the only cameras at Isfahan. Iran removed others here when it stopped allowing the IAEA to conduct snap inspections, a measure it took after the agency referred it to the Security Council last February. IAEA inspectors visited the Isfahan facility twice in January.

Soltanieh said the tour was "an opportunity to see that the IAEA has full surveillance control over the activities of this facility."

At the end of the tour, Soltanieh told the visitors that all the 250 tons of UF-6 gas which Iran produced in 2006 have been safely stored at Isfahan's underground tunnels, but refused to answer questions about where the tunnels were located in the plant.

Anti-aircraft guns and radar stations surround the facility, much of which is built underground to protect it from airstrikes, which became a concern for Iran after Israel hit Iraq's main reactor in 1981.

On Friday, a top Iranian nuclear official said that U.N. inspectors have set up cameras at Natanz that would allow them to monitor the activity there. Centrifuge hookup is expected to start at Natanz next week.

Diplomats accredited with the IAEA in Vienna, Austria, said that hundreds of technicians and laborers have been "working feverishly" at Natanz over the past few weeks, setting up piping, control panels and electric cables before the centrifuge hookup.

But a U.N. official in Vienna, where the IAEA is based, said that Iran had met only some of the world body's requests for installing monitoring cameras at Natanz's underground site.

Tehran already has cascades of 164 centrifuges installed above ground at Natanz and has announced plans to operate 3,000 centrifuges below ground there, enabling it to speed up production of nuclear fuel.

Iran Gives Visitors Inside Look At Esfahan Nuclear Facility (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

ESFAHAN, Iran — The squat, tan buildings with barred windows can be reached only by driving well outside the city to a flat stretch of desert on the edge of the hills. The site is surrounded by an array of antiaircraft artillery emplacements, each with one or two soldiers at the ready, and a large metal fence topped with barbed wire.

Once inside the reception hall, visitors are greeted by a huge poster that reads, "Nuclear Energy Is Our Obvious Right."

Here, in a city considered the heart of its nuclear development program, is where Iran has been taking the initial technological steps to turn ordinary uranium into the makings of nuclear fuel.

In a rare invitation to foreign visitors Saturday, Iranian officials opened the doors of the normally closed facility. The officials reported that the fledgling conversion program, which was in its infancy only three years ago, has now manufactured 250 tons of uranium hexafluoride gas, the feedstock for Iran's controversial uranium enrichment program.

The group included visitors from all over the world, said Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency. "We have decided they would come here to have the opportunity to see themselves what is going on," he said as they walked through the large rooms of tanks, feeder lines, pressure gauges and control panels.

The official delegation of seven included representatives of the Non-Aligned Movement, the G-77 group of developing nations, and the Arab League, all accredited to the IAEA in Vienna. Iranian officials allowed a group of journalists to cover the visit.

"We want to remove these ambiguities and questions from our Arab brothers and sisters in the region. They have to know that everything is transparent and it is for peaceful purposes, and there is no concern as far as safety is concerned," Soltanieh said. "You will notice these facilities are of the highest standard, and a lot of investment has been made in order to prevent any environmental impact."

DOJ_NMG_0127440

The uranium conversion facility at Esfahan is only a piece of Iran's nuclear program, which the Islamic Republic says it is pursuing to develop new sources of electrical power and maintain a high level of oil exports.

The next and most controversial step is conducted at an even more secret plant at Natanz to the north, where the feedstock material produced at Esfahan is processed through a series of centrifuges to enrich the uranium for use as fuel for nuclear reactors. Enriching it far more than that, a level beyond Iran's present capability, most experts believe, would be sufficient for use in a nuclear weapon.

The U.S. and some other countries believe that may be the ultimate goal of Iran's nuclear program, but Iran contends that it is opposed to nuclear weapons and would simply withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty if it wanted to build them.

The United Nations Security Council has adopted a first tier of sanctions against Iran. The measures freeze some assets and bar companies from selling materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear program. The U.S. has warned that it will seek to toughen the sanctions soon if Iran does not halt enrichment activities, and there are growing fears in Tehran that the U.S. or Israel could launch military strikes against Iranian nuclear targets.

The Arab League's representative to the IAEA, Mikhail Wehbe of Syria, warned that military action against Iran's nuclear program would be a mistake.

"These issues should be dealt with with the utmost standard of diplomacy, not with a threat. Because any threat to a nuclear facility, it could be catastrophic," he said.

Saturday's tour was mainly a publicity exercise; the delegates admitted that they understood little of what they were seeing. But it was clearly part of a strong effort on Iran's part to demonstrate its willingness to open up its nuclear program to inspection.

Not all of the uranium conversion facility was on view Saturday. Reporters were not allowed to see the storage chambers, reportedly built in underground tunnels to make them immune from airstrikes, where the hexafluoride gas is stored. That location is monitored by IAEA video cameras, Iranian officials say.

But visitors were allowed into what was described as the most sensitive part of the plant, the room where two IAEA video cameras are trained on the large, white, horizontal capsules in which hexafluoride gas is made from uranium yellowcake.

Soltanieh said the IAEA maintains a strict count on both the intake and outflow of the capsules to ensure none goes missing. The video cameras, he said, are a gesture to build "confidence" and to make sure the capsules are not moved when inspectors are not present.

Soltanieh also said Iran was proceeding with its previously announced schedule to install 3,000 new centrifuges at Natanz, part of an industrial-sized enrichment operation whose debut Iranian officials are expected to announce soon, perhaps as early as the Feb. 11 anniversary of the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

"The bullying forces ... are against Iran's advancement and that of independent nations. However, they should know that the era of their hegemony is over and that Iranians will overcome all obstacles facing them to access the peak of technology," President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Saturday in remarks carried by the Islamic Republic News Agency. "During the current week, great achievements will be introduced to the Iranian nation."

Iran's Boast On Uranium Enrichment Is Put To Test (NYT)

By William J. Broad, David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

After decades of largely clandestine efforts, Iran is expected to declare in coming days that it has made a huge leap toward industrial-scale production of enriched uranium — a defiant act that the country's leaders will herald as a major technical stride and its neighbors will denounce as a looming threat. But for now, many nuclear experts say, the frenetic activity at the desert enrichment plant in Natanz may be mostly about political showmanship.

The many setbacks and outright failures of Tehran's experimental program suggest that its bluster may outstrip its technical expertise. And the problems help explain American intelligence estimates that Iran is at least four years away from producing a nuclear weapon.

After weeks of limited access inside Iran, inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency have reported that Tehran has succeeded in manufacturing parts for about 3,000 centrifuges, the devices that can spin uranium into reactor fuel — or bomb fuel. In recent days, the Iranians have begun installing the machines and supporting gear in a cavernous plant at Natanz, which would be a potential target if the United States or one of its allies decided that diplomacy would never keep Iran from getting the bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0127441

What the Iranians are not talking about, experts with access to the atomic agency's information say, is that their experimental effort to make centrifuges work has struggled to achieve even limited success and appears to have been put on the back burner so the country's leaders can declare that they are moving to the next stage.

To enrich uranium on an industrial scale, the machines must spin at very high speeds for months on end. But the latest report of the atomic agency, issued in November, said the primitive machines of the Iran's pilot plant ran only intermittently, to enrich small amounts of uranium. And the Iranians succeeded in setting up just two of the planned six groupings of 164 centrifuges at the pilot plant.

"It looks political unless they've made progress that we don't know about," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a senior fellow at the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a weapons analysis group in London.

Iran's nuclear boasts come in the midst of an increasingly rancorous chess game between Tehran's mullahs and the Bush administration over the aims of Iran's nuclear programs, its role in Iraq and its ambitions to become the dominant power in the Middle East. The speculation about imminent conflict has grown so strong that President Bush's new secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates, who is intimately familiar with Tehran's nuclear ambitions from his days as director of the Central Intelligence Agency, declared on Friday, "We are not planning for a war with Iran."

Nuclear experts outside the United States government say that if Iran is successful in its latest move and carries out the enrichment, in open defiance of a United Nations demand that it suspend such activity, it could potentially yield fuel for an atom bomb in two or three years, faster than American intelligence has suggested.

Even so, Iran's very public declarations appear to contain large doses of domestic political posturing and outright bluffing.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has become the face of Iranian defiance, is under growing pressure at home because of unemployment and the squeeze of economic sanctions — and President Bush's advisers have said he may view a nuclear standoff with the United States as a way to help his standing. That, combined with evidence of problems at the pilot plant, suggest that the industrial push may be aimed as much at enriching Iran's political leverage as enriching uranium.

The Iranians insist their effort is solely to fuel nuclear reactors, a statement that in the recent words of R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, "no country that has seriously looked at the evidence believes."

At Natanz, where Iranian crews are installing the centrifuges, the desert south of Tehran gives way to barbed wire, antiaircraft guns and a maze of buildings. Two of those buildings are cavernous halls that, together, are roughly half the size of the Pentagon. They are buried deep underground to withstand attack.

The crews are installing pipes, wiring and control panels and are now stringing together the centrifuges into a "cascade" of connected machines, which spin in parallel to achieve enrichment. "They're working on the first cascade," a European diplomat said Friday.

The diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity as protocol, added that international inspectors who had just emerged from Tehran saw parts for 3,000 centrifuges. However, all of them are of the most elementary type, known as a P-1. The "P" stands for Pakistan, a legacy of the fact that Iran obtained the design from Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani rogue nuclear pioneer.

Mr. Ahmadinejad claimed last year that the Iranians were also working on a more sophisticated centrifuge, called the P-2, which would enrich uranium far faster. But inspectors have yet to be shown any of those — leading to speculation in Washington and Vienna about whether Iran has another, hidden facility.

In the underground halls at Natanz, Iranian officials say, the country plans to expand the number of centrifuges from 3,000 to 54,000 eventually, in theory letting it enrich uranium by the ton and giving it the capability to make many reactor fuel rods or nuclear weapons.

However, Mr. Fitzpatrick, a former State Department official in the field of nuclear nonproliferation, said the industrial push made little sense given Iran's problems, as reported the I.A.E.A., in getting its experimental centrifuges to run smoothly at the pilot plant near the cavernous halls of Natanz.

DOJ_NMG_0127442

"From a technical point of view," he said, "it's illogical to stand up 3,000 centrifuges before you know how to do it."

The dimensions of Iran's technical woes are suggested by its delayed schedules. Tehran originally planned to have all six cascades of its experimental plant operating by 2003, and to begin installing centrifuges in the industrial halls in 2005.

Mr. Fitzpatrick added that the industrial push made little strategic sense because the thousands of centrifuges would present a tempting target to an adversary. "You might as well draw a big bull's eye around them," he said of the cavernous halls.

Diplomats say they believe Iran plans to unveil its industrial push on Feb. 11, the anniversary of the Islamic revolution. Yesterday, as part of the anniversary celebrations, Iran took diplomats and journalists on a tour of another nuclear facility, at Isfahan.

Mr. Fitzpatrick said Iran would need this year to install the 3,000 machines at Natanz, next year to get them running smoothly, and 9 to 11 months of spinning to have them produce the fuel for a single bomb. He cautioned, however, that such an accomplishment would require all the machinery working more or less perfectly and the Iranians moving "as quickly as they can."

Iran's enrichment program, begun in 1985, was born in great secrecy and built on centrifuge plans obtained from the black market of Dr. Khan. In 2002, the covert program was exposed when an Iranian opposition group revealed the construction of the plant at Natanz.

At first, inspectors from the international atomic agency in Vienna had wide latitude to travel through Iran in an effort to comprehend the depth and breadth of the enrichment project — and assess its true nature, whether for war or peace. They toured centrifuge factories, found a hidden centrifuge factory behind a false wall in a small electric facility in downtown Tehran and hunted for signs of weapons-grade enrichment. They visited the cavernous hall at Natanz, until recently a huge, empty basement.

By the atomic agency's estimates, Iran could produce upwards of 100 centrifuges a month, and was stockpiling them.

Then, last February, after three years of unusual openness, Iran reacted to the growing pressure from Washington and Europe to suspend its enrichment — or face sanctions — by drastically reducing the access of international inspectors to Natanz and dozens of other atomic sites, programs and personnel.

No longer could the inspectors swab machines, scoop up bits of soil, study invoices, peek behind doors and gather seemingly innocuous clues. No longer would the Iranians let the inspectors investigate the origins of traces of highly enriched uranium or examine important documents from the Khan network. Now, the inspectors are limited to a narrow range of operations, leaving them partially blind.

The Iranians appear to have sped ahead. In interviews, diplomats and nuclear officials said recent inspector reports of rapid centrifuge mobilization and installation at Natanz show that Tehran had worked hard for the past year, even as it engaged in increasingly harsh language that some experts took as a cover for technical failings.

Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, recently suggested that the Iranian strides amounted to something of a bargaining chip that might be traded away to head off a larger confrontation.

The West, he proposed at Davos, Switzerland, on Jan. 26, might suspend its economic sanctions against Iran while Tehran simultaneously suspended its enrichment of uranium. He floated the idea for what he called a "time-out" after saying that Iranian officials had told him they planned to begin installing centrifuges this month at their Natanz industrial-scale plant.

"Enough flexing muscles, enough calling names," Dr. ElBaradei told reporters at the World Economic Forum conference. "It's time to engage."

Ex-U.S. Military Leaders Urge Iran Talks (AP)

By Jill Lawless, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

Three former high-ranking U.S. military officers have called for Britain to help defuse the crisis over Iran's nuclear program, saying military action against Tehran would be a disaster for the region.

In a letter to the Sunday Times newspaper, the three former officers urged President Bush to open talks "without preconditions" with the Iranian government to find a diplomatic solution.

DOJ_NMG_0127443

The signatories were retired Lt. Gen. Robert G. Gard, a senior military fellow at the Center for Arms Control and Nonproliferation in Washington; retired Marine Gen. Joseph P. Hoar, former head of U.S. Central Command; and Vice Admiral Jack Shanahan, former director of the Center for Defense Information.

They said Britain "has a vital role to play in securing a renewed diplomatic push" and urged Prime Minister Tony Blair to make it clear he would oppose any military attack on Iran.

The officers said an attack "would have disastrous consequences for security in the region, coalition forces in Iraq and would further exacerbate regional and global tensions."

"The current crisis must be resolved through diplomacy," they said.

The United States and several of its Western allies believe Iran is using its nuclear program as a cover to produce a nuclear weapon — charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity. Last week, a respected think tank, the International Institute for Strategic Studies, said Iran was likely two to three years from having the capacity to build a nuclear weapon.

The U.N. Security Council imposed economic sanctions on Iran last month for refusing to halt uranium enrichment, which can be used both for nuclear reactors and to make atomic weapons. The council said it would consider new measures if Iran's defiance continues.

The U.S. government has refused to rule out military action if Iran does not scale back its nuclear activities, and has beefed up the U.S. military presence in the Gulf. Bush also has vowed more aggressive moves against Iranian operatives in Iraq, where the United States accuses Iran of training and arming insurgents who attack U.S. troops.

In a separate letter, Muslim, Jewish and Christian leaders in Britain called for a peaceful resolution to the crisis with Iran.

There is "no justification in international law for attacking Iran militarily and the use of force is not an option at this juncture," said the letter to The Independent on Sunday newspaper, signed by Rabbi Tony Bayfield, head of reform Judaism in Britain; Lord Harries, the former Anglican Bishop of Oxford; and Imam Abduljalil Sajid of the Brighton Islamic Mission.

What To Ask Before The Next War (WP)

By Paul R. Pillar

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Imagine that the famously flawed intelligence judgments about Iraq's programs to develop unconventional weapons had been correct. What difference would that have made to the American effort in Iraq?

The Bush administration would have had fewer rhetorical difficulties in defending its decision to go to war, even though any discoveries of weapons programs would have confirmed nothing about the use to which Saddam Hussein might someday have put such weapons or whether Iraq would eventually have acquired nuclear weapons.

But the war itself would be the same agonizing ordeal. An insurgency driven by motives having nothing to do with weapons of mass destruction and little to do with Hussein would still be going on.

Iraq's sectarian divisions and intolerant political culture would still have pushed it into civil war. Iraq would still have become the latest and biggest jihad, winning recruits and donors for al-Qaeda and boosting the militant Islamic movement worldwide. And the United States would still be suffering the same drain of blood and treasure in Iraq and most of the same damage to its global standing and relationships.

This thought experiment highlights how problems with the policy process (or, rather, the lack of a process) that led the United States into the Iraq quagmire went beyond the administration's manipulation of intelligence on weapons programs and terrorist relationships. The administration so successfully shaped the policy question around its chosen selling points involving these two issues that what passed for a national debate gave little attention to important questions about the likely nature and consequences of a war. The debate was largely reduced to contemplating the terms of a pseudo-syllogism: Hussein has weapons of mass destruction; Hussein supports terrorism; therefore, we must use force to remove Hussein.

Now, an accelerating debate about Iran and its nuclear program shows signs of the same dangerous reductionism. Some argue for an airstrike against Iranian nuclear facilities sooner rather than later. Whether the Bush administration will act on such advice in the next two years is uncertain, but it is taking confrontational steps, including augmenting forces in the Persian Gulf and raiding an Iranian consulate, that increase the chance of heightened tension escalating into a military clash.

DOJ_NMG_0127444

A long argument over many barely addressed issues would be needed to get from a belief that Iran is seeking nuclear weapons to a conclusion that a military strike, or even policies that increase the risk of U.S.-Iranian hostilities, is advisable. One issue is the uncertainty of the intelligence about Iran's nuclear program, although this is getting some discussion thanks to the recriminations about the intelligence on Iraq.

Other questions that need answering include:

What would be the urgency of taking forceful action, given that the announced estimate is that Iran is still several years from acquiring a nuclear weapon?

How malleable (and how well-defined) are Tehran's intentions, and what changes in Washington's policy might lead Tehran to abandon a weapons program? Even if Tehran's intentions do not change, what other options would impede or slow its nuclear program? If Iran were to acquire nuclear weapons, how would that change its behavior and affect U.S. interests? In particular, why would deterrence, which has kept nuclear peace with other adversaries, not work with Iran?

The likely hardening, concealment and dispersal of Iran's nuclear facilities raise questions about the impact any military strike would have on the program. How much would Iran's nuclear efforts be set back, especially given that bombs are not very good at destroying knowledge and expertise? Would the Iranian response be appreciably different from that of Iraq after Israel bombed its nuclear reactor in 1981 (Iraq redoubled its nuclear efforts while turning to different methods for producing fissile material)?

The most neglected questions concern other consequences of a U.S. strike or any other U.S.-Iranian combat, even if such combat did not lead to a prolonged occupation. How would Tehran respond to an act of war? What terrorism might it launch against the United States? How would it exploit U.S. vulnerabilities next door in Iraq, where it has barely begun to exploit the influence it has assiduously been cultivating? What other military action might it take, with the risk of a wider war in the Persian Gulf?

Other effects concern Iranian politics. How much would the direct assertion of U.S. hostility strengthen Iranian hard-liners, whose policies are partly premised on such hostility? How much would it add to all Iranians' list of historical grievances against the United States and adversely affect relations with future governments?

Broader regional and global ramifications include the impact on the oil market, whether other Middle Eastern nations would be less willing to cooperate with the United States and the prospect of exacerbating the damage the Iraq war already has dealt to U.S. standing worldwide.

Some might argue that the worst case that could ensue from an Iranian nuclear weapon is so bad that it trumps all other considerations. But there is no more reason than there was with Iraq to consider the worst case of only one side of the policy equation. And the worst case that could result from U.S.-Iranian combat is plenty frightening: thousands of Americans dead from retaliatory terrorist attacks, a broader war in the Persian Gulf, $150-per-barrel oil, a global recession and more.

That's not the most likely case -- neither is a vision of Iranian-generated mushroom clouds -- but it is plausible that substantial portions of that scenario would materialize.

Avoiding the next military folly in the Middle East requires that the agenda for analysis and debate not be so severely and tendentiously truncated as before Iraq. Not only must proponents of military action not be allowed to manipulate the answers, they also should not be allowed to define the questions.

The writer, a former national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia, teaches security studies at Georgetown University.

Report: N.Korea Considering Concessions (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

North Korea is ready to freeze a key nuclear facility and allow international inspectors limited access to the country in exchange for millions of barrels of oil and an easing of U.S. financial restrictions, a Japanese news report said Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0127445

The report came one day after the main U.S. negotiator on North Korea said he believed the next round of six-nation disarmament talks with the communist state starting Thursday in Beijing could produce real progress.

The Japanese daily Asahi Shimbun reported Pyongyang will also demand at the Beijing talks that it be removed from Washington's list of state sponsors of terrorism.

The report quoted former U.S. State Department official Joel Wit, who met the North's chief nuclear negotiator, Kim Kye-gwan, and other regime officials during a visit to Pyongyang last week. It said the North was demanding half a million tons of oil a year — the equivalent of about 3.5 million barrels — in energy aid.

Hopes for progress at the upcoming talks are high amid indications that Washington and Pyongyang recently narrowed differences over a key financial dispute that has hindered negotiations.

Earlier this week, the two sides held bilateral talks on that issue in Beijing. The meetings ended inconclusively, but officials indicated that enough goodwill was generated to prevent the issue from disrupting the nuclear negotiations.

"From all accounts, it was a very useful couple of days' discussions," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Saturday upon arriving in Seoul to coordinate strategies for the coming talks. "Let's see how some of these useful substantive conversations we had can be put to use" in the nuclear talks.

"I think we do have some reason to believe we can make some progress," Hill said.

The Japanese newspaper report said North Korean officials told Wit they were prepared to close the reactor in its main nuclear complex in Yongbyon and accept inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

But they said the reactor itself would remain off-limits and the North would not close the site used for its October nuclear weapons test, or allow inspections there. They also reportedly told the former U.S. official the North was not prepared to reveal details of its nuclear weapons program.

In return for its concessions, Pyongyang plans to demand oil in compensation for an aborted project to build two light-water reactors in the country, according to the report.

The North will also demand that Washington take steps to lift financial sanctions against North Korean assets, imposed over the regime's alleged counterfeiting of U.S. dollar bills and money laundering activities.

Hill said progress in the upcoming talks means beginning to implement a 2005 accord, in which North Korea pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

The negotiations, involving China, Japan, the two Koreas, Russia and the U.S., have made little headway since the 2005 accord — the only ever reached in the process.

Progress stalled soon afterward because of Pyongyang's objection to the U.S. financial restrictions.

At the latest round of disarmament talks in December — the first after the North's October nuclear test — Pyongyang refused to address disarmament issues and demanded the U.S. lift financial restrictions first. The North claims the measures show Washington's hostile attitude and illustrate its need for a nuclear deterrent.

On Road To Kosovo Independence, A Warning: Go Slow (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

MITROVICA, Kosovo, Jan. 29 — Thuggish Serbian “bridge watchers” still maintain their vigil on the north side of the Ibar River here, ready to punish any ethnic Albanian who dares to cross the unofficial boundary between Serbian and ethnic Albanian territory in Europe’s unfinished war.

Kosovo, still officially a province of Serbia, is bitterly divided between Serbian enclaves, including a large chunk of the north, and the rest of the territory, which is overwhelmingly ethnic Albanian. Now, as the United Nations nudges Kosovo toward what it calls “final status” and Belgrade calls independence, many of northern Kosovo’s Serbs are threatening to break away.

“Northern Kosovo will secede,” warned Oliver Ivanovic, a moderate Serbian politician here. Mr. Ivanovic says he has been warning the United Nations, NATO, the European Union and the United States that, nearly eight years after a NATO bombing campaign drove the Serbian Army and other security forces out of Kosovo, it is still too early to settle the status of the disputed territory. “Kosovo’s independence will leave no space for the moderates to act.”

DOJ_NMG_0127446

Secession by northern Serbs could provoke Albanian reprisals against Serbian enclaves elsewhere in Kosovo, warn Serbs and Albanians alike, and could destabilize a still fragile region full of ethnic slivers separated from their homelands.

Kosovo, which is more than 90 percent ethnic Albanian, has struggled since the early 20th century to free itself from the dominance of Belgrade. With the breakup of Yugoslavia in the early 1990s the fight began anew, but Serbia resisted fiercely.

The war was marked by atrocities on both sides and a horrific cycle of "ethnic cleansing," as the formerly mixed Serbian and ethnic Albanian populations pulled apart. Nearly 10,000 ethnic Albanians died as well as many Serbs. Thousands more, mostly ethnic Albanians, remain missing.

It ended with NATO's intervention in 1999, and the province has been administered by the United Nations ever since.

[A United Nations mediator, Martti Ahtisaari, presented his proposals for Kosovo's final status to officials in Belgrade and Pristina on Friday, but the two sides remained far apart. The Serbian president, Boris Tadic, immediately rejected the plans as a prelude to independence while Kosovo Albanians — who with the United States' blessing have said they will accept nothing less than independence — welcomed them. The continued standoff suggested that the intended end may instead be a prologue to another difficult chapter in a troubled history.]

Most of the Kosovo Serbs insist that they will never accept an independent Kosovo. Even if the government in Pristina does hoist a new national flag, they say, they will fight to recover the province that Serbs still consider their cultural heartland — the cradle and, in 1389 at the hand of the Turks, the grave of their great medieval empire.

"It would create a situation like Iraq or Lebanon here in Serbia," said Milan Ivanovic, a doctor at Mitrovica's hospital and head of Kosovo's hard-line Serbian National Council (no relation to Oliver Ivanovic). He cited the Christian reconquest of Moorish Spain and France's eventual recovery of the Alsace-Lorraine region from Germany as models. "We would fight to get Kosovo back with all legitimate means."

Kosovo Albanians and their international supporters hope that a high degree of autonomy in Serbian areas with guarantees for the protection of Serbian rights and strict international oversight will eventually persuade Serbs in the territory to accept an Albanian-led government in Pristina.

"Hopefully, with independence, a local Serb leadership will emerge to address the needs of the Serbs within the Kosovo system," said Muhamet Hamiti, an adviser to Kosovo's president, Fatmir Sejdiu.

Some moderate Serbian politicians are already willing to work within a Kosovo national system, even if their political support in the Serbian community is small.

But Serbian enclaves, particularly northern Kosovo, still operate under Serbian national authority and draw most of their financial support from Belgrade, raising questions about how Pristina could enforce sovereignty over Kosovo Serbs without coercive actions that would risk provoking more violence.

Nowhere is the divide as clear as in the region around this northern city. A United Nations-financed train that links the rest of Kosovo's Serb enclaves with the north carries Serbs and Albanians alike until it reaches the Mitrovica station south of the river. There, even the Albanian conductor gets off. Only Serbs ride on for another 15 minutes across an iron railroad bridge to the end of the line.

"I'm not brave enough to go up there," the conductor said, watching the train pull away. "I survived the war. I don't need another challenge."

Cars carry Serbian license plates and the economy still operates on the Serbian dinar even though the Albanian areas of this long-disputed territory, now administered by the United Nations, long ago converted to the euro. Serbia's Ministry of Education in Belgrade has even set up what it calls the "University of Pristina, Temporarily Located in Mitrovica."

"How can they force us to accept independence?" asked Dr. Ivanovic, the Serbian politician, who like many people working for Serbian institutions in Kosovo's Serbian enclaves is paid an above average salary by Belgrade as a reward for his loyalty.

While many people see fixing Kosovo's eventual independence as the last chapter of Yugoslav disintegration, Serbs see it as the dismemberment of their homeland.

The province, ringed by snowy mountains and populated with great colonies of inky rooks that gave it its name (kos means blackbird in Serbian), is home to the Serbian Orthodox Church's most sacred sites.

DOJ_NMG_0127447

“This is the spiritual center of the Serbian Church,” said Sister Dobrila, a nun at the monastery of the Patriarchate of Pec, which was built around a richly frescoed Byzantine church from the 13th century that holds the tombs of Serbia’s medieval archbishops.

She noted that western Kosovo, the site of the monastery, is called Metohija in Serbian, which means “church land.” “It’s sacred territory,” she said.

Even the birds, which swarm over Pristina to settle in its trees at night, are woven into the nationalist myth. According to Serbian folklore, the birds are the souls of the dead from the 14th century battle of Kosovo, in which a Serbian-led Christian army sought to stop the Ottoman advance — an advance whose legacy is the nominally Muslim Albanian majority in the province today.

The common analogy given to Americans, imperfect but pertinent in the emotions it stirs, is the notion of secession by Florida or New Mexico, if the Spanish-speaking populations in those states became a majority. The analogy is imperfect because few Americans, most of whom are already long separated from their cultural roots, have as deep an emotional connection to place as many Europeans have.

That is why Europe, understanding the violence of such emotions, is not united behind the United Nations plan. Countries facing their own secessionist movements — Spain with the Basques, Romania with ethnic Hungarians, and Russia with Chechens and peoples of other rebellious territories — are skeptical of what they see as an American effort to jam a solution into place so Washington can turn its attention elsewhere.

“A forced solution is not a solution,” said Marko Jaksic, head of the Democratic Party of Serbia and widely regarded as the most powerful politician in Mitrovica.

Palestinians Slam Major Powers Over Aid Boycott (AFP)

AFP, February 4, 2007

GAZA CITY - The rival Hamas and Fatah factions have both condemned the failure of the major powers involved in Middle East peacemaking to end a punishing Western aid embargo on the Palestinians.

"These decisions mean more suffering for our people. Continuing the siege is to continue the pain and injury we suffer from throughout the year," Palestinian prime minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas said from his home in Gaza City's Al Shati refugee camp.

The so-called Mideast Quartet -- the United States, Russia, the European Union and United Nations -- met in Washington on Friday in a bid to revive efforts to achieve an Arab-Israeli peace deal and establish a Palestinian state.

But the Quartet stopped short of resuming aid dollars to the cash-strapped authority, as Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas had expected, an aide said.

"We were expecting that the Quartet would take a decision to lift the oppressive siege on the Palestinian people to stop the suffering and create a atmosphere suitable to reviving the peace process," Abbas adviser Nabil Abu Rudeina told AFP.

The aid boycott was slapped on the Palestinian Authority last March when Hamas took power after roundly beating the previously dominant Fatah in January legislative elections.

Considered a terrorist organization by the West, Hamas has steadfastly refused to recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by past peace accords -- conditions laid down by the Quartet if the flow of aid to the Hamas-led government is to resume.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted the Washington meeting on a day when 25 people were killed in factional clashes in the Gaza Strip between forces loyal to the Western-backed Abbas and those of the radical Hamas.

The fighting, the worst yet in a year-long power struggle between Abbas's secular Fatah party and the Islamists, continued on Saturday after a ceasefire agreed late on Friday quickly collapsed.

In a final communique read out by UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon on Friday, the Quartet expressed its "deep concern" over the factional fighting and called for an end to continuing Palestinian militant attacks on Israel.

Palestinians "Nearer" Power Deal (BBC)

BBC.com, February 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127448

Rival Palestinian factions Hamas and Fatah have made progress towards agreeing a government of national unity, Egypt's president has said.

Hosni Mubarak's comments came as fighting between members of the two groups continued in the Gaza Strip. At least one man was killed.

More than 20 people have been killed and 100 wounded in recent days.

The factions have repeatedly agreed to ceasefires, aimed at ending a bitter power struggle.

Palestinian Interior Minister Saeed Seyam said on Saturday that he and Rashid Abu Shbak of Fatah agreed "an immediate ceasefire, removing gunmen from the streets and rooftops of buildings and removing all the checkpoints".

However the BBC's Alan Johnston in Gaza said a very similar plan was declared on Friday but failed to halt the violence.

A Fatah security official was shot dead in fighting near the faction's Gaza headquarters.

'Coherent strategy'

President Mubarak, speaking at a joint news conference with visiting German Chancellor Angela Merkel, said he was working to "seal the crack" between the two sides.

Gaza viewpoint

Factions locked in struggle

"What is happening now is a problem between the Palestinians themselves, and it is impossible for the Palestinian side to sit with the Israelis, as they are still not agreeing with each other," he said.

Ms Merkel, who also heads Germany's presidency of the European Union, praised Egypt's efforts to broker a deal between the two factions.

She also said she hoped the Middle East quartet of the US, UN, EU and Russia would develop a coherent strategy for peace rather than working in isolation towards peace in the region.

Bloodshed

Earlier Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas and Fatah leaders appealed for calm.

The calls followed hours of violence which shattered the truce declared on Friday.

There were fierce exchanges of machine gun and heavier fire in the central area around the Islamic University, a Hamas stronghold.

University workers ran for cover as Hamas and Fatah gunmen traded fire from the rooftops of nearby buildings, the Associated Press news agency reported.

About 60 people have been killed since 25 January, in the deadliest factional unrest in recent months in Gaza.

Reports say Palestinian Authority President and Fatah chief Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas political chief Khaled Meshaal will meet in Saudi Arabia next Tuesday to try to end the fighting.

This would be a second meeting for the two leaders after a summit in Damascus on 21 January ended without a breakthrough.

Hamas and Fatah have been trying to form a unity government for months.

They are deadlocked over Hamas' rejection of international calls for it to recognise Israel.

Western donors have been withholding direct aid, resulting in a deep economic crisis in the Palestinian territories.

Hamas Fighters Appear To Tighten Hold In Gaza (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 3 — Forces loyal to Hamas appeared to consolidate their hold on northern Gaza and much of Gaza City on Saturday, with at least 12 more people wounded in continuing clashes between Palestinian factions, residents and doctors said.

What has been some of the worst internal Palestinian fighting in years ebbed overnight after the warring factions, Hamas and Fatah, met to try to arrange a cease-fire. But gun battles raged into Saturday, and masked men continued to hold positions and operate checkpoints throughout Gaza City.

DOJ_NMG_0127449

Hamas forces appear to be in control of northern Gaza, bordering Israel, down through most of Gaza City, with Fatah forces concentrated around the government and security compounds of the Remal neighborhood, surrounding the main security headquarters, Saraya, and the presidential compound of Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, who is not in Gaza.

Hamas fighters at checkpoints were stopping all cars to look for Fatah members or members of the security forces, said Tawfiq Abu Khoussa, a Fatah leader in Gaza City. He demanded that "Hamas remove all the checkpoints throughout the Gaza Strip but mainly in Gaza City."

Detentions or kidnappings of fighters were reported, with Fatah accusing Hamas of detaining as many as 40 of its members or security officials at roadblocks. Hamas forces have also been overrunning and sometimes destroying headquarters of the Fatah-dominated Preventive Security forces in northern Gaza.

Few people ventured from their homes, and many stayed away from windows. On Friday, Wasi Kurdish, 20, was killed as he watched television when a bullet came through a window and hit him in the chest.

Ghada Abu Daoud, who works for the Gaza office of a Persian Gulf emirate, said: "Hamas is in control of the streets of Gaza City. It's Hamas that seems to initiate every raid, and the number of Fatah wounded seems higher."

Ms. Daoud said in a telephone interview that she ventured out on Saturday morning in a car, but that masked men stopped her at a checkpoint and strongly suggested that she return home. "Everyone is wearing black," she said. "But the Qassam Brigades seem stronger than anyone." The Qassam Brigades are the military wing of Hamas, which also dominates a separate, parallel police force known as the Executive Force.

Dr. Jumaa al-Saqqa, a surgeon and spokesman for Al Shifa hospital, Gaza's largest, said Hamas forces had taken over the hospital and were using it as a protected firing position. "We're extremely depressed," he said by telephone. "I'm afraid to walk to my office in the hospital. Even in my apartment I'm afraid of a bullet coming through the window."

Dr. Saqqa said that blood supplies were low, and that given the street fighting and what he called the "shame" of the internal fighting, few Gazans were going out to give blood. "People aren't willing to give blood for this internal fighting," he said.

Abed Salaam Shihada, a Gazan documentary maker, said: "One prisoner is punishing another. But Hamas feels itself under real threat; it's defending itself."

Mr. Shihada suggested that with the international boycott on Hamas and the increased pressure from the United States, including the prospect of $86.4 million in aid and training to Fatah forces loyal to Mr. Abbas, Hamas was asserting its presence in Gaza. "For them it's a battle for existence," he said.

Hamas sharply criticized the meeting of major countries involved in Middle East diplomacy on Friday in Washington. At the meeting, the so-called quartet — the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — expressed concern about the violence and pressed for a meeting soon of Mr. Abbas, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to find a clearer "political horizon" toward peace. But the group insisted that it would not deal with Hamas until it recognized Israel, forswore violence and accepted previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Ahmed Youssef, an adviser to the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, who is a member of Hamas, said the meeting produced nothing positive. He criticized Germany, as the current head of the European Union, for failing to end the boycott of Hamas.

A small protest against the internal bloodletting was called Saturday in Unknown Soldiers Square in Gaza City, near the parliament building, but few Gazans felt safe to venture out to join it, residents said. Scores had come in previous days, but only 20 or so on Saturday.

The United Nations issued a statement on Saturday deploring the violence on behalf of the many agencies that work in Gaza to provide food, education and medical care to refugees and others. With their own workers at risk and often unable to travel safely, the agencies said: "It is becoming extremely difficult for us to fulfill our humanitarian mandates to alleviate the suffering of the Palestinian people. The implications of this for a population already facing extreme hardship are grave."

United Nations schools did not reopen Saturday after a vacation, leaving more than 200,000 students at home.

Mr. Abbas and the exiled leader of Hamas's political bureau, Khaled Meshal, are to meet Tuesday in Mecca at the invitation of King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia to continue talks on a unity government. Mr. Meshal, based in Damascus, is considered to have control over Hamas's military wing, which appears to ignore the authority of the Hamas-led Palestinian government and of Prime Minister Haniya.

DOJ_NMG_0127450

Mr. Haniya and other noted Hamas leaders have been silent and apparently underground during these days of fighting, while many senior Fatah leaders left Gaza to go to the West Bank, taking their families.

Arab countries are embarrassed and angry about the fighting. The Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said Saturday that the infighting had harmed the Palestinian cause. "This appeared clearly in the results of the quartet meeting yesterday and its statement that questioned the ability of the Palestinian people to rule themselves," he said.

At least 17 people, mostly fighters, were killed Friday, and 6 on Thursday. More than 200 people have been wounded, and neighboring universities, Hamas's Islamic University and Fatah's Al Azhar University, were both attacked and damaged by fire.

The latest clash between Hamas and Fatah, breaking yet another cease-fire, began when Hamas forces attacked a convoy of trucks from Egypt. Hamas said the trucks were full of weapons and military equipment.

A spokesman for the Executive Force, Islam Shahwan, said Saturday that the containers included Kalashnikov rifles, ammunition, flak jackets and helmets intended for Fatah forces in Gaza. Fatah spokesmen say the trucks contained tents and medical equipment, and Hamas has provided no evidence that the trucks were full of weapons.

Fatah also said that caches of weapons were at the Islamic University, and that it had captured some Iranian weapons experts there. But there has been nothing to back up those charges and no release of documentary evidence, and most experts regard the Iranian charge, in particular, as Fatah propaganda.

Factional Clashes Shoot Holes In Palestinian Truce (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

JERUSALEM — Gunmen from rival Palestinian factions battled sporadically in the Gaza Strip on Saturday despite a tentative cease-fire.

The skirmishes between the ruling Hamas movement and its rival, Fatah, were not as sustained or heavy as those of the previous two days, which left 23 people dead and scores injured. Still, at least one person was killed and at least 10 were wounded Saturday.

By evening, representatives of the two groups agreed to restore the cease-fire, which began to unravel nearly as soon as it was announced Friday.

Under terms announced late Saturday by Interior Minister Said Siyam of Hamas, the groups agreed to withdraw their forces, dismantle impromptu checkpoints and leave the streets in the hands of police. But there was no immediate sign of a pullback.

For much of the day, gunmen were virtually the only people on the streets of Gaza City and areas to the north.

Shooting broke out early Saturday near a base used by security forces loyal to Fatah and around the compound of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who leads Fatah.

Meanwhile, Fatah forces occupied two ministries of the Hamas-led government, Agriculture and Communications. Hamas said the gunmen destroyed furniture and stole computer equipment.

Although the fighting had tapered off, the air in Gaza City was of a place besieged. Masked gunmen manned makeshift checkpoints to look for their rivals. Businesses, universities and most schools were shuttered, leaving more than 200,000 children without classes.

The United Nations called Saturday for an end to the violence, saying it was endangering aid workers and hindering the ability of humanitarian agencies to provide assistance.

Previous cease-fire deals have fallen apart, and there was no immediate sign that the new agreement would hold. The violent power struggle began after Hamas toppled the long-dominant Fatah in parliamentary elections in January 2006.

Both sides have heavily armed militias.

Most of the 70,000 members of the security forces are at least nominally loyal to Fatah. Hamas has thousands of its own armed militants and commands a new police agency, called the Executive Force, numbering about 6,000 men.

DOJ_NMG_0127451

Repeated efforts to negotiate a power-sharing deal have failed. Abbas is to travel to Saudi Arabia this week for talks with Khaled Meshaal, the exiled Hamas political leader who is based in Syria. The two men met in Damascus last month but didn't bridge their differences.

Abbas has tried to persuade Hamas to agree to a shared political program that would meet Western demands to recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by past Israeli-Palestinian agreements. Western nations cut off most aid to the Palestinian Authority after the election last year because they consider Hamas a terrorist group.

Hamas, Fatah Ignore Truce Deal In Gaza (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

Fatah and Hamas clashed at Cabinet ministries, universities and security headquarters Saturday in defiance of a truce that was to have calmed the seething Gaza Strip.

The cease-fire agreement was announced late Friday on the deadliest single day of battles between the two sides, who have been fighting for control of the Palestinian government since the Islamic militant Hamas ousted Fatah from power in last year's elections.

Palestinian officials said the deal was approved by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and Hamas' supreme leader, Khaled Mashaal. But the cease-fire — the second announced this week — showed no signs of taking hold.

Gunbattles raged across Gaza after the truce was announced, continuing through the night and early Saturday. With no casualties reported overnight, some Gazans, who had spent the previous two days huddled at home for safety, were emboldened to leave their houses to go to work.

But 12 people had been wounded by late morning, hospital officials said, and Fatah said Hamas had kidnapped 40 of its security officials at roadblocks. Hamas reported one of its followers had been kidnapped.

Factional kidnappings have become a routine part of the Gaza landscape, but so far abducted men have been released quickly and unharmed.

In Gaza City, the coastal strip's largest town, Fatah gunmen stormed the Agriculture Ministry, ransacking offices and stealing computers, servers and official documents, said Agriculture Minister Mohammed al-Agha.

Fatah-affiliated security officials said nothing was stolen or destroyed, and denied al-Agha's assertion that gunmen opened fire from the building's rooftops.

Officials at the Hamas-run Communications and Postal Ministry said Fatah gunmen fired two rocket-propelled grenades at the building. Gunbattles also erupted around the Interior Ministry, which Hamas controls, and the Fatah-dominated National Security headquarters.

Universities also continued to be the site of clashes. Armed men at Islamic University, a Hamas stronghold, traded fire with Fatah fighters who took up position on the rooftop of nearby al-Azhar University and surrounding buildings. In southern Gaza, gunmen stormed the Fatah-affiliated Al-Quds University campus in the town of Rafah, torching the student council building, university officials said.

Gunmen in Gaza City stopped cars and searched them for rivals.

Even before the gunfire intensified, the streets of Gaza City had been almost empty. And the U.N. said it would not reopen its schools in Gaza on Saturday after a midyear recess, as scheduled, because of the fighting — a decision that kept nearly 200,000 students at home.

More than 100 Palestinians have been killed in internal violence since Hamas, which rejects Israel's right to exist, won parliamentary elections a year ago and wrested power from Fatah, which advocates peacemaking with the Jewish state.

On Friday alone, the day's death toll reached 17, including four children, and more than 200 people were wounded. Casualties were so high that hospitals ran out of ambulances to transport the dead and wounded, and blood supplies were running low.

In Washington, the so-called Quartet of Mideast negotiators met on Friday to explore ways to jump-start peacemaking between Israel and Abbas despite the latest round of Palestinian factional violence.

DOJ_NMG_0127452

"There's simply no reason to avoid the subject of how we get to a Palestinian state," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said after meeting with foreign ministers from the European Union, United Nations and Russia.

Pressure Grows For Blair To Depart Office Early (WT)

By Toby Helm, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

LONDON -- The first cracks in Cabinet support for Prime Minister Tony Blair have emerged, with senior ministers questioning whether he can remain in office for another five months without inflicting lasting damage on the Labor Party.

Mr. Blair's defiant declaration Friday that he would not be hounded from office by a scandal over sales of knighthoods and other honors failed to stem growing pressure for him to quit before the midterm May elections.

Senior Labor members of Parliament have reported a collapse of morale within the party. The Daily Telegraph learned that at least three Cabinet ministers have been discreetly canvassing them about whether Mr. Blair should stay in office.

There are also reports that some senior Labor lawmakers are "actively encouraging" Cabinet ministers to wield the political dagger and allow Labor a fresh start under Gordon Brown.

Some wanted members of the Cabinet to urge Mr. Blair to quit "sooner rather than later," Channel 4 News reported.

A poll released yesterday indicated that more than half of British voters believe Mr. Blair should leave office immediately.

The survey of 1,014 adults by ICM for the center-right Sunday Express newspaper suggested 56 percent of the public want Mr. Blair to quit now, while 37 percent back him to stay on.

Mr. Blair says he plans to step down this summer.

Some lawmakers said they thought the only way to dislodge Mr. Blair would be for the Cabinet to persuade him to go voluntarily and put the party's interests before the desire to pass his 10th anniversary in office on May 2.

In an interview with the Daily Telegraph, David Cameron, leader of the opposition Conservative Party, said the Blair government was now "dysfunctional" and in a state of "paralysis."

"It seems to me it's got to that point where everyone in Parliament, everyone in government, everyone in the press, everyone in the country is thinking, 'Hello? It's over,' " he said.

The Conservative leader said that Mr. Blair was "losing it" and a "tipping point" had been reached.

In a highly charged interview on BBC Radio 4's Today program Friday, Mr. Blair dismissed suggestions that he was distracted from his work by the cash-for-honors inquiry after it emerged that he had been questioned by police for a second time last week.

He refused to bring forward his plans to leave office, saying: "You will have to put up with me for a bit longer."

But he appeared to acknowledge the damage the police inquiry was doing to his reputation, saying he was not going to "beg for my character in front of anyone."

Menzies Campbell, the Liberal Democrat party leader, said he detected "resignation" in Mr. Blair's voice.

Several other lawmakers said it was a low-key performance that reflected Mr. Blair's disappointment that his premiership is drawing to an end under a cloud.

Environment Secretary David Miliband pleaded for Mr. Blair to be allowed to carry on, saying there was a British tradition "that you are innocent until proven guilty."

But other Cabinet ministers are distancing themselves from Mr Blair.

Hazel Blears, the Labor Party chairman and minister without portfolio, acknowledged that the lengthy police investigation was creating "corrosive cynicism" that was damaging for the country.

Britons Strive To Contain Bird Flu (WT)

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

HOLTON, England -- Britain scrambled to contain its first outbreak of the highly pathogenic H5N1 strain of bird flu in domestic poultry yesterday after the virus was found at a farm run by Europe's biggest turkey producer.

About 2,500 turkeys have died since Thursday at the Bernard Matthews farm near Lowestoft in eastern England. The Department for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) said all 159,000 turkeys on the farm would be culled.

DOJ_NMG_0127453

"We're in new territory," National Farmers' Union Poultry Board Chairman Charles Bourns said. "We've every confidence in DEFRA, but until we know how this disease arrived, this is a very apprehensive time for all poultry farmers."

The virus strain was identified as the highly pathogenic Asian strain, similar to a virus found in Hungary in January, DEFRA said.

It was the first time the deadly H5N1 strain was found on a British farm.

The outbreak mirrored a similar case in which hundreds of turkeys died at a farm in eastern France almost a year ago.

That outbreak was contained and there followed a lull in cases of H5N1 in European poultry until last month, when thousands of birds were culled after an outbreak among geese on a farm in Hungary.

Also yesterday, the World Heath Organization confirmed Nigeria's first human death from the strain. Nigerian health officials on Wednesday said several people had apparently contracted the virus, including a young woman who later died.

The strain tends to be transmitted to poultry by infected migrating wildfowl.

The disease has killed at least 164 persons worldwide since 2003, most of them in Asia, and more than 200 million birds have died from it, or been killed to prevent its spread.

But it has not yet fulfilled scientists' worst fears by mutating into a form that can be easily transmitted between humans and possibly cause a global pandemic.

Avian-flu specialist Colin Butter of the Institute of Animal Health said the British outbreak was surprising as it had happened outside the main bird-migration period.

"The next thing we need to know is if this is a primary or secondary case. If this is a secondary case, it is much more serious. If this is the first case, or 'reference case,' and we can stamp it out, the outbreak will be controlled," he said.

A protection zone was established with a radius of 2 miles and a surveillance zone of 6 miles around the infected farm. Bird-related gatherings, such as bird shows and pigeon racing, were suspended nationwide.

Television news footage showed piles of slaughtered birds being funneled into an open tractor-trailer before being taken away for incineration.

Britain's poultry industry is worth $6.7 billion, with 800 million birds produced each year.

In May, 50,000 chickens at three farms in Norfolk, also in eastern England and home to some of Europe's biggest poultry farms, were culled after another strain, H7N3, was detected.

A wild swan found dead in Scotland in March had the H5N1 version of the virus. It was thought to have caught the disease elsewhere, died at sea and been washed ashore in Scotland.

Britain's deputy chief veterinary officer, Fred Landeg, said the virus was found in only one of 22 turkey sheds on the farm, owned by Bernard Matthews PLC, Europe's largest turkey producer.

Experts stressed the situation did not pose a public health threat, and that eating well-cooked poultry products posed no risk. However, close contact with sick birds, such as in slaughtering or plucking, could lead to transmission of the disease.

Deadly Bird Flu Confirmed In British Turkeys (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 3 — British authorities confirmed Saturday that an outbreak of bird flu discovered among turkeys at a poultry farm in eastern Britain had been caused by the deadly A(H5N1) strain, which has killed humans in other parts of the world.

The disease has killed 2,500 turkeys near Lowestoft since Thursday, making it the biggest outbreak of the strain reported in Britain since concern about its global spread began to take root in 2003.

An additional 160,000 birds will now be culled in an effort to contain the outbreak, government officials said.

The prospect of a mass slaughter recalled Britain’s battle with foot-and-mouth disease in 2001, when nearly four million animals, mainly sheep, pigs and cows, were burned.

The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs said that veterinary authorities had imposed restrictions in areas within six miles of the infected farm in eastern England, owned by the Bernard Matthews company, one of Europe’s biggest poultry businesses.

DOJ_NMG_0127454

The department also said all bird shows and pigeon racing was banned while scientists tried to establish more detail about the virus and the level of risk it presented to humans. The department did not say what had caused the outbreak.

Fred Landeg, a senior government veterinarian, said there was no public health concern. “Avian influenza is a disease of birds,” he said, “and whilst it can pass very rarely and with difficulty to humans, this requires extremely close contact with infected birds, particularly feces.”

Britain’s last brush with the virus was last April, when a dead swan that washed up in Scotland tested positive for the strain. Government scientists said it had probably carried the infection from Germany and posed no threat to humans.

Later that month, chickens in another part of eastern England — a center of poultry farming — died of a different strain of avian influenza, H7, which can cause mild symptoms in humans. At that time, a poultry farm worker fell ill with conjunctivitis, which was attributed to the virus.

The disease is commonly transmitted to farmed birds by infected migrating birds.

But since 2003, 164 people, most of them in Asia, have died of the A(H5N1) strain, and authorities worry that the virus could easily become transmissible among humans to create a global pandemic. About 200 million birds have either died or been killed in the same period.

On Saturday, the World Health Organization confirmed that the strain had killed a 22-year-old Nigerian woman, making her the first known human fatality in sub-Saharan Africa, [a news organization] reported.

Tests carried out at a laboratory in London confirmed the findings of Nigerian health authorities, who announced on Wednesday that the woman had died after catching the virus from an infected chicken.

Bird Flu Detected On Turkey Farm In England (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 3 -- The deadly H5N1 Asian strain of bird flu, which has killed 165 people since 2003, has been confirmed on a commercial turkey farm in eastern England, health authorities said Saturday.

Officials said the disease had killed 2,600 turkeys on the Bernard Matthews company turkey farm in Suffolk county, northeast of London. All 159,000 turkeys at Bernard Matthews, one of Europe's leading producers, were being slaughtered as a precaution, and television footage showed thousands of carcasses being dumped into trucks.

The outbreak is the first confirmed case of H5N1 among British domestic poultry in more than 15 years, officials said, and it comes at a time of increasing concern that migrating birds are carrying the disease from its origins in Asia through Africa, the Middle East and deeper into Europe. While transmission of the disease from birds to humans is rare, the World Health Organization says 271 people have been infected with H5N1 since 2003, mainly in Asia. There have been no reported cases of human infection in Europe or the United States.

British health officials said the immediate risk to humans from the Suffolk case was "extremely low." The Health Protection Agency said transmission of avian influenza from birds to humans occurs "very rarely and with difficulty" and requires "extremely close contact" with infected birds. Health officials advised that properly cooked poultry and eggs were safe to eat.

"In parts of the world where widespread infection in poultry has been reported, transmission of the virus to humans has occurred very infrequently," Maria Zambon, an influenza specialist at the health agency, said in a statement. "To date there is no evidence that avian influenza H5N1 has adapted to spread easily between humans."

David Nabarro, bird flu coordinator for the United Nations, told the BBC that it was "exceedingly unlikely" that the outbreak in Britain would lead to human infections. "The numbers of human cases are very, very small indeed, even though the virus has been moving through poultry in at least 50 countries in the last year," he said. "This is really not a human disease; it is a poultry disease."

The cause of the current outbreak is not yet known, but the disease was most likely carried to the turkey farm by a wild bird, said a spokeswoman for the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Defra). She said that all of the turkeys were raised from eggs produced at a hatchery that is being monitored for signs of bird flu. So far, none have been found, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0127455

Bernard Matthews officials issued a statement Saturday confirming the outbreak but noting that "none of the affected birds have entered the food chain and there is no risk to consumers." A company spokesman referred further inquiries to government officials.

The company's Web site says Bernard Matthews is the biggest turkey producer in Europe, raising 8 million birds a year on 54 farms in Britain. The company does about $800 million a year in business and employs more than 6,000 people, according to the Web site.

Fred Landeg, Defra's deputy chief veterinary officer, said that only one of the 22 turkey houses at the Bernard Matthews farm appeared to have been affected but that all turkeys on the farm were being killed as a precaution. Officials have imposed severe restrictions on poultry owners within a six-mile radius of the infected farm, requiring that all poultry be kept inside. Poultry owners in a larger "restricted zone" covering 1,300 square miles of eastern England are being advised to keep domestic birds isolated from wild birds.

Landeg said further tests showed the disease is "the highly pathogenic Asian strain" of the virus. Indonesia, the country hit hardest, had 46 human deaths from bird flu last year and five already this year. Health officials around the world have been closely monitoring the potential spread of infected birds, and some have warned of the potential for a deadly pandemic.

Defra officials said the H5N1 strain has been confirmed in birds in at least 45 countries. It first appeared in the European Union last year and has been confirmed in wild birds in at least 13 E.U. countries, officials said. Britain is the seventh E.U. country where H5N1 has been found in domestic poultry, following France, Sweden, Germany, Denmark, Romania and Hungary.

A strain less dangerous to humans, H7, was found in chickens at a farm in Norfolk, England, last April, leading to the slaughter of more than 30,000 birds.

Peter Bradnock of the British Poultry Council said the outbreak could have an economic impact on the poultry industry.

"I think people understand this is first and foremost a problem for poultry, not for people," he said. "I am hoping we will not see any particular change in buying habits."

Deadly Bird Flu Virus Found In Britain (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

LONDON (AP) - Officials confirmed Saturday that the H5N1 strain of bird flu had been found in turkeys on a commercial farm - Britain's first mass outbreak of the disease that has ravaged Asia's poultry stocks and killed more than 160 people worldwide.

The virus strain that killed about 2,500 turkeys on the British poultry farm was identified as the highly pathogenic Asian strain, similar to a virus found in Hungary in January, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs said.

It was the first time the deadly H5N1 strain was found on a British farm.

Also on Saturday, the World Heath Organization confirmed Nigeria's first human death from the strain. Nigerian health officials on Wednesday said several people had apparently contracted the virus, including a young woman who later died.

Last month Hungarian officials killed thousands of geese after H5N1 was detected in the southeast of the country - the first known case of the strain within the European Union since August 2006.

Britain's deputy chief veterinary officer, Fred Landeg, said all 159,000 turkeys on the affected farm in eastern England would be slaughtered. He said the virus was found in only one of 22 turkey sheds on the farm, owned by Bernard Matthews PLC, Europe's largest turkey producer.

Bird flu has killed or prompted the slaughter of millions of birds worldwide since late 2003. It has killed at least 164 people worldwide, but remains difficult for humans to catch.

Experts fear it could mutate into a form that spreads easily among people, potentially sparking a global pandemic. So far, most human cases have been traced to contact with sick birds.

The English outbreak near Holton in Suffolk county, about 130 miles northeast of London, represented the first known instance of H5N1 in Britain since an infected wild swan was found in Scotland in March. Turkeys and chickens are more susceptible to H5N1 than wild birds, who can carry the virus over long distances without showing symptoms.

DOJ_NMG_0127456

Television news footage showed piles of slaughtered birds being funneled into an open tractor-trailer before being taken away for incineration.

U.N. flu coordinator Dr. David Nabarro said experts had anticipated commercial flocks in Europe and elsewhere could be infected by migrating wild birds during the northern winter months.

"This virus is going to be in bird populations for years to come, and the way in which we'll deal with it is by implementing the well-rehearsed plan to stamp it out at source," he told British Broadcasting Corp. television. "We have to learn to accept that and not see it as a serious problem and just get on with normal poultry rearing and consumption."

Experts stressed the situation did not pose a public health threat, and that eating well-cooked poultry products posed no risk. However, close contact with sick birds, such as in slaughtering or plucking, could lead to the disease being transmitted.

"There is no need for immediate concern, but we do need to identify the source of the virus," said Colin Butter, a bird flu expert with the Institute of Animal Health. "If the virus has come from the wild bird population, we need to know which birds and how much of the population has been affected."

Last year, the H5N1 virus was discovered in countries in Africa, the Middle East, Central Asia and Europe.

Lab tests conducted by the World Health Organization in London confirmed that a 22-year-old woman was infected with H5N1 when she died on Jan. 17, Information Minister Frank Nweke Jr. said.

"It bears restating, therefore, that H5N1 is widespread and continuing in the poultry population in Nigeria," Nweke said.

Turkmen Candidates Practice Pliancy (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

MOSCOW -- Six presidential candidates are barnstorming the country and holding public meetings to talk about improving education, reforming health care, ensuring adequate pensions and boosting agriculture.

It could be Iowa -- if it weren't Turkmenistan.

Acting President Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov, 49, will almost certainly win when the Central Asian country's citizens go to the polls Feb. 11. His opponents, a deputy minister and four regional officials, are willing foils, according to analysts and exiled politicians.

Murad Karyev, the supposedly neutral chairman of the Central Election Commission, has already said Berdymukhammedov is the best man for the job.

But the modicum of debate in a country that during its 15-plus years of independence lived under the megalomaniacal shadow of president-for-life Saparmurad Niyazov amounts to a slight thaw. For the first time, the country will hold a presidential election in which more than one candidate is running.

Each of the six candidates continues to pledge loyalty to the legacy of Niyazov. But their stump speeches contain some implicit criticism of the late president by acknowledging the need to reverse the erosion of social programs, in particular.

"We know who the winner is already," said Murad Esenov, director of the Institute for Central Asian and Caucasian Studies in Sweden. "However, there are other candidates, and the fact that they have the possibility to speak up is significant and good. I believe there will be certain changes, because everyone realizes they cannot live as they lived before."

The exiled opposition has been prevented from returning to take part in the election. A coalition of exile organizations chose Khudaiberdy Orazov, a former vice premier and head of the Central Bank, to run as their candidate, but he is sitting out the campaign abroad.

"They are trying to create an image of real elections, but of course these are not elections. It's some sort of clownery," said Orazov, who lives in Sweden. "I believe we are entering the second stage of dictatorship."

Agents from Turkmenistan's internal security service, the MNB, are shadowing five of the candidates to ensure they don't stray from their scripts and say things contrary to policies laid out by the leading candidate, according to the Eurasian Transition Group, a nongovernmental organization in Germany that is one of the few with a presence in Turkmenistan.

DOJ_NMG_0127457

"The other five candidates have to attend security council meetings, where they receive their orders," said Michael Laubsch, executive director of the German group. "Everything is concentrated on Berdymukhammedov, and the MNB have total control over the other candidates."

For the outside world, the direction Turkmenistan takes will carry profound implications for energy security. The former Soviet republic is becoming the focus of competition among Russia, China and the West as they vie for its natural gas resources.

Most of Turkmenistan's gas is now exported through Russian pipelines. The supply could become vital to the ability of Gazprom, the Russian energy giant, to meet rising demand over the next decade. But Western governments would like to see construction of new export routes that bypass Russia and diversify the supply chain, something Niyazov had resisted.

China has already secured a deal to build a new pipeline that will deliver billions of cubic yards of natural gas annually over 30 years, beginning in 2009.

Russian President Vladimir Putin has embraced Berdymukhammedov. At a news conference Thursday, Putin mused favorably on the idea of an OPEC-like organization for natural gas, although he stressed, "We are not going to set up a cartel."

The United States and the European Union have stepped up contacts with Turkmenistan's new leadership. The opposition-in-exile has expressed frustration at what it sees as muted statements from those countries about the need for real democratic change.

Under Niyazov, who was 66 when he died of heart disease in December, Turkmenistan was one of the world's most isolated countries, subject to the bizarre whims of a leader who squandered vast amounts of revenue from natural gas resources on monuments to himself.

The country's education system, which forced students to study Niyazov's writings, was gutted. The number of years students spent in school was cut, and foreign degrees were not recognized. Pensions for 100,000 elderly citizens were summarily denied. Ballet and opera were banned as alien. Dissidents were jailed or forced into exile.

Exiled human rights activists have taken comfort from the release this week of an environmentalist who was given a three-year suspended sentence, rather than the usual prison term, after being convicted on a weapons possession charge that was widely seen as trumped-up. But that was offset by the ruthless suppression last month of a prison riot at a facility outside Ashkhabad, the capital. Twenty-three people were killed, according to human rights activists.

Berdymukhammedov, a dentist by profession and a former minister of health, has said that he will relax controls on Internet access, among the most stringent in the world, and that Turkmenistan may eventually move toward a multiparty system.

"I would like to be the president of a democratic country where people enjoy freedom and every condition to work and to rest, and where justice, peace and friendship dominate," Berdymukhammedov said, to sustained applause, at a televised meeting last month.

Whether such rhetoric is a short-term ploy to consolidate power by a governing class still unsure of its popular standing is unclear. But emerging regional and tribal concerns, suppressed under Niyazov, could also accelerate the need for broader power-sharing.

In a secretly conducted poll of 1,145 respondents across Turkmenistan after Niyazov's death, the Eurasian Transition Group found that 81 percent of those surveyed want a president who supports democratic reforms, and 55 percent believe their votes will not be counted on election day.

"Berdymukhammedov needs to build up a certain respect, and I believe he will allow some relaxation," said Farid Tuhbatullin, a former political prisoner in Turkmenistan and now the director of the Turkmen Initiative for Human Rights, based in Vienna. "The opposition who live in the West may have a chance to build up a dialogue with the authorities, and then maybe later they may be able to legalize their activity in the country."

Hu Cultivates Source Of Industrial Materials (WT/AP)

By Joseph J. Schatz

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

LUSAKA, Zambia -- Chinese President Hu Jintao yesterday brought his eight-nation African tour to Zambia, a copper-rich country where China's growing clout has prompted charges of exploitation and has emerged as a volatile political issue.

DOJ_NMG_0127458

Huge photos of Mr. Hu and Zambian President Levy Mwanawasa greeted motorists on Lusaka's main roads in preparation for the tightly orchestrated three-day visit, which followed stops earlier this week in Cameroon, Liberia and Sudan.

"I am sure that this visit will serve to take Zambian-Chinese relations to a higher level," Mr. Hu said.

He has used the tour to cement China's increasing economic and political ties and its fast-growing role as a foreign donor throughout the continent.

The Chinese leader was expected to attend a state banquet and meet with Mr. Mwanawasa, who has cultivated close ties with China. The country is a major foreign aid donor to Mr. Mwanawasa's government, with investments in Zambia topping $500 million, according to China's state-run news agency, Xinhua.

China also has poured hundreds of millions of dollars into Zambia's copper sector, which accounts for 60 percent of the impoverished nation's exports.

Mr. Hu's visit to Lusaka is expected to focus on new Chinese aid for Zambia and the inauguration today of an economic partnership zone in Zambia's Copperbelt province, which has become a key source of copper for China's growing economy.

But the Chinese delegation decided against visiting the province, where 51 Zambian workers died in a 2005 explosion at a Chinese-run mine. Accidents and concerns over poor working conditions at Chinese-run copper mines -- plus resentment over an influx of Chinese traders into the local apparel industry -- fueled a political backlash in Zambia's presidential elections last September over the Chinese presence.

Opposition challenger Michael Sata won support in urban areas after criticizing what he called "exploiter" Chinese investors.

"They're not here to develop Zambia; they're here to develop China," said Guy Scott, a Sata ally who represents Lusaka's central district in parliament.

The government has not invited Mr. Sata's party to public events during Mr. Hu's visit, according to the state-owned Daily Mail newspaper.

Mr. Hu's visit was preceded by a raft of new Chinese commitments, including the release of more than $6 million for the construction of a new soccer stadium in the mining town of Ndola and a $39 million grant for road building.

New Hope For Genocide Resolution (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

LAST WEEK, Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank) engaged in what has become a biannual congressional ritual: Introducing a nonbinding resolution instructing the president of the United States to call Turkey's Ottoman-era slaughter of Armenians a genocide. Unlike in years past, however, this time the symbolic but important legislation actually has a legitimate chance at passage.

Two recent developments have created momentum. First, the Democratic Party, which has historically been more sympathetic to the resolution, now controls Congress. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) in particular has taken a keen interest in bringing the matter to a vote. Second, a 17-year-old gunman last month executed in cold blood the respected Turkish Armenian journalist Hrant Dink on a crowded Istanbul street.

The slaying of Dink, who had been prosecuted for acknowledging the genocide, has sent a collective shiver down Turkey's spine, triggering street demonstrations and renewed calls for the government to change its policy. It is still a crime in Turkey to speak the truth about a period of history whose accepted worldwide interpretation Ankara still denies.

Schiff's resolution merely calls on the president to ensure that U.S. foreign policy "reflects appropriate understanding and sensitivity" regarding the genocide and that he use the G-word during his annual message commemorating the National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man on April 24, the date in 1915 when Turkey rounded up 250 Armenian intellectuals to be slaughtered. That the resolution is so mild makes the White House's opposition all the more vexing.

Even though President Bush made a campaign promise in 2000 to use the word "genocide," his flip-flop is neither surprising nor mysterious — Ankara has considerable diplomatic influence, and Turkey is too valuable an ally to alienate with congressional resolutions. Yet the U.S. is at its best when it chooses truth over expedience, especially in matters as grave as genocide. It's hard to say "never again" convincingly if you're too afraid to speak bluntly about what you aim to prevent.

DOJ_NMG_0127459

Relax, It's Not The End Of The World (LAT)

By Francis Fukuyama

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

IT IS EASY TO GET very discouraged when surveying the state of the world. Few Americans need to be reminded about the chaos in Iraq, Iran's ambitions as a regional and potentially nuclear power or the possibility of Sunni-Shiite conflict spreading throughout the Persian Gulf.

But there's also the fact that Russia has been regressing politically, using its energy wealth to muscle Belarus and Western oil companies that invested in it, while using gangster-style tactics to silence critics at home and abroad. Nationalism is resurgent in Northeast Asia, with younger generations of Japanese, Chinese and Koreans at each other's throats over wrongs committed more than half a century ago. This in turn blocks cooperation over the threat posed by North Korea's nuclear weapons.

In our hemisphere, anti-American populists have been elected in Venezuela, Bolivia and Ecuador, and are busy centralizing power and reversing the trend of the 1990s toward openness and economic integration. Around the world, authoritarian regimes are learning repression from one another. What political scientist Samuel Huntington labeled the "third wave" of democratization began in the 1970s with Spain and Portugal, spread through Latin America and Asia, and culminated in the collapse of communism. But this wave has clearly crested. Not wanting to see another democratic upsurge like Ukraine's 2004 Orange Revolution, Russia, Egypt, Syria and Venezuela have all passed laws closing off international funding for pro-democracy groups.

Underlying these worrisome trends is a huge decline in the prestige of the American model, which since the Iraq war has come to be symbolized less by the Statue of Liberty than by the hooded prisoner at Abu Ghraib.

The world's evident instability has led the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists to move the hands of its "Doomsday Clock" to five minutes to midnight, two minutes closer to the figurative end of civilization. Even the fact that hundreds of millions of people are pulling themselves out of poverty lays the groundwork for global warming.

But before we get too discouraged with the state of the world at the beginning of 2007, we should stop to consider a broader context in which things look a lot brighter. The single most notable but overlooked fact about today's world is that the global economy has been driving ahead full speed, raising living standards and closing the gap between the First and Third worlds. The economies of the world's two most populous countries, India and China, have been growing in recent years at nearly 9% and 10%, respectively. A decade after the 1997-98 financial crisis, East Asia as a whole has returned to its torrid pace of development.

But the rest of the world is growing steadily too. Latin America, despite instability in the Andes and a backlash against "neo-liberalism," has been averaging 4% to 5% growth based on exports. Sub-Saharan Africa, after three decades of decline, has seen greater than 5% annual growth in recent years, and the Middle East is not far behind. These trends in the developing world are increasingly driven by south-south trade, as India and China consume commodities and natural resources from Latin America and Africa. This has spawned world-class multinational companies from developing countries, such as Mittal (originally of India), Cemex (Mexico) and Embraer (Brazil). Even Europe, despite the dislike of many of its intellectuals for an American-led globalization, has seen rates of unemployment fall to levels without recent precedent as the European Union expands and integrates with the global economy.

What is even more striking than the fact of economic growth has been its robustness. The early years of the 21st century have not been peaceful ones, after all: The world has seen the 9/11 attacks on the United States; horrific bombings in London, Madrid, Istanbul and Bali; two wars in the Middle East and one in Afghanistan; and an enormous increase in commodity prices. Similar shocks in the 1970s sent the global economy into a tailspin, leading to recession and inflation in the U.S., the debt crisis in Latin America and stagnation in Europe. And yet the U.S. economy has not even suffered a technical recession (two back-to-back quarters of declining output) in the last decade.

Ah, many would say, but today's rosy economic picture masks huge vulnerabilities, particularly in the form of the twin American trade and budget deficits and the unsustainable buildup of U.S. dollars in foreign central banks. These deficits, and the global imbalances they represent, are indeed worrisome and unsustainable, but people misunderstand where they come from.

DOJ_NMG_0127460

They do not arise primarily from American profligacy but rather from decisions taken by non-Americans to build up dollar reserves and thus ensure themselves against financial risks. The decade following the fall of the Berlin Wall was marked by constant financial instability, but since the Asian financial crisis, countries have weaned themselves off short-term capital flows and built up reserves through export-led growth. The International Monetary Fund is in trouble today because it has run out of customers for its fire brigade services. We evidently suffer, as Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke once suggested, from a global oversupply of capital that keeps real interest rates low even as growth takes off.

Economic growth by itself will not guarantee stability, any more than the period of globalization before 1914 could prevent the outbreak of World War I. But there is good reason to think that we have consistently overestimated threats to stability since 9/11 and that it is our reaction to this overestimation that has created special dangers. At the time of the Sept. 11 attacks, there were probably no more than a few dozen people in the world with the motivation and potential means to cause catastrophic harm to the United States. Once our mighty national security apparatus was turned to focus on this problem, the likelihood of a successful attack dropped dramatically. It was in deciding that we had to "make a statement" by invading Iraq that we created a brand new problem for ourselves, creating a new terrorist haven and shifting the power balance in the Persian Gulf in Iran's favor.

But various equilibrating forces are at work. The Sunni world is not sitting by idly as Iran's influence grows, but is mobilizing to contain the threat. At home, there are many more measures we could take to lower the risk of catastrophic terrorism, such as better port security and an upgrading of our public health system to deal with biological threats. Far more likely than a catastrophic attack on the U.S. using weapons of mass destruction are bombings, attacks on airplanes, assassinations and the like — terrible events, but ones we can deal with.

There are, of course, many good reasons to want to prevent rogue states such as Iran and North Korea from getting nuclear weapons. But countries — as opposed to stateless terrorist groups — have important equities to protect, and it is not clear why deterrence would not to continue to work to restrain them. Iran's foreign policy, despite frightening rhetoric, has remained relatively cautious from the start of the 1979 Islamic revolution whenever core national interests were involved. The most acute dangers presented by proliferation are those of miscalculation as new nuclear powers emerge and as other states are tempted to preempt them.

And although the behavior of the latest bunch of oil-empowered tyrants is disturbing, in the long run, many of today's troublesome political trends are unlikely to be sustained. Russia, Venezuela and Iran — leaders of the anti-democratic rollback — have been able to defy the normal laws of economics because they benefit from high energy prices. But oil prices have already come down from last year's high of $75 per barrel to about $57 per barrel Friday. This reflects the working of markets: Rising prices have stimulated heavy investment in new upstream capacity while persuading consumers to conserve or to switch to alternative sources of energy. It is unlikely that Venezuela will be able to waste another $25 billion trying to buy itself a seat on the U.N. Security Council anytime soon.

Even pessimism about Iraq is overdone. The Bush administration has indeed made a mess of things, creating a new terrorist base in Al Anbar province and facilitating the rise of Iranian and Shiite power throughout the Gulf. But we seem not to have noticed that the civil war engulfing Iraq involves two anti-American, radical Islamist groups that are increasingly interested in fighting one another rather than the U.S. This does not absolve Washington from moral culpability for bringing this situation about, but it does mean there are self-equilibrating forces in the region that will limit the damage that conflict will represent to U.S. interests once we disengage.

There are real dangers to being excessively pessimistic at this juncture. Growing numbers of people in the U.S. and Israel believe that Iran represents an existential threat, that it will behave irrationally and therefore cannot be deterred — and that we consequently have no choice but to preempt. It is this same logic — that our backs are against the wall — that led us to the Iraq debacle. But assuming a worst-case outcome is likely to make it a self-fulfilling prophecy.

For all of its stumbles in the last few years, the United States remains a rich and powerful country, with plenty of margin to absorb setbacks and make up for mistakes. The large part of the world that is modernizing successfully is dependent on us for continued progress, and perhaps for that reason is far less anti-American than those regions mired in conflict and stagnation. There are real risks out there today, but it may help to take a deep breath and assess calmly where we stand. Terrorists use the tools they do because they are weak and have no others. Americans need to remember that we are the 800-pound gorilla: We have choices, but we need to take care when we throw our weight around.

DOJ_NMG_0127461

Francis Fukuyama is a professor at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies and the author of "America at the Crossroads: Democracy, Power and the Neoconservative Legacy."

DOJ_NMG_0127462

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Attorneys Downplay Comments By Juror (SACBEE)..... 3
Prosecutors Rebut Hayat Request (STOCKREC) 4
Feds Say No Juror Misconduct In Lodi Terror Trial (CCT)..... 5
Salah's Long Road To Clear Name (DSOUTH) 5
Robyn E. Blumner column: Truly Tortured Logic (SPT) 6

War News:

Bush Tells Democrats He Welcomes Iraq Debate (AP)..... 7
Bush Says Iraq War Has Sapped "Our Nation's Soul" (HILL)..... 8
Bush: War Is "Sapping Our Soul" (POL)..... 9
Bush Drops In On House Democrats (LAT) 10
Bush Puts "Ic" Back In "Democrat Party" (AP) 11
At Democrats' Meeting, Bush Appeals For Cooperation (WP).... 12
Bush Meets With Democrats On Their Turf (NYT)..... 13
A Decider Meets 535 More Of 'Em (NYT) 14
Bush Builds Bonds With House Democrats At Retreat (WT)..... 15
At Least 130 Die As Blast Levels Baghdad Market (NYT) 16
At Least 125 Killed In Blast At Baghdad Market (WP)..... 18
Deadly Blast's Damage Is Physical And Psychological (LAT)..... 19
130 Killed In Baghdad Bombing (CHIT)..... 20
Scores Killed In Baghdad Market Blast (AP) 21
Iraqi PM Vows To End Bomb Terror (BBC)..... 23
Doubts Run Deep On Reforms Crucial To Bush's Iraq Strategy (WP)..... 24
With Rumsfeld Gone, Critics Of War Look To Rice (NYT)..... 26
Japan's FM Calls US Operation In Iraq 'Naive' (AFP) 27
No I-Told-You-Sos (WP)..... 27
Under Bush's Pillow (NYT) 30
Coalition Phases In Iraqi Sailors (LAT)..... 30
Security Contracts To Continue In Iraq (WP) 32
War In Iraq Propelling A Massive Migration (WP) 33
Iraq War Spawns Growing Refugee Problem (AP) 36
Taliban Leader Killed In NATO Airstrike (AP)..... 38
Residents Flee Taliban-held Town (AP)..... 38
New Chief For NATO Afghan Force (BBC) 39
Afghan Schools Take On The Taliban (LAT)..... 39
The Road To Helmand (WP) 41
Wrong Model For Afghanistan (NYT) 46

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Firings Set Stage For Congressional Battle (WP). 46

Corporate Scandals:

Thomas To Review Stock Option Grants (AP)..... 48

Criminal Law:

Vice President's Shadow Hangs Over Trial (WP)..... 48
Libby Fights To Keep Tapes From Public (PHI)..... 50
Libby Prosecutors Await Judge's Rulings (CNN)..... 50
Why Dick Cheney Cracked Up (NYT)..... 51
Libby Prosecutors Hope To Show Marked News Articles (WP).. 53
Libby Trial Reveals What Prosecutor Wouldn't (CNN) 53
F.B.I. Investigating Complaint Against California Lawmaker (NYT) 55
Former Manchester Mayor Arrested (LEXHL)..... 56
Federal Indictment Of Fumo Is Expected Soon (PHI) 56
FBI Probe Of Perata Apparently In Limbo (SANMCT) 58
FBI Investigates High-level Aide To Sheriff (STPPP)..... 59
Fletcher Aide Under FBI Probe Had Wide Reach (MINNST)..... 60
Indiana Killings Stir Fear Among Homeless (NYT)..... 61
Mich. Translator In Iraq Sentenced For Offering Bribe (AP)..... 62
Fulton Man Indicted For Child Pornography (JEFFCNT) 63
The Taxpayers' Tab: Police Billed $27,000 In Travel Costs To Federal Grant (AEAGT)..... 63
Are We All Gambling Criminals? (LAT) 65

Civil Law:

FTC Slaps Telemarketer With $1M Fine (AP)..... 65
ITT To Settle U.S.-China Technology Case, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM) 66

Civil Rights:

As Officers Stop And Frisk, Residents Raise Their Guard (NYT) 67
Officer In Louima Case Returns To State To Finish Sentence (NYT) 68
Taser Task Force Will Get To See Weapon's Effects (MERCN) 69
Curb Cuts: Going With The Flow Easier For All (MCT)..... 69
Felts: Seizure Of Home In '03 Violated Rights (MONNS) 71
Harsh Accusations Intensify In L.I. State Senate Contest (NYT) 72
Final Push In Nassau State Senate Race (NSDY)..... 73
Iraq's Shadow Widens Sunni-Shiite Split In U.S. (NYT)..... 74
With Jails Full, California Eyes Other States (NYT/AP)..... 75

Antitrust:

Letters Of Ill Repute (SLPD) 76

Grinstein Stood Tall As Delta's Defender (AJC) 79

Environment/Indian Affairs:

In Drill, CDC Practices For Influenza Pandemic (WP)..... 81
Can Washington Get Smart About Science? (LAT) 82
At Humanity's Doorstep (NYT)..... 84

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gang `capital' Steps Up Fight (CHIT) 85
Gun Charges Dismissed On Suspected Hit Man (PPG) 86
For Police, Ill-Gotten Gains Become Money Well Spent (NYT) .. 87

Immigration:

Acrobat Admits Guilt In Visa Scam (WT)..... 88
Contractors Walking Immigration Tightrope (DENP)..... 89
The Price Of Citizenship (NYT)..... 90

Tax:

Court Upholds Evasion Ruling In A Tax Case (NYT) 91
The Netherlands, The New Tax Shelter Hot Spot (NYT) 91

Congress-Administration:

Budget's Ups And Downs Leave Big Chunk For War (AP) 95
Bush's Medicare Budget Would Raise Premiums (NYT) 96
Lawmakers See Pot Of Gold In Tax Gap (LAT) 97
Facing Inequality (WP)..... 99
In Washington, Contractors Take On Biggest Role Ever (NYT).. 99
Capitol's Newcomers Try A Little Openness (WP) 102
Balking On Bundling (WP) 103
Cardin Finds Passion For Speeches (WT) 104
Pathologists Protest Defense Site's Closure (WP) 104
Health Coverage's Momentum (WP) 105
A Billion-Dollar Election Warning (NYT)..... 106
Farm Bill Doesn't Go Far Enough (LAT)..... 107

Other News:

Giuliani On 2008 Bid: "A Real Good Chance" (NYT) 108
Rudy Giuliani Seriously Considering Presidential Bid (AP) 108
Inspiring Strong Emotions, And Very Mixed Ones, Too (NYT) . 109
McCain's Advisers Once Made Ads That Drew His Ire (NYT) .. 110
Romney Targeting McCain (TSSC)..... 112
Mavericks Both, But Different Iraq Paths (NYT) 113
A Bar, A Brew, A Drifting Senator (HARTC)..... 114
GOP's Conservatives Strain For Leadership (WT)..... 115
Underdogs Demand Iraq War's End, Troops Home (WT)..... 116
Democrats Split On How To End The War (WP) 116
Richardson To Democrats: Bring Troops Home Now (ABQ) 118
Vilsack Calls For End To Financing Of Iraq War (DMR) 118
Democrats Endorse Voting Measure (WP) 119
Biden Says He Regrets Remarks On Obama (AP)..... 119
Nominate Biden: America Needs The Comic Relief (NHUL) 120
Twisting In Their Own Windiness (WP) 120
Joe Biden's Just A Barrel Of Gaffes (LAT) 121
The Racial Politics Of Speaking Well (NYT)..... 122
Clinton Camp Hasn't Written Off Fundraising Couple Who Helped Competitor (WP)..... 124
Richardson Touts Unique Qualifications (AP) 124
On The Run (NYT)..... 126
Obama Mentor Rallies Black Support (POL)..... 127
Obamarama (NYT) 128
Call It The "Andy Amendment" (LAT) 129
Iran Has Guests In To See, But Not Inspect, Nuclear Site (NYT)130
Iran Shows Nuclear Facility To Diplomats (AP)..... 131
Iran Gives Visitors Inside Look At Esfahan Nuclear Facility (LAT)131
Iran's Boast On Uranium Enrichment Is Put To Test (NYT)..... 133
Ex-U.S. Military Leaders Urge Iran Talks (AP) 134
What To Ask Before The Next War (WP)..... 135
Report: N.Korea Considering Concessions (AP)..... 136
On Road To Kosovo Independence, A Warning: Go Slow (NYT)137
Palestinians Slam Major Powers Over Aid Boycott (AFP) 138
Palestinians "Nearer" Power Deal (BBC)..... 139
Hamas Fighters Appear To Tighten Hold In Gaza (NYT)..... 140
Factional Clashes Shoot Holes In Palestinian Truce (LAT)..... 141
Hamas, Fatah Ignore Truce Deal In Gaza (AP) 142
Pressure Grows For Blair To Depart Office Early (WT)..... 142
Britons Strive To Contain Bird Flu (WT) 143
Deadly Bird Flu Confirmed In British Turkeys (NYT)..... 144
Bird Flu Detected On Turkey Farm In England (WP) 145
Deadly Bird Flu Virus Found In Britain (AP) 146
Turkmen Candidates Practice Pliancy (WP)..... 146
Hu Cultivates Source Of Industrial Materials (WT/AP)..... 148
New Hope For Genocide Resolution (LAT) 148
Relax, It's Not The End Of The World (LAT) 149

DOJ_NMG_0127464

TERRORISM NEWS:

Attorneys Downplay Comments By Juror (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, February 4, 2007

Federal prosecutors said Saturday there is little or no evidence to support allegations of juror misconduct in a motion for a new trial of a Lodi man convicted of terrorist activity.

Misconduct claims on behalf of Hamid Hayat are barred by rules of evidence, cannot be substantiated, actually describe proper conduct, or describe conduct not harmful to Hayat, prosecutors maintain in a 187-page brief opposing a new trial.

In their October motion, defense attorneys cite a statement by juror Alicia Lopez that jury foreman Joseph Cote made a "hangman gesture" and once said "hang him" in discussions with other jurors during the trial.

"These bare bone allegations, on their face, are vague and ambiguous and do not constitute substantial evidence that (Cote) was actually biased against the defendant," wrote prosecutors S. Robert Tice-Raskin and Laura Ferris in the opposition brief.

Defense attorneys also cited statements by jurors Lopez and Theresa Berkeley-Simmons that Cote used racial slurs during the trial, including his opinion that Pakistanis or Muslims all "look alike" if dressed the same.

Hayat is a U.S. citizen of Pakistani descent.

But the prosecutors answered that "it is far from clear whether Cote's reported statement is a 'racist statement,' or what it reveals about the foreperson's views in general with respect to individuals of different races, nationalities or creeds."

The statement does not seem to be aimed at "any individual or group in a marked or virulent derogatory fashion," Tice-Raskin and Ferris wrote.

Also highlighted in the defense motion are Cote's post-trial statements to an Atlantic magazine reporter suggesting that, when deliberating, he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for London subway bombings.

The Atlantic article should be given little weight given its "double-hearsay nature," and testimony regarding jury deliberations is inadmissible, the prosecutors answered.

Beyond that, they said, the "mere fact that the foreperson recalled the London bombings or that some of the bombers were Pakistani does not suggest he is prejudiced against Pakistanis or Muslims; that recollection is simply a neutral recollection of widely reported and known information."

Additionally, case law allows a juror "to utilize his/her life experiences and general, common knowledge when evaluating evidence," they wrote.

Cote spoke in the Atlantic article in 2006 of "new rules of engagement" that he viewed as applying in terrorism cases, and said he did "not want to see the government lose its case."

The prosecutors said this statement "reflected nothing more than his belief that the intent and danger issues were difficult and complex for the jury."

On April 25, the jury found Hayat guilty of undergoing terrorist training in Pakistan, returning to Lodi prepared to wage violent jihad -- or holy war -- against fellow Americans, and lying to the FBI when initially questioned.

The 23-year-old Hayat faces up to 39 years in prison. Sentencing has been postponed while U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. considers the motion for a new trial.

Oral arguments on the motion are next month.

At the same time the jury found Hayat guilty, a separate jury deadlocked in a parallel prosecution of his father, Umer Hayat. A mistrial was declared in that case. The elder Hayat was charged with initially lying to the FBI in 2005 about his son's support of terrorism and his own firsthand knowledge of terrorist training camps in Pakistan.

Umer Hayat, a Lodi ice cream street vendor, later pleaded guilty to lying to customs officials in 2003 about the amount of money he and his family were taking on a trip to Pakistan. He was sentenced in August to the 11 months he had spent in jail awaiting trial.

The primary evidence against Hamid Hayat was a lengthy, videotaped interview conducted by FBI agents over two days in June 2005. He eventually made some damaging admissions, and the interview was seen by the jurors as a confession.

Burrell erroneously rejected the defense's attempt to present James Wedick, a retired FBI agent, as an expert witness on the bureau's policies and procedures for interviews, the defense lawyers argued in their motion.

DOJ_NMG_0127465

They said Wedick, a highly decorated veteran of 34 years in the bureau, would have testified that it was inappropriate to start videotaping Hayat's interview only after a "confession" had been elicited following hours of questioning.

But the prosecutors argued in Saturday's brief that Wedick's testimony "would have been needlessly confusing, cumulative and wasteful of time."

Moreover, they wrote, it "would have amounted to nothing more than an impermissible attempt by (Hayat's lawyers) to argue his case via an expert; something that defense counsel was qualified to argue and, in fact, did argue during closing."

The defense motion said Hayat truthfully told the FBI he did not attend a terrorist training camp, but he eventually was worn down by the agents' marathon interrogation.

"Wanting simply to be permitted to go home, Hayat agreed, albeit rather incoherently, to his interrogators' insistent suggestions that he had so trained," the defense lawyers wrote in the motion.

Prosecutors responded that there was no showing Wedick "had any particularized experience rendering him qualified to opine on the issue of false confessions."

Burrell was being asked "to accept nothing more than Mr. Wedick's unsupported conjecture and supposition that these confessions were somehow contaminated," the prosecutors contended.

"That was plainly insufficient," they wrote. About the writer:

The Bee's Denny Walsh can be reached at (916) 321-1189 or dwalsh@sacbee.com.

Prosecutors Rebut Hayat Request (STOCKREC)

By Jeff Hood, Lodi Bureau Chief

Stockton Record, February 4, 2007

Bid for new trial called an attempt to fix mistakes

Federal prosecutors on Saturday characterized Hamid Hayat's request for a new trial on terrorism-related charges as an attempt by his defense attorneys to fix mistakes they made before and during his case last year.

Hayat, 24, was convicted in April of aiding terrorists and lying to the FBI about it after his return to his Lodi home following a two-year visit to his ancestral homeland of Pakistan.

Hayat's attorneys in October filed a 106-page motion for a new trial, stating they have new evidence that proves Hayat did not attend a terrorist training camp. The request for a new trial also alleges U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. made several improper rulings, such as denying Hayat the right to cross-examine government informant Naseem Khan on several matters.

Defense attorneys also claim Burrell erred by not prohibiting expert testimony that would have helped the U.S.-born Hayat's case, and that there were several instances of juror misconduct.

In their 187-page reply filed early Saturday, prosecutors restated the evidence that led to Hayat's conviction, which carries a possible 38-year federal prison sentence, and then argued against each of the eight points defense attorneys cited as grounds for a new trial.

Defense attorneys have an opportunity to file a rebuttal, and both sides will offer arguments supporting their positions on March 23 in Burrell's courtroom.

Prosecutors claimed Hayat's attorneys, Wazhma Mojaddidi and Dennis Riordan, want a second chance to fix Mojaddidi's procedural errors that kept her from asking certain questions of witnesses and from calling one of her experts, retired FBI Agent Jim Wedick.

Government attorneys called Mojaddidi's strategy during the trial "tactical gamesmanship" that backfired. They stated the defense's claim that it has new proof of Hayat's innocence - the testimony of Hayat cousins Usama Ismail and Jaber Ismail of Lodi - is not accurate, saying there is a legal difference between "newly discovered" and "newly available" evidence, because they did not subpoena Usama Ismail to testify and made no effort to obtain testimony from Jaber Ismail, who was in Pakistan during the trial.

Prosecutors downplayed the alleged juror misconduct, including a gesture by foreman Joseph Cote in which he pulled up on an imaginary noose around his neck and said "Hang him," after the second day of testimony.

"It would be fair to say that the juror's act, at most, appears to be a premature reaction to compelling government evidence, but nothing more," prosecutors Robert Tice-Raskin, Laura Ferris and Sharon Lever state in their reply.

Other instances of jurors failing to abide by Burrell's orders did not have any significant effect on the trial, they argue.

Hayat and his father, Umer, were arrested by federal authorities in June 2005 after being questioned for several hours at the FBI's Sacramento office.

A trial for Umer Hayat, 48, on two counts of lying to FBI agents ended with a hung jury. He later pleaded guilty to lying about the amount of cash he was carrying during a trip to his native Pakistan in 2003 and was released from custody in August.

Contact Lodi Bureau Chief Jeff Hood at (209) 367-7427 or jhood@recordnet.com.

Feds Say No Juror Misconduct In Lodi Terror Trial (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, February 4, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Calif. - Defense arguments that a jury foreman was biased in the trial of a Lodi man convicted of terrorist activity are not supported by evidence, federal prosecutors said Saturday.

The federal government's comments came in a 187-page brief opposing a motion for a new trial by Hamid Hayat's defense. The defense motion is based on statements made by juror Alicia Lopez that jury foreman Joseph Cote made a "hangman gesture" and once said "hang him" in front of others on the panel.

"These bare bone allegations, on their face, are vague and ambiguous and do not constitute substantial evidence that (Cote) was actually biased against the defendant," wrote prosecutors S. Robert Tice-Raskin and Laura Ferris.

The defense motion also highlights post-trial statement's by Cote in an Atlantic magazine report suggesting that, when deliberating, he likened Hayat to young Pakistani men responsible for London subway bombings.

Prosecutors answered that the Atlantic article should be given little weight and that "it is far from clear whether Cote's reported statement is a 'racist statement,' or what it reveals about the foreperson's views in general with respect to individuals of different races, nationalities or creeds."

Hayat is a U.S. citizen of Pakistani descent. On April 25 a jury found him guilty of undergoing terrorist training in Pakistan, returning to Lodi prepared to wage violent jihad against fellow Americans, and lying to the FBI when initially questioned.

Oral arguments on the motion are next month in front of U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr.

Salah's Long Road To Clear Name (DSOUTH)

By Chris Hack, Staff writer

Daily Southtown (IL), February 4, 2007

More battles ahead

Attorneys for Mohammed Salah, who was acquitted of racketeering charges last week, have vowed to keep working to clear the name of the Bridgeview man deemed a terrorist by the federal government and to help his family lead a normal life.

"These good people have had their lives put through the wringer," longtime Salah attorney Matthew Piers said Friday. "We are not done fighting on behalf of this family."

While the long-looming threat of a hefty prison sentence may now be off the table, Salah still faces an uncertain future of civil-court judgments, restricted liberties and the stigma of the government's terrorist label.

Salah, 53, was acquitted Thursday of the terrorism-related charges after a three-month trial. He was found guilty of a far lesser charge of obstruction of justice, but the overall outcome marked a dramatic victory for the defense in a case once touted by the U.S. Justice Department as an important component of the war on terror.

"If this is the government's idea of the war on terror, it should keep us all awake at night," said Piers, a vocal critic of several federal anti-terror cases unveiled after 9-11. "This was a political prosecution plain and simple, and I think everyone in that courtroom knew it."

In the racketeering case, Salah was accused of breaking American laws to aid the militant Palestinian group Hamas, which is considered a terrorist group by the U.S. government. According to federal prosecutors, he delivered laundered money to Hamas operatives in the Occupied Territories in the early 1990s and helped recruit would-be terrorists.

The obstruction charge normally wouldn't carry much prison time, although prosecutors might push to have Salah's 1993 conviction in an Israeli military court on Hamas money-running charges count against him here. Defense attorneys, who insist the Israeli conviction was the result of bogus confessions tortured out of Salah during a two-month interrogation session, contend Salah should receive only probation for the U.S. conviction.

Also hanging over Salah's head is a 1998 civil case filed by federal prosecutors in a bid to seize $1.4 million in cash and assets they claimed Salah meant to funnel to Hamas. That civil case was put on hold as a criminal probe into Salah's alleged Hamas links stopped and started over the years.

Records show prosecutors were prepared to settle the case in July 2001 under an agreement that would have let the government keep the cash and Salah keep his Thomas Street house. But after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, the investigation into Salah's past was rekindled and the deal died.

"It's still pending and the government plans on pursuing it," First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary Shapiro said of prosecutors' civil case after the verdict in the criminal case was announced.

DOJ_NMG_0127467

Piers said he'll likely argue the case should be tossed out on double-jeopardy grounds: The criminal case included many of the same allegations as the government's civil case, and prosecutors would have moved to seize Salah's cash and assets if he had been convicted on the racketeering charge.

"Our position is that the government had their shot and they lost," Piers said. "Beyond that, the government would come off looking extremely vindictive and they would be skating on very thin ice legally."

"But we're more than ready to take on the government if they want to pursue the civil forfeiture case."

Salah's assets have been blocked by the federal government since August 1995, more than two years before he would be released from an Israeli prison and return to Bridgeview. His family initially was allowed to withdraw living expenses from the frozen money, but Piers said that arrangement ended years ago.

"They're penniless," Piers said. "They've been living off the support of people in their community, and they would have starved to death without that."

Indeed, after the racketeering acquittal Thursday, Salah pointed out that generosity among crowds of supporters swarming the Dirksen Federal Building in a tearful celebration that continued into that night at the Bridgeview mosque.

"I have to thank everyone who helped my family put food on the table," Salah said.

Salah also could someday be on the hook for a share of a $156 million judgment against him and a group of local organizations accused of financing Hamas in the 1990s. The judgment was the result of a civil lawsuit filed by the parents of a Jewish teen killed in a West Bank terrorist attack.

Although the organizations had little money and the federal government already had dibs on Salah's assets, attorneys for the teen's family have aggressively moved to seize books, fax machines and Internet domain names from the groups in an effort to dismantle what they said was once a clandestine terrorist financing network.

The judgment has been appealed, and attorneys expect a decision soon. Oral arguments in the case were heard well over a year ago; the appeals court may have been reluctant to release a ruling in the high-profile civil case while the equally high-profile criminal trial was unfolding.

But perhaps most difficult to overcome is the fact Salah was declared a "Specially Designated Terrorist" in an executive order of the U.S. government in 1997; he's still the only American citizen to hold the distinction. It means Salah needs special licenses from the U.S. Treasury Department to get a job or conduct financial transactions, must account for his spending and explain any travel plans.

The terror classification was made outside the judicial system, but Piers said Salah may eventually mount a legal challenge to the designation now that he's been acquitted of terrorism charges 10 years after he was labeled a terrorist.

Just as his racketeering trial drew crowds of supporters for months, Salah's fight to clear his name would be closely watched in the local Muslim community.

"We hope that the suffering of the Salah family is over," Chicago director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations Ahmed Rehab said in a statement last week. "We also hope that the 'terrorism' label be reserved in the future for those found guilty of that charge in an open and fair trial administered in a respected court of law."

Robyn E. Blumner column: Truly Tortured Logic (SPT)

By ROBYN E. BLUMNER, Times Perspective Columnist

St. Petersburg (FL) Times, February 4, 2007

Canada apologizes for aiding innocent man's torture, so why can't we?

"On behalf of the United States, I wish to apologize to you and your family," President Bush told Maher Arar in a televised news conference, during which the president announced that the United States was also giving Arar $8.9-million in compensation for our role in sending the Canadian to a Syrian prison where he was tortured.

Okay, now it's time to wake up from a dream. This scene happened all right, not in the United States but in Canada, and the nobly contrite politician was Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, not our own Decider-in-Chief.

Arar's ordeal is well known. The software engineer was detained during a stopover at New York's John F. Kennedy Airport in 2002. After being subject to days of interrogation in the United States, the Canadian of Syrian descent was sent to Syria under the American program of extraordinary rendition. He spent 10 months in a grave-size cell and was tortured into signing a false confession that he was associated with terrorists and had trained in Afghanistan - a place he had never visited. He was eventually released without charge.

Since Arar's return to Canada, our neighbor to the north has committed itself to investigating its role in this outrage. A two-year inquiry by Justice Dennis O'Connor concluded that there was no evidence linking Arar to terrorism and that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were demonstrably wrong when they informed U.S. border agents that Arar was suspected of Islamic extremism. The head of the RCMP resigned over the incident.

Canada has now issued a very public apology, coming straight from its national leader, and the nation will compensate Arar for its hand in his terrifying ordeal. Harper has also promised increased oversight of Canada's intelligence agencies "to lessen the likelihood that something like this will ever happen again."

Arar responded to the prime minister's gesture by declaring: "I feel proud as a Canadian."

Before George W. Bush came to the White House, I would have expected our own government to act in a very similar manner: a public apology, the rolling of heads responsible, a promise to exert tighter controls and due compensation to the victim.

Instead, we've responded to Arar by keeping him, his wife and his children on a government watch list so that they cannot travel in or over our country or its territories. We have stymied his lawsuit against the United States for abducting and deporting him, claiming that to allow it to go forward would jeopardize state secrets. And, perhaps most galling, even though it is an open secret that we send people to other countries for interrogation where they are sure to be tortured, we continue to claim that our actions are consistent with the Convention Against Torture - a treaty that explicitly bars such conduct.

The contrast between the model of responsible and responsive governance in Canada and the sniveling, defensive, fabulizing posture of the White House and Justice Department on this matter of national character is the answer to the question: Why does the rest of the world hate us?

The Arar case is the perfect storm of Bush administration arrogance, dishonesty and incompetence coalescing with its utter disregard for the principles of due process and human rights that used to pulse at the core of our nation.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff claim that there is reason to keep Arar on a watch list. But when Canada's minister of public safety, Stockwell Day, examined Arar's confidential U.S. files, he announced that there was "nothing new" to justify any continued suspicion.

Arar is a terrorist the same way our Iraq adventure is full of "enormous successes" as the vice president just declared. When reality doesn't fit the script, Team Bush ignores it.

Some of our nation's more responsible political leaders have tried to act more Canada-like. Rep. Edward Markey, D-Mass., has called on the White House to "admit publicly that it was cruel to detain and transfer" Arar for torture.

And it was a moment of national pride when Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., publicly called Gonzales to the mat at a recent Senate Judiciary Committee hearing for claiming that assurances were given by Syria that Arar wouldn't be tortured.

"We knew damn well if he went to Canada he wouldn't be tortured," Leahy declared loudly. "He'd be held. He'd be investigated.

"We also knew damn well, if he went to Syria, he'd be tortured."

Gonzales could only reiterate the bald-faced lie that the United States tries to meet its antitorture treaty obligations. How lame.

When Canada is better at demonstrating American values than we are, it's time our government took a refresher in Civics 101. Learn how to apologize and admit error and maybe our great nation will live up to its billing once again.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Tells Democrats He Welcomes Iraq Debate (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Virginia (AP) -- President Bush squarely addressed the issue most on the mind of House Democrats, saying Saturday that deep divisions over the Iraq war need not bring anyone's patriotism into question.

"You know, I welcome debate in a time of war and I hope you know that," Bush said in opening remarks as the guest speaker at a retreat that drew about 200 lawmakers to a Virginia resort.

He said disagreeing with him over the war -- as many in the room do -- does not mean "you don't share the same sense of patriotism I do."

"You can get that thought out of your mind, if that's what some believe," the president said. "These are tough times, but there's no doubt in my mind that you want to secure this homeland as much as I do."

Bush's conciliatory words were similar to some of his previous statements. But the applause that followed them offered some indication that this audience was happy to hear them so directly and in person.

Democrats, who in November wrestled control of the House from Republicans for the first time in a dozen years, have yet to settle on a legislative response to Bush's war plan. It involves adding 21,500 troops to the 132,000 already in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0127469

Deciding what any nonbinding resolution in opposition should say or what should be done if the buildup fails to stop the violence were primary topics at the lawmakers' two-day retreat.

Options could include stripping the budget of war money, capping the number of troops in Iraq or refusing to pay for future deployments.

With that in mind, Bush gave his plan a soft sell.

"I listened to many members here, I listened to members of my own party, I listened to the military and came up with a plan that I genuinely believe has the best chance of succeeding," the president said.

He received applause for repeating his insistence that Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's government in Baghdad must show tangible improvement on the political front.

"I do know we agree on some things and that is that the Maliki government is going to have to show strong leadership," Bush said. "There's benchmarks that they have got to achieve."Achievements praised

Iraq was hardly the only topic on which Bush sought to win over a crowd of skeptics with flattery and acknowledgments of differences of opinion. With Democrats now in charge in the House and Senate, he had little choice.

Among the "big things" he singled out as prospects for bipartisan cooperation were balancing the budget, tackling budget-busting entitlements, immigration overhaul, health care, education and alternative energy production. He also frequently complimented the Democrats for their out-of-the-gate accomplishments since the session began in early January.

"I look forward to working with you," he said. "I know you've probably heard that and doubt whether it's true. It's true."

Already, Bush has granted several of the new majority's demands. He has acknowledged making mistakes in Iraq, fired Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and surrendered the fight for John Bolton to be U.S. ambassador to the United Nations.

Reflecting the target set by Democrats, Bush has promised a plan to balance the budget by 2012 after presiding over record deficits and tax cuts. Also, the president tentatively has agreed to increasing the federal minimum wage. The House and Senate have passed competing versions of this legislation.

The president also had a little fun at his own expense, hoping it would prove his willingness to find bipartisan consensus. His reference in his State of the Union address to their party as the "Democrat majority" -- as opposed to the "Democratic majority" -- caused grumbling and offense and he sought to make up for it.

"Now look, my diction isn't all that good," Bush said to laughter. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language. And so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

After Bush's remarks, reporters were ushered out of the room while lawmakers asked the president a few questions.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California and caucus chairman Rahm Emanuel of Illinois said Democrats would focus mostly on the war in Iraq.

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said the question portion of Bush's appearance was closed to be consistent with his appearances at gatherings of congressional Republicans. At those events, Bush spoke in public but the questioning was closed "to provide frank and open discussion," Stanzel said.

He said Bush last attended the House and Senate Democratic retreats in early 2001, right after he took office.

Bush Says Iraq War Has Sapped "Our Nation's Soul" (HILL)

By Jonathan Kaplan

The Hill, February 3, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Va. – Speaking to House Democrats Saturday at a resort in this historic town, President Bush admitted that the country's morale has suffered because of the war in Iraq.

Bush said that the war in Iraq is "sapping our nation's soul," as part of his answer to a question from Rep. Susan Davis (D-Calif.) about why the burden of fighting the Iraq war has fallen primarily on the military. Davis represents San Diego where many active duty military personnel live.

Unlike a parliamentary system, U.S. lawmakers do not get to question the nation's head of state and chief executive. But Democratic aides were stunned at the pronouncement perhaps recollecting President Carter's pronouncement in 1979 that there exited a "crisis of the spirit in our country."

Bush began speaking to a packed conference of lawmakers, spouses, and a few babies (including Speaker Nancy Pelosi's newborn grandson) and children around 10:15 a.m. after arriving in Newport News, Va., via Air Force One. He was driven to the Kingsmill Resort & Spa a few miles away.

Bush attempted to charm the new majority by explaining that he meant no offense during the State of the Union address by calling them the "Democrat Party."

"My diction isn't all that good," Bush said. "Thank you for inviting the head of the Republic Party."

He also thanked the families of the lawmakers who serve in public office.

DOJ_NMG_0127470

"I know it's tough...sometimes they say bad things about you in the newspaper," Bush said, chuckling himself and eliciting the same from the crowd.

At times pointed and direct, he also told them that he wants to "do some big things together" and added that he did not question the patriotism of those who disagreed with the decision to go to war in Iraq.

"You can get that thought out of your mind, if that's what some believe," the president said. "These are tough times, but there's no doubt in my mind that you want to secure this homeland as much as I do."

Bush rattled off policy areas in which he said he wanted to make some progress, including balancing the budget, immigration, energy, Iraq and some smaller bore foreign policy issues, such as slowing the growth of HIV/AIDS and malaria in Africa.

After Bush concluded his speech, Democratic leadership aides asked the press to exit the room so that lawmakers could ask Bush some questions on the war, veterans' issues, global warming, Hurricane Katrina and immigration.

According to staffers in the room, Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.) asked a question about budget deficits, Reps. Tim Walz (D-Minn.) and Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) asked why veterans and Katrina, respectively, were not mentioned in his State of the Union address, Rep. Jay Inslee (D-Wash.) prodded Bush on global warming and Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) asked about immigration.

To Thompson's question, Bush said he did not mention national parks in his speech to the nation but that he considers those important as well.

After the speech, questions and working a rope line, Bush appeared at a press conference with Pelosi and other Democratic leaders.

Bush described the session with the lawmakers as "relaxed, informative and enjoyable," and that the questions were very good.

"We don't always agree - that's why we're in different political parties," he said.

Bush: War Is "Sapping Our Soul" (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, February 3, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Va. – President Bush told a closed-door gathering of House Democrats Saturday that the war in Iraq was "sapping our soul in some ways," according to congressional aides who heard him.

During the private question-and-answer session, Rep. Susan Davis, D-Calif., had asked the president whether he agreed the effort in Iraq amounted to "a military at war and not a country at war," congressional aides said.

Later, in a meeting with reporters, both Bush and House Democratic leaders sounded notes of bipartisanship. But asked whether the president had responded to Democrats' criticism of his plan to send more troops to Iraq, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., offered a flat: "No."

"The president really stood his ground on Iraq," she said.

In other questions from Democrats to the president, according to the aides:

Rep. John Tanner of Tennessee asked what Bush would do to reduce the budget deficit and foreign debt. Rep. Tim Walz of Minnesota asked how he would handle skyrocketing medical costs for veterans. Rep. Luis Gutierrez of Illinois asked about comprehensive immigration reform. Rep. Bennie G. Thompson of Mississippi wanted to know what the president would do to improve rebuilding of the Gulf Coast after Hurricane Katrina. And Rep. Jay Inslee of Washington raised concerns about the declining number of polar bears and increased risk of flooding in a question about global warming.

All of the questions followed Bush's brief speech to the Democrats.

In it, he drew applause when he mentioned common goals such as comprehensive immigration reform, promoting democracy in Afghanistan, eradicating disease in Africa and remaining focused on the humanitarian crisis in Darfur.

But Democrats sat on their hands when he renewed his call for new heath care legislation.

On Iraq, he stressed common ground.

"We agree on some things - that the Maliki government will have to show strong leadership," he said, drawing applause, in a reference to Prime Minister Jawad al Maliki.

Speaking at the House Democrats' retreat for the first time since 2001, Bush led off with a little conciliatory charm, joking about his reference to the "Democrat majority" in the State of the Union address, a choice of words that many Democrats had viewed as a calculated insult.

"My diction isn't all that good," the president ventured. "I've been accused of occasionally mangling the English language, so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

The quip drew laughs and applause.

DOJ_NMG_0127471

Referring to four Pelosi generations, the president wondered how her father would have reacted to her becoming the first female speaker, mentioning the recent birth of her sixth grandchild and praising the child's mother, Alexandra Pelosi, for being "spunky."

He called House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Md., a "down-to-earth, no-nonsense guy."

And Hoyer took the comment as a genuine bipartisan gesture.

"I thought it was the expression of a sincere desire on part of the president and the caucus that we do want to work together," Hoyer said.

Bush Drops In On House Democrats (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, VA. — Venturing into enemy territory, President Bush traveled to a retreat for House Democrats on Saturday to invite the new congressional majority to work with him on immigration, energy and even national security.

"I do know we agree on some things," the president told a ballroom full of lawmakers and their families in a carefully choreographed meeting of Washington's competing centers of power.

Bush sought to turn on the charm for his Democratic rivals, cracking jokes about his diction and showering praise on House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco and her new grandson (who also got a hug from the president, days after getting one from former President Clinton).

"I kind of remembered — help me remember the good old days," Bush said later in brief remarks to reporters. The president had not gone to House Democrats' annual retreat since 2001, shortly after he took office.

But even the meticulous planning that went into the encounter could not conceal the deep divisions between the White House and the Democratic majority on Capitol Hill. Pelosi introduced the president from a lectern bearing the slogan "Governing for a New Direction," but he spoke from his own lectern, emblazoned with the presidential seal, a few feet away.

No issue brought out the divisions more than the war in Iraq. The president devoted less than two minutes of his 16-minute address to the subject. And his attempt to highlight common ground over the feeling that the Iraqi government should do more to bridge sectarian divisions offered little comfort to his critics.

The president suggested, as he has before, that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki would have to meet a list of "benchmarks," including providing adequate troops to help American soldiers in Baghdad.

But Bush did not discuss timetables for Maliki's government or specify consequences if it should fail — omissions that have been repeatedly criticized by Democrats.

After his speech, Bush faced several tough questions from lawmakers in a private question-and-answer session, according to members of Congress and aides who were in the room.

In response to one question about Iraq, the president, who as recently as a few months ago insisted that America was winning, acknowledged that if he were asked about the conflict by a pollster, he would express concern as well. Large majorities of Americans say they believe the war is going poorly.

Bush also said the war was "sapping our souls," according to people in the room.

"The president's body language changed," one lawmaker said. "He was quite defensive." The White House and the Democratic caucus had carefully negotiated how many questions the president would face, ultimately agreeing that the Democrats could ask six — and only after reporters left the room.

In addition to the question about Iraq, which was asked by San Diego Rep. Susan A. Davis, lawmakers also asked about immigration, the budget and the government response to Hurricane Katrina.

In public, however, Bush, Pelosi and other Democratic leaders took pains to avoid appearing partisan.

In opening his speech, the president joked about having used the term "Democrat Party" in his recent State of the Union address — a phrase that some lawmakers interpreted as derogatory.

"Now, look, my diction isn't all that good," the president said. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language. And so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

Democrats laughed appreciatively.

"Still has the touch," Pelosi noted later.

But some of her caucus seemed less impressed.

"I think people were grateful he came. But Iraq is the issue," said Massachusetts Rep. Jim McGovern, who staunchly opposes the war. "It is the issue that concerns most Americans … and telling jokes and hugging babies is not going to make these tough issues go away."

DOJ_NMG_0127472

Bush Puts "Ic" Back In "Democrat Party" (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, February 3, 2007

Williamsburg, Va. (AP) -- Relying on self-deprecating jokes, unusual candor and outright flattery, President Bush on Saturday wooed lawmakers he not only needs but will have to answer to in the final two years of his presidency.

Bush had not seen fit to attend a Democratic congressional retreat since 2001, his first year in office. But the new political reality that has Democrats in charge of Capitol Hill for the first time in a dozen years changed his mind. When he appeared before House Democrats at a Virginia resort, he seemed to be trying to make up for lost time.

With his first words, he sought to put to rest one bone of contention between the White House and the new congressional majority: The dropped "ic."

Democrats found it demeaning when the president, in his State of the Union address last month, referred to the "Democrat majority," as opposed to the "Democratic majority."

"Now look, my diction isn't all that good," Bush told the 200 lawmakers who wrapped up two days away from Washington with family and aides. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language. And so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

He got hearty laughs. And he was careful to keep the "ic" firmly tacked on for the rest of his remarks.

Bush's address was followed by a private session. With the media ushered out of the room, lawmakers were allowed to ask the president a half-dozen questions that covered Iraq, immigration, education and other topics.

Even though this was expected to be the toughest part of Bush's foray onto Democratic turf, both he and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California emerged with good things to say.

"We were honored by your presence," Pelosi told Bush. "We're also encouraged by your remarks."

Speaking to reporters after the president had departed for Washington, she added: "Let's make no mistake. The choice is bipartisanship or stalemate. We have to work together."

Still, divisions over Iraq were never far.

One of the primary topics at the retreat was how to legislate opposition to Bush's overhauled Iraq strategy, which involves adding 21,500 troops to the 132,000 already in the country.

Democrats have not settled conclusively on the approach for any anti-war resolution or on what action to take if the buildup fails to halt the violence.

Bush explained how he settled on his proposal.

"I listened to many members here. I listened to members of my own party. I listened to the military and came up with a plan that I genuinely believe has the best of succeeding," he said.

The president earned applause for repeating his insistence that Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government in Baghdad must show tangible improvement on the political front. "The Maliki government is going to have to show strong leadership," Bush said.

Seeking to earn his bipartisan stripes, he also said that opposing him on the war — as many in the room do — does not mean "you don't share the same sense of patriotism I do."

"You know, I welcome debate in a time of war and I hope you know that," the president said. "These are tough times, but there's no doubt in my mind that you want to secure this homeland as much as I do."

Bush's conciliatory words were similar to statements he has made before. But the applause offered some indication that this audience was pleased to hear them so directly and in person.

In the private session, Bush told the Democrats he empathizes with their anguish, saying the war is "sapping our soul," according to two officials who attended the session. They spoke on condition of anonymity because it was a closed meeting.

Pelosi heard nothing to suggest the president is bending to any criticism.

"The president really stood his ground on Iraq. He explained why additional troops would be needed and why it would work this time," she said, adding parenthetically, "even though it had failed four times before."

No matter the topic, the president stayed on point, saying he wants to work together on "big things" and he respects that Democrats disagree on some issues:

_On balancing the budget and the spending blueprint for 2008 that he submits Monday to Congress, he said, "Some of it you'll like, some of it you won't like, but it achieves the goal that we have said, which is to balance the budget."

_On addressing the looming insolvency of entitlement programs such as Social Security, he said, "I'm under no illusions of how hard it's going to be. The only thing I want to share with you is, is my desire to see if we can't work together to get it done."

DOJ_NMG_0127473

_On his proposal to make health insurance more available through changes in tax laws, he said, "I've already heard from some members who thought it was a lousy idea, I understand that. But please look at it in depth."

Bush brushed past the veto threats his aides have issued for one-third of the agenda that Pelosi's caucus approved in the House's first 100 hours of the year.

Instead, he focused on compliments, on the Democrats' choice of Pelosi — "this fine woman" — as the first female speaker ever and for their approval this past week of billions for fighting AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis overseas.

"I look forward to working with you," he said. "I know you've probably heard that and you doubt whether it's true. It's true."

At Democrats' Meeting, Bush Appeals For Cooperation (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Paul Kane

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Feb. 3 -- President Bush, forced by circumstance to reach out to some of his strongest adversaries, appealed directly to House Democrats on Saturday to work with him to reform the immigration system, limit the cost of Social Security, curb the consumption of gasoline and balance the federal budget.

Visiting the Democrats' annual retreat for the first time since 2001, the president told lawmakers there are "big things" they could accomplish by working together and sought to defuse any bad blood with self-deprecating humor. He opened his public remarks with an allusion to his tendency to mispronounce the name of the rival party by calling it the Democrat Party, seen by many party activists as a calculated insult.

"I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party," Bush said to laughter. He drew scattered applause a few moments later when he used the correct name in calling on the "Democratic Party" to work with him to address the mounting future liabilities of Social Security and Medicare.

Democrats rose to politely applaud Bush before and after the speech, a sign of the outwardly cordial and respectful nature of the day's session.

Democrats had a rare opportunity to question the president directly, using a private session after his speech to press him on Iraq, immigration, global warming, the deficit and the absence of Hurricane Katrina and veterans' issues in his recent State of the Union address. While Bush asked Democrats to keep the conversation private, some people present said he gave no ground on his basic position on the war but was upfront in talking about its impact on the populace.

According to some Democrats present, Rep. Susan A. Davis (Calif.) told Bush about her concern that the military is fighting a war without the rest of the country sharing the sacrifice. Bush disagreed with that proposition, according to the Democrats there; he said that the war is psychologically draining for the entire country and that it is "sapping our souls" in some ways.

Bush also defended his plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq, saying that they would operate under new rules of engagement and that they could clear and hold troublesome areas. One senior Democratic staffer present said Bush spoke favorably of some of the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, the commission that recently evaluated the administration's war policy, such as embedding Americans to train Iraqi forces and eventually withdrawing U.S. troops. But he said there is too much sectarian violence to carry out such recommendations immediately.

The friendly tone, as described by officials on both sides of the day's session, was a marked change from a campaign season of heated rhetoric from Bush and the Democrats and followed six years of mistrust and lack of cooperation. As he closed his unsuccessful campaign last year to hold GOP majorities in Congress, for example, Bush described the Democratic war strategy as "The terrorists win, and America loses." In a 2004 interview with the San Francisco Chronicle, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), now House speaker, called Bush an "incompetent leader."

Deep divisions remain, especially on the war, and despite the talk of bipartisan goodwill, Pelosi was already making plans Saturday morning for symbolic showdowns with the White House on international affairs. Before Bush arrived at the Kingsmill Resort for the House members' strategy session, she told her caucus that they will be voting on a no-confidence resolution on the president's plan to send additional troops to Iraq.

Moreover, Pelosi told her colleagues that if it appears likely that Bush wants to take the country to war against Iran, the House would take up a bill to deny him the authority to do so, according to Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly.

Still, both sides may have incentives to cooperate in the next year or so. If Bush has any hope of domestic achievements in the remainder of his term, he must find Democratic votes, while many top Democrats concede they are under some pressure to show that they can be more than just an opposition party.

The president spent close to half an hour shaking hands and greeting people at the end of the question-and-answer session. He also spent time holding and hugging Pelosi's sixth grandchild, born shortly after the November elections. Pelosi's daughter, Alexandra Pelosi, is a documentary filmmaker whose 2002 film "Journeys with George" chronicled the president's 2000 campaign. She had a front-row seat Saturday and was filming the event with a hand-held camera.

DOJ_NMG_0127474

"I felt welcomed," Bush said as he and the House speaker met with reporters afterward. "I felt like people understood that I've got pressures on me, like I understand they have pressures on them. And I really hope that the members out there get a sense that I bear no ill will, I bring no animosity about the fact that we may not agree on every position."

Pelosi said she came away "encouraged" by the president's remarks. After Bush left to return to the White House, Pelosi said she believes there is room for compromise with him on three areas: a jobs innovation program, energy independence and immigration.

"The choice is bipartisanship or stalemate," she said.

In the private session, two Democrats -- freshman Rep. Tim Walz (Minn.) and Rep. Bennie Thompson (Miss.) -- pushed the president in separate questions on why he did not talk about veterans' issues or the relief effort for Hurricane Katrina victims in his opening remarks to the caucus or in his State of the Union address.

Bush defended his record in those areas and said his silence in a particular speech should not be interpreted as a lack of concern, Democrats present said. As an example, Bush said he cares about maintaining national parks, even though the subject did not come up in the State of the Union.

Some Democrats said they remain wary of Bush. In his question to the president, Rep. Luis V. Gutierrez (Ill.) said it is difficult for Democrats to trust Bush on immigration after Republicans used the issue "so brutally" against his party in the elections -- a remark that drew a loud ovation from other Democrats, according to people in attendance.

Bush said Democrats are not the only ones with "arrows" in their backs, a reference to the deep divisions in his own party on immigration. He spoke about his desire to combine tough border enforcement and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants, and he indicated a hope to keep politics out of the debate.

After he was pressed by Rep. Jay Inslee (Wash.) about curbing carbon emissions to reduce global warming, Bush strongly defended his environmental record and the progress of the nation. According to some in the room, Bush told Inslee not to assume that he does not care as much about greenhouse gasses as Inslee does.

Bush Meets With Democrats On Their Turf (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG, Va., Feb. 3 — In a rare appearance before an audience of Democrats, President Bush said Saturday that he did not question the patriotism of those who disagreed with his Iraq strategy and asked lawmakers not to let dissension over the war entirely erode their trust in him.

“I welcome debate in a time of war, and I hope you know that,” Mr. Bush said. “Nor do I consider a belief that if you don’t happen to agree with me, you don’t share the same sense of patriotism I do. You can get that thought out of your mind if that’s what some believe.”

The president’s words were met with applause from House Democrats, who gathered here at a secluded resort along the James River for their annual issues conference. Newly in control of Congress, Democrats invited Mr. Bush to their retreat, eager to show that they could no longer be overlooked by the White House.

“The choice,” said Representative Nancy Pelosi, the House speaker, “is bipartisanship or stalemate.”

So for nearly two hours, Mr. Bush held forth with some of the very Democrats he has spent the better part of six years sparring with. He spoke to members of Congress and their spouses, took pointed questions in a private session about Iraq, the budget deficit and immigration, and shook hands and posed for pictures.

“I’m looking forward to working with you,” Mr. Bush said, gesturing to those seated in the crowded ballroom. “I know you’ve probably heard that and you doubt whether it’s true — but it’s true. We’re going to do big things together.”

The political reality, of course, requires Mr. Bush to work with Democrats in the final two years of his presidency if he wants his legacy to include legislation like overhauling the nation’s immigration and health care systems, and beginning to curb America’s dependence on foreign oil.

“A great goal is a comprehensive immigration bill,” Mr. Bush said. “In order to get it done, it’s going to require members in the House and the Senate — Republican members, Democratic members — finding common ground, and the White House wants to help.”

The president’s speech, which lasted about 16 minutes, was interrupted by applause 21 times. Occasionally, the clapping seemed tepid, as some legislators looked across the room to see whether fellow Democrats were joining in. At other times, particularly if Mr. Bush delivered a self-deprecating line, the clapping boomed.

He began his remarks with such a moment, saying he meant no ill will at the State of the Union address when he referred to the lawmakers as members of the “Democrat Party.” The remark stirred a mini-dustup among some Democrats, who believed he was being pejorative.

DOJ_NMG_0127475

"Look, my diction isn't all that good," Mr. Bush said. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language, so I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

The event's cordiality stood in contrast to the coming days on Capitol Hill, where the Congress is heading toward a confrontation with the White House over Iraq policy. In a private session with lawmakers, several participants said, Mr. Bush conceded the war is "sapping our soul," but he said he intended to pursue his plan to send more troops to Iraq.

"We share a common goal," Mr. Bush said in his public remarks, "and that is to keep America safe."

In his weekly radio address on Saturday, Mr. Bush said the top priority of the budget he will submit to Congress on Monday was "keeping America safe and winning the war against extremists who want to destroy our way of life." He intends to request nearly three-quarters of a trillion dollars in military spending, which Democrats vowed to thoroughly scrutinize.

Mr. Bush did not wade deeply into the specifics of his budget proposals in his speech to Democrats, but he warned with a smile, "Some of it you'll like, some of it you won't."

Before Mr. Bush arrived, Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the House majority leader, conceded that some Democrats were not thrilled about their guest speaker. "There was a little controversy about the president coming," he said. "Some of our members said, 'Well, why is he coming down?' "

But by the time he left the room, the president's critics almost certainly were not won over, yet they said they felt empowered by being able to ask questions and raise concerns after spending most of Mr. Bush's presidency in the minority.

"Look, we don't always agree," Mr. Bush said. "That's why we're in different parties."

A Decider Meets 535 More Of 'Em (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

GEORGE W. BUSH was never one to cozy up to Capitol Hill.

From the outset of his presidency, Mr. Bush treated the Republican-run Congress like a tool at his disposal. If he invited lawmakers to the White House, it was to speak, not to listen. Rob Simmons, a moderate Republican from Connecticut who lost his House seat in November, recalls how a colleague recounted that Ronald Reagan invited freshman lawmakers in, four at a time, just to hear what was on their minds.

"I never had that opportunity, and that's a little disappointing, because when it comes to intelligence issues, I think I have something to offer," said Mr. Simmons, a former military intelligence officer who spent 10 years as a spy with the C.I.A. "The best I could do was to be invited in a fairly large group, up to 20 people, to receive essentially a briefing on the president's position."

Now that Democrats are in charge, the president is making a great show of Congressional outreach. Consider the last week: On Tuesday, Mr. Bush agreed on a bipartisan panel to advise him on the war. On Wednesday, the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, dropped by the Oval Office to report on her trip to Iraq. On Friday, Mr. Bush held a White House reception for Republican senators. On Saturday, he was headed to Williamsburg, Va., to a House Democratic retreat.

But there is little evidence that the Congressional courtship has influenced the president who famously called himself "the decider," whether the issue is Social Security or the decision to send more troops to Iraq. So this week, the Senate plans to push back, taking up a bipartisan resolution condemning the new Iraq strategy. The debate is more than a simple policy dispute, or even a public rebuke of the way Mr. Bush has managed the war.

It is a lawmakers' revolution, of sorts, an uprising against the way Mr. Bush has treated the 535 people who spend their workdays at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue.

"What has become clear with the troop surge is that there is not just a policy difference, but a real level of personal animosity as well," said Julian E. Zelizer, a professor of history at Boston University who writes frequently about Congress. "There's no trust. There's no respect. There's no love."

That animosity is palpable not only among Democrats — who are suddenly in the unfamiliar position of no longer being ignored by Mr. Bush — but also Republicans. Lawmakers of both parties are irked by the president's muscular expansion of executive authority, and what they see as his cavalier attitude toward their constitutional authority as a co-equal branch.

"The president repeatedly makes reference to the fact that he is the decider," Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the senior Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said about troop levels last week. "I would respectfully suggest to the president that he is not the sole decider, that the decider is a joint and shared responsibility."

Even Senator Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, the senior Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee who often backs the administration, tried to warn Mr. Bush to pay Congress more heed.

"The administration has been inclined not to disregard Congress, but to not take Congress very seriously," Mr. Lugar told Fox News in December. "I think this time Congress has to be taken seriously."

DOJ_NMG_0127476

From his first days in Washington, Mr. Bush expected his fellow Republicans to work uncomplainingly in service of his agenda. And they did. Party unity was tight; White House officials say there were few policy disagreements that required the kind of discussions Mr. Bush has initiated over Iraq. Instead, the president devoted himself to campaigning to get Republicans re-elected.

Still, tensions built. When Senator Trent Lott, the Mississippi Republican, ran into trouble over remarks considered racially inappropriate, the White House did the unthinkable, inserting itself into Congressional affairs to orchestrate Mr. Lott's ouster. When Senator John Thune, the South Dakota Republican who passed up a bid for a governorship because Mr. Bush asked him to run for the Senate instead, wanted help saving a military base in his state, the White House spurned his request.

"The attitude in the White House was, 'They're going to need us more than we need them,' " said Scott Reed, a Republican strategist. "The president liked to campaign, he liked to have an active schedule raising money for candidates, and there was a belief that was enough."

Now Mr. Bush is paying the price, says James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University. "Are the chickens coming home to roost?" Mr. Thurber asked. "Yes. If he had been a real solid guy with Republicans along the way, they'd be with him now, a lot more than they are."

Presidents past have used the power and glamour of the White House to stroke the occupants of Capitol Hill but also to forge relationships that produced legislation. President Bill Clinton got along with Newt Gingrich when he was speaker of the House, and the two paired to overhaul the welfare system. Lyndon Johnson, a creature of Congress and a master at manipulating it, maintained strong ties on Capitol Hill, even during the darkest days of Vietnam.

"As he struggled himself with his presidency, he wasn't isolated from legislators," Professor Zelizer said. "I think it's very different with this president."

With just two years left in the administration, White House officials say the president hopes to persuade Democrats to work with him on domestic issues like immigration and energy, even as they thwart him on Iraq. Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said the aim is for Mr. Bush to reassure his own party that "he's still a Republican" and "at the same time find common ground with Democrats."

The effort has not gone unnoticed. Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the No. 2 Democrat in the Senate, jokes that he has been to the White House so often that, "I'm going to get a coffee cup and leave it there." Mrs. Pelosi's aides say she was touched when Mr. Bush, in his State of the Union Address, introduced her as "Madam Speaker" with a flourish — a moment so carefully orchestrated that White House aides deleted it from the advance text to preserve an element of surprise.

Yet even there, Mr. Bush stumbled, referring to the "Democrat Party," a phrase Democrats find insulting — though the president later said he meant no offense. And just last week, Mr. Bush grabbed more power for the White House, signing a directive giving the administration greater control over rule-making on matters of public health, safety and the environment.

"We're going to give him the benefit of the doubt," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, chairman of the House Democratic Caucus. "But in my view, the most important test is: Are they going to shed the Dick Cheney view of the Congress, which is that it is a second-class branch of government?"

And therein lies the rub for Mr. Bush as he tries to repair his frayed relations with Capitol Hill. Unless he gives ground on policy matters, playing nice with lawmakers is not going to do him much good. Senator Susan Collins, the Maine Republican who is a lead sponsor of the resolution opposing the Iraq policy, gives Mr. Bush good marks for trying.

"But there is a difference," she said, "between being heard, and being heeded."

Bush Builds Bonds With House Democrats At Retreat (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

WILLIAMSBURG -- President Bush and House Democrats got off to a good start in finding common ground yesterday at the Democrats' annual retreat -- with Mr. Bush saying they even share a bond in having been shot in the back by Republicans on immigration.

"You are not the only one with arrows in your back," the president said during a closed-door question-and-answer session with the House Democratic Caucus, according to two individuals who were in the room.

He was responding to Rep. Luis Gutierrez, Illinois Democrat, who said Republicans had been merciless during last year's elections in attacking Democrats on border security. He asked Mr. Bush to win more Republican support for the Democrats' preferred bill.

To a round of applause, the president said he will fight for a bill that does not deport illegal aliens. Mr. Bush said it would be a mistake to miss the opportunity for reform this year and let the issue enter the 2008 election campaign, when he worried it would become too political.

DOJ_NMG_0127477

Immigration is one issue on which Mr. Bush may fare better with Democrats in control than with his own party. But, dependent on Democrats for his final two years, the president has made overtures on a host of other issues during the past month that he hopes can come to fruition under the new regime.

Yesterday, Democratic leaders said he convinced them he wants to work with them on some issues.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Illinois Democrat, said Mr. Bush's acknowledgment of global warming in his State of the Union address and of growing "income inequality" in a speech on Wall Street last week both bode well, as did his admission that the Iraq war isn't going well and his early steps to increase education spending.

"We had plenty of common ground, which the president was willing to acknowledge," House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, said after the session.

During her introduction, she invoked Lincoln's second inaugural address calling for reconciliation between the North and South "with malice toward none, with charity for all."

She said Democrats can work with Mr. Bush on what she called the "three i's" -- immigration, energy independence and innovation for the economy.

The president broke the ice with Democrats by explaining his use of the term "Democrat Party" during his State of the Union address last month. The phrase had angered some lawmakers, who consider it a slur.

"Look, my diction isn't all that good," Mr. Bush explained, drawing chuckles. "I have been accused of occasionally mangling the English language, and so, I appreciate you inviting the head of the Republic Party."

The president assured Democrats he doesn't question their patriotism for disagreeing with his Iraq policy.

"You can get that thought out of your mind, if that's what some believe," he said, to a smattering of applause.

That's a change from the past, when Mr. Bush has wondered whether his political opponents would "forget the lessons of September 11th." And it's a sharp departure from the midterm campaign last year, when Republicans accused Democrats of favoring a "cut-and-run" strategy.

The president drew the biggest applause when he talked about spending on AIDS in Africa and keeping pressure on Sudan to find a solution to the mass killing and displacement in the Darfur region of that northeast African nation.

He faced six questions during the closed portion, including why his new Iraq plan would succeed when past troop surges have failed, what he plans to do about the size of the national debt, and whether he would agree to mandatory caps on carbon emissions to curb global warming.

Mr. Bush didn't outright reject caps, but said his focus on technology is a smarter approach. He also said Kyoto treaty-style caps, such as ones that Europeans have adopted, have failed and said fast-growing Asian countries won't participate in that solution, anyway, leaving technology as the only path.

Mr. Bush also was asked why he didn't mention Hurricane Katrina or veterans during his State of the Union address. He compared those issues to the national park system, saying he didn't talk about it either, but still considers it important.

One person in the room said Mr. Bush "sounded very defensive" on Katrina.

It was the first time since 2001 that the president addressed one of the Democratic caucus' annual retreats. He spoke to both House and Senate Democrats that year.

Mr. Bush was so warmly received yesterday that he stayed in the room to shake hands for a half-hour after he was done answering questions.

Protesters weren't allowed at the King's Mill resort, where the gathering took place, but they congregated on a corner just outside the complex.

"Stop funding; start impeaching; mandate peace" read the painted slogan on the back of one panel truck driving the streets nearby.

At Least 130 Die As Blast Levels Baghdad Market (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel, Qais Mizher

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Sunday, Feb. 4 — A mammoth truck bomb obliterated a popular central Baghdad market on Saturday, ripping through scores of shops and flattening apartment buildings, killing at least 130 people and wounding more than 300 in the worst of a series of horrific attacks against Shiites in recent weeks.

The attack was the work of a suicide bomber who detonated about one ton of explosives in the bustling Sadriya market, in a largely Shiite enclave at 5 p.m., as shoppers finished buying food for dinner and men sipped coffee at cafes nearby, the police said. It was the deadliest single bomb blast since the United States invasion almost four years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0127478

The bombing, the fourth major attack against a densely populated Shiite area in less than three weeks, seemed sure to inflame Shiite political and militia leaders just as more than 20,000 American troops begin to arrive in an attempt to stop the civil war that threatens to tear Iraq apart.

The unrelenting killing of Shiites also promises to put more pressure on Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who finds himself squeezed between American demands to crack down on Shiite militias and his fellow Shiites' increasing belief that the militias are their best defense against Sunni insurgents.

American commanders say that in recent weeks, as Mr. Maliki has tried to show he is supporting the current plan to secure Baghdad, top Shiite government officials have meddled less in the Americans' efforts to pursue militia leaders.

But Shiite community leaders say that as a result, they are now more exposed to Sunni insurgent attacks. And some Shiite militia commanders acknowledge that they have reduced militia checkpoints to avoid confrontation with American forces.

Within hours of the bombing, Mr. Maliki denounced the attack as the work of "Saddamists" and other Sunni insurgents.

The chaotic scene after the blast suggested how much pressure Shiite political leaders would face to seek revenge against Sunnis for the recent attacks: as onlookers cursed the Iraqi government for not protecting them from Sunni militants, Shiite militiamen descended on the area, angrily questioning people they believed did not belong in the neighborhood.

The bomber struck close to the middle of the narrow market, which stretches for about an eighth of a mile, killing everyone nearby and dozens more in collapsed apartment buildings and coffeehouses that line the market, witnesses said.

"Look at all these buildings," shouted Qadir Ali Ismael, a 41-year-old vegetable seller who escaped the blast. "There were families living in these apartments and they didn't find anyone alive in there. All of those people were killed!"

The attack left a crater 15 feet long, 10 feet wide and 5 feet deep. Blast waves left buildings a block away badly damaged.

Police officers rushed frantically to rescue wounded people trapped inside buildings, only to find that they could not break through damaged doors to get inside. By the time they did, some of the wounded had bled to death, said Abu Ali, who runs a health clinic a few blocks from the market.

"The doors wouldn't open," he said. "The rescuers are getting there too late." He said he treated more than 40 people himself, mostly children and women, and quickly ran out of first-aid supplies.

As the loudspeaker of a nearby Shiite mosque called for people to donate blood, American Humvees took up positions on a street that leads to a nearby Sunni neighborhood, apparently in an effort to prevent clashes between the sects.

Anger spread through the crowd that gathered at the blast site as people said that the attack was the work of Sunni insurgents. Although no group claimed responsibility by early morning Sunday, suspicion fell on Sunni militants, who have conducted large-scale suicide bombings in the past.

One elderly man, crying and shouting, was surrounded by younger men.

"They tried to kill us because we are Shia," the older man said. "Why are there no bombs in Adhamiya?," he said, referring to a large Sunni district of Baghdad. "Maliki and the Americans are the sons of dogs because they do nothing to protect us."

Grieving relatives rushed to hospitals. At the Imam Ali Hospital in the Sadr City neighborhood, the refrigerated portion of the morgue quickly filled and bodies were piled up next to it. People tried to donate blood, but were told to go to a blood bank that is in a dangerous area of Baghdad.

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, condemned the attack as an "example of what the forces of evil will do to intimidate the Iraqi people." And the White House called the bombing an atrocity, saying, "Free nations of the world must not stand by while terrorists commit mass murder in an attempt to derail democratic progress in Iraq and throughout the greater Middle East."

Several Sunni neighborhoods came under retaliatory attack Saturday night. A Western official said Adhamiya was struck by several mortars, and an Interior Ministry official said another Sunni neighborhood in eastern Baghdad, Slaykh, was also hit by at least three mortar rounds.

The death toll on Saturday eclipsed the number in September 2005 attack in a Shiite area of Baghdad and one in the February 2005 bombing of a Hilla market, each of which killed at least 120 people. The largest overall attack remains a series of bombs that killed about 200 people in Sadr City last November.

With Saturday's bombing, more than 400 people have been killed in about a half-dozen bomb attacks on Shiite areas in Baghdad and Hilla in just the past three weeks. The Sadriya market was also hit by two large bombs in early December.

Saturday's attack came as both the Iraqi and United States governments have committed to yet another attempt to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. Many Democrats and some Republicans have assailed the White House for its decision to send extra troops.

The United States Senate is most likely to vote soon on a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop buildup.

DOJ_NMG_0127479

Earlier on Saturday, Iraq's most revered Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, repeated his call for Muslims to "stand together and repel division and reject sectarian rifts," and he denounced those who he said were "deepening the sectarian disputes between the Muslims."

The calamity in Baghdad came after a bloody day throughout the rest of Iraq that included a coordinated volley of seven car bombs in Kirkuk, apparently the latest strike by insurgents seeking to thwart Kurdish efforts to fully annex the disputed oil-rich city.

The first Kirkuk suicide attacker detonated his bomb-laden Toyota near the offices of the powerful Kurdistan Democratic Party at about 10:30 a.m., killing one civilian and wounding 17 others while damaging 10 nearby houses, according to Burhan Habib Tayeb, a senior police officer in Kirkuk. Other reports placed the casualty toll at 2 dead and 30 wounded.

The next four car bombs were detonated about every 10 minutes, beginning at 11 a.m. One wounded two students at a school for girls and another wounded four people at a gas station. Two more bombs went off later in the day, wounding two civilians, said a Kirkuk police captain, Emad Jasim.

Gunmen fatally struck Iraqi forces twice in Samarra, north of Baghdad, where the destruction of a Shiite shrine last February set off a wave of sectarian violence. Gunmen struck a police checkpoint north of the city about 7:30 a.m., killing six policemen and wounding six more, a police official said. Four Iraqi soldiers were later killed just south of the city after gunmen attacked their checkpoint. Three other soldiers were wounded, and three of the gunmen were killed, the police official said.

The Iraqi police also battled insurgents in a neighborhood of western Mosul on Saturday, while a large bomb wounded three policemen in another part of western Mosul, a police official said. Several insurgents were killed in the gun battle, but no policemen died, he said.

Iraqi forces imposed a curfew in Kirkuk, Mosul and Samarra following the violence.

The American military on Saturday reported the deaths of six more servicemen. Two soldiers assigned to units in insurgent-dominated Anbar Province in western Iraq died Friday from "wounds sustained due to enemy action," the American military announced. The names and specific units were not released.

Two other soldiers based near Baghdad were killed when a roadside bomb struck their patrol south of the capital on Friday.

A soldier from the 13th Sustainment Command (Expeditionary) died from an apparent heart attack after physical training on Friday, while another from the same command died Jan. 30 from "noncombat-related causes" during a two-week leave, the military said.

At Least 125 Killed In Blast At Baghdad Market (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 3 -- A suicide bomber detonated more than a ton of explosives in a market in central Baghdad late Saturday afternoon, killing at least 125 people and wounding 300 in the deadliest single bombing in the capital since the war started.

The blast at the al-Sadriya market in a predominantly Shiite Muslim area leveled at least three buildings and set fire to dozens of businesses, trapping scores of people under piles of rubble.

The explosives were hidden under produce and bags of groceries in the back of a pickup truck that the driver parked near an entrance to the market.

"It's a massacre," said Tahsin Abu Lubna, who lives near the area. "It's like a slaughterhouse. You can see blood everywhere. It's an unbelievable sight."

The attack followed a recent string of bombings targeting places where Shiites congregate in Baghdad and elsewhere in the country. Officials say Sunni insurgents are behind the violence, which comes as the Iraqi government and U.S. military are stepping up security in the capital as an intended first step to restoring order in Iraq.

Ambulances rushed to the scene after the bombing, but many of the corpses and the wounded were loaded on the back of pickup trucks.

"They were carrying the bodies like sheep," Abu Lubna said in a phone interview as he watched emergency vehicles stream out of the devastated area outside his window.

A 29-year-old mechanic who works nearby said he rushed to the scene to help.

"This is a real disaster," said the mechanic, who gave only his first name, Amjad. "I carried four bodies," he added, including two he recognized: a yogurt vendor and a man who sold tea.

Iraqi officials said that determining the exact death toll would take at least a day.

"The bodies are still under the destroyed buildings, so this is why it is hard to have a final number now," Maj. Gen. Jihad al-Jabiri, an explosives expert at the Interior Ministry, said on state-run al-Iraqiya television.

DOJ_NMG_0127480

Iraqi news stations showed piles of bloody bodies lying in the street outside a hospital.

"The hospitals are equipped to handle this number of casualties because they get used to it," Health Minister Ali Hussein al-Shamari said on the state-run station.

Ali Dabbagh, a spokesman for the Iraqi prime minister, said authorities suspect that a Sunni insurgent group sponsored the attack. Most recent large bombs in Iraq have been detonated during the morning hours, but the two large bombings this week -- two suicide bombers killed dozens of shoppers at a bazaar in the southern city of Hilla on Thursday -- came in the evening.

"They're trying to change their strategy," Dabbagh said. "They change in order to show that they have the upper hand."

Dabbagh said the pickup truck used in Saturday's attack did not have a license plate, making it difficult to trace it to the bomber's accomplices.

Dabbagh blamed Syria for not doing enough to stop the violence, saying that 50 percent of insurgents enter Iraq through Syria.

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki attributed the attack to "forces of evil and terrorism" driven by "Saddamists and Baathists" who have "cheapened the blood of innocent civilians."

The market has been struck at least twice before, last month and in December.

Shoppers frequent the market to buy meat, poultry, vegetables and household goods. Vendors work out of small stores and wooden carts. The market is generally packed on Friday and Saturday afternoons, when many Iraqis do not work.

The White House condemned the attack, saying in a statement issued last night: "Another atrocity in Baghdad today has targeted the innocent people of Iraq. Free nations of the world must not stand by while terrorists commit mass murder in an attempt to derail democratic progress in Iraq and throughout the greater Middle East."

The U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, said in a statement, "To those who commit these heinous crimes, we send this message: You will be relentlessly hunted until you are apprehended and brought to justice. Have no doubt; you will pay for your role in these crimes."

Earlier in the day, seven car bombs detonated in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing at least two people and wounding nearly 30. One of the bombs exploded in front of the Kurdish Democratic Party building in the ethnically mixed city.

The city's police chief decried the recent loss of an Iraqi military brigade based in Kirkuk -- one of the units the government has sent to Baghdad as part of the capital's security plan.

Also Saturday, the U.S. military announced the deaths of four soldiers Friday. Two were killed in Anbar province in western Iraq. The other two were killed in a roadside bombing south of Baghdad. Their names will be released after relatives have been notified, the statement said.

Deadly Blast's Damage Is Physical And Psychological (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A dump truck hauling a ton of explosives hidden beneath boxes of food exploded in the center of a crowded Baghdad market Saturday, killing at least 130 people and injuring more than 300 in the deadliest blast since the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

The attack, carried out by a suicide bomber, was designed to inflict a massive physical as well as psychological toll on a population haunted by a string of devastating strikes on other markets, including one Thursday that killed 73 people in the southern city of Hillah, and another in Baghdad last month that killed more than 80.

This one came in the evening, when the Sadriya market was crowded with after-work shoppers stocking up for dinner.

The truck's deadly payload included land mines, ammunition, rockets, mortars and other explosives, which erupted in a fireball and sent buildings crashing down on top of merchants and customers, said Maj. Gen. Jihad Jabiri of Iraq's Interior Ministry.

The White House and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki denounced the attack, which was another reminder that their vows to counter spiraling bloodshed with increased troops are having no deterrent effect. Ten other explosions, including seven car bombs in the northern city of Kirkuk and one south of Baghdad, killed at least three more people Saturday. In addition, Iraqi police reported finding the bodies of 15 Iraqi men around Baghdad, all shot to death and apparent victims of the sectarian warfare enveloping the country.

Shirwan Ridha, a taxi driver, was on his last run of the day and was standing near his minivan, waiting for it to fill with passengers, when the truck blew up about 300 feet away from him. "Huge fire rose to the sky. I was thrown into the air and then to the ground," said Ridha. "I saw my car being destroyed, and the people inside it were shouting and screaming."

Hamed Majed, a butcher who works in the market, said he was tending to customers when he noticed a large yellow truck struggling to navigate through the narrow street, which was lined with cafes, food shops, and stores selling everything from

DOJ_NMG_0127481

DVDs to computer goods. When some people asked the driver where he was trying to go, he "told them he was carrying food products for the shops in the area," Majed said.

Seconds later, after the truck had gone about 500 feet down the road, it exploded. "The explosion was the biggest one that I have seen in my life," said Majed, adding that he has seen several in the area. The market area was hit by a series of blasts on Dec. 2 that killed 51 people, and a June bombing in the market killed four people.

"The shop walls, ceiling and the refrigerators fell on us," said Majed, 35, who suffered leg and head injuries. "The people rescued me . . . and transferred me to the main street by a cart." He spoke from Kindi Hospital, which was so overwhelmed with casualties that it began turning away new ones and sending them to other medical facilities.

Bodies covered in white sheets were laid out on the hospital floor outside the emergency room. Survivors also were being treated on the floors. "The situation is catastrophic," said one hospital official. "It is turmoil over here. The halls are filled with the blood of the injured and the dead. There are children, women and men."

The explosion severely damaged 10 apartment buildings and left a ghastly landscape of human remains, food, shattered goods and animal meat that was sent hurtling from butchers' stalls. Witnesses said fuel from generators added to the blast's fiery aftermath. One man, wearing a black leather jacket, sobbed as he clung to a piece of blackened metal protruding from the ground.

In a statement, the White House called the attack an "atrocity." Al-Maliki, the Shiite prime minister, echoed the denunciation and blamed it on "Saddamists and Takfirists," a reference to supporters of former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein and Sunni Muslim extremists. The attack was similar to others blamed on Sunni forces, who frequently have used car bombs to target crowded, civilian targets in Shiite-dominated or ethnically mixed areas, such as Sadriya.

Just hours earlier, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the country's most revered Shiite cleric, had appealed for an end to sectarian bloodshed, saying it was the duty of good Muslims to discourage violence and dissension. "We need to be more united than ever and keep ourselves away from sectarian tumult and sectarian clashes," he said in a statement.

At the same time, a Sunni militant group linked to al-Qaida vowed to step up attacks across Iraq and claimed responsibility for the string of Kirkuk bombs.

The same group claimed responsibility for shooting down a U.S. military helicopter north of Baghdad Friday, which killed two U.S. crew members.

Three more U.S. military deaths were reported Saturday by military officials -- two in fighting in western Anbar province, and another in a noncombat incident.

President Bush plans to send an additional 21,500 troops to attempt to quell violence in Baghdad and other areas of Iraq in coming months, but U.S. intelligence agencies said Friday the situation is so bleak that it will be well more than a year before the country can be stabilized. In their report, known as the National Intelligence Estimate, the agencies said the causes of violence in Iraq were so complicated that the term "civil war" was too simplistic to explain the situation.

The attacks in Kirkuk on Saturday underscored the complexities of Iraq's violence. The worst attack targeted offices of one of the main Kurdish parties, the Kurdish Democratic Party, which favors autonomy for the oil-rich region. Two people were killed when a suicide bomber tried to ram a car into the building, the Kirkuk police chief, Shirko Shaker, said.

In the next few hours, seven more car bombs and two other explosions rocked the city, injuring 28 people, and prompting officials to place the city under a 4 p.m.-6 a.m. curfew.

A party official, Nashat Hassan, blamed the violence on forces opposed to efforts to return to the city thousands of Kurds displaced by Saddam as part of his plan to remake the city for Arabs.

A referendum is scheduled later this year for Kirkuk residents to decide whether to join the autonomous region of Kurdistan, a move that could deny Iraq's other regions much of the area's oil wealth.

"What kind of Islam is this?" said Kirkuk resident, Bashar Hassan, 42, in an emotional voice. "They have created their own rules by killing innocent people from all backgrounds," he said of the bombers. "May they go to hell."

130 Killed In Baghdad Bombing (CHIT)

By Liz Sly

Chicago Tribune, February 4, 2007

The deadliest single bombing in Iraq since the 2003 invasion killed at least 130 people and wounded at least 300 in a crowded Baghdad street market Saturday, the latest in an escalating campaign of terror targeting shoppers that has claimed hundreds of lives in recent weeks.

A fuel truck packed with a ton of explosives detonated in the narrow streets of the Sadriyah open-air market in central Baghdad just before dusk, at a time when the market was crammed with people stocking up on supplies before nightfall. Two buildings were obliterated, 10 others collapsed, dozens of stalls were incinerated, and many victims died instantly in the huge explosion, which reverberated across the city.

DOJ_NMG_0127482

Police and witness accounts said the blast was caused by a suicide bomber who disguised his cargo with boxes of oil and flour. But government officials later said the explosives were packed into a fuel tanker that was parked in the street and then detonated by remote control.

It was just the latest attack in a string of bombings against markets that appear designed to maximize civilian casualties and inflame sectarian tensions ahead of the deployment of an extra 17,500 U.S. troops to Baghdad to help enforce a tough new security plan.

Two days earlier, a pair of suicide bombers killed 73 people in the Shiite town of Hillah, and on Jan. 22 a bombing in a different Baghdad market killed 88--the worst recent examples of the sustained bombing campaign that has intensified since President Bush announced his plans to "surge" the number of troops in Baghdad. The mostly Shiite Sadriyah market was hit last December by a wave of car bombings and mortar shells that killed more than 50.

Even by Iraqi standards, however, this bombing was shocking, in its size and in the number of casualties inflicted. Previous waves of attacks have claimed more lives, such as last November's onslaught of six car bombs in the Shiite Sadr City slum neighborhood in which more than 200 people died.

Rarely, however, has such a large bomb been used against a purely civilian target. Until Saturday, the bloodiest attack was a suicide bombing in Hillah in February 2005, also against a market, in which 115 people died.

In a strongly worded statement, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki blamed the attack on "Saddamists and taqfiris," or Sunni extremists.

"The forces of terror and evil have united together against our dear Iraqi people," he said. "We were shocked today, and so were all Iraqis and honest people around the world by this despicable crime."

The bombing came 40 days after the execution of Saddam Hussein, prompting some speculation that it was intended to mark the day normally commemorated as the end of the traditional mourning period in Iraq.

"Maybe the terrorists wanted to do something big to commemorate the death of Saddam," said Shiite lawmaker Hassan Snaid, a security adviser to al-Maliki.

Another theory is that insurgent cells are disposing of their stockpile of prepared bombs ahead of the security plan. Most of the extra U.S. units won't reach Iraq for several more weeks, but al-Maliki has said his security plan is due to go into effect within days, reinforced by the U.S. troops now in the capital.

Yet another possibility is that insurgents are seeking to intensify the sectarian conflict engulfing many Baghdad neighborhoods before extra U.S. troops arrive, rendering Bush's plan unworkable.

Although many of the attacks have occurred in Shiite neighborhoods and none in Sunni ones, markets such as Sadriyah in the heart of the capital can't be considered as belonging to any particular sect. "The victims would have been Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds," Snaid said.

The bombing came hours after the most senior Shiite cleric in Iraq, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, issued a statement appealing to Iraqis not to fall prey to attempts to divide them along sectarian lines.

"Unite, reject division, stay away from sectarianism and avoid provoking religious disputes. Those disputes are several centuries old, and there's no solution to be found which satisfies everybody," he said. "We must focus on the issues we all share in order to strengthen Islamic unity and spread love and brotherhood among the sons of this nation."

Past such appeals by the revered ayatollah have failed to halt the intensifying attacks against Sunnis and Sunni neighborhoods by Shiite death squads and militias, often acting in revenge for bombings against Shiite neighborhoods.

Saturday also saw a wave of seven coordinated suicide bombings against Kurdish and government targets in the northern city of Kirkuk, in which two people died. The authorities imposed a curfew in the northern city of Mosul after gunmen staged a major ambush against Iraqi police in which six died.

Those attacks were claimed by the Islamic State of Iraq, an Al Qaeda-linked group that says it represents an Islamic government in Sunni areas of Iraq.

But none of the recent bombings against civilian markets has been claimed by any group.

Also Saturday, the U.S. military reported the deaths of five more soldiers -- four in fighting and one of an apparent heart attack. All of the victims died Friday.

Scores Killed In Baghdad Market Blast (AP)

By STEVEN R. HURST

Associated Press, February 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127483

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) -- A suicide bomber driving a truck loaded with a ton of explosives hidden beneath cooking oil, canned food and bags of flour obliterated a Baghdad food market on Saturday, killing at least 132 people in one of the most fearsome attacks in the capital since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

The explosion was the deadliest strike by a single suicide car bomber since the war started, surpassing the Feb. 28, 2005, attack targeting mostly Shiite police and national guard recruits in Hillah that killed 125.

Saturday's attack also was the bloodiest in the capital since a series of car bombs and mortars killed at least 215 people in the Shiite district of Sadr City on Nov. 23, and the fifth major bombing in less than a month targeting predominantly Shiite districts in Baghdad and the southern city of Hillah.

The attack leveled about 30 shops and 40 houses, witnesses said.

Hospital officials said 132 people were killed and 305 were wounded in the thunderous explosion that sent a column of smoke into the sky on the east bank of the Tigris River. The nearby al-Kindi hospital - quickly overwhelmed - began turning away the wounded and directing ambulances to hospitals in the Shiite Sadr City neighborhood.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the bombing was "an example of what the forces of evil will do to intimidate the Iraqi people."

The bombing came just days before American and Iraqi forces were expected to start an all-out assault on Sunni and Shiite gunmen and bombers in the capital.

Only a day earlier, 16 American intelligence agencies made public a National Intelligence Estimate that said conditions in Baghdad were perilous.

"Unless efforts to reverse these conditions show measurable progress ... in the coming 12 to 18 months, we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate," a declassified synopsis of the report declared.

Emergency workers and civilians wheeled scores of bloodied and mangled victims into the hospitals with intravenous drips already in their arms. Doctors and paramedics were in a frantic triage to save the lives of the most seriously wounded.

"We don't allow big trucks in the market, but the driver convinced us that he had food to deliver for a shop. Once he got inside, he detonated the bomb," said Kamil Ibrahim, a 36-year-old vegetable vendor at the entrance to the market district.

Ibrahim - wounded in his head, chest and abdomen - said two of his workers, young men 18 and 19 years old, were killed instantly.

The shopkeeper spoke from a bed in al-Kindi Hospital, where he was rushed in a private car after rescuers wheeled him out of the market on a wooden cart.

Suspicion immediately fell on Sunni insurgents - al-Qaida in Iraq and allied groups in particular. The militant bombers are believed to have stepped up their campaign against Shiites in the final days before the joint U.S.-Iraqi crackdown in Baghdad. Many saw the operation as a last-chance effort to clamp off violence that has turned the capital into a sectarian battleground.

Suspected Sunni attackers have appeared emboldened in recent weeks after radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, under pressure from fellow Shiites who dominate the government, ordered the thousands of gunmen in his Mahdi Army militia to avoid American attacks in the coming assault.

In the hours after the explosion, Shiite and Sunni mortar teams traded fire across the darkened city. Two people were killed and 20 wounded in one predominantly Sunni district.

The White House called the bombing an atrocity and said, "Free nations of the world must not stand by while terrorists commit mass murder in an attempt to derail democratic progress in Iraq and throughout the greater Middle East."

On Sunday, a roadside bomb struck a police patrol in a predominantly Sunni area in Baghdad, killing four policemen and wounding three.

The blast occurred about 7:30 a.m. in the Azamiyah neighborhood in northern Baghdad, police said, giving the casualty toll. The area, which is mainly inhabited by Sunni Arabs, also has faced mortar attacks in recent days in apparent retaliation for a series of bombings against Shiite targets.

Also Sunday, a mortar round landed at about 8 a.m. in a religiously mixed residential area in downtown Baghdad, killing one woman and wounding three civilians, police said.

Violence shattered the northern city of Kirkuk on Saturday as well. Eight bombs exploded within two hours, the opening blast a suicide car bomber apparently targeting the offices of the Kurdish Democratic Party of Massoud Barzani, leader of Iraq's autonomous Kurdish region.

Two people were killed in that blast and four nearby homes destroyed. There was no claim of responsibility for the series of bombings in the oil-rich city where Arabs, Kurds and Turkomen all claim ascendance.

Sunni insurgents were seen as likely suspects, however, as many of them have fled to the north of the country in a bid to escape the crackdown in the capital.

DOJ_NMG_0127484

Further signs the insurgents were migrating north appeared in Mosul, where insurgent forces fought Iraqi police and soldiers. Police said five insurgents were killed. Police spokesman Brig. Abdul Karim al-Jubouri said fighters abandoned their attack when Iraqi security forces moved in backed by U.S. air power.

In the Baghdad blast, Maj. Gen. Jihad al-Jabiri of the Iraqi Interior Ministry said one ton of explosives ripped through the Sadriyah market.

"There are still bodies under the rubble," he said. In an outburst of frustration and anger he called for the government to "deport (non-Iraqi) Arabs immediately."

The general's comments reflected growing displeasure inside the government of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki with neighboring Syria, which Baghdad charges has done too little to close its border to Sunni militants.

In his second heated verbal attack on Damascus in two days, government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh said "50 percent of terrorism enters Iraq from Syria, and we have evidence" to prove that.

"The Interior Ministry and the Ministry of State for National Security gave them (the Syrians) evidence about those who are conspiring and are sending car bombs. We gave them the numbers of their apartments and the buildings where they live," al-Dabbagh said on Al-Arabiya satellite television.

The Sadriyah market sits on a side street lined with shops and vendors selling produce, meat and other staples. The market is about 500 meters from a Sunni shrine.

Not far from the Sadriyah marketplace, a suicide bomber crashed his car into the Bab al-Sharqi market 12 days ago and killed 88 people.

South of Baghdad, a pair of suicide bombers detonated explosives Thursday among shoppers in a crowded outdoor market in the Shiite city of Hillah, killing at least 73 people and wounding 163.

An Iraqi militant group tied to al-Qaida in Iraq announced, meanwhile, it had launched its own new strategy to counter the coming U.S.-Iraqi crackdown.

In an audiotape posted on a Web site commonly used by the insurgents, a voice purported to be that of Abu Abdullah Rashid al-Baghdadi, also known as Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, said the group would "widen the circle of battles" beyond Baghdad to all of Iraq. Al-Baghdadi heads The Mujahedeen Shura Council, an umbrella organization of insurgent groups in Iraq.

The U.S. military reported the deaths of five more soldiers - four in fighting and one of an apparent heart attack. All died Friday.

Iraqi authorities said that 145 people were killed or were found dead Saturday, including those killed in the market bombing. Of the total, 19 were found dumped in the capital, most of the bodies showing signs of torture.

Iraqi PM Vows To End Bomb Terror (BBC)

BBC.com, February 4, 2007

Iraq's PM has vowed to put an end to attacks like Saturday's deadly truck bombing in Baghdad, which he blamed on followers of ex-leader Saddam Hussein.

The vehicle blew up in the mainly Shia al-Sadriya district in central Baghdad, killing more than 130 people and injuring more than 300.

Washington said the attack was another atrocity aimed at innocent Iraqis.

Free nations should not stand by while mass murder was committed, the White House statement said.

"The Iraqi people and the world is shocked by this... The Saddamists have returned to commit a new crime," Mr Maliki said.

"We reassure the population that we will put an end to these crimes," he added.

An Iraqi government spokesman, meanwhile, said that half of the attacks in Baghdad were carried out by extremists who came from Syria.

"We say that - and we have evidence to prove it," Ali al-Dabbagh told al-Iraqiya TV.

'Tonne of explosives'

Saturday's blast took place as people bought food ahead of a night-time curfew.

It shattered stalls and left a huge crater in the street.

Maj Gen Jihad al-Jaberi of the interior ministry told state television the truck was carrying one tonne of explosives that were detonated by a suicide bomber.

Nearby hospitals were overflowing with dead and injured

Rescuers pulled the dead and injured from the rubble of the blast and loaded them on to pick-up trucks to be ferried to hospital.

Wards and corridors overflowed at the nearby Ibn al-Nafis hospital, with relatives screaming for help for their loved ones.

The same market was hit by car bombs on 2 December that killed more than 50 people.

DOJ_NMG_0127485

Another attack, on the Haraj market in Baghdad on 22 January, killed 88 people.

BBC world affairs correspondent Mike Wooldridge says the attacks on markets are widely seen as Sunni insurgent groups stepping up their activities before a new joint Iraqi-US security operation in Baghdad gets under way.

He says the fear is always that bombings like this will bring retaliation form Shia militias.

Iraq's most prominent Shia cleric, Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, made a new appeal to all Iraqis to "reject sectarian violence".

In a separate attack on Saturday, five people were killed and some 40 injured in car bomb blasts in the northern city of Kirkuk.

In the central city of Samarra, six policemen were shot dead by unidentified gunmen, police said.

Doubts Run Deep On Reforms Crucial To Bush's Iraq Strategy (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The success of the Bush administration's new Iraq strategy depends on a series of rapid and dramatic political and economic reforms that even the plan's authors have little confidence will work.

In the current go-for-broke atmosphere, administration officials say they are aware that failure to achieve the reforms would result in a repeat of last year's unsuccessful Baghdad offensive, when efforts to consolidate military gains with lasting stability on the ground did not work. This time, they acknowledge, there will be no second chance.

Among many deep uncertainties are whether Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is up to the task and committed to spearheading what the administration foresees as a fundamental realignment of Iraqi politics; whether Maliki's Shiite-dominated government and its sluggish financial bureaucracy will part with $10 billion for rapid job creation and reconstruction, at least some of it directed to sectarian opponents; and whether the U.S. military and State Department can calibrate their own stepped-up reconstruction assistance to push for action without once again taking over.

A pessimistic new National Intelligence Estimate released Friday described the Iraqi government as "hard-pressed" to achieve sectarian reconciliation, even in the unlikely event that violence diminishes. Without directly mentioning Maliki, it noted that "the absence of unifying leaders among the Arab Sunni or Shia with the capacity to speak for or exert control over their confessional groups limits prospects."

Several senior officials involved in formulating the political and economic aspects of the administration's strategy, along with a number of informed outsiders, agreed to discuss its assumptions and risks on the condition that they not be identified by name. Other sources refused to be even anonymously quoted, describing the administration as standing on the brink of an intricate combination of maneuvers whose outcome is far from assured.

The foundation of the strategy is not new -- U.S. policy since the March 2003 invasion has been to use American military might, money and know-how to foster a peaceful Iraq with a unified government and a solid economy. The strategy incorporates major elements of last year's "clear, hold and build" plan, whose "hold and build" parts never got off the ground.

Several sources expressed concern that the administration, by publicly rejecting a "containment" option -- withdrawing U.S. troops to Iraqi borders to avoid sectarian fighting while preventing outside arms and personnel from entering the country -- has not left itself a fall-back plan in the event of failure.Shift in Political Climate

The strategy's political component centers on replacing deepening Sunni-Shiite-Kurdish divides with a new delineation between "extremists" and "moderates." Moderates are defined as those of all religious and political persuasions who eschew violence in favor of safety and employment.

With the help of outside Iraq experts, the administration has compiled lists of active and still-untapped moderates around the country. "They wondered could I give them some [names] from the provinces or anywhere" from which to construct a new political base, recalled one think-tank expert called to the State Department in December. According to the intelligence estimate, however, Iraq's reservoir of such people, especially trained technocrats and entrepreneurs, has been drained as they have fled the country in droves.

As American and Iraqi combat forces focus on cooling the cauldron of violence in Baghdad, U.S. military commanders and State Department teams plan to funnel "bridge money" toward moderate designees in outer provinces and in the capital to create jobs, start businesses and revitalize moribund factories. Iraqi money would come in behind to make it all permanent.

Iraqis with physical and economic security, the thinking goes, will give their political support to the government that produces both. Closing the circle, the Iraqi government will see non-sectarian moderates as the central support for a new political coalition.

As they put the plan together, officials held heated internal debates over whether Maliki was the right man to head such an effort. Some argued in favor of engineering a new Iraqi government under Maliki's Shiite coalition partner, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), and Hakim's political stalking horse, Iraqi Vice President Adel Abdul Mahdi.

DOJ_NMG_0127486

They closely examined the makeup of Iraq's 275-seat parliament, where a no-confidence vote requires only a simple majority. Maliki's Dawa party is part of the Hakim-led United Iraqi Alliance, the largest Shiite group, with 130 seats. Making a strong case for SCIRI, some argued that the Iraqis themselves were so fed up with Maliki that a different governing coalition is possible with realigned Sunni and Kurdish elements. This view found proponents in the White House and Pentagon, and it extended into parts of the normally more cautious State Department.

Maliki, whose Dawa party holds 12 seats in the parliament, was seen as unwilling to separate voluntarily from his existing power base -- dominated by the violent and unruly Baghdad-based Jaish al-Mahdi militia, also known as the Mahdi Army, of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. With a new coalition, the Alliance would not need Sadr's 30 seats.

SCIRI's own militia, the Badr Organization, is seen as more cohesive, "an actual organization with command and control" that might be integrated into the Iraqi military, said one State Department official. The administration has charged that both the Sadr and Badr militias receive assistance from Iran. But officials regularly note that Badr forces have not attacked the U.S. military and that SCIRI has voiced equal opposition to Iranian and U.S. domination.

Other officials find that view naive, noting that evidence of Iran's involvement in Iraqi violence was found in a SCIRI compound during a raid last month.

Several officials said they believe that Hakim's backers in the Bush administration have been seduced by his forceful demeanor and Abdul Mahdi's fluent English. And while many emphasized the importance of a single, visible Iraqi leader, others have said it is a mistake to personalize the policy in one Shiite actor.

After extensive discussions last month with Maliki, Hakim and Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, the most senior Sunni in the Iraqi government, policymakers decided to place their bets on Maliki. "We judge that Maliki does not wish to fail in his role," National Intelligence Council Chairman Thomas Fingar told Congress in a tepid endorsement recently. "He has some, but not all, of the obvious requirements for success."

In any case, replacing Maliki was determined to be "too hard," in the words of one analyst. A two-thirds parliamentary majority is required to install a new prime minister, and any attempt to remove Maliki by parliamentary maneuver, it was agreed, should remain a Plan B that Iraqis themselves would undertake if he failed to produce results.

So far, Maliki has said the right things about cracking down on the sectarian violence -- including by Sadr's militia -- that is tearing Baghdad apart. But there are worrisome signs. A parliamentary session late last month in which Maliki introduced the new plan was adjourned after it erupted in sectarian squabbling in which the prime minister gave as good as he got.

Many experts believe that the administration's effort to build a new political center, supported by "moderate" Sunni allies in the region that fear Shiite Iranian expansion, such as Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt, is hopelessly outdated. "Our struggle may be between moderates and extremists," Brookings Institution scholar Martin Indyk said last month. "Their struggle is between Sunnis and Shias."New Economic Initiatives

On the economic front, where the United States has already invested more than $38 billion, the administration has asked for $538 million to keep current programs running and has proposed an additional $1.2 billion for new initiatives that it says will receive long-term Iraqi funding.

A combination of violent attacks on previous projects, sectarian favors, inefficient and overly cautious officials, and a complex bureaucracy -- much of it installed by the United States under the post-invasion Coalition Provisional Authority -- has left the Iraqi government with a significant capital surplus in each of the past several years.

Getting approval for reconstruction expenditures in the past, observed one U.S. official, has been like "pushing wet spaghetti." The surplus, which is kept in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, now totals $12.5 billion. Maliki has publicly agreed to spend $10 billion of it on reconstruction and jobs.

The State Department has sent new "tiger teams" to six Iraqi ministries to help clear away the wreckage of the past and speed financing for approved projects, and it plans to double to 20 the number of U.S.-staffed provisional reconstruction teams in Baghdad and around the country.

In addition to Foreign Service officers, experts including small-business advisers and camel veterinarians are being recruited from the U.S. Agriculture Department and elsewhere to staff the teams, the State Department's Iraq coordinator, David Satterfield, told Congress last week.

Former Foreign Service officer Timothy M. Carney, who worked in Iraq in 2003, has been appointed to coordinate the U.S. and Iraqi bureaucracies, to get the Iraqi government's money moving and to make sure that Iraqi funding priorities coincide with the administration's.

DOJ_NMG_0127487

But some officials worry that the expanded U.S. presence will repeat the mistakes of the past -- when the United States oversaw virtually every part of the Iraqi government -- and undermine the goal of turning the country over to the Iraqis themselves.

"It's the same old problem as in 2003," cautioned one official. "The same impatience that if they can't do it we'll step in and do it. There is a bit of that creeping into this dialogue."

With Rumsfeld Gone, Critics Of War Look To Rice (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3 — For six years, first as national security adviser and then as secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice worked under the cover of a very effective shield: Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was the administration's lightning rod for criticism over its handling of Iraq.

But in recent weeks, with Mr. Rumsfeld gone, Ms. Rice has faced increased, and somewhat unfamiliar, criticism. At a Senate hearing on Jan. 11, she confronted a wall of opposition from Republicans as well as Democrats. During hearings this week on Iraq, several of her predecessors were pointed in their disapproval of her job performance.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III took issue with Ms. Rice's refusal to engage Syria diplomatically. Back in his day, he told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, "We practiced diplomacy full time, and it paid off."

This week, Senators Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, and John McCain, Republican of Arizona, released three letters demanding that Ms. Rice make public the administration's requirements for actions to be taken by the Iraqi government to earn continued American support. Along with the letters, and Ms. Rice's reply — which indicated that the Iraqis had already missed most of the benchmarks — the senators also released an irate statement.

"Secretary Rice finally provided a response" to the senators' repeated requests, the statement said. "What Secretary Rice's letter makes abundantly clear is that the administration does not intend to attach meaningful consequences for the Iraqis continuing to fail to meet their commitments."

And on Jan. 20, The Economist published an editorial titled "The Falling Star of Condoleezza Rice."

"Condoleezza Rice," it said, "is not the woman she once was."

Ms. Rice rarely becomes flustered — she bristles whenever reporters ask her how she "feels" about anything — and her aides maintain that she has taken the criticism in stride. But the Jan. 11 hearing clearly took its toll. "Let's just say it was a bad day and leave it at that," one senior State Department official said. The next day, Ms. Rice hit back at Senator Barbara Boxer, the California Democrat, who said Ms. Rice did not pay a personal price for the war because she had no immediate family members serving in Iraq.

"I thought it was O.K. to be single," Ms. Rice said. "I thought it was O.K. to not have children, and I thought you could still make good decisions on behalf of the country if you were single and didn't have children."

Despite her role at the heart of the Iraq war from its beginnings, Ms. Rice had, thus far, avoided the public pillorying that Mr. Rumsfeld received. She has repeatedly had the highest approval ratings of anyone in the administration, and she continues to earn approval ratings that are substantially higher than her boss's.

In particular, as secretary of state, Ms. Rice has been treated like a celebrity, appearing on Vanity Fair's best-dressed list and in an article in the November issue of Vogue. There are Web sites devoted to persuading her to run for president — www.draftcondi.us says her nomination "would be the greatest political move of the century" — and a blog obsessed with her personal style: <></> includes a Rice "hairdo alert system," and on Jan. 29 it posted a photograph of an Italian designer's gown that features Ms. Rice's face.

But as the Bush administration's overall foreign policy has come under fire, and other senior officials have left the administration, Ms. Rice is starting to take the heat previously reserved for Mr. Rumsfeld.

"Before, nobody assigned her the kind of ownership or authorship over the administration's policy — she did get something of a pass," said Michael A. McFaul, a political science professor at Stanford who knows Ms. Rice. "Now, there aren't that many officials still around, and she's much more exposed."

Kenneth M. Pollack, a research director at the Brookings Institution, said: "It is no longer the case that Rumsfeld is the administration bad guy. People will look much harder at Condi's role now, and Iraq is really going to rest on her shoulders."

In the past, most of the criticism has come from the left. But now the disapproval has spread, and Republicans are joining in. The starkest example came on Jan. 11, when Ms. Rice faced a room full of skeptics as she defended, before a Senate panel, President Bush's new Iraq strategy. "You're going to have to do a much better job" explaining the rationale for the war, Senator George V. Voinovich, Republican of Ohio, told her, adding that the administration could no longer count on his support.

DOJ_NMG_0127488

The censure continued this week during three days of rare Senate testimony from a cadre of Ms. Rice's predecessors. While the former secretaries of state and national security advisers — Mr. Baker, Henry A. Kissinger, Madeleine K. Albright, Brent Scowcroft and Zbigniew Brzezinski — were diplomatic in their critiques of the administration's foreign policy, all left the impression that as America's top diplomat, Ms. Rice was not engaging in real diplomacy.

"That's what we hire a secretary of state for, not to sit there and proclaim categorical statements, but to engage in the process," said Mr. Brzezinski, President Jimmy Carter's national security adviser.

Mr. Kissinger and Ms. Albright both sounded a similar note. Mr. Kissinger, while giving lukewarm support to the administration, said America should always be ready to negotiate with Iran and Syria, while Ms. Albright added that "one gains by communicating with countries with which one disagrees."

Ms. Rice's mentor, Mr. Scowcroft, who was national security adviser to President Gerald R. Ford and the first President Bush, called the troop increase a "tactic, not a strategy."

Ms. Rice remains extraordinarily close to the president — she spends time at Camp David and in Texas with Mr. Bush and his wife — and friends said that relationship was a source of comfort to her.

The criticism of Ms. Rice has yet to reach the decibel level of that directed against Mr. Rumsfeld, and it may never get to that point, in part because she is not highhanded in her behavior toward colleagues and underlings, her close friends and aides said. Mr. Rumsfeld was heavily criticized by Democrats, and eventually, Republicans, but he also received a lot of disapproval from people who worked with him and for him at the Pentagon and in the administration.

Mr. Rice has yet to inspire that level of exasperation from colleagues, either from inside the State Department or the National Security Council. "Whatever harping you may find, you won't find the same kind of internal dissent" which Mr. Rumsfeld provoked, said Philip D. Zelikow, the State Department's former counselor and a close friend of Ms. Rice. "She'll occasionally have a tart thing to say, but she's not one of those people who wrings their hands and worries incessantly about their press."

But she sometimes does take criticism personally. Last fall, she telephoned President Bush's father, who employed her on his National Security Council in the early 1990s, after Bob Woodward's book "State of Denial" reported that the elder Mr. Bush had said that she had been a "disappointment" and "not up to the job."

The former president told Larry King on CNN that Ms. Rice "called me and said, 'There's something in this book.' " He denied that he called her a disappointment. "I guess there were some hurt feelings," he said.

Japan's FM Calls US Operation In Iraq 'Naive' (AFP)

AFP, February 4, 2007

Japan's foreign minister has criticised the US occupation of Iraq as "very naive" and blamed it for spiralling unrest there, in another swipe at US tactics by the key Washington ally.

Taro Aso said in Kyoto that then-US Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- now replaced -- "started off the war, but the operation after the occupation was very naive."

"Because this operation did not work well, it (Iraq) is in trouble now," he said, quoted by Jiji Press.

"It became clear that the operation after a war is very important when you think about peace-building."

Aso's comments came on the day a suicide bomber blew up his Mercedes truck in a Baghdad market, killing at least 130 people and injuring hundreds, in the second deadliest attack since the US-led invasion of 2003.

They follow those by Japanese Defence Minister Fumio Kyuma who has made a series of critical comments about US policies.

Last month Kyuma said US President George W. Bush was wrong to invade Iraq and warned that Tokyo might not automatically renew its air force mission to the war-torn country.

That rebuke from one of Washington's closest foreign allies came just hours after an embattled Bush had used his annual State of the Union speech to plead for public support to send more troops to Iraq.

The White House last month announced that 21,500 extra US troops would be sent to Iraq in a bid to rein in the violence.

Kyuma also has criticised Rumsfeld, saying that "he was too bullish on the conditions in Iraq" and called the US decision to invade "premature".

Prime Minister Shinzo Abe has insisted Japan will continue supporting Iraq, however.

Japan was a staunch backer of the Iraq invasion. Former premier Junichiro Koizumi, a close friend of Bush, took the landmark step of deploying Japanese troops to Iraq.

Tokyo ended the troop mission in July but has kept its air force engaged in transporting goods and personnel to the war-torn country.

No I-Told-You-Sos (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0127489

By Lynne Duke

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Sweet vindication. Who wouldn't want it? To be right. To be free of criticism and upheld by evidence, by actual proof, that one's predictions about a controversial war were correct.

It is the culture of this town -- trafficking in rightness. People clamor day in and day out, in that polished and politic way of the Washingtonian, to be proved right.

But on Iraq, the vindicated are pained. There is no gloating -- not with thousands of people dead, Americans and Iraqis; not with the Iraq war precipitating an ongoing foreign policy crisis that has left the United States' global image in tatters.

For people who were pilloried, penalized or warned to be careful because of their opposition to a powerful president's war, vindication is nothing to celebrate. It is a victory most bitter.

"Emotionally, it's a very traumatic and unhappy outcome." That is retired Army Lt. Gen. William E. Odom, head of the National Security Agency under President Ronald Reagan. "How can you be happy about being right about the disaster that's been created?"

It weighs on him.

"Vindication is not pleasing," he says. "Even some of my friends have noted: the more vindicated I've been, the more irritable I become."

Back before the war even began, Odom said its aims were wrong. He criticized the doctrine of preemption, said al-Qaeda had nothing to do with Iraq and predicted that democracy could scarcely take hold there. A year after the war began, he was quoted calling it a failure -- and heard soon thereafter that he'd been dubbed a Benedict Arnold for his views. To dissent, back then, was risky. Not like now, when the conventional wisdom about the conflict has made a U-turn in a political climate where anger over the war toppled the majority party in Congress. The president sounded almost plaintive in his State of the Union address, saying, "This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in."

Lots of people predicted things would turn out this way. They are military brass and lawmakers and foreign policy intellectuals, the kind of wise ones whose counsel is routinely sought and respected. In the run-up to this war, their concerns carried no weight against a swelling of patriotism, a backdrop of fear and an administration determined to oust Saddam Hussein. Their warnings that Iraq had nothing to do with the attacks of Sept. 11 were ignored. Worse, some were shunned and scolded.

As president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Jessica Tuchman Matthews, raised hard prewar questions about the looming Iraq engagement. They predicted Iraq would become a long occupation and recruiting tool for al-Qaeda and would damage U.S. relations with the Muslim world. And: No weapons of mass destruction would be found.

One day back then, one of Matthews's colleagues ran into an acquaintance on the street, and that acquaintance warned: " 'What is your boss doing? Nobody at Carnegie is ever going to get through another Senate confirmation.' " And Matthews was herself admonished by a colleague at another think tank, who told her: "You're going to make Carnegie irrelevant. The war's going to happen and you ought to have Carnegie working on the after-war rather than on 'we shouldn't go to war.' "

Amid what she calls the "seemingly inexorable roll" toward war, the clear message was "you better get on the bandwagon or you'll never be taken seriously in this town again."

Instead, she looks like an accurate prognosticator. But, "you can't take any pleasure in having been right," says Matthews, "because this is a catastrophe for the United States and people are dying and didn't have to die, and it's going to take us years and years and years to dig out of this, and it's been a catastrophe for the Iraqi people."

Also repudiated were people who supported the war but diverged from the official administration line. Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, then the Army's chief of staff, was sharply rebuffed in early 2003 for publicly saying that several hundred thousand U.S. troops would be needed to keep the peace in Baghdad.

Now, as President Bush seeks additional troops for Iraq, it is widely agreed that the war was indeed prosecuted with too few troops -- a seeming vindication for Shinseki, though he did not respond to an e-mail seeking comment.

Vindication is a difficult and complex concept and one that has to be considered with many caveats, such as those presented by Zbigniew Brzezinski when asked if he felt vindicated.

"If vindication was accompanied by a sense that America is likely to undo the damage they have done and can dis-embarrass itself of the tragic involvement, then my answer would be yes."

But Brzezinski, former national security adviser under President Jimmy Carter, scarcely believes such course corrections will happen.

He opposed Bush's doctrine of preemption and assessed the war policy as one that "was propelled forward by mendacity." He spoke out before and during the war, and he believes his criticisms began to sting as the war began to falter. As a result, he says, he was ultimately shut out of high-level Defense and State Department briefings he had often attended and was publicly upbraided by a foreign policy peer.

Despite the broad sea change in opinion among the political and policy class, Brzezinski's sense of vindication has its limits, he says, because "I have the feeling that the president's team is hellbent on digging itself in more deeply and if it does not succeed in Iraq some of its wilder policymakers seem to be eager to enlarge the scope of the war to Iran."

"I'm saddened," he said, "because I think it's doing terrible harm to America. But more than being sad, which is an emotion, I'm worried."

From Afghanistan to Iraq to Iran? Could this scenario actually play out? It is, among the vindicated, not at all absurd, for official Washington's sights have turned to Iran with "the same signs, a very similar drumbeat" as that which preceded the war in Iraq, says Rep. Barbara Lee (D-Calif.).

Lee saw it coming -- not Iran, but Iraq. Back in September 2001, days after the terror attacks, she saw the broadly worded congressional resolution authorizing President Bush to use force to fight terrorism as giving him a dangerous degree of carte blanche.

That early resolution allowed the president to "use all necessary and appropriate force against those nations, organizations, or persons he determines planned, authorized, committed or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on Sept. 11, 2001, or harbored such organizations or persons, in order to prevent any future acts of international terrorism against the United States by such nations, organizations or persons."

It is language that haunts her still.

"I said then it was giving the administration a blank check to use in perpetuity," Lee says. "If you read that resolution, it's very clear that it was the beginning of a march to war."

She voted against that resolution -- the only member of Congress to do so -- and then took the barbs.

"It was a very tough period," she says. "To call me unpatriotic was the lowest of the low," especially considering that her father, an Army lieutenant colonel, served for 25 years and saw duty in World War II and Korea.

Now, she says, people are eager to tell her she was right. But "it's not about feeling vindicated," she says.

"I want people to understand that this is a very dangerous foreign policy, the administration's foreign and military policy is very dangerous, that the notion of preemptive war is very dangerous and that we need to support more rational approaches to our foreign and military policy."

Lee, like Odom and many others, is calling for the war to end. They are strange bedfellows -- she, a progressive liberal; he, a usually hawkish conservative.

For months, Odom, a senior fellow at the Hudson Institute, has been pushing a "cut and run" policy. He even wrote a piece in the Los Angeles Times in October headlined "How to Cut and Run," in which he wrote, "We must cut and run tactically in order to succeed strategically."

He advocates troop withdrawal coupled with a diplomatic engagement with Iraq's neighbors, especially Iran, with whom the United States actually has common interests, nukes notwithstanding.

Retired Marine Gen. Anthony Zinni, formerly the top U.S. military man in the Middle East, started where Odom started -- in opposition to the war. Zinni argued that going into Iraq would destabilize the region and distract from the fight against al-Qaeda.

For his opposition, he says he was accused by some fellow officers of having political motivations and was disinvited from attending meetings at the Joint Forces Command, where he'd been a regular as a senior mentor for more junior officers.

But he diverges from most early critics of the war, because he now is arguing that withdrawing from Iraq would destabilize the region. Instead, he says, a new strategic framework for the war is needed -- something far broader than the increase Bush has proposed, which Zinni calls a "half-step."

"It's breaking my heart, watching it," he says of the war. "I was praying somehow I'd be wrong, but in my heart of hearts I knew it would happen this way -- the bad decision-making, the insufficient troops."

Congress now is mulling varying resolutions on the war, but Zinni complains that "the debate is wrong. I think Congress is debating the arrangement of the deck chairs on the Titanic."

But the ship, he argues, doesn't have to go down.

As the debate now centers on what can be salvaged from the U.S. engagement in Iraq, a cynical Washington exercise is underway, some of the vindicated say. It's a snake-like shedding of skin, a policy metamorphosis in which people who once were prominent cheerleaders for the war now are cozying up with the war's early opponents and distancing themselves from their earlier roles.

Matthews has seen it and fears it may warp the crucial debates about the way forward in Iraq and toward Iran.

"So many of the people who were wrong have gone on to being very visible pundits without ever admitting how wrong they were," Matthews says.

Brzezinski says there are some people -- and he's talking "outside of the administration, of course" -- who have embraced his positions in the oddest and most disingenuous way.

DOJ_NMG_0127491

They say "that they are happy to have associated themselves with these views . . . ," Brzezinski says. "That is the funny part, because you meet people who say, 'Oh, I was with you all along.' "

Under Bush's Pillow (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Dick Cheney as Lord Voldemort?

A reader named Melissa S. e-mailed to say that she explains Iraq policy to her 8-year-old son in terms of Harry Potter characters: "Dick Cheney is Lord Voldemort. George W. Bush is Peter Pettigrew." Don Rumsfeld is Lucius Malfoy, while Cornelius Fudge represents administration supporters who deny that anything is wrong. And, she concludes, "Daily Prophet reporter Rita Skeeter is Fox News."

That was one of the 400 comments from readers offering literary or historical parallels to the Bush administration and Iraq. One of the most commonly cited was Xenophon's ancient warning, in "Anabasis," of how much easier it is to get into a Middle Eastern war than out.

As a reader named John H. summarized "Anabasis": "Ten thousand Greek mercenaries march from Greece to Iran to effect regime change (unseat one emperor and establish his younger brother). They win the first few battles (cakewalk, mission accomplished) but then the younger brother is killed."

So the invaders found themselves without an effective prime minister to hand power to, yet they were stuck deep inside enemy territory. Xenophon's subtext is how the slog of war corrodes soldiers and allows them to do terrible things. Xenophon is particularly pained when recounting a massacre that was the Haditha of its day.

The readers who sent in comments were responding to a column I wrote last month arguing that President Bush is inadvertently a fine education president, because he breathes new life into the classics. Thucydides' account of the failed "surge" in the Sicilian expedition 2,400 years ago is newly relevant, and "Moby Dick" is interesting reading today as a bracing warning of the dangers of an obsessive adventure that casts aside all rules. (You can submit your own favorite literary or historical parallel at nytimes.com/ontheground.)

Perhaps I'm cherry-picking from the classics to support my own opposition to a "surge" in Iraq. In writing this column, I wondered what classics Mr. Bush's supporters would cite to argue for his strategy. Shakespeare's "Henry V"? "Hamlet"?

Yet frankly, it's difficult to find great literature that encourages rulers to invade foreign lands, to escalate when battles go badly, to scorn critics, to be cocksure of themselves in the face of adversity. The themes of the classics tend to be the opposite.

Literature and history invariably counsel doubt and skepticism — even when you think you see Desdemona's infidelity with your own eyes, you don't; even when your advisers are telling you "it's a slam-dunk," it's not. The classics have an overwhelmingly cautionary bias, operating as a check on any impulsive rush to war.

Perhaps that is because, as Foreign Policy argues in its most recent issue, humans have an ingrained psychological tilt to hawkishness. In many ways, the authors note, human decision-making tends to err in ways that magnify conflict and make it difficult to climb down from confrontation.

My hunch is that the classics resonate in part because they are an antidote to that human frailty; literature has generated so many warnings about hubris in part to save us from ourselves.

Eastern classics have that same purpose of trying to tame and restrain us. The central theme of Chinese philosophy is the need for moderation, and Sun Tzu's famous "Art of War" advises generals on how to win without fighting. (Sun Tzu and Julius Caesar alike also appreciated the diplomatic benefits of treating enemy prisoners well; they would be appalled by Abu Ghraib and Guantánamo.)

So Mr. Bush should resolve that for every hour he spends with Mr. Cheney, he will spend another curled up with classical authors like Sophocles. "Antigone," for example, tells of King Creon, a good man who wants the best for his people — and yet ignores public opinion, refuses to admit error, goes double or nothing with his bets, and is slow to adapt to changing circumstance.

Creon's son pleads with his father to be less rigid. The trees that bend survive the seasons, he notes, while those that are inflexible are blown over and destroyed.

Americans today yearn for the same kind of wise leadership that the ancient Greeks did: someone with the wisdom to adjust course, to acknowledge error, to listen to critics, to show compassion as well as strength, to discern moral nuance as well as moral clarity. Alexander the Great used to sleep with the "Iliad" under his pillow; maybe Mr. Bush should try "Antigone."

Oh, and for Mrs. Bush? How about Aristophanes' "Lysistrata"?

Coalition Phases In Iraqi Sailors (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0127492

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

Khawr Al Amaya Oil Terminal, Persian Gulf — Every morning on this aging metal hulk, an Iraqi naval officer reads the weather report over the radio so it can be heard by dozens of civilian boats.

It's a job that used to be done by an American sailor.

Here and elsewhere in the Persian Gulf off Iraq's shores, Iraqis are gradually taking over jobs once done by U.S. Marines and sailors. They stand guard on terminals such as this one, which is often compared to the bizarre structures of the movie "Waterworld."

At the port of Umm al Qasr, Iraqis are lectured by U.S. Navy and Coast Guard personnel and British Royal Navy sailors on the techniques of boarding ships, quizzing often hostile crews and searching for contraband and weapons. Some Iraqi sailors participate in inspections with U.S., British and Australian sailors.

It is a slow process for a nation whose navy was destroyed in the early hours of the 2003 assault led by the United States.

"In 2003 we destroyed anything that floated," said Marine Maj. Gen. Carl Jensen, commander of a coalition task force assigned to guard terminals. "So we're trying literally to bring the Iraqi navy back from the grave."

The Khawr al Amaya terminal, and a second facility a few miles away, lie about 60 miles from Iraq and 12 miles from Iran. Together, they provide more than 95% of the Iraqi government's income.

The oil terminals have long been points of friction between Iran and Iraq, leading to several battles during their war. "This place has been shot to hell," said Jensen, walking the 1,000-yard length of the Khawr Al Amaya terminal.

U.S. military sources say the Iranians spy on the terminals from a sunken construction crane and that Iranian patrol boats are a frequent sight.

Tankers arrive daily to fill up with crude oil and depart for refineries around the globe. Disrupting the terminals could sink the Iraqi government's hopes of rebuilding its country.

"This is the economic anchor for Iraq," said Navy Capt. Chris Noble. "We need to guard that anchor."

Cmdr. Jaimie Hatcher, captain of the Australian frigate Toowoomba, puts it in what he calls Australian vernacular: "This mission is bloody important."

Insurgents made a bold assault on the terminals in 2004 but were repelled. Two U.S. sailors and a Coast Guardsman were killed.

Now, a dozen ships ring the terminals to thwart attacks on the hundreds of ships that transit this part of the gulf: fishermen, merchants, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and even a few pirates. A 2.5-mile perimeter is kept around the terminals.

Newly arrived coalition sailors are lectured on the 2004 attack.

"It's not like everybody out here is trying to kill us," Lt. Cmdr. Cesar Rios told a group of Australian sailors last month. "But we have to be aware of what is normal."

In recent months, the Navy has tried to make its presence more friendly to passing ships and their captains. By having an Iraqi read the weather report, the U.S. hopes to encourage those captains to report anything suspicious on the water.

"Think of it as the 1950s cop on the beat in a complicated neighborhood. If you can establish trust, things will work out better," Noble said.

For the fishermen, the coalition sailors have a message: An attack on the oil terminals could cause a disastrous oil spill. "We make it real to them," said Ensign Lisa Green. "They need to know we're here protecting the oil terminals so your fertile fishing grounds remain fertile."

Some of the Iraqi officers are veterans of the Iraqi navy. Many of the enlisted are new recruits.

"They're learning as they go, but they're definitely getting better," said Coast Guard Lt. j.g. Kristopher Ensley, executive officer of the cutter Aquidneck.

U.S. officials say Iraq's navy faces the same challenge as its army: changing a top-down style that does not encourage leadership in the enlisted ranks.

"The way they once worked, if you weren't the guy in charge, you weren't anything," said Lt. Aaron Bergman. "They're finally realizing that if you break into smaller units, you can be more effective."

Iraqi oil workers live aboard the terminals, as do U.S. personnel. Six months ago, the U.S. Navy docked a three-story barge at Khawr al Amaya to provide quarters and a chow hall.

Duty in the winter can be pleasant. During the summer it is brutal. Temperatures soar above 120 degrees. "The metal grates get so hot it will melt your shoes," Bergman said.

The U.S. ships are part of the 5th Fleet, based in Bahrain. The smaller craft, such as the 170-foot patrol boats, are permanently based in the gulf, but larger ones, such as the aircraft carriers and their escorts, are assigned from the Pacific and Atlantic fleets.

DOJ_NMG_0127493

No one is putting a timetable on when the U.S. can withdraw from the terminals. The Iraqi navy has only half a dozen small boats; it has about 1,000 personnel but hopes to have 2,000 next year.

Security Contracts To Continue In Iraq (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The Defense Department plans to continue hiring private contractors to provide security at reconstruction projects in Iraq and to train U.S. and Iraqi military officers in counterinsurgency, despite problems with past contracts for such jobs that traditionally have been done by military personnel.

The contracting out of these wartime activities comes at a time when the United States is stretching its resources to provide the additional 21,500 troops in Iraq that are needed under President Bush's new strategy, which involves stepped-up counterinsurgency operations in Baghdad and the expansion of economic reconstruction activities.

During an appearance before the Senate Armed Services Committee last month, Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new top commander in Iraq, said he counts the "thousands of contract security forces" among the assets available to him to supplement the limited number of U.S. and Iraqi troops to be used for dealing with the insurgency.

A former senior Defense Intelligence Agency expert on the Middle East, retired Army Col. W. Patrick Lang, said last week that contracting out intelligence collection and security for Army units and their contractors "results from actual military forces being too small." He added: "I can't remember a subordinate commander considering mercenaries as part of his forces."

Retired Marine Gen. Anthony C. Zinni, who once headed the U.S. Central Command and today serves on an advisory board of a defense contractor, said there is a role for private firms taking on security missions. But he warned that problems can arise "when they take on quasi-military roles."

Aegis Defence Services Ltd., a British security firm, has about 1,000 employees in Iraq, about 250 of them Iraqis, under a $300 million contract that began in 2004.

Under that contract, which is up for rebidding, Aegis provides security support services to U.S. Army Corps of Engineers personnel working on reconstruction projects throughout the country. Among its tasks is the operation of six Reconstruction Operations Centers, which disseminate threat warning information and track convoys.

Aegis also coordinates security in Iraq for 10 prime contractors and their subcontractors through security liaison teams, and the teams pass on to the military information gathered by their sources.

Aegis provides about 300 guards to Corps of Engineers facilities in Iraq, along with personal security escort teams for Corps personnel and contractors when they travel to such sites. The firm also provides the reconstruction liaison teams that travel the country to get updates on projects and information about local communities.

In 2005, the U.S. special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction investigated the Aegis contract and found a number of shortcomings. Among them was that Aegis did not vet all of its Iraqi employees for security, as required.

A sample check of the personnel records of 20 of 125 Iraqi nationals then on the payroll found no evidence of an interview for six, no evidence of a police background check on 18 and no records at all on two. "As a result, there is no assurance that the Iraqi national employees do not pose an internal security threat," the inspection report said.

In response, Aegis managers said Iraqi police checks were too difficult to obtain, given the destruction of past records. The requirement was dropped. The report also said that the company agreed that Iraqis would be vetted through the State Department system. The inspection report said that, as of April 2005, only 17 of the "last" 213 Iraqis hired had been vetted through that system. Aegis employees include foreign nationals, among whom are Gurkhas from Nepal, and all must be vetted.

Under the new contract now out for bids, the winner is to monitor all convoys, maintain a Web site, provide "Iraq-wide unclassified daily reports," as well as "provide relevant and timely intel/ops reports throughout Iraq" -- referring to intelligence/operations reports.

The U.S. government will provide about 134 vehicles, primarily sport-utility vehicles, but also armored personnel carriers. The government will also furnish weapons and ammunition, but the contractor must identify the people to whom the weapons will be issued. Employees will have access to government dining facilities and post exchanges, "where available," and will be entitled to "acute medical and dental services to include medical evacuation under emergency circumstances . . . at no cost" while they are "in theater."

Another contract up for bids is the operation of the Counterinsurgency Center for Excellence (COIN CFE) for up to three years at Camp Taji, north of Baghdad, in a section called the Phoenix Academy, which is devoted to joint U.S.-Iraqi training. Established in 2005 by Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commander of Multi-National Force-Iraq then, it will now operate under Petraeus, who recently rewrote the Army's counterinsurgency manual.

DOJ_NMG_0127494

Last May, a Pentagon news release said COIN CFE, which involves U.S. and Iraqi personnel, was established "to help units adapt to and train for the war against terror in Iraq as it is fought today." At that time, it was a week-long course with 31 trainers and classes with about 40 trainees, including "brigade commanders, battalion commanders, company commanders and senior staff -- including noncommissioned officers," the news release said.

Under the new proposal, contractors will handle a variety of classes, including a special seminar for "general officers and senior field grade leaders at the multi-national corps and division levels." The group for senior leaders will be limited to 25, while the lower-level classes will include up to 70 students and will involve not just Iraqi army forces but also Iraqi National Police.

Lang, a former Green Beret who worked in counterinsurgency in the post-Vietnam War period, said the need to set up a counterinsurgency school in Iraq and rewrite the textbook showed that the Army had dropped that subject matter altogether during the 1980s and the 1990s. "The old doctrine died out, along with the lessons of East Africa, Vietnam and Bolivia," he said, "and now they need people with this kind of memory who are retired and know from experience."

War In Iraq Propelling A Massive Migration (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

AMMAN, Jordan -- Inside his cold, crumbling apartment, Saad Ali teeters on the fringes of life. Once a popular singer in his native Baghdad, he is now unemployed. To pay his $45 monthly rent, he borrows from friends. To bathe, he boils water on a tiny heater. He sleeps on a frayed mattress, under a tattered blanket.

Outside, Ali, 35, avoids police officers and disguises his Arabic with a Jordanian dialect. He returns home before 10 p.m. to stay clear of government checkpoints. Like hundreds of thousands of Iraqi refugees here, he fears being deported. Six months ago, near his home in Baghdad, two men threatened to kill him. Singing romantic songs, they said, was un-Islamic.

So when his pride hits a new low, he remembers that day.

"Despite all the hardships I face here, it is better than going back to Baghdad," said Ali, long-faced with a sharp chin, who wore a thick red sweat shirt and rubbed his hands to keep warm. "They will behead me. What else can I do? I have no choice."

As the fourth year of war nears its end, the Middle East's largest refugee crisis since the Palestinian exodus from Israel in 1948 is unfolding in a climate of fear, persecution and tragedy.

Nearly 2 million Iraqis -- about 8 percent of the prewar population -- have embarked on a desperate migration, mostly to Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, according to the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. The refugees include large numbers of doctors, academics and other professionals vital for Iraq's recovery. Another 1.7 million have been forced to move to safer towns and villages inside Iraq, and as many as 50,000 Iraqis a month flee their homes, the U.N. agency said in January.

The rich began trickling out of Iraq as conditions deteriorated under U.N. sanctions in the 1990s, their flight growing in the aftermath of the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. Now, as the violence worsens, increasing numbers of poor Iraqis are on the move, aid officials say. To flee, Iraqis sell their possessions, raid their savings and borrow money from relatives. They ride buses or walk across terrain riddled with criminals and Sunni insurgents, preferring to risk death over remaining in Iraq.

The United Nations is struggling to find funding to assist Iraqi refugees. Fewer than 500 have been resettled in the United States since the invasion. Aid officials and human rights activists say the United States and other Western nations are focused on reconstructing Iraq while ignoring the war's human fallout.

"It's probably political," said Janvier de Riedmatten, U.N. refugee agency representative for Iraq, referring to the reason why the world hasn't helped Iraq's refugees.

"The Iraq story has to be a success story," he said.

For decades, Jordan welcomed refugees. Roughly a third of its 5.9 million residents are Palestinian refugees. According to the United Nations, 500,000 to 700,000 Iraqi refugees live in Jordan, but aid officials say the actual number is nearer to 1 million because many Iraqis live under the radar. Jordan's tolerance has waned, however, since a group of Iraqis bombed three hotels in November 2005, killing 60 people, according to Iraqis, aid officials and human rights groups. The government fears that Iraq's mostly Sunni Arab refugees could remain in the country permanently or become recruits for Iraq's insurgency.

Now, the exodus is generating friction and anger across the region, while straining basic services in already poor countries. Iraqis are blamed for driving up prices and taking away scarce jobs. Iraq's neighbors worry the new refugees will carry in Iraq's sectarian strife.

"The Jordan government does not want to encourage Iraqis to stay for a long time," said Gaby Daw, project officer for the Catholic charity Caritas Internationalis, one of the few aid agencies assisting Iraqi refugees.

Into their new havens, Iraqis are bringing their culture and way of life, gradually reshaping the face of the Arab world. But the cost of escape is high. Feeding the bitterness of exile is a sense that outside forces created their plight. Many Iraqis here view the U.S.-led invasion that ousted President Saddam Hussein as the root of their woes.

DOJ_NMG_0127495

"We were promised a kind of heaven on earth," said Rabab Haider, who fled Baghdad last year. "But we've been given a real hell."Sad Goodbyes

The road out of Iraq begins on Salhiye Street in Baghdad.

On Jan. 13, knots of Iraqis waited to board 14 buses to Syria. Inside a travel agency, Raghed Moyed, 23, sat solemnly with her 12-year-old brother, Amar. It had become too dangerous for her to attend college, so she was heading to Damascus to continue her education. As she sat, her head bowed, she recalled the previous night, when she bade farewell to her friends.

"It's really sad," said Moyed, her voice cracking as tears slid down her face. "I cried the whole way from the house to here. I don't want to leave Iraq, but it is hard to stay."

Sameer Humfash, the travel agent, watched her cry. By his estimate, 50 to 60 families were fleeing each day on the buses lined up outside. Nowadays, Iraqis were heading mostly to Syria, he said.

"They are not letting Iraqis in at the Jordanian border," interrupted Ahmed Khudair, one of Humfash's employees.

Humfash makes all his passengers sign waiver forms that read: "I am traveling on my own responsibility and God is the only one that protects us." On the roads to both Jordan and Syria, Sunni insurgents have dragged Shiites from buses and executed them. Humfash stays in radio contact every hour with the bus driver, usually a Syrian. He always asks three questions, he said:

"How is the road?"

"Did they take any passengers?"

"Did they hurt any passengers?"Angst at the Border

Along the Iraq-Jordan border Jan. 16, a brisk wind howled across the barren landscape. It was 1:45 p.m. Until recently, hundreds of cars and buses filled with Iraqis would have been lined up to enter Jordan. On this day, there were four vehicles. A Jordanian border security official said many Iraqis were afraid to travel through Anbar province, one of Iraq's most violent regions.

Abu Hussam al-Khaisy, an Iraqi taxi driver, offered another explanation. The day before he had brought a family of seven Iraqis to the border, but Jordanian officials, he said, denied them admission with no explanation.

"They are not giving permission to enter because they are scared about security," said Khaisy at a restaurant in Ruwayshid, a Jordanian rest stop about 55 miles from the border. In other instances, he said, officials have turned away young Iraqi men who could take jobs away from Jordanians.

Today, the government is making it increasingly difficult for Iraqis to reside legally in Jordan. It views Iraqis as temporary visitors, not refugees, and has not sought international assistance. Human rights activists and U.N. officials have accused Jordan of shutting its border to many Iraqis fleeing persecution and deporting others.

Nasir Judah, a government spokesman, said Jordan has kept its door open to Iraqis even as they have become a burden on Jordan's economy and natural resources. In recent years, the influx was largely unregulated, but now tighter security measures are needed, he said. Iraqis, he added, have tried to enter Jordan using fake passports and identity cards.

"There are no mass deportations of Iraqis," Judah said. "Otherwise the numbers would be dwindling, and they are not."

On this day, Khaisy was driving Abu Wisam al-Azzawi, 35, back to Baqubah, a city about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Two months ago, members of Azzawi's immediate family were refused entry into Jordan, even though he owned a car dealership in Amman. Azzawi still remembers his son, on the Iraq side of the border, pleading through the cellphone: "Daddy, don't leave us."

Now, he was planning to fetch them from Baqubah and take them to Syria.

"I haven't told my family I am coming back," said Azzawi, before getting into Khaisy's maroon Caprice Classic in Ruwayshid. "Maybe I am not going to see them."

"Maybe I will get killed on the road."Seeking Safety, Aid

Outside the restaurant, two sport-utility vehicles passed by, heading to Amman. One, with large red-checkered bags on its roof, carried Abu Saif al-Ajrami's family. The other vehicle carried their life's possessions.

The Jordanians let them in after the family waited more than 24 hours at the border. It helped that Ajrami's father was Jordanian. At night, they arrived in Amman near a place refugees call Iraq Square, where taxis drop off recent arrivals. Two relatives, whom the family had not seen in five years, met them. There were hugs and kisses, and praises to God.

"I feel psychologically relieved. You can see it is very safe," said Ajrami, waving his hands at the cars flowing by. "But I have left my family, friends, my neighbors, my memories back in Baghdad. The first day there is security, I will go back."

Then he declared he would find a job the next day. "From the border to here, we felt like we had entered paradise," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127496

Widad Shakur, 53, said that when she arrived in Amman in October, she felt the same way. A Shiite Muslim, she fled after Sunni extremists threatened to behead her daughter, a teacher. But Iraq's chaos is never far away. A week ago, Shakur learned that a Sunni family had occupied her house. Now, she cannot sleep at night.

And she cannot afford to return to Iraq. Her daughter, a saleswoman, earns barely $300 a month, half of which goes to their rent. "I wish I was a bird and I could fly back to my house," said Shakur, as tears welled in her eyes.

"Who expected it would turn out like this -- Sunni against Shia?" she continued. "We were like brothers. Why is this happening?"

She has a more pressing problem. Her legs hurt, she said. But she cannot afford a doctor. She worries that seeking help at a Jordanian hospital might lead to deportation, even though she has a three-month residency permit.

"I don't know whether we have the right to go to it or not," said Shakur, who wore a black, sequined head scarf. "I am afraid to go there."

At the Royal Association for Iraq Immigrants, Salah al-Samarai had 28 pink and yellow folders stacked on his desk. They belonged to Iraqis in need of surgeries.

"I don't know what to do," said Samarai, the head of the nonprofit that helps Iraqis, as visitors waited outside his door.

In front of him sat Waad Abdul Rahim, a solemn Iraqi professor dressed in a tweed jacket. His 14-year-old daughter, Mina, needed an intestinal operation. It cost $5,000. For the past month and a half, he has visited Samarai's office.

"I come every day, and then I go back to suffer," Rahim said. "Her life is in danger. The longer it takes, the more dangerous it is going to be."

Samarai nodded in sympathy and said, "We have four or five more-serious cases."

Most of the organization's funds come from donations, he said. He doesn't blame the Jordanian government. "It's enough they opened their doors for us to stay here," Samarai said. But he wished the international community would do more to help.

"Lots of Americans tell us we don't need money: 'You are wealthy.' I even went to the European Union. They also said, 'You don't need money.' "A Taste of Baghdad

Rabab Haider and her husband, Ibrahim al-Shawy, live in an elegant, sunlit apartment in Amman. Along with other middle-class Iraqis, they live in a parallel Iraq. Many of their relatives and friends are here. Iraq's sectarian divisions rarely enter their lives.

The richest Iraqis can get residency permits by depositing $70,000 in a Jordanian bank, buying property or investing. Others simply pay a $2 daily fine for expired permits.

"I see more Iraqis here than I do in Baghdad," said Shawy, who travels every few months to Iraq, where he owns land.

Qaduri, a popular restaurant nearby, was once an institution in Baghdad. Then it was bombed. Seven months ago, its owners decided to resurrect it in Amman. Now it serves tashreeb, a traditional Iraqi stew, from midnight to noon, just as it did in Baghdad.

Next door, a sign reads that another restaurant plans to open soon. Its specialty: pacha, the dish of boiled lamb's head that Iraqis consider a delicacy.

At a recent Iraqi wedding in the upscale Bristol Hotel, an Iraqi singer sang songs and guests moved to the drumbeats of the jobee, an Iraqi folk dance. In Baghdad, with the car bombs, checkpoints and kidnappings, large weddings are all but extinct.

"You turned the clock back four years," Um Ammar, a guest who had recently arrived from Baghdad, told the groom's mother.

The singer began to hum a patriotic Iraqi hymn. In the audience, eyes filled with tears. Others sobbed.

Moments later, the singer crooned: "Baghdad."

The audience responded: "In my eyes is Heaven."

"Baghdad," the singer sang again.

"Is our one and only love," the audience sang. "Baghdad is our sole mother, may God safeguard you from the evil surrounding you."

On a January afternoon, over cake and coffee in their Amman apartment, Haider and Shawy spoke of nostalgia, guilt and uncertainty.

"What about the torment?" said Haider, a pleasant, short-haired woman with a faint British accent. "You being safe and your people in Baghdad are not."

They have six months of savings left, Shawy said. He's sending rÃ©sumÃ©s around the world.

"How long can we keep this?" asked Haider, looking at their plush sofas, the purple vase, the glass dining table.Living in Fear

DOJ_NMG_0127497

On Jan. 18, a curly-haired artist named Qais Mohammed Ateih sat inside singer Saad Ali's two-room apartment, which is nestled near a warren of shops and narrow alleys. A third Iraqi refugee, Razzaq al-Okaeli, 35, joined them. The trio spoke about being like beggars, depending on friends for meals. Ateih said he knew at least 70 Iraqis who have been deported since 2003.

In the wake of Hussein's execution in December, many Iraqi Shiites say they have been targeted because of their sect. Jordan, a mostly Sunni nation, is home to many supporters of Hussein, who was a Sunni and a benefactor of Palestinians.

"Is the government targeting us for being Shiites? No. But from individual policemen, we feel this," said Ateih, 36. "They say, 'You betrayed Saddam.' "

If they are lucky, Ateih said, they find jobs as day laborers, earning $7 for a 14-hour workday. But Jordanian employers, they said, often exploit Iraqis. Okaeli said he recently worked for two months as an air-conditioning repairman; his employer paid him for only 10 days of work.

"They know we cannot complain to the authorities," said Okaeli, a short man with brushed-back hair and long, trim sideburns. "If we complain, we will get deported."

Ali sat on a worn brown sofa, rubbing his hands, taking in the conversation. He had hoped to earn enough money to help his parents in Baghdad. Now, when he speaks to them, he never reveals the truth.

"They are inside Iraq. They should have to worry only about themselves," said Ali, his eyes lowered at the dusty red carpet. "So I tell them I am fine."

He paused, then glanced at the tiny heater, and said, "I never expected it would be like this."

Iraq War Spawns Growing Refugee Problem (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

Decades after the Middle East was hit by the mass uprooting of Palestinians, it is again struggling with a gigantic refugee problem — this time from Iraq.

The exodus — one million to neighboring Syria alone, according to the U.N. — is another unforeseen byproduct of the 2003 Iraq invasion. When it might peak, nobody knows, but if it continues at its present rate, the consequences for the region would be profound.

Iraqis now make up more than 5 percent of Syria's population, the U.N. refugee agency says. Jordan says its 700,000 Iraqis have swollen its population by 12 percent, and its officials say they have already moved to cut off the flow. So has Egypt, with 130,000 Iraqi newcomers.

But Syria's doors remain open and the new arrivals have transformed some Damascus neighborhoods to such an extent that Iraqi-accented Arabic is all that's heard.

In the capital's Jarramana suburb, restaurants advertise Iraqi dishes, along with belly dancers and singers imported from Baghdad, Basra and Mosul. Many store windows advertise apartments and houses for rent or sale. In al-Sayda Zeinab, another Damascus suburb, Iraqis crowd into the marble-tiled plaza of a Shiite mosque, far outnumbering Iranian pilgrims.

Syria is poor and lacking in jobs, and many Syrians grumble about the newcomers pushing up the cost of food and housing. The U.N. refugee agency says it is struggling to help the Iraqis, many of whom are poor and running out of the meager funds they brought.

New York-based Human Rights Watch accuses the United States of doing too little, saying it should "significantly" increase the number of Iraqi refugees it will resettle this year and contribute generously to the U.N. appeal for funds to cope with the crisis.

"Washington is spending about $2 billion per week on the war in Iraq, but has barely begun to address the human fallout from the war," said Bill Frelick, Human Rights Watch's refugee policy director.

The U.S. resettled several hundred Iraqis in 2006, according to the U.N. agency, whose formal title, UNHCR, stands for U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. It wants Washington to take up to 20,000 in 2007.

Egypt and Jordan have reported only minor security frictions with the refugees, but both say their fear of importing Iraq's violence forces them to clamp down.

Jordanian officials point to the killing of 60 people in 2005, when Iraqi suicide bombers linked to al-Qaida blew themselves up in three hotels in Jordan's capital, Amman.

Human Rights Watch says Jordan refuses entry to Iraqi men between ages 17 and 35. Government officials acknowledge restrictions on the entry of Iraqis, but won't give specifics.

The Iraqi presence in Jordan is a "burden," Jordanian government spokesman Nasser Judeh said. Jordan, he said, wants an international conference to discuss compensation for Arab nations hosting fleeing Iraqis.

Syria, population 18 million, is the refuge of choice primarily because of its relaxed entry regulations for Arabs, the relatively low cost of living and availability of schools and health care.

DOJ_NMG_0127498

President Bashar Assad's government is reluctant to detail the costs. "There is indeed a burden, but Syria doesn't complain to anyone and is not asking anyone for help," Vice President Farouk al-Sharaa told reporters in Damascus in January.

Still, the impact is felt. Housing prices in the Damascus area have soared by up to 300 percent. Syrians also complain about higher food prices and overcrowding at some schools, which have reportedly admitted up to 28,000 Iraqi children. In areas where Iraqis have settled, residents say some classes have swollen from 30 pupils to 50.

The Damascus office of the UNHCR says about 40,000 Iraqis arrive monthly. They can stay for six months, then must leave and renew the visa process from scratch. The quickest way is a short trip to neighboring Lebanon, but at $20 a person or more, the sightseeing packages are too costly for the poor.

Still, most Iraqis in Syria say they have no serious complaints about their life in exile, and have made a home away from home.

Some have settled in Palestinian refugee camps, where rents are lower, joining tens of thousands of Palestinians who came to Syria as refugees following the 1948 creation of Israel and the 1967 Arab-Israeli war.

Iraqis also have set up a private university outside the capital, with Iraqi lecturers and a mostly Iraqi student body — a reflection of Iraq's war-driven brain drain.

Two Damascus theaters are showing Iraqi plays, complete with star actors-in-exile. "Homesick," a slapstick comedy set in the offices of an imaginary Iraqi satellite TV channel based in Syria, has drawn near sellout crowds since opening Dec. 7.

"My homeland is like a paradise even if it resembles hell," blares a song from the theater's speakers.

For $5 a ticket, Iraqis who have fled suicide bombings, death squads, gunbattles, unemployment and violent crime laugh hysterically as comedians Majid Yassin and Nahi Mahdi joke about Baghdad's fuel shortages and power outages.

"It is not a good life, but at least we are safe here," said Ibrahim Hamad, a former Iraqi army officer who came to Syria eight months ago with his wife and three children from Anbar province, the heartland of Iraq's Sunni-led insurgency.

"No bombs, no shootings, no Americans, no militiamen and no power cuts," he said.

Hamad is not entitled to an army pension because he was an active member of Saddam's now-outlawed Baath party. The family lives on the $250 a month he collects from tenants living in his central Baghdad apartment, and from dabbling in cross-border commerce.

The promise of a well-paid job in a business run by relatives in the Persian Gulf city of Dubai keeps his hopes up.

The United States and Iraq's Shiite-dominated government accuse Syria of harboring leaders of Iraq's Sunni-led insurgency — particularly former Baath Party officials — and allowing them to move back and forth across the border with Iraq. Among the Iraqis in Syria are some 300,000 Shiites, but there have been no reports of Iraq's Sunni-Shiite tensions spilling over into Syria.

The UNHCR is struggling to deal with the flood of Iraqis across the region — and within their homeland. It says some 500,000 fled their homes to other parts of Iraq in 2006 alone, and that the number of internally displaced people could reach 2.3 million — nearly one in ten Iraqis — by the end of 2007.

This month, the Geneva-based agency made an emergency appeal for $60 million to help fleeing Iraqis.

"Unremitting violence in Iraq will likely mean continued mass internal and external displacement affecting much of the surrounding region," it said.

Already, its resources in Syria are stretched thin. The waiting time for seeing a UNHCR official is five months, said Laurens Jolles, the UNHCR representative in Syria. He hopes it will drop to one month after his office recruits 10 new staff.

"Syria's generosity is admirable and must be noted," he said in an interview.

But many Iraqi families are running out of money and becoming increasingly dependent on aid from religious and political support groups, he said. Up to 30 percent of young Iraqis aren't attending school, he added.

Some of the refugees are fortunate enough to find legal work, but Jolles said many more are employed illegally, and vulnerable to exploitation.

The Iraqis pose no security threat, "but there are social ills like theft and prostitution," said Elias Murad, editor-in-chief of the Al-Baath, official newspaper of Syria's ruling Baath Party.

Saad Hamza Ilwan, a retired primary school teacher from Mahmoudiyah, a particularly dangerous Sunni Arab town south of Baghdad, came to Syria with his wife and three children nearly two years ago. He could only afford a flat in the al-Yarmouk Palestinian refugee camp, which is more like a sprawling suburb of Damascus.

He sells cellular telephones and phone cards. "Business is slow," he said as his 10-year-old son, Mohammed, dusted the shelves. "There are five shops selling the same things on this part of the street alone."

He said his children are struggling with a Syrian school system that is more rigorous than Iraq's.

"But the Syrians treat us well," said Ilwan, who says he fled Iraq four months after U.S. troops stormed his home, arrested two of his brothers and held them for eight months.

DOJ_NMG_0127499

In al-Yarmouk, the men spend their evenings smoking and drinking sweet black tea while swapping stories of conditions at home learned from telephone conversations with relatives and friends in Iraq.

Mohammed, the 10-year-old, huddles by an electrical heater to fend off the cold and declares himself homesick.

"I don't like Damascus," he says, drawing protests from his father. "I want to be back in my school in Iraq."

Associated Press correspondents Jamal Halaby in Amman, Jordan, and Salah Nasrawi in Cairo, Egypt, contributed to this report.

Taliban Leader Killed In NATO Airstrike (AP)

AP, February 4, 2007

NATO-led troops killed a senior Taliban leader with a precision airstrike near a southern Afghan town overrun by militants, a spokesman for the alliance said Sunday.

Col. Tom Collins said the airstrike near Musa Qala on Sunday morning killed a senior Taliban leader riding in a car.

Musa Qala on Thursday was overrun by an estimated 200 Taliban fighters who disarmed local police, ransacked the district center and hoisted their trademark white flag.

The town had been subject to a peace deal brokered last October between village elders and the Helmand provincial government that prevented NATO, Afghan and Taliban fighters from coming within 3 miles of the town center.

Collins said the Taliban leader was killed within that 3-mile zone with the approval of the Afghan government. He said no NATO or Afghan forces were on the ground in Musa Qala.

Collins didn't immediately name the person killed in the strike, but Mohammad Wali, a Musa Qala resident, said the airstrike killed a Taliban leader named Mullah Abdul Gafoor and some of his associates while they were riding in a truck through a small village just outside Musa Qala.

Another resident, Lal Mohammad, told The Associated Press on Saturday that the fighters in Musa Qala were being led by Gafoor, the hardline militia's corps commander in western Afghanistan during the Taliban regime.

Musa Qala saw intense battles between Taliban fighters and British troops last summer and fall. The fighting caused widespread damage to the town of around 10,000 inhabitants, most of whom were forced to leave.

British forces withdrew from Musa Qala in October after the truce, which turned over security to local leaders and prevented NATO forces from entering the town.

Gen. David Richards, who was replaced Sunday as NATO's commander, told the AP on Saturday that "very surgical and deliberate" force would be used to evict the fighters from Musa Qala, where he said the alliance's strategy of avoiding military action has driven a wedge between residents and Taliban insurgents.

Residents Flee Taliban-held Town (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) -- Hundreds of villagers fled a southern Afghan town overrun by Taliban militants, fearful of a NATO attack on the insurgent fighters who have hoisted their trademark white flag over the town's ransacked government center, residents said.

NATO's outgoing commander, Gen. David Richards, said "very surgical and deliberate" force would be used if needed to solve the crisis in the town of Musa Qala, and Afghan Defense Minister Abdul Rahim Wardak said: "If there is a need for an operation, there will be one."

Col. Tom Collins, a spokesman for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, said Saturday that NATO was watching the situation, but that no forces were in Musa Qala. NATO troops pulled out of the town in October after the government and village elders signed a peace agreement.

"It is only a matter of time before (the) government re-establishes control," Collins said.

However, he said NATO had reports that Taliban militants had reinforced their defensive positions.

Abdul Baqi, a villager who fled Musa Qala with five family members on Saturday, said residents feared a bloody clash was imminent after the Taliban fighters swarmed the town Wednesday and Thursday, temporarily taking village elders hostage.

"I'm going to stay with my relatives and will return only if the situation gets better," Baqi said while sitting in his pickup truck in the nearby district of Gereshk.

Resident Mohammad Wali said Taliban fighters had hoisted a white flag over the damaged government compound, and villager Lal Mohammad said hundreds of residents had fled.

British troops fought intense battles with Taliban fighters in Musa Qala in the second half of last year. The clashes caused widespread damage to the surrounding town of around 10,000 inhabitants, most of whom were forced to flee.

DOJ_NMG_0127500

British forces left Musa Qala in October after elders and the Helmand provincial governor struck a truce that turned over security to local leaders and prevented NATO forces from entering the town.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmadi, said the Taliban took over the town in response to NATO attacks he said violated that agreement -- an apparent reference to a NATO airstrike outside of Musa Qala that killed a senior militant leader and a number of his deputies late last month.

But NATO said the Taliban were never party to the agreement, and that "by their actions, the Taliban have ended over four months of peace in Musa Qala which, until now, had seen a return to normality with reconstruction and development getting under way."

"It is very clear that the Taliban are acting against the wishes of the people of Musa Qala," a NATO statement said.

Richards, a strong supporter of the British-backed peace agreement, said the Taliban move proved the agreement's success.

"These mechanisms to drive a wedge are an absolute classic part of any counterinsurgency," he said. "Far from being a failure, it shows what a success this can be and how upsetting it can be to the Taliban."

New Chief For NATO Afghan Force (BBC)

BBC.com, February 4, 2007

UK General David Richards has handed over control of the Nato force in Afghanistan to US General Dan McNeil.

During Gen Richards's nine months in charge, the International Security Assistance Force (Isaf) has increased from 9,000 to more than 33,000 troops.

Commanders who have recently faced a fierce Taleban offensive in the south have asked for further reinforcements to fight the insurgents.

But so far only the US and Britain have pledged more troops.

Criticism

It has been a challenging time for Gen Richards

Gen Richards faced Taleban attacks in the south where US, British, Canadian and Dutch troops were deployed in areas previously outside the control of the government, our correspondent says.

Nevertheless, he marked the end of his reign by declaring that the conflict in Afghanistan is a "winnable war".

In a BBC interview, Gen Richards said the Taleban commander in the disputed town of Musa Qala in Helmand province, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, was killed in an air strike overnight.

"It's almost 100% certain that... the leader of the Taleban grouping in Musa Qala that intimidated the people and took over the centre, has just actually been taken out in an air strike along with some of his leading henchmen."

Speaking to the Associated Press, he said the Taleban had failed to recover from a major battle last year.

"They know in a conventional sense their attempt, which I will give them credit for was a good attempt, failed when they gathered 1,000 fighters in one place."

New approach?

Gen McNeil took command of the multinational headquarters in a ceremony on Sunday morning.

He has been based in Afghanistan before, and will take on the Isaf mission of bringing security and development, and helping win over the people for the Afghan government, our correspondent says.

He says there has been some criticism from US quarters of the British policy of making peace deals with local elders - notably in Helmand province where a four-month ceasefire recently collapsed in one town.

The new commander is expected to have more troops available to him than Gen Richards could call upon.

There is an uncertainty as to whether Gen McNeil might take a more direct approach to the counter-insurgency but that is yet to be seen, our correspondent says.

Afghan Schools Take On The Taliban (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

WACH TANGI, AFGHANISTAN — Even before the winter wind had scattered the ashes of their village school, the people of this poor hamlet in eastern Afghanistan decided they had to fight back.

On a bitterly cold night last month, suspected Taliban militants set fire to all five "classrooms," housed in canvas tents donated by a humanitarian agency. It was one of nearly 200 schools across the country burned in the last year by Islamic insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0127501

Four hundred more schools were closed by threats and intimidation, driving more than 130,000 students from their classrooms and dealing a harsh blow to massive international efforts to rebuild an education system ravaged during the years of Taliban rule.

Over the last three months, however, the rate of attacks has fallen dramatically, with fewer than half a dozen schools believed to have been targeted. Education officials attribute the decrease at least in part to a nationwide drive to create local "defense committees" for schools, enlisting the help of tribal elders, Islamic clerics and, in some cases, homegrown militias.

The people of Wach Tangi, which lies about 10 miles north of Jalalabad, the capital of Nangarhar province, believed their village was too remote and their tent school too rudimentary to attract the notice of any Taliban militants in the area.

The road leading to the village of 1,800 people resembles a dry riverbed: winding, pitted and stone-strewn. So arid and forbidding is the landscape that in the Pashto language, Wach Tangi means "valley without water."

But on the night of Jan. 6, arsonists took the trouble to make the journey, and methodically set each tent ablaze. Villagers raised the alarm within moments, but it was too late. The classrooms vanished in a whoosh of flames that scorched the stone foundations and charred the metal support poles.

"We realized right away that we had made a big mistake by not doing more to protect ourselves, to protect our school," headmaster Wali Mohammed said.

A posse of village men took to the dry hills, trying unsuccessfully to track the arsonists. The next day, virtually all of Wach Tangi's families, even the poorest, agreed to chip in what they could to have armed men guard the school at night once it reopened.

Within two days, the village had organized a protection committee made up of its most influential citizens, charged with the task of keeping the school, its pupils and its teachers safe.

The school is up and running again, in UNICEF-donated tents. Students still have the schoolbooks that were home with them when the old school was burned, and more are on the way from donors.

But the fire remains fresh in everyone's mind.

"Those who did this to our school are enemies of our country," said Abdul Wahed, a white-bearded tribal elder. "We won't allow this to happen to us or to our children."

Afghanistan's Education Ministry has encouraged grass-roots school-protection initiatives in recent months, even though the central government has no money to fund them. There are no reliable figures, but the ministry believes more than half the country's 9,000 schools are under some form of locally organized protection, whose effectiveness remains to be seen.

"There just aren't enough police to watch over every school in the country," said Zuhoor Afghan, a ministry spokesman. "But the local people know their own towns and villages best. They know who is a stranger; they know who has business there and who does not."

Villagers are aware that their vigilante methods could cost them their lives. The Taliban, whose name means "students," see Western-style education as a threat to their concept of a pure Islamic state. Their followers regard modern education as a force for Western colonialism.

Wahed, the elder in Wach Tangi, said he did not know what would have happened if villagers had caught up with armed men on the night of the fire.

"We had only a few old guns," he said with a shrug. "But we would have done our best against them."

Likewise, the night watchmen hired by the village are equipped only with handguns, little match for the automatic rifles carried by Taliban fighters.

Still, the villagers believe their newfound watchfulness will be a deterrent. And the school-protection committee members are trying, each in his own way, to help stave off attacks.

The mullah on the committee has been using mosque sermons to emphasize that nothing in the Koran forbids girls from receiving an education, as they do in Wach Tangi, where about half the nearly 500 pupils are girls. Boys study in the morning and girls in the afternoon.

One of the tribal chieftains on the committee is calling in favors from kinsmen nearby, asking them to keep their ears open for word of any threat. Another committee member has lobbied the police to mount more frequent patrols, winning a sympathetic hearing from a commander who grew up in the area.

Many of those associated with the school remain deeply fearful. Teacher Gul Anar said that after the fire, she considered abandoning her work. Dozens of teachers have been killed in Afghanistan, and she was afraid of becoming a victim too.

"I was terrified," she said. "And losing our school was such a very sad moment. But then I thought of my students, how eager they are to learn, and I decided I must continue."

DOJ_NMG_0127502

Some educators believe that the recent lull in school burnings and other attacks is only partly due to the establishment of protection committees. Violence traditionally decreases during the coldest months, and they think the insurgents will become more active again during the spring.

Other school officials believe that the Taliban, after initially underestimating the strength of the country's education ethic, may have discerned that the school-burning campaign was backfiring.

"People hated it during the time of the Taliban, when their daughters could not study and when nothing was taught in the schools but theology," said Mohammed, the Wach Tangi headmaster. "Attacking schools is not going to make them popular again. Even they can see that."

In what may have been a concession to that sentiment, a Taliban spokesman in the country's south announced last month that the movement would begin opening schools of its own, at which girls "eventually" would be welcome.

Educators and Western military officials scoffed at the notion.

"What's the curriculum going to be — suicide bombings?" asked Mark Laity, the chief spokesman in Afghanistan for NATO.

"We don't believe for a moment that education is a genuine goal of these people…. They don't want Afghanistan to have a functioning government or civil society."

"It's only a ruse," said Afghan, of the Education Ministry. "If they did open schools, they wouldn't teach anything but religion — no mathematics, no language, no history."

In the classroom tents of Wach Tangi, teachers said, they still had not been able to adequately explain to their pupils why their school had been a target.

"After the fire, they asked me over and over again, 'Why? Who would do this?' " said teacher Shoiabullah, who uses one name.

"We didn't have a real answer for them. We said only that we would try our best to keep it from happening again."

The Road To Helmand (WP)

By Holly Barnes Higgins

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The news came in a phone call from Afghanistan. Ten days ago, a suicide bomber tried to talk his way into a compound in Lashkar Gah where I had worked until last October. He blew himself up without getting in and no one else was seriously hurt, but the story shook me. What I had expected for so long had finally happened.

I went to Afghanistan in October 2005 to work on an economic development project funded by the U.S. government. I went because I believed in the mission: helping to improve the quality of life in a war-torn land. I was lucky to get out.

Now I am home, hearing with dismay that President Bush lauds our work as a success and is requesting more aid for Afghanistan. I think of my colleagues still back in Helmand province, especially the young Afghans who risk their lives to work with us because the United States has insisted that progress is on the way.

I know about the millions of dollars already wasted there.

When I was in the field, I sometimes had to travel to Kabul to talk to U.S. officials about various assistance strategies and whether they were viable on the ground. They call the process "groundtruthing."

A year later, this is the story of my time in Afghanistan. This is my own groundtruthing.September 2005

I didn't want to go.

When a friend mentions the job in Afghanistan, I shake my head before he even finishes talking. I'm not looking for another adventure. I've worked with uban youth and in Angola. I've done enough hard time in hard circumstances. At 36, I feel it's my time to settle down. The most dangerous province in Afghanistan is the last place I want to go.

But my friend presses. "Would you be willing just to talk with them?" he asks. I imagine what I've seen of Afghanistan in the media -- a desperate place bombed to hell even though it already looked to be in pieces. Still vulnerable to the idea of humanitarian service, and to adventure, I agree to a meeting.

The project in question, run by a private contractor and funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID) to the tune of $121 million over four years, is intended to provide jobs, develop business and agriculture, and improve infrastructure in Helmand province -- all part of the effort to reduce poppy-growing in that region, one of the largest opium-production centers in the world. It seems a worthy goal.

But the project is also taking over from another that shut down after 11 members of its staff were killed. The Taliban have never claimed credit for the deaths, but most people assume they're to blame.

I talk to anyone I can find who has experience in the region. No one thinks I should take the job. Only one person I meet has ever even set foot in Helmand, and she sounds stunned that I'm considering working there for a year or two. The lone voice of optimism is that of a journalist. "You'll have a ball," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0127503

Before I leave for Kabul, I put my belongings in long-term storage, ship my cats home to Texas, rent out my apartment. I also prepare a power of attorney and my will.October 2005

Our little plane hits the large swath of gravel that serves as an airstrip for Lashkar Gah, the capital of Helmand. The barrenness all around is astounding: no buildings, no parking lots, nothing but a few dust-colored structures.

A group of Afghan men with Soviet-era rocket-propelled grenade launchers watch us get off the plane. They follow every move I make, but I'm careful not to look them in the eye.

My living quarters are a bedroom and bath in a 10-bedroom, three-story pink stucco building that people call "the palace," short for "narco-palace." Blast-protection film covers the windows, and the security manager is preparing to hire a crew to fill thousands of sandbags to fortify the perimeter. The project office is in the same compound, so my commute is about six steps door to door.

The house speaks of rare wealth (and bad taste), but the periphery of our compound is just like everyone else's: rudimentary ditches filled with rubbish and a black-green soup of waste and water.

An American colleague takes me up to the roof. All around are grassless yards and square houses of mud or clay. Directly below us, a scrawny cow stands under a drought-shrunken tree, a chicken pecking at her hoof, while a child prepares to fly his plastic-bag kite. Passersby stare up in shock at the sight of a blond woman with an uncovered head. Ducking, I hurry back inside.

* * *

One of 34 Afghan provinces, Helmand lies about 400 miles southwest of Kabul. It's home to the highly conservative Pashtun people. Poppy production was nearly unheard of here before the Soviet invasion in 1979. But today, most farmers grow poppy, along with smaller amounts of other produce. It's simple economics: A farmer can earn about $5,400 per hectare of opium yield, almost 10 times what he would get for a hectare of wheat.

In the 1950s and '60s, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and USAID developed a 1,600-kilometer irrigation system in the province. Many residents remember a time when Lashkar Gah, with its newly paved streets and neat rows of tree-shaded houses, was called "Little America."

Today, much of the pavement is ruined, and the sagging former USAID homes look much older than they are. Meanwhile, massive, gaudy structures built with drug money rise around them. Because of their bizarre, strange-colored exteriors dotted with mirrors and decorative tiles, these narco-palaces are also referred to as "Pakistani wedding cakes."

* * *

I am the only woman on our team. I'd been warned that locals would think I was a prostitute brought from the West for the male staff of American, Australian, British and Latin American contractors, and that this perceived violation of Islamic morality would put the team at heightened risk.

So I am required to stay on the first floor, while my expat male colleagues enjoy more private quarters upstairs. I dress in shapeless clothing and wear only enough makeup to feel comfortable, yet I still feel as though I'm surrounded by a neon light.

The only time I feel relief from this self-consciousness is around A., our Hazara cook. Unlike the Pashtun men, A. looks me in the eye, laughs easily, doesn't seem afraid of me. He spends hours preparing our meals, then watches our expressions as we eat, awaiting appreciation from the table, often winking at me.

Nonetheless, by and large the food is horrible -- sometimes really horrible. But about once a week, A. hits the bull's eye. His "Pashtun burgers" are a favorite. He uses an old coffee can to cut circles out of nan, the flat Afghan bread, to serve as buns.

More than anything, A. wants to be a chef in the United States. Sometimes I get excited about this idea and think about ways to help make it happen. But the barriers are too great.

I feel the same about S. and R., the two young Afghan women in our office. They want to go to medical school, but they have no passports and no money. Nor do they know much English. I feel impotent in the face of their dreams. Getting an Afghan into the United States post-9/11 is as ambitious an undertaking as, well, getting poppy out of Afghanistan.

* * *

The people of Helmand fall into two categories. The great majority believe that poppy is the only reliable source of income. The small minority believe that with help, alternative livelihoods are possible. They don't know how to make progress, but they're hungry for it, so they're willing to trust us.

The project's goal is to diversify the economy and create jobs. Plans include building roads and refurbishing the irrigation system, electrification improvements, job training, an industrial park. I'm responsible for setting up the public information office and developing a campaign to promote the project to Afghans. But there's a substantial caveat: illiteracy. The project's security manager tells me that not one man in his unit of 60 can write his own name; to receive their pay, they "sign" with their thumbprint. Whatever strategy I come up with will have to be compelling but simple.

DOJ_NMG_0127504

The company seems most invested in pleasing its client, USAID. Meanwhile, USAID is concerned about pleasing the Afghan people, local and national Afghan leaders, the media, Capitol Hill and the State Department. So I am to issue reports every other week, as well as "success stories" that will convince everyone that these millions of dollars are well spent, that U.S. efforts in Helmand are a shining example of our good work in the world.

On paper, it sounds great. But in practice, all I have to promote are concepts. I'm told to wait before I initiate any public education effort. Weeks go by. Nothing happens. I tell the team I'm concerned about losing the confidence of Afghans who are interested in finding livelihoods other than poppy cultivation. I suggest announcing project timelines so that people can anticipate positive changes. We must provide something to generate discussion as people eat their meals, sit together for tea, walk to Friday prayers.

But because of mismanagement at multiple levels, personnel turnover, lack of initiative and concerns about personal security, progress simply isn't forthcoming. Often the local Afghan government and its culture of corruption, or USAID, are blamed for the lack of results, but the bottom line is the same: We have very few accomplishments to report.

In the meantime, the reports are still due. And I feel pressure to explain to local residents what we are doing here. I hear over and over how the Afghans feel let down by the international community. So our words and images must be chosen with great care. I have little but words and images to offer.

* * *

Though the Taliban pulled out of Lashkar Gah after the U.S. invasion in 2001, they have gradually made their way back, working with drug lords to control the production of the poppy crop they once forbade, the profits from which now fuel their resistance. The Taliban and their collaborators approach our laborers regularly, making deals to ensure their loyalty during the planting and harvesting season.

But maintaining poppy production is only part of their mission. They are here to expel the infidels, maintain the status quo of fear and resist progress that suggests cooperation with the West.

We hear that the Taliban see Helmand province as their proving ground, the key to taking back Afghan territory from NATO and Afghan troops. Commanders on the ground describe the situation as the most brutal conflict the British army has been involved in since the Korean War.

* * *

I ask the elders who work in our office to help me find someone to serve as my assistant. B. comes in the next day. She's nervous, and her English is poor. She doesn't have any real qualifications. But I'm desperate for help, so I hire her.November 2005

Our security manager is continually checking rumors of danger. Recently, he has received reports of more "night letters" distributed locally.

The night letter calls on holy warriors to fight the infidels. One that I read states that cooperation with Christians and Jews and those associated with the U.S.-backed invasion is punishable by death. Any Afghan known to work as a cook or driver or to engage with Westerners will be executed.

I think of B. and the risks she takes to work with us. We agree that she will call me at the end of every work day to let us know that she has arrived home safely. She in turn worries that I could be poisoned, and insists that I eat food prepared only by people I trust.

* * *

A vehicle-borne suicide bomb detonates outside the provincial governor's office compound, about two blocks away. It's only a partial explosion, and the bomber survives the blast to be shot down as he gets out of the car. Several days later, we hear more blasts -- the rest of the suicide mission's explosives. U.S. Special Forces forgot to tell anyone they were going to set them off. Our ribs shake from the impact, and a tense silence descends on the office.

* * *

I hold a dry opium pod, and it rattles like a baby's toy. Today I learned that women are planting poppy openly in front of their homes, trying to attract buyers. I'm told that some are widows who can't imagine another way to provide for their children. Others are virtual widows, their husbands lost to the haze of opium addiction.

I met today with F., the director of women's affairs for the province. Apparently she secretly educated hundreds of girls in her home during the Taliban era. The Helmand Women's Association is housed in a dank, dilapidated building. F. receives no salary and faces begging, pleading women every day. She feels helpless, and is grateful that we are here.

* * *

Several of us go to the bazaar in search of spices for our Thanksgiving meal. I bite into things, hoping to find nutmeg, and examine the local version of peppercorn. My favorite senior Afghan staff member, H., is with me as the crowds gather to watch us.

DOJ_NMG_0127505

Suddenly, I'm pushed. I assume it's an accident, but H. snaps at the crowd. We've just received a call from security about a possible car bomb, so he's already on edge. It's one of only two shopping trips we'll make before the market is designated "no go" for expats, and it is cut short. But I have nutmeg.December 2005

I heard this today: "Helmand is where God comes to cry." The barren surroundings are so overwhelming that they blunt any interest in conversation, so our travels on the road are mostly quiet. Until we see a camel, or an enormous Kuchi dog, or a little girl decked out in something bright and sequined.

Every day here, it is palpable, the cost exacted from a people living between abject poverty and illegal income. I see it in the cautious eyes of turbaned men coming into the compound to meet with our agricultural team, and in the suspicious expressions of local leaders.

I don't think they know that we understand their situation. Inside this compound we think about it all day, every day. We talk about it at meals; we know the world outside these walls is waiting for more and better options.

But the team seems to face obstacles everywhere: some USAID regulation that management can't get around; resistance to new ideas; and a general sense of being overwhelmed that's the result of an ill-conceived mission.

Local residents live between a rock and a hard place, and expect us to extricate them. We live between a rock and a hard place, and clock time until our contracts are up.February 2006

I feel bad that we're not accomplishing more here, but I have no guilt about living in this compound and earning hardship pay. Especially because USAID keeps raising our danger pay, but never talks about evacuation. We're the only foreigners left here except the military. Even a Bangladeshi nongovernmental organization shut its doors recently after one of its Afghan staff members was killed as he prayed in the nearby mosque.

* * *

As harvest season approaches, we brace ourselves for foreign media inquiries. Predictably, most want to tell the sinister story of opium and violence. I am determined to show a different Helmand. But after the first two or three visits, it becomes obvious that the project has few activities to showcase. Over and over we take reporters to the cobblestone road at Qalai Bost.

Our one success story, the road was begun early this year, using stones harvested from the Helmand River. Nearly 350 men were paid $4 a day to leave the poppy fields and work on it. I never thought I could get excited about road construction, but it truly is a thing of beauty, as is the laborers' pride in it.

In preparation for a visit by reporters, I want the men to practice being interviewed, so I play reporter while B. serves as interpreter. I ask her to encourage the workers to use their own words. To my relief, each man speaks authentically about his fondness for the work. A day's wage on this project, one says, is enough to buy medicine and send his child to school, and he is proud of the fact that it is clean money.

The reporter I accompany to the site the next day has been around the region a lot longer than I have. When I suggest that she speak to the men I had talked to, she recoils and strikes off in the opposite direction, looking for other laborers who will tell her the darker story of poppy. We all could have saved her the time and risk and told her that over the phone. We all know that story.

* * *

B. has grown so much in the job. Once a young woman who refused to talk to men she didn't know, she now makes phone calls and engages with both men and women with confidence. Mortified when I first suggested that she accompany me to a meeting with government officials, she regularly makes presentations to groups.

She also has an acute case of wanderlust. When I return from London, she asks about my holiday. "It was lovely," I say. She smiles but her look is one of longing. "Where would you want to go if you could go anywhere in the world?" I ask her.

She stiffens, and says I must not suggest such things. "God has written on our foreheads where we are to go in this life," she says, "and he has not written that I am to leave Afghanistan."

I smile. "A few months ago, would you have believed it if someone had said: 'God has written on your forehead that you are to work with an American organization and make a good living'?"

She seems uncomfortable. I feel guilty and go back to my computer. Then she whispers, "Holly. I would like to visit India -- India and London!"

* * *

In the past, threats of poppy eradication have been empty, but now we hear that it has begun. Locals tell me the average citizen believes that "alternative livelihood programs" and eradication efforts go together. This is just what we didn't want, and what some on our team fear puts us at greater risk. We urgently need to make the public distinction between alternative livelihoods and eradication.

We all seem to know how inverted this process is. The options that the project is proposing should have been in place before the eradication threat returned. It comes to these farmers every year lately, and every year they ask, "What are our alternatives?" And every year, the answer is the same, though no one is honest enough to say it: "There are no other options."August 2006

DOJ_NMG_0127506

I'm back from home leave, and B. tells me about the phone calls.

"I was called by this man," she says. "I don't know who he is, but you know, he shouldn't do this. So I said to him, 'What kind of Muslim are you to call an unmarried woman?' " But he responded: "What kind of Muslim are you to work with Americans?"

The caller said he knew where she lived, what time she left her family's home for the walk to our compound, what color her burqa is. I think of the threats to the women on the provincial council, to F., and the recent killing of F.'s counterpart in Kandahar, as well as of F.'s own driver. I tell B. she must now call me when she reaches her afternoon classes. I make her change her route and ask her to call me after she arrives home each night.

* * *

F. and the other women in Helmand's department of women's affairs have avoided going to their new building since her driver was killed, so B. and I head to the old office for a meeting. For this three-block drive, B. covers all but her eyes. She says she doesn't want to be seen in our vehicles; it frightens her. In the front seat, two middle-aged former soldiers from South Africa serve as our escorts. They are carrying automatic weapons; we all wear body armor.

During the meeting, we hear a large explosion. On the way back to the compound, we learn that it was a suicide bomb at the market nearby. It killed 23 people, many of them women and children doing their midday shopping.

The intentional killing of innocents, virtually around the corner. We go to dinner, talk about it briefly, then move on to new recipe ideas. Without our being conscious of it, numbness sets in.September 2006

The head of the British government's drug team is pacing on the tarmac in Kabul, his bulletproof vest a stark contrast to his summery plaid shirt and rumpled khaki suit. He and his colleagues don't get to Helmand much, and he seems anxious.

We are headed back to Lashkar Gah, to a counter-narcotics shura, a consultation with religious leaders and tribal elders. Planting season is fast approaching, so the pressure is on to encourage people to plant something other than poppy. To increase confidence in him, we've told locals that the governor of Helmand has called the meeting. In truth, the meeting was put together by the British drug team working with USAID and the State Department.

We arrive two hours late and enter a room crowded with somber, sweating men. Some have traveled for more than a day to be here.

After a series of benign speeches by the governor and the ministers of agriculture and of rural reconstruction and development -- speeches that fail to make use of the statistics and talking points we've worked around the clock to produce -- the crowd asks questions. The men become worked up, but all I hear are the predictable complaints: There are no alternatives to poppy. Why can't you just raise the price of cotton, we'd all grow it instead. Where has all the reconstruction money gone?

I am getting as agitated as the crowd, because I know that the materials in the unopened plastic folders would have preempted all these questions. I watch the ministers take notes as the governor mops the sweat from his face and neck.

I get up and go into the hall, where the governor's shooters are pacing. But before I can leave, the meeting breaks and I am led to a private lunch where 30 people sit in silence.

* * *

Another suicide bombing, this one even closer to the compound. I'm in the reception area. At first I think someone has slammed the metal-and-glass door behind me really hard, so I keep talking. We've just received 15,000 information booklets that I've designed. I'm showing them to our Afghan staff when I notice people running.

Our security force comes through the door and rushes past with weapons in hand. We cancel the road move we had planned and some of us gather to watch the smoke rise. The bomb killed 21 people down the street, about a block and a half away.

Once every few days, I think about the very real chance that this could be B.'s last day, some guard's, even mine. Bribes are offered and accepted frequently here, and I wonder when someone wearing an explosive vest will pay off one of our Afghan guards for access to our building.October 2006

It is my final full day in Afghanistan. I feel spent. I make some green tea out of sight of colleagues who are fasting for Ramadan. If depressing had a taste, I think it would be lukewarm, unsweetened green tea.

It occurs to me that I have been set up to fail, and that this is what has made me so tired, not the dysentery or the malaria or the long days and nights. On the good days, I still feel like progress is possible. Other days, I internalize the project's failure, and that is the feeling I leave Afghanistan with. The sandbagged walls and armored vehicles have not prevented guilt from penetrating my bones.

I now think that the West can do little if anything to quell the opium poppy trade, except to intercept the traffickers. This will be true as long as Helmand's residents refuse to recognize and respect the central government; as long as streets and schools, markets, mosques and government buildings are targeted by suicide bombers; as long as elders strike deals with the Taliban and government officials themselves profit from poppy production.

DOJ_NMG_0127507

Still, I wish I could have been and done more. Then on this last day, I see the photographs of our public information materials being distributed in the villages of Helmand. They show wide-eyed children studying the pictures, teachers in full classrooms pointing to pages in the booklets I wrote, smiling policemen handing them out.

I don't know if the words and images inspired any conversations about hope and possibility. But in my final hours in this country, these pictures allow me, at last, to feel some small glimmer of satisfaction.

Holly Barnes Higgins is a former aid worker in Afghanistan and Angola.

Wrong Model For Afghanistan (NYT)

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

There is no question that Afghanistan needs to wage a far more effective fight against opium trafficking if it ever hopes to achieve a stable peace. But Colombia — another United States ally whose narcotics trade is helping finance a lethal insurgency — is not the model to follow.

Unfortunately, that is exactly what America's top-ranking military officer, Gen. Peter Pace, recently called for, after the nomination of Washington's current ambassador in Bogotá, William Wood, to be the new American ambassador in Kabul.

The limited gains Colombia has achieved in recent years have been offset by an overly generous amnesty program for right-wing paramilitary leaders and drug traffickers, which has seriously compromised the rule of law. And American aid has been disproportionately directed into military and police programs, leaving far too little to promote alternative livelihoods for Colombia's farmers. Despite all the money spent, the amount of land planted with coca crops has risen and the net harvest has been reduced only slightly. Afghanistan's problems will not be solved by copying these mistakes.

Last year Afghanistan produced 90 percent of the world's opium — a rise of almost 50 percent from the year before. The exploding drug trade is not just a problem for Europe, where most of the heroin produced from that opium ends up. It is a major destabilizing force inside Afghanistan.

Drug money, which represents roughly 35 percent of the country's gross domestic product, is fueling government corruption, financing warlords — some pro-government and some pro-Taliban — and adding to a dangerous disillusionment with President Hamid Karzai's government.

Most of the American aid sent to Kabul since 2001 has gone into security programs and short-term relief and reconstruction, not the long-term development on which lasting security depends. This has left Afghan farmers prey to drug traffickers who often supply the only credit available, with repayment expected in opium poppies.

And with no visible help coming from Kabul or Washington toward alleviating crushing poverty, people in Afghanistan's southern provinces are beginning to look favorably toward a resurgent Taliban. The significantly increased American aid package for Afghanistan announced last month needs to focus more on development. Mr. Wood needs to bring a different set of priorities to Afghanistan, not simply repeat the mistakes Washington has made in Colombia.

DOJ:

U.S. Attorney Firings Set Stage For Congressional Battle (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

H.E. "Bud" Cummins III had served for five years as the U.S. attorney in Little Rock -- a job he obtained in large part because of his credentials as a longtime GOP lawyer and avid supporter of President Bush.

So Cummins, 47, was more than a little surprised when he got a call from the Justice Department last year asking him to resign. He was told there was nothing wrong with his performance, but that officials in Washington wanted to give the job to another GOP loyalist.

"I don't think many of us were aware that the administration might want to ask someone to step aside just to give someone else an opportunity," said Cummins, who left office in December and was replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former aide to presidential adviser Karl Rove. "The precedent was that once you were appointed, assuming you were successful in office, you were there until there was a change in the White House."

Cummins was the first in a wave of seven U.S. attorneys to be fired by the Justice Department, a move that has prompted sharp criticism from Democrats in Congress and has set the stage for a legislative battle over the attorney general's power to appoint federal prosecutors.

DOJ_NMG_0127508

Six of the prosecutors received calls notifying them of their firings on a single day shortly before Christmas, officials said, including the U.S. attorney who oversaw a prominent public corruption probe in San Diego and a prosecutor in New Mexico whose life as a military lawyer was portrayed by Tom Cruise in the movie "A Few Good Men." Most have told colleagues that they have no idea why they were shoved out, according to aides.

A little-noticed provision passed last year allows Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales to appoint interim U.S. attorneys indefinitely without seeking approval from the Senate. Fearing an attempted end run around congressional prerogatives, both House and Senate Democrats have introduced legislation to repeal the provision. The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to hold a hearing on the issue Tuesday.

"The U.S. attorneys' job is too important for there to be unnecessary disruptions, or worse, any appearance of undue influence," Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said in a floor speech last month.

Gonzales and his aides say that they intend to seek Senate approval for every new U.S. attorney and that the old system, which allowed federal judges to appoint replacements, has both practical and constitutional problems. Justice Department officials also defend Gonzales's right to fire U.S. attorneys at will and have suggested that each of the recently dismissed prosecutors had performance problems.

"Every U.S. attorney, like the attorney general of the United States, serves at the pleasure of the president," Gonzales said in a recent interview with The Washington Post. "We can be asked to leave at any time; we can be asked to leave for any reason."

He added later: "From time, to time we make an evaluation as to whether we believe we can put in people who can produce better results, who can do a better job."

But there is also evidence that broader political forces are at work. One administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity in discussing personnel issues, said the spate of firings was the result of "pressure from people who make personnel decisions outside of Justice who wanted to make some things happen in these places."

Several of those fired have already left, and the rest will be gone by the end of the month.

The dismissals include the heads of two of the most important U.S. attorneys' offices in the country: Carol S. Lam in San Diego and Kevin Ryan in San Francisco. The others were John McKay in Seattle; David C. Iglesias in New Mexico; Daniel G. Bogden in Nevada; and Paul K. Charlton in Arizona. All declined to comment for this story.

Ryan's departure was perhaps the least surprising because his tenure had been marked by public complaints about plummeting morale and high staff turnover. But Lam's departure has been more controversial, prompting public complaints from the head of the local FBI field office and questions from Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) and others. Some Democrats speculated that the administration was attempting to undermine the ongoing corruption probe centered on former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), which was overseen by Lam.

"We have people from the FBI indicating that Carol Lam has not only been a straight shooter but a very good prosecutor," Feinstein said. "Therefore, it is surprising to me to see that she would be, in effect, forced out, without cause. This would go for any other U.S. attorney among the seven who are on that list."

Justice Department officials -- who discussed personnel issues on the condition of anonymity -- said that Lam's record was far more mixed, noting that prosecutions of firearms offenses plunged during her tenure and that she personally oversaw a major health-care fraud case that ended in a mistrial.

Another surprise was the firing of McKay, whom Cummins described as "a rock-star U.S. attorney" and whose effort to build a law enforcement database is the template for a new nationwide program at Justice. McKay was also rebuffed for a federal judgeship at the same time.

Like President Bill Clinton before him, Bush removed nearly all the U.S. attorneys when he came into office and replaced them with his own Senate-confirmed appointments. Under previous statutes, the attorney general had the power to appoint an interim prosecutor for 120 days in the case of a vacancy, but then it was up to the local district court to make an appointment until the Senate approved a final pick.

Gonzales and many legal experts say that arrangement was a troubling intrusion on the separation of powers between the independent branches of government.

A new provision, which was quietly tucked into USA Patriot Act reauthorization legislation last year, allows Gonzales to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely. Not counting the recent dismissals, there have been 11 vacancies since the measure was enacted, and Justice Department officials said they will provide nominations to the Senate for each position.

Feinstein and other Democrats fear the provision would allow an attorney general to avoid Senate confirmation of U.S. attorneys altogether and are proposing a return to the previous system.

DOJ_NMG_0127509

B. Mahlon Brown III, a former U.S. attorney for Nevada who now heads the National Association of Former United States Attorneys, said most members of the group are in "shock and awe" over the wave of firings. "It goes against all tradition, and it's very troubling to a lot of us," Brown said.

But Dennis W. Boyd, executive director of the National Association of Assistant U.S. Attorneys, which represents currently employed federal prosecutors, said many of the group's members "do not see it as particularly unusual." Seven firings among 93 U.S. attorneys offices are not that many, Boyd added.

Cummins said "the political aspect of it shouldn't really be a shock to anybody," noting his own status as an active Republican lawyer who served as one of Arkansas's electors committed to Bush in 2000.

"Every U.S. attorney knows they serve at the pleasure of the president," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Thomas To Review Stock Option Grants (AP)

AP, February 4, 2007

Thomas Group to Review Stock Option Practices

IRVING, Texas (AP) -- Thomas Group Inc., a management consulting firm, said Friday that it is initiating a review of its past stock option granting practices and will report its fourth-quarter and full-year results when the review is complete.

The company said that the stock options review was initiated voluntarily and not in response to an inquiry by the Securities and Exchange Commission or any other regulatory agency. More than 100 companies are under investigation by the SEC or Justice Department for their stock option granting practices, and at least 93 others have launched their own internal reviews, according to an Associated Press review.

Thomas said it plans to report its full quarterly and full-year earnings and file its Form 10-K annual report by the March 31 filing deadline.

The company did report revenue for the quarter ended Dec. 31 and the full year. Thomas said quarterly revenue increased 26 percent to $14.8 million from $11.7 million in the year-earlier period. For the full-year, revenue increased 38 percent to $59.5 million from $43.1 million in 2005.

Thomas Group also said it increased its signed contracts 46 percent in 2006 to $59.5 million from $40.8 million in 2005.

Shares of Thomas Group fell 14 cents to $13.70 in after-hours trading, after rising 13 cents to close at $13.84 on the Nasdaq.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Vice President's Shadow Hangs Over Trial (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith, Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Vice President Cheney's press officer, Cathie Martin, approached his chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, on Air Force Two on July 12, 2003, to ask how she should respond to journalists' questions about Joseph C. Wilson IV. Libby looked over one of the reporters' questions and told Martin: "Well, let me go talk to the boss and I'll be back."

On Libby's return, Martin testified in federal court last week, he brought a card with detailed replies dictated by Cheney, including a highly partisan, incomplete summary of Wilson's investigation into Iraq's suspected weapons of mass destruction program.

Libby subsequently called a reporter, read him the statement, and said -- according to the reporter -- he had "heard" that Wilson's investigation was instigated by his wife, an employee at the CIA, later identified as Valerie Plame. The reporter, Matthew Cooper of Time magazine, was one of five people with whom Libby discussed Plame's CIA status during those critical weeks that summer.

After seven days of such courtroom testimony, the unanswered question hanging over Libby's trial is, did the vice president's former chief of staff decide to leak that disparaging information on his own?

No evidence has emerged that Cheney told him to do it. But Cheney's dictated reply is one of many signs to emerge at the trial of the vice president's unusual attentiveness to the controversy and his desire to blunt it. His efforts included the extraordinary disclosure of classified information, including one-sided synopses of Wilson's report and a 2002 intelligence estimate on Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0127510

Under questioning from FBI agent Deborah S. Bond, Libby acknowledged that he and Cheney "may have talked" aboard the plane from Norfolk that day about whether to make public Plame's CIA employment, Bond testified Thursday.

Her testimony brought Cheney closer than ever to the heart of the controversy surrounding the Bush administration's efforts to discredit Wilson, who had accused the White House of twisting intelligence he had gathered as it sought to justify the invasion of Iraq.

White House officials testified that Cheney was irritated because he thought Wilson had alleged the vice president sent him on the fact-finding trip to Niger but rejected the investigation's conclusions. Time after time at the height of the controversy, they said, Cheney directed the administration's response to Wilson's criticism and Libby carried it out.

Cheney personally dictated other talking points for use by the White House press office; helped negotiate the wording of a key statement by then-CIA Director George J. Tenet; instructed Libby to deal directly with selected reporters; told Libby to disclose selected passages from the national intelligence estimate and other classified reports; and held a luncheon for conservative columnists to discuss the controversy.

Throughout this period, Cheney kept a news clipping of Wilson's criticisms on his desk, annotated with the question, "did his wife send him on a junket?" according to court statements. Libby told a grand jury that he and Cheney discussed it on multiple occasions each day.

Randall Eliason, a former chief of public corruption prosecutions for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Washington, said, "There has been significant evidence of how deeply the vice president was involved. If Cheney is personally, deeply involved in it, it's Libby's job to be personally, deeply involved."

Wilson was a former U.S. ambassador dispatched by the CIA the previous year -- at the suggestion of his wife but on a decision by other officials -- to determine whether Iraq had recently tried to acquire nuclear materials from Niger. The agency later said that it was responding to inquiries made by Cheney's office, the State Department and the Defense Department.

On July 6, 2003, 16 months after his return, Wilson publicly accused the administration of ignoring his report, which debunked the Iraq-Niger speculation, and of twisting his information to justify the invasion of Iraq.

Wilson's allegations provoked a political firestorm. Within days, the White House was forced to repudiate a key assertion President Bush had made in his State of the Union address, and Tenet issued an unusual public apology for failing to stop the president from making it. But rather than tamping down the controversy, the administration's backtracking only "made it flare up," as then-White House spokesman Ari Fleischer testified last week.

In its response, the White House wound up training its fire not only on the substance of Wilson's allegations but on him personally, trial testimony has shown.

Over the course of that week in July, bracketed by Wilson's published criticism and Cheney's flight back from Norfolk, three senior White House officials -- Libby, Fleischer and special presidential assistant Karl Rove -- inaccurately told or suggested to five reporters that Wilson had been dispatched to Niger by Plame, according to the testimony. Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage separately told columnist Robert D. Novak that Plame worked at the CIA, and Novak made that news public July 14.

The belittling implication of the disclosure, as Fleischer and others testified last week, was that nepotism, rather than Wilson's knowledge and experience, lay behind his involvement in the matter.

While Cheney and Libby have asserted that their sole intent in contacting journalists was to defend the credibility of their policy, prosecutors disclosed new evidence on Wednesday that the administration was focusing on Wilson himself. Cheney's then-communications director, Mary Matalin, advised Libby in a phone call July 10, prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg said.

Matalin, according to notes Libby made of the conversation, called Wilson "a snake" and warned that his "story has legs," Zeidenberg said. She laid out a plan: "We need to address the Wilson motivation. We need to be able to get the cable out. Declassified. The president should wave his wand."

While arguing unsuccessfully that the jury should see all of Libby's notes on the conversation, Zeidenberg said, "All we have heard from the defense all along is that Mr. Libby was only interested in responding on the merits." He said it was significant that Libby wrote down word for word "an extremely negative and ad hominem attack, if you will, about a critic."

Plame's employment at the CIA was classified, making it illegal for any official to knowingly and intentionally disclose it. Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald's 22-month investigation did not produce charges of that offense.

But Libby was indicted on charges of making false statements, obstruction of justice and perjury for denying that he was aware of Plame's employment and had disclosed it to journalists.

In courtroom testimony, witnesses have asserted that Cheney and two others told Libby about Plame in June, and that he told two journalists and Fleischer -- who in turn said he told two more journalists. It was, in short, a hot topic of gossip by the administration.

DOJ_NMG_0127511

According to Martin's testimony, Cheney directed her early in the week of July 6 to keep track of daily news coverage of the controversy, including "who was continuing to comment." During a meeting on Capitol Hill, Martin said, Cheney "dictated to me what he wanted me to say" about it to reporters.

In a meeting July 8, Martin said, Cheney also decided that Libby would call NBC News reporters Andrea Mitchell and David Gregory to discuss the matter. Martin said she walked out during Libby's subsequent calls to the reporters.

After Mitchell suggested in a broadcast that the White House was "pushing blame" for the mess toward the CIA, Martin said, then-deputy national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley looked directly at Martin during a staff meeting and said such efforts were improper. At that moment, Martin said, Libby "looked down," in effect leaving her to absorb the blame.

Three months later, White House spokesman Scott McClellan publicly cleared Rove of leaking Plame's name -- inaccurately, as it turned out -- but provided no such statement about Libby.

According to Cheney's own notes, introduced at the trial last week, Cheney told McClellan that such a statement "has to happen today. Call out key press saying same thing about Scooter as Karl. Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

Libby Fights To Keep Tapes From Public (PHI)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON - Former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is fighting to keep his grand jury testimony about the leak of a CIA officer's name from being released and broadcast.

That testimony - the sworn statements Libby gave investigators about his conversations with Vice President Cheney and journalists - is at the heart of his perjury trial. Special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald plans to play hours of recordings of that testimony in court next week to bolster his case that Libby lied and obstructed Fitzgerald's leak investigation.

Trial evidence is normally public, and all exhibits in Libby's case have been made public so far. Even though Fitzgerald successfully fought to get Libby's full grand jury testimony admitted into evidence, Libby's attorneys say the audiotapes should not be released outside the courtroom.

Defense attorney William Jeffress, who successfully argued a Supreme Court case that kept the Watergate tapes from being released, said in court Thursday that grand jury tapes are never meant to be made public.

He said he knew of no case in which such tapes have been released.

In the tapes, Libby discusses conversations he had regarding CIA officer Valerie Plame Wilson, the wife of a prominent Iraq war critic, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson. Her identity was leaked to reporters in 2003.

Nobody was charged with the leak. Fitzgerald said Libby learned her identity from Cheney and discussed it with journalists. Libby says that he forgot about his conversation with Cheney and that, when he heard about Valerie Wilson from a reporter weeks later, it struck him as new information.

Fitzgerald says Libby concocted that story to protect himself from prosecution, because repeating rumors from reporters was less serious than repeating sensitive information from Cheney.

If the tapes are released, they could be broadcast on television, radio and online. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he worried that would sensationalize an already public trial.

Attorneys for the Associated Press and more than a dozen other news organizations argued in court documents yesterday that the tapes should be made public. Libby's testimony is far less sensational, they wrote, than other tapes that have been released in court, such as 911 phone calls from inside the World Trade Center and FBI tapes from the Abscam investigation.

Walton said he would consider the matter over the weekend.

Libby Prosecutors Await Judge's Rulings (CNN)

By Paul Courson, Cnn Washington Bureau

CNN, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Prosecutors in the criminal trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby plan to rest their case as soon as Tuesday.

Nearly a dozen witnesses have taken the stand in the past two weeks. The last witness is expected to be Tim Russert, moderator of NBC's "Meet the Press."

Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, is fighting a five-count indictment including charges of perjury and obstruction of justice related to the public disclosure of a one-time operative at the CIA.

DOJ_NMG_0127512

Valerie Plame's identity was made public in a column by Robert Novak on July 14, 2003. Libby told a grand jury that Russert told him the operative's name four days earlier, but a former New York Times reporter testified last week that Libby gave her Plame's name the previous month.

Libby is not accused of leaking classified information, but Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald hopes to show Libby lied under oath trying to save his job.

"You may be involved in something that is a big mess in terms of law, in terms of politics and in terms of getting yourself fired," Fitzgerald said Thursday as he tried to establish Libby's state of mind with proposed evidence that could include newspaper articles Libby had saved in his office.

Fitzgerald on Thursday asserted he has proof as to what Libby "had in mind when he made up a story that says, 'You know what? I forgot everything that ever came from the vice president. That wasn't what I passed on. I passed on what came from Mr. Russert when Mr. Russert told me that all the reporters are saying it.' "

Fitzgerald wants the jury to consider two undisclosed newspaper articles Libby had saved in his office files. Defense attorneys have objected, saying the articles contain all manner of hearsay they would not be able to challenge in court.

U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton hopes to rule on the evidence by the time the trial resumes Monday and before the defense makes its case.

Libby resigned after he was indicted by a federal grand jury in October 2005.

The story started more than three years earlier, when former Ambassador Joseph Wilson made a trip to Africa in February 2002, investigating whether Iraq, under Saddam Hussein, had tried to acquire uranium from the African country of Niger.

Wilson told the CIA he doubted there were any transactions.

Almost a year later, President Bush asserted the disputed link between Iraq and Niger in his State of the Union address. The reference was later renounced by the head of the CIA, partly because of a firestorm caused by Wilson openly questioning the claim in a column in the New York Times.

By June 2003, information began circulating more widely among reporters that Plame was Wilson's wife and worked at the CIA, and among officials that Plame had arranged for her husband's trip, according to testimony in the Libby case.

Thursday, an FBI agent took the witness stand for the prosecution to describe the first Libby interview in connection with an investigation as to how Plame's name got out.

Defense attorney William Jeffress, on cross-examination of Agent Deborah Bond, recounted her report that Libby had told her "he had been told by the vice president during a telephone call that Mrs. Wilson worked at the CIA in the Counter Proliferation Division, correct?"

Agent Bond replied, "Yes, but that he had forgotten about it."

The phone call between Libby and Cheney took place on June 12, 2003, about a month before Libby says he first learned about Wilson's wife from NBC's Russert, according to testimony and documents presented at trial.

Since the jury was seated January 23, prosecutors have called witnesses from the CIA, the White House and the press. Testimony and evidence include handwritten notes by Libby, Cheney, the vice-president's spokeswoman, his legal counsel, and two reporters with knowledge of the story.

Courtroom devices have included audiotapes of Libby's secret grand jury testimony, videotapes of White House briefings, and opportunities for the members of the jury to hand questions to the judge to ask witnesses.

Prosecutors have hours of recordings of Libby's grand jury testimony they want to introduce as evidence.

But if Walton allows the recordings to be played in the courtroom, defense attorneys hope to block their public release. Walton indicates he is inclined to agree, as he tries to avoid exposing the nonsequestered members of the jury to media coverage of LIbby's trial.

As the second week drew to a close, Walton said coverage would become all the more "sensational" if the recordings were broadcast on news and talk programs.

Walton already was thinking of putting constraints on evidence and testimony admitted after Libby lawyer Ted Wells declared his intention to call Cheney to the witness stand.

Defense attorneys also have former CIA Director George Tenet and Rove on a list of proposed witnesses.

Why Dick Cheney Cracked Up (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

IN the days since Dick Cheney lost it on CNN, our nation's armchair shrinks have had a blast. The vice president who boasted of "enormous successes" in Iraq and barked "hogwash" at the congenitally mild Wolf Blitzer has been roundly judged delusional, pathologically dishonest or just plain nuts. But what else is new? We identified those diagnoses long ago. The more intriguing question is what ignited this particularly violent public flare-up.

DOJ_NMG_0127513

The answer can be found in the timing of the CNN interview, which was conducted the day after the start of the perjury trial of Mr. Cheney's former top aide, Scooter Libby. The vice president's on-camera crackup reflected his understandable fear that a White House cover-up was crumbling. He knew that sworn testimony in a Washington courtroom would reveal still more sordid details about how the administration lied to take the country into war in Iraq. He knew that those revelations could cripple the White House's current campaign to escalate that war and foment apocalyptic scenarios about Iran. Scariest of all, he knew that he might yet have to testify under oath himself.

Mr. Cheney, in other words, understands the danger this trial poses to the White House even as some of Washington remains oblivious. From the start, the capital has belittled the Joseph and Valerie Wilson affair as "a tempest in a teapot," as David Broder of The Washington Post reiterated just five months ago. When "all of the facts come out in this case, it's going to be laughable because the consequences are not that great," Bob Woodward said in 2005. Or, as Robert Novak suggested in 2003 before he revealed Ms. Wilson's identity as a C.I.A. officer in his column, "weapons of mass destruction or uranium from Niger" are "little elitist issues that don't bother most of the people." Those issues may not trouble Mr. Novak, but they do loom large to other people, especially those who sent their kids off to war over nonexistent weapons of mass destruction and nonexistent uranium.

In terms of the big issues, the question of who first leaked Ms. Wilson's identity (whether Mr. Libby, Richard Armitage, Ari Fleischer or Karl Rove) to which journalist (whether Mr. Woodward, Mr. Novak, Judith Miller or Matt Cooper) has always been a red herring. It's entirely possible that the White House has always been telling the truth when it says that no one intended to unmask a secret agent. (No one has been charged with that crime.) The White House is also telling the truth when it repeatedly says that Mr. Cheney did not send Mr. Wilson on his C.I.A.-sponsored African trip to check out a supposed Iraq-Niger uranium transaction. (Another red herring, since Mr. Wilson didn't make that accusation in the first place.)

But if the administration is telling the truth on these narrow questions and had little to hide about the Wilson trip per se, its wild overreaction to the episode was an incriminating sign it was hiding something else. According to testimony in the Libby case, the White House went berserk when Mr. Wilson published his Op-Ed article in The Times in July 2003 about what he didn't find in Africa. Top officials gossiped incessantly about both Wilsons to anyone who would listen, Mr. Cheney and Mr. Libby conferred about them several times a day, and finally Mr. Libby, known as an exceptionally discreet White House courtier, became so sloppy that his alleged lying landed him with five felony counts.

The explanation for the hysteria has long been obvious. The White House was terrified about being found guilty of a far greater crime than outing a C.I.A. officer: lying to the nation to hype its case for war. When Mr. Wilson, an obscure retired diplomat, touched that raw nerve, all the president's men panicked because they knew Mr. Wilson's modest finding in Africa was the tip of a far larger iceberg. They knew that there was still far more damning evidence of the administration's W.M.D. lies lurking in the bowels of the bureaucracy.

Thanks to the commotion caused by the leak case, that damning evidence has slowly dribbled out. By my count we now know of at least a half-dozen instances before the start of the Iraq war when various intelligence agencies and others signaled that evidence of Iraq's purchase of uranium in Africa might be dubious or fabricated. (These are detailed in the timelines at frankrich.com/timeline.htm.) The culmination of these warnings arrived in January 2003, the same month as the president's State of the Union address, when the White House received a memo from the National Intelligence Council, the coordinating body for all American spy agencies, stating unequivocally that the claim was baseless. Nonetheless President Bush brandished that fearful "uranium from Africa" in his speech to Congress as he hustled the country into war in Iraq.

If the war had been a cakewalk, few would have cared to investigate the administration's deceit at its inception. But by the time Mr. Wilson's Op-Ed article appeared — some five months after the State of the Union and two months after "Mission Accomplished" — there was something terribly wrong with the White House's triumphal picture. More than 60 American troops had been killed since Mr. Bush celebrated the end of "major combat operations" by prancing about an aircraft carrier. No W.M.D. had been found, and we weren't even able to turn on the lights in Baghdad. For the first time, more than half of Americans told a Washington Post-ABC News poll that the level of casualties was "unacceptable."

It was urgent, therefore, that the awkward questions raised by Mr. Wilson's revelation of his Africa trip be squelched as quickly as possible. He had to be smeared as an inconsequential has-been whose mission was merely a trivial boondoggle arranged by his wife. The C.I.A., which had actually resisted the uranium fictions, had to be strong-armed into taking the blame for the 16 errant words in the State of the Union speech.

What we are learning from Mr. Libby's trial is just what a herculean effort it took to execute this two-pronged cover-up after Mr. Wilson's article appeared. Mr. Cheney was the hands-on manager of the 24/7 campaign of press manipulation and high-stakes character assassination, with Mr. Libby as his chief hatchet man. Though Mr. Libby's lawyers are now arguing that their client was a sacrificial lamb thrown to the feds to shield Mr. Rove, Mr. Libby actually was — and still is — a stooge for the vice president.

DOJ_NMG_0127514

Whether he will go to jail for his misplaced loyalty is the human drama of his trial. But for the country there are bigger issues at stake, and they are not, as the White House would have us believe, ancient history. The administration propaganda flimflams that sold us the war are now being retrofitted to expand and extend it.

In a replay of the run-up to the original invasion, a new National Intelligence Estimate, requested by Congress in August to summarize all intelligence assessments on Iraq, was mysteriously delayed until last week, well after the president had set his surge. Even the declassified passages released on Friday — the grim takes on the weak Iraqi security forces and the spiraling sectarian violence — foretell that the latest plan for victory is doomed. (As a White House communications aide testified at the Libby trial, this administration habitually releases bad news on Fridays because "fewer people pay attention when it's reported on Saturday.")

A Pentagon inspector general's report, uncovered by Business Week last week, was also kept on the q.t.: it shows that even as more American troops are being thrown into the grinder in Iraq, existing troops lack the guns and ammunition to "effectively complete their missions." Army and Marine Corps commanders told The Washington Post that both armor and trucks were in such short supply that their best hope is that "five brigades of up-armored Humvees fall out of the sky."

Tomorrow is the fourth anniversary of Colin Powell's notorious W.M.D. pantomime before the United Nations Security Council, a fair amount of it a Cheney-Libby production. To mark this milestone, the White House is reviving the same script to rev up the war's escalation, this time hyping Iran-Iraq connections instead of Al Qaeda-Iraq connections. In his Jan. 10 prime-time speech on Iraq, Mr. Bush said that Iran was supplying "advanced weaponry and training to our enemies," even though the evidence suggests that Iran is actually in bed with our "friends" in Iraq, the Maliki government. The administration promised a dossier to back up its claims, but that too has been delayed twice amid reports of what The Times calls "a continuing debate about how well the information proved the Bush administration's case."

Call it a coincidence — though there are no coincidences — but it's only fitting that the Libby trial began as news arrived of the death of E. Howard Hunt, the former C.I.A. agent whose bungling of the Watergate break-in sent him to jail and led to the unraveling of the Nixon presidency two years later. Still, we can't push the parallels too far. No one died in Watergate. This time around our country can't wait two more years for the White House to be stopped from playing its games with American blood.

Libby Prosecutors Hope To Show Marked News Articles (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The day of his interview with the FBI, Vice President Cheney's then-top aide hand-marked copies of two Washington Post articles about the breadth of a criminal leak investigation -- and underlined were passages suggesting that any official who had told reporters about a CIA officer could be in legal jeopardy, prosecutors said in court filings yesterday.

Government prosecutors argued that the October 2003 articles -- stored in former chief of staff I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's personal folders, and printed from the Internet at his request -- show that Libby had a motive to lie about his secret conversations with reporters and knew that he could be in trouble.

The prosecutors are urging presiding U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton to let the articles be placed into evidence so the jury can see them.

Libby told investigators in 2004 that he kept and read the articles, according to the filings, and that he may have underlined the key passages about criminal liability and investigators' interest in any officials' discussions with reporters about CIA officer Valerie Plame.

Plame's name was revealed in a syndicated column by Robert D. Novak on July 14, 2003 -- eight days after her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify war with Iraq.

Defense attorneys argued in competing filings yesterday that the Oct. 4 and Oct. 12 articles, written by Walter Pincus and Mike Allen, would prejudice the jury against Libby.

They say the articles are "inflammatory" because they indicate that Plame had been engaged in covert work in recent years and that revelations about her identity could harm national security interests -- both issues that, they argue, the judge has ruled are not relevant to Libby's trial.

Libby Trial Reveals What Prosecutor Wouldn't (CNN)

By Kevin Bohn, CNN Washington Bureau

CNN.com, February 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127515

In our Behind the Scenes series, CNN correspondents and producers share their experiences in covering news and analyze the stories behind the events. CNN's Kevin Bohn has been in the courtroom as the perjury and obstruction trial of the vice president's former chief of staff has unfolded.

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- As the trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby goes on, we are learning more and more about special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald's investigation, which was prompted by the leak that Valerie Plame was an undercover CIA agent.

Fitzgerald was appointed in December 2003 to oversee the probe, which originally was being led by the Justice Department's criminal division.

The only public comment Fitzgerald made about the case before the trial began was in his news conference in October 2005.

Libby, the vice president's former chief of staff, is charged with lying to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating who leaked Plame's identity to the press.

Now we learning what witnesses told FBI agents or testified before a grand jury, and we are gaining more insight through the release of many documents related to the case.

Those range from a mundane calendar of then-Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman to the often-talked about memo from the State Department's intelligence unit about former ambassador Joseph Wilson's 2002 trip to investigate claims that Iraq was trying to obtain uranium in Africa.

We have seen correspondence between the Justice Department and Fitzgerald's office and Vice President Dick Cheney's office asking for documents, as well as subpoenas that were issued.

In fact, David Addington, the vice president's current chief of staff, says his office handed over more than 12,000 documents as part of the probe, including many handwritten notes from Libby himself.

Some of those notes had to be analyzed by experts to figure out exactly what Libby was saying since his handwriting is notoriously bad.

One of the more intriguing exhibits was the handwritten note from the vice president in which he appears to talk about how Libby should not be made a scapegoat.

"Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy (the words 'the Pres.' are marked out) that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," Cheney wrote.Jurors questioning witnesses

One unusual thing in this trial: allowing the jurors to ask questions of witnesses. Lawyers say it's rare in federal courtrooms but occurring more in some federal trials.

The presiding judge, Reggie Walton, is a former superior court judge where this practice is more common. Some lawyers say there is a lot of discussion about this type of activity to try to get the jury more involved and to allow them to address any doubts they might have.

Jurors have so far posed several questions for most of the witnesses.

When prosecutors and defense attorneys are finished with the witness, the jurors are given the chance to write questions on note cards which are handed to the judge. He and the lawyers on both sides then have a conference to decide if the questions are appropriate for this witness or if they ask for speculation, whether they involve classified information, or whether they are asking about issues too far afield.

One of the questions posed by the jury for former New York Times reporter Judith Miller was, "Why did you make the decision to go to jail?"

Miller had discussed it briefly in her earlier testimony. In answer to the juror's question she said, "Because everything that I do and I have done in Washington -- all of my reporting depended on people coming to me and being able to trust me that I would protect them."

For former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, one juror wanted to know more about the procedure used to make sure he understood an official was discussing classified information with him.

Many of the questions asked about specific points raised during testimony of the various witnesses, which seemed to indicate the jurors were paying pretty close attention.

There are several questions the judge has said he couldn't ask. One of them involved a request for classified information that caused the judge and lawyers to talk for an extended period. Eventually, the judge denied the request for the specific document.Journalists also on trial

Libby is not the only person being scrutinized in this trial. Several high-profile journalists have testified and others are expected to be called.

How journalists keep their notes, where they keep their notes and how they interpret attribution for information they were given have come under the microscope. There have been legal fights over the journalists' notes.

Some major points of stories weren't in their notes. Under cross-examination, Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper admitted there is no reference to the quote he says Libby gave him confirming that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA. Defense attorneys also pointed out some of the sloppiness in Cooper's note taking.

When Miller explained that she had found about 50 notebooks in a shopping bag under her desk, defense attorney William Jeffress asked, "Was this standard method used for archiving your notes?"

After some in the courtroom chuckled, Miller responded "No. I was actually intending to take them home" but didn't get a chance to before she was jailed for contempt for refusing to discuss her sources with the grand jury.

Miller refused to answer questions from other reporters Wednesday afternoon after she had been grilled by Libby's attorneys. She was heard to tell her attorney that she was relieved it was over.

F.B.I. Investigating Complaint Against California Lawmaker (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer, Philip Shenon

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 3 — The Federal Bureau of Investigation is investigating whether Representative Gary G. Miller, Republican of California, improperly used an unusual tax provision to avoid paying capital gains taxes on profits from land sales to California cities, law enforcement and government officials said.

Last summer, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a watchdog group, filed a complaint with the Internal Revenue Service saying that Mr. Miller had failed to pay capital gains tax on the 2002 sale of 165 acres in Monrovia, Calif.

The complaint said Mr. Miller invoked a rarely used provision that allows tax deferment if the land that is sold is facing an eminent domain threat and the protected proceeds are reinvested within two years.

Mr. Miller, who would have faced about a 30 percent tax on the property under a normal sale, used the roughly $10 million in profits from the Monrovia sale to buy property in Fontana, Calif., from Lewis Operating Corp., one of his major campaign contributors, and then resold some of that land to the City of Fontana in 2005 and later in 2006.

Mr. Miller requested and was provided with letters from each city saying that they had the power to invoke eminent domain, said his spokesman, Scott Toussaint.

On Thursday, Mr. Toussaint said that Mr. Miller used the same tax deferment on the Fontana land sales, but on Friday said that he had not, and that Mr. Miller had paid back taxes to Monrovia.

Mr. Toussaint declined to provide documentation of those payments.

Mr. Toussaint added that Mr. Miller had no knowledge of an F.B.I. investigation, and that the congressman, whose district snakes along a narrow swath of Los Angeles, Orange and San Bernardino Counties, had requested that the House Ethics Committee review the deals.

The committee has declined to comment on whether it has conducted an investigation. The committee's spokesman did not return a phone call for comment on Friday.

In recent weeks, the F.B.I. has interviewed current and former officials from Monrovia, said the city's spokesman, Dick Singer, and requested a videotape of a 2000 City Council meeting in which Mr. Miller appears, asking the council to buy his land.

Mr. Singer said in an interview that the city was interested in buying the land from Mr. Miller to avoid development on the site, which was later turned into a wildlife preserve.

The city passed a ballot measure to raise tax money from residents to match state funds to help buy the land, as well as parcels owned by other potential developers, but eminent domain was never invoked.

Mr. Singer said that Mr. Miller did request, and was given, a letter suggesting that the land could be condemned.

"We use eminent domain very, very, rarely," Mr. Singer said, saying its use was almost exclusively limited to commercial-use properties in areas where the city wants to develop housing.

"In 30 years we have done as much redevelopment as anyone in the country, and we have used it maybe a half-dozen times."

A former mayor of Monrovia, Lara Larramendi, has told reporters that she was contacted by investigators and that eminent domain was never mentioned in letters to Mr. Miller.

Reached Friday, Ms. Larramendi said she had been advised to not answer further press questions.

Multiple calls and an e-mail message to Kenneth Hunt, Fontana's city manager, were not returned, but in published reports, Mr. Hunt is quoted as saying that the city did not have eminent domain authority in the areas where Mr. Miller bought the land.

"You get a sense from the whole transaction that there is an unseemly underbelly of contacts and connections that, if not illegal, is deeply troubling," said Shaun P. Martin, a law professor at the University of San Diego. "Things are happening in this case that do not happen to regular people."

DOJ_NMG_0127517

This week, Mr. Miller threatened to sue the City of Monrovia if it did not “retract or correct any misstatements made to the media or any governmental agencies” about the sale of the land.

“It was our feeling based on those letters that Miller had committed fraud,” said Melanie Sloan, the executive director of the watchdog group that filed the complaint with the I.R.S. “There was no eminent domain and therefore he had no business claiming it.”

In Washington, Mr. Miller sits on the Financial Services Committee and is the ranking Republican member of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations.

Former Manchester Mayor Arrested (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), February 4, 2007

DAUGH WHITE BEING HELD ON FEDERAL CHARGES

Federal authorities have arrested a longtime Eastern Kentucky mayor who lost re-election last November.

Former Manchester Mayor Daugh K. White was being held yesterday at the Laurel County Detention Center on federal charges, the facility confirmed. The charge against White was not available.

The FBI raided Manchester City Hall last October and seized a variety of records, but has not disclosed the nature of its investigation.

However, a state audit released in December said that while White was mayor, the city misused taxpayers' money by paving more than 30 private driveways, making undocumented loans to employees and private companies and paying for personal travel expenses of city workers.

A spokesman for state Auditor Crit Luallen said the office had given a copy of its findings to the FBI, and current Mayor Carmen Lewis said questions from FBI agents indicated city finances are a focus of the inquiry. No information was available yesterday on whether charges against White had anything to do with that case.

Lewis beat White, a seven-term incumbent, in November after an aggressive campaign.

White becomes the third Clay County public figure arrested by federal authorities in the last few months.

Federal Indictment Of Fumo Is Expected Soon (PHI)

By John Shiffman, Mario F. Cattabiani And Craig R. Mccoy

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 4, 2007

The four-year investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo is coming to an end, and lawyers familiar with the case expect him to be indicted soon, possibly as early as Tuesday.

Fumo, one of the most powerful politicians in Pennsylvania, last year received a target letter - a formal notice that he is likely to face charges related to the fraud and obstruction-of-justice probe.

Fumo recently told people close to him to brace for an indictment, and has assured them that he will vigorously fight the charges.

"He's looking forward to clearing his name," said a person close to the Philadelphia Democrat. "He's kind of relieved the investigation is coming to a close."

Since 2003, the FBI and IRS have grilled everyone from Fumo's florist to a Senate-paid private eye. Agents have scrutinized Fumo's yacht trips, his finances, his use of legislative staff - and his aides' alleged cover-up.

But the heart of the case appears to be whether Fumo illegally exploited a multimillion-dollar South Philadelphia charity to fund his personal and political agenda - using it, as one person close to the case put it, "as his personal piggy bank."

The charity, Citizens' Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, is funded mainly by public dollars and Peco Energy donations - most of the money won with Fumo's influence or help.

Early on, agents scrutinized those donations. Now, instead of pursuing how the money was raised, they are focused on how it was spent.

The Inquirer previously reported that the charity paid for political polls and secretly funded a lawsuit against a Fumo political rival.

The Inquirer has learned from sources that authorities are also investigating whether the charity bought Fumo household items and provided its SUVs - a Ford Expedition and a Lincoln Navigator - for Fumo to use on vacation.

Last week in Harrisburg, Fumo walked away without answering when asked whether he expected to be charged.

Fumo, who has served in the state Senate for nearly three decades, has said the investigation is politically inspired by the Bush White House.

Now 63, he has long been respected and at times feared for his intelligence, political instincts, and network of appointees and allies.

DOJ_NMG_0127518

Fumo has faced criminal charges before, only to prevail against them.

In 1973, five years before he became a senator, he was arrested on charges of vote fraud, but the charges were quickly withdrawn.

In 1980, a federal jury convicted him of putting "ghost" employees on the state payroll, but a judge threw out the conviction, a decision affirmed on appeal.

Citizens' Alliance was founded in 1991 by Fumo allies, including two legislative aides.

One was Ruth Arnao, a close friend and a senior staffer in Fumo's legislative office in South Philadelphia until 2004. Until recently, Arnao, 51, was executive director of Citizens' Alliance. She, too, received a target letter last year. Her lawyer did not return phone calls seeking comment Friday.

The senator has extolled the charity's good works: rehabbing the Passyunk Avenue commercial strip, subsidizing charter schools, and doling out grants to the likes of the St. Edmunds Golden Age Club, a legal clinic for the disabled, and the Anti-Defamation League.

FBI and IRS agents began investigating Fumo's relationship to Citizens' Alliance in 2004 after The Inquirer reported that the charity had collected millions of dollars in donations from unidentified sources.

The newspaper later revealed that the money had come from Peco Energy and the Delaware River Port Authority.

Peco secretly gave the charity $17 million as part of legal settlements in which Fumo agreed to drop his opposition to its business plans, the paper revealed. The senator has noted that Peco also agreed to cut bills to consumers as part of the settlements.

Fumo, long a power on the port authority, used his clout to obtain $10 million for Citizens' Alliance. The port authority is largely funded by tolls paid on its bridges and the PATCO commuter train.

Aside from the Peco and port authority money, Citizens' Alliance has received more than $4 million in state and other government grants.

As the federal probe nears its end, people knowledgeable about the inquiry say prosecutors have dropped the idea of bringing charges related to the Peco donations.

One source explained that prosecutors had concluded the donations weren't a crime because they had come as part of settlements in "real litigation," including a dispute over utility deregulation.

Fumo has portrayed his role in Citizens' Alliance as a patron.

"I don't get any benefits from it," Fumo said during a 2004 radio interview. "In fact, once in a while, I think they've picked up trash at my house and I've paid them $100 a month."

Trash pickup wasn't all that Citizens' Alliance did for Fumo, a source said.

On occasion, Fumo legislative aides drove Citizens' Alliance SUVs to Martha's Vineyard so Fumo could use them when he flew in for his annual vacations, according to a source familiar with the trips.

In a recent written response to Inquirer questions, Fumo's lawyer, Richard A. Sprague, said Fumo's work as a senator did not "cease even when he is on 'vacation.' "

Sprague said Fumo's Senate staff would drive office equipment to him - "computers, fax machines, etc."

"Sen. Fumo has long had the reputation as a tireless public servant whose efforts on behalf of Pennsylvania are not compressed into a 9-to-5, Monday through Friday schedule," Sprague wrote. "To the contrary, Sen. Fumo and his staff work 24/7 at the job of being the most effective Senate office in the commonwealth."

While Fumo has generally declined to talk about the investigation, his supporters have dismissed the inquiry as a witch-hunt that has ignored the good work of Citizens' Alliance and sought to criminalize mistakes and legitimate spending.

In reference to the lawsuit, the polls, and alleged obstruction of justice, Fumo's supporters offer explanations:

In 2001, the charity anonymously funded a legal challenge to then-Republican State Sen. Robert Jubelirer, a Fumo political enemy. The suit unsuccessfully sought to stop Jubelirer from serving simultaneously in the Senate and as lieutenant governor. Sprague has said the charity's payment was justified because the issue was of "great public importance." He suggested that the secrecy had been necessary to protect the nonprofit from "retaliation from the very officials involved in the litigation."

In 2002 and 2003, Citizens' Alliance paid more than $200,000 for political polling. After questions were raised, one of the senator's campaign funds reimbursed the charity. Fumo's supporters say it was an accounting error.

Last year, two former Senate aides, Leonard Luchko and Mark Eister, were charged with obstruction of justice, accused of deleting Fumo office e-mail as part of an effort to thwart the FBI investigation. In court filings, prosecutors have said they are investigating whether Fumo was involved in that alleged cover-up.

Fumo staffers have said that long before the investigation began, office policy required employees to delete old e-mail on a regular basis.

Prosecutors have tried to get Luchko and Eister to testify against Fumo - without success. Their lawyers say Luchko and Eister have done nothing wrong and have nothing bad to say about Fumo.

The grand jury investigating Fumo is set to expire within two weeks. Prosecutors have said they will complete their investigation by then.

Already, the grand jury has heard a mountain of evidence, generating thousands of pages of transcripts, a court filing shows.

FBI agents and prosecutors have issued scores of subpoenas. Seized e-mails alone run for 40,000 pages, prosecutors have said.

One other focus of the case has been Fumo's use of luxury yachts of the Independence Seaport Museum, where he sits on the board.

The museum leased one such boat for Fumo in 2001 at a cost of $13,375. He reimbursed the museum for the cruise in April 2004, three months after news of the investigation broke and more than 21/2 years after the trip, The Inquirer has learned.

Agents have conducted hundreds of interviews, seeking information from City Council members tied to Fumo, from the senator's political advisers - and from Frank Wallace, the private detective who has been retained by the state Senate Appropriations Committee.

Wallace's lawyer, Frank DeSimone, declined to comment Friday. It is not known why the FBI spoke with Wallace.

Two weeks ago, two of Fumo's close friends, South Philadelphia florists Jerry and Ann Catania, were seen trudging into the grand jury area. Their lawyer, Michael M. Mustokoff, declined to comment, and it could not be learned why the Catanias had been called to testify.

Fumo has long used the Catanias' business, Ten Pennies, to garland political fund-raisers. Since 2003, records show, Fumo's campaigns have paid the florists $176,000.

FBI Probe Of Perata Apparently In Limbo (SANMCT)

By Steven Harmon, MEDIANEWS SACRAMENTO BUREAU

San Mateo County Times, February 4, 2007

State senator seems unconcerned with investigation into campaign spending

SACRAMENTO — Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata has spent nearly $1 million defending himself against a federal probe into whether he illegally funneled money to family and close associates.

But more than two years after the harsh light of suspicion first fell on the 61-year-old East Bay Democrat, the FBI investigation appears to have fallen quietly into a black hole of obscurity.

The flurry of subpoenas flying out of FBI offices in San Francisco has slowed to an apparent stop. There haven't been any publicly acknowledged FBI interviews of witnesses since last summer. Images of FBI investigators carting off computer files and papers from Perata's home have faded. The urgency to defend Perata has also waned: Money going into Perata's legal defense fund has essentially dried up, and his debts are nearly all paid up.

Perata has walled himself and his staff from the investigation by handing all legal issues to his Sacramento-based law firms: Stevens & O'Connell, which serves as his main counsel, and Olson, Hagel & Fishburn, which specializes in campaign finance law. Democratic political consultant, Jason Kinney, a former political aide to former Gov. Gray Davis, is handling public relations duties for Perata.

"This situation — we don't even call it an investigation — doesn't touch him in any way," Kinney said. "He's been forced to put together a legal team so they can be prepared for anything that comes along ... and so he can focus 100 percent of his energies on rebuilding California, the needs of his caucus and constituents. Rarely do these worlds intertwine."

Advertisement

Perhaps one measure of Perata's concern over the probe can be discerned from his defense fund, which now totals $168.22. After receiving $441,000 in contributions in 2005, the fund took in just $5,150 in contributions last year, according to campaign finance reports released this week.

Not only has fundraising slowed, so has spending. Having shelled out $682,305 from his defense fund in 2005, last year Perata spent $283,609 to cover debts — and $260,000 of that was covered by a transfer from his campaign committee, Taxpayers for Perata.

Having paid $965,914 total in legal expenses, he still owes $55,255 to his lawyers.

The original charges centered on payments that Perata's campaign committees, or side committees controlled by friends, made to Perata's relatives and close associates for campaign work. Some of that money went back to Perata for rent or consulting services.

Timothy Staples, a longtime friend and former college roommate, got similar treatment. A pair of political consulting businesses Staples ran received contracts from committees financed by the senator's campaign donors. Staples paid Perata more than $200,000 for consulting services in 2002 and 2003. Perata has since severed business relations with Staples.

Perata refuses to talk about the investigation with reporters and it appears to be a nonissue in the Capitol. In fact, he has never been stronger as the leader of the Senate, having just been re-elected by his caucus without a whiff of a challenge that would seem certain if anyone sensed he was vulnerable.

He made full use of his position to help usher one of the Legislature's most productive sessions last year, and took the lead in the successful campaign to pass $37.3 billion in infrastructure bonds.

Perata has appeared unfazed through it all, plowing through the daily demands of being leader and remaining unbridled in his views. He has regular meetings with the governor and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez, D-Los Angeles, has maintained a visible presence at the Capitol, and has even advocated extending his own term limits and, hence, his power as leader of the Senate.

But no one knows if another shoe is out there ready to drop. The FBI has made no comment on where the investigation is, whether they're about to indict or if they're ready to close up shop — and a spokeswoman said they won't comment. They don't even have to inform Perata if they've already abandoned their investigation, she said.

The apparent disarray in the U.S. Attorney's Northern District office may be Perata's biggest ally. More than half of the 101 federal prosecutors have left the office since Ryan, the Bush-appointed U.S. attorney, took over in 2002. The lead prosecutor on Perata's case, Ben Burch, left in 2005 for a spot on the Superior Court bench in Contra Costa County.

Trying to read into it has been a waste of time — whether the silence is a good or a bad sign — Kinney said. So Perata has taken a page from former President Bill Clinton, who stared down an endless array of investigations: He's learned to compartmentalize.

"I've never seen it affect Don," said former Senate President Pro Tem John Burton, a longtime friend. "If you know you didn't do anything, it doesn't bother you. It's obvious to me that Don feels secure in his own probity and he's just going ahead in his job. It says something about his inner strength. Seeing him, talking to him, you wouldn't even think he's got a care in the world."

Contact Steven Harmon at sharmon@cctimes.com or (916) 441-2101.

FBI Investigates High-level Aide To Sheriff (STPPP)

By Mara H. Gottfried

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, February 4, 2007

Ramsey County Sheriff Bob Fletcher said Friday the FBI is investigating a high-level civilian aide in his department.

Mark Naylon, a public information officer and Fletcher's friend, is being investigated for allegations of criminal conduct, the sheriff said.

Fletcher declined to detail the allegations. No other county employees were being investigated, he said.

Naylon, 46, didn't return calls Friday. His lawyer, Paul Rogosheske, declined to comment.

The allegations are ones the FBI "is obligated to investigate," Fletcher said.

If they prove true, Fletcher said, "I would be shocked, but I'll let the investigation run its course."

Fletcher hired Naylon in 1998. Naylon served as best man at Fletcher's wedding in 2004. Fletcher narrowly defeated former St. Paul Police Chief Bill Finney in November to win another term.

The FBI contacted Fletcher about its investigation into Naylon for the first time Friday and asked for a meeting, the sheriff said. Agents requested documents and access to employees for interviews. Fletcher said his office is cooperating.

An FBI spokesman said the agency does not confirm or deny whether an investigation is taking place.

The sheriff's office will launch an internal affairs investigation, Fletcher said. Naylon is on vacation out of state and his employment status with the department didn't change Friday, Fletcher said.

"Typically, we take the approach that a person is innocent until proven guilty," Fletcher said.

When Fletcher hired Naylon as public information officer, his friend didn't have a background in law enforcement or media relations.

"He's certainly one of the hardest workers at the sheriff's office," said Fletcher, who added that information from Naylon's community contacts has led to "dozens of felony arrests."

Naylon, who has lobbied for the sheriff's office at the Legislature, is hoping to get a part-time peace officer's license and start a career in law enforcement this year, Fletcher said. Naylon's salary is $64,660.

Naylon's name surfaced in a gambling investigation by the Minnesota Department of Public Safety's Alcohol and Gambling Enforcement Division in 2003.

The investigation focused on Naylon's friend, Michael Ogren, who then owned a bar called Rock in Maplewood.

Acting on a tip, investigators raided the bar July 14, 2003, and found people playing blackjack, craps and roulette. That night, Ogren told investigators he sent gambling proceeds from his annual game nights at the bar to Fletcher's re-election campaign.

"I think in the past couple of years we can go back, I have the canceled checks from right after this tournament that can substantiate that," Ogren said, according to a transcript of the interview.

The next day, Fletcher directed a sheriff's inspector to ask state investigators to interview Ogren about his allegation and investigate further, according to a July 2003 sheriff's office memo.

According to the same memo, the state Department of Public Safety declined to pursue the allegation. A state investigator there told the sheriff's department inspector that investigating the Fletcher allegation "doesn't fit" the department's job and that it "doesn't care where the money goes," according to the memo.

On July 16, 2003, the sheriff's inspector interviewed Ogren, who recanted his statement about routing gambling proceeds to Fletcher's campaign.

Ogren told the inspector that making the allegation about Fletcher was "stupid on my part" and "a bad case of judgment," according to a transcript of the interview.

In the meantime, the commissioner's office of the Department of Public Safety reviewed Ogren's allegation and referred it to the FBI, according to Assistant Commissioner Tim Leslie.

Leslie said he does not know what became of the referral.

In October 2003, the Ramsey County Attorney's Office charged Ogren with gambling, a felony. Ogren did not enter a plea of guilty or not guilty. He agreed to complete 100 hours of community service and, after remaining law abiding for one year, the county attorney's office dropped the charge against him.

Ogren did not return a call Friday.

Naylon was deposed in 2005 as part of an unrelated lawsuit against the sheriff's department. Naylon said in the deposition that he was gambling at the Rock bar the night of the raid, but left before investigators arrived. He was not arrested or charged.

"They gamble everywhere," Naylon said when a lawyer questioned him about gambling. "Why is it illegal? … I don't think gambling's a crime."

Ogren now owns the Myth nightclub in Maplewood. Fletcher said Naylon moonlights for Ogren as security director at Myth.

Mara H. Gottfried can be reached at mgottfried@pioneerpress.com or 651-228-5262.

Fletcher Aide Under FBI Probe Had Wide Reach (MINNST)

By Paul McEnroe, Mary Lynn Smith And Howie Padilla, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 4, 2007

Though not a sworn deputy, the public information officer has been credited with playing a key role in the Ramsey County Sheriff's Office.

Ramsey County Sheriff Bob Fletcher says his department has made "dozens, if not hundreds of arrests," based on the connections of his public information officer, Mark Naylon.

Those connections also appear to be why Naylon finds himself the target of an FBI investigation into allegations that he stole money, tampered with evidence and tipped off suspects and informants.

On Friday, FBI agents spent more than an hour in Fletcher's office informing him that Naylon was under criminal investigation. Agents seized Naylon's files and his office computer. Sources have told the Star Tribune that the FBI is particularly interested in Naylon's relationship with the Hell's Outcasts motorcycle gang, which has a history of gun and drug trafficking.

Naylon, who Fletcher said is on vacation out of state, couldn't be reached. Calls to his home and cell phone Saturday were not answered.

The probe has put Fletcher, who was elected to a fourth four-year term in November, on the defensive. He hired Naylon, whom he describes as a "great friend," to be the department's spokesman in 1998, though Naylon had no experience in law enforcement or in media relations.

Officially, Naylon is the office's public information officer. Fletcher said that Naylon also has played a key role for the office's interaction with drug and gun task forces.

While Naylon had no formal training or experience for the post, Fletcher lauds him for his work.

Fletcher said Naylon received a commendation letter from the FBI for his assistance in identifying the SpongeBob SquarePants bank robber, who in 2005 was convicted of robbing a Minneapolis TCF bank.

"He shares the passion of law enforcement," Fletcher said Friday. "Although he's not a sworn officer, he's been very valuable to the department."

Naylon grew up on St. Paul's East Side, graduated from Johnson High in 1978 and briefly attended then-Mankato State University. In 1992, he became business manager of a 4,000-member local laborers and construction union and held the job until 1998, when he resigned to work for Fletcher.

While with the union, he also co-owned a bar, Moose's Locker, on St. Paul's East Side. On his liquor license application, Naylon listed Fletcher, then-Hennepin County Sheriff Pat McGowan and then-St. Paul Mayor Norm Coleman as character references. The bar has since closed.

Fletcher, who was introduced to Naylon through a mutual friend in the St. Paul Police Department, has benefited from Naylon's political connections. One of the sheriff's favorite projects was to help establish the Minnesota Gang Strike Force, and Naylon lobbied on his behalf at the Legislature.

But records also show that, while working for Fletcher, Naylon also was a registered lobbyist several years ago for horse racing gambling interests, insurance companies and a bank.

Fletcher said Friday he didn't know whether Naylon, whose county salary is about $63,000 a year, actively lobbied for these groups while being paid by taxpayers. Fletcher said he also does not know much about Naylon's off-duty jobs.

Naylon runs a private security business that uses moonlighting Ramsey County deputies at Minnesota's largest nightclub, Myth, which is in Maplewood. That bar is owned by Naylon's friend, Mike Ogren, who was charged with illegal gambling when his former bar, the Rock, was raided by state gambling enforcement agents in 2003.

While agents were questioning witnesses, Naylon showed up at the bar to make sure that his friend didn't think he had given information leading to bust, according to court documents. Ogren told state investigators that the gambling proceeds were going into Fletcher's reelection fund. Days later, Ogren recanted his statement when questioned by two county investigators, who had been sent there on Fletcher's orders.

Naylon frequently shows up at crime scenes. Some deputies and authorities from other agencies have complained about his presence.

Within months of Naylon's hiring, Ramsey deputies first got a glimpse into Naylon's style. During a 1999 standoff, Naylon was accused of endangering deputies who were hiding and surrounding a house. He drove onto the scene, his headlights illuminating the deputies, according to a memo sent to a supervisor.

"I do not know what police training Naylon has, but putting an untrained civilian into these situations endangering deputies is obviously not a good idea," wrote then-Sgt. R.J. Sanchez

Fletcher dismissed Naylon's behavior, chalking it up to "enthusiasm." Fletcher didn't discipline Naylon. Fletcher said he "coached" him.

Since then, Fletcher said, he can't recall any formal or informal complaints about Naylon, only compliments.

pmcenroe@startribune.com · 612-673-1645 mlsmith@startribune.com · 612-518-8337 hpadilla@startribune.com · 612-590-2637

Indiana Killings Stir Fear Among Homeless (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

The first two bodies were found on a hunch in early January in South Bend, Ind., during a search of an old industrial part town. Two police officers popped open the lid of a manhole and down there, beaten to death and stacked upright one above the other, were two missing men, Michael S. Nolan Jr. and Michael W. Lawson.

Just three days later, as the investigation expanded, the police opened another manhole about 100 yards away from the first and found two more men, Jason A. Coates and Brian Talboom, their bodies bludgeoned and discarded underground the same way.

To one officer on the scene, Sgt. David Wells, the discovery seemed more like something from a dark crime drama than anything that tranquil and academic South Bend had ever experienced. “It was really horrific,” Sergeant Wells said. “And really perplexing.”

The four men had only two things in common: they lived together in a burned-out building that they had painstakingly transformed into a makeshift home. And they made money by “scrapping” — hunting the urban landscape for increasingly valuable and marketable metals like copper and brass to sell to recyclers and construction businesses.

On Saturday night, the police announced that two homeless men had been arrested and charged with murder in the four deaths, said Capt. Jeffrey Walters of the South Bend Police Department.

The men, Daniel J. Sharp, 56, and Randy L. Reeder, 50, were being held in St. Joseph County, Ind., and Berrien County, Mich., respectively, according to The Associated Press. The police said Mr. Sharp and Mr. Reeder killed the four men because they believed they had stolen salvaged scrap metal that Mr. Sharp and Mr. Reeder had intended to sell.

DOJ_NMG_0127523

The killings have fostered a sense of dread in the unusually tight-knit community of homeless men and women in South Bend. “I don’t go out at night anymore,” said James Manns, 45, who is living in a homeless shelter near downtown. “All we can do is step back and see if it happens again.”

These sorts of feelings represent a reversal for many. Particularly among the homeless, the quiet college town of South Bend cemented its reputation for tolerance and hospitality a long time ago. For years, it has been the place to go from around the region for emergency shelter, free meals, and even shots of hope, some said, from myriad charities and service groups. An accurate count is hard to come by but some of the larger shelters in this city of 107,000 can accommodate up to 200 people a night and are almost always full.

Sergeant Wells said before the arrests that the police thought the slayings of the four homeless men were neither a case of random violence nor the work of a serial killer, and they believed the killings were connected with the scrapping business.

Scrappers in an old rust-belt factory town like South Bend can make hundreds of dollars out of a single haul mining the mechanical past if, they are crafty and strong enough. Many scrappers team up for added manpower, as the four friends had done.

Some of what scrappers do involves demolition of abandoned property — ripping out pipes and electrical tubing — but often they tread into what is simply theft, the police said. They leave behind aggrieved property owners and, often, face turf wars over territory.

“We have both supply and demand here,” said Capt. Philip A. Trent, a spokesman for the South Bend Police Department. He noted the high number of derelict buildings around town and that there were plenty of people desperate enough to engage in the dangerous, backbreaking work. “Add it all up, and you’ve got a cottage industry — and a profitable one at that.”

The police first interviewed Mr. Sharp on Wednesday and noticed that his boots matched some forensic evidence from the building, Tim Corbett, commander of the St. Joseph County homicide unit told The Associated Press.

Mr. Sharp confessed to the police on Friday that he and Mr. Reeder killed the other men sometime between Dec. 18 and Dec. 21, according to The Associated Press. Forensic evidence in the building confirmed Mr. Sharp’s account, Mr. Corbett said.

While Mr. Lawson, 53, Mr. Nolan, 40, Mr. Talboom, 51, and Mr. Coates, 29, lived on their own, and they were well known among the staff and residents of several local shelters, where they would sometimes stop for food, or to do odd jobs. Over the years, the four had also lived off and on in various shelters.

“I’m just upset. I knew those guys. Good guys, all of them,” said Jim Holleman, who was spending one night last week at the Hope Rescue Mission shelter near downtown.

Just days before they were killed, the men offered what they considered a “guest room” to Matthew Miller, who had been kicked out of a shelter for drinking alcohol. Mr. Miller said he had run into Mr. Lawson at the neighborhood library, where he passed the time on many cold days.

“Mike said: ‘You don’t have to be on the street. Come stay at our building,’ ” Mr. Miller said. “So I did for about three days, then I got back into the shelter. Three days after that, I heard about him being missing.”

Mr. Miller, 30, said he was so distraught by the killings that he could not get out of bed for days, not even to attend the memorial services.

“My anxiety went up so high since then,” he said. “I miss them. And I don’t go places alone after dark by myself like I used to. A lot of people feel that way, they won’t go anywhere around here by themselves anymore.”

Mich. Translator In Iraq Sentenced For Offering Bribe (AP)

AP, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A suburban Detroit man who worked as a translator in Iraq was sentenced today to three years in prison for offering a bribe to a police official for the purchase of armored vests and other equipment for $1 million.

Faheem Mousa Salam, 29, was sentenced in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia by Judge Richard J. Leon, according to a statement from the Justice Department.

Salam, of Livonia, pleaded guilty on Aug. 4 to violating the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

He admitted that he offered $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, prosecutors said. Salam said he had 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer to sell.

Salam tried to complete the sale with someone he believed was an official of the training group, but who actually was an undercover agent of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction. Salam offered the agent a separate payment of $28,000 to $35,000 for his help.

Salam was arrested in March. He was an employee of the Titan Corp., a government contractor working in Iraq.

Prosecutors said at Friday's sentencing that Salam was motivated by greed, not a desire to provide troops with equipment.

Fulton Man Indicted For Child Pornography (JEFFCNT)

Jefferson City (MO) News Tribune, February 4, 2007

David Matthew McCormick is facing new federal charges after a grand jury on Friday issued a new indictment in his case.

Bradley J. Schlozman, the United States Attorney for the Western District of Missouri, announced in a Friday news release the federal grand jury in Jefferson City added a charge in its new, two-count indictment that replaces one issued last Nov. 6.

McCormick, 20, now is charged with possessing child pornography on April 27, 2005, and distributing child pornography over the Internet on March 26, 2005.

Friday's indictment also includes a forfeiture allegation, which would require McCormick to give the government any property used to commit the alleged crimes, including two computer hard drives, a computer tower, a compact disc and a cellular camera telephone.

Schlozman said the case is being brought as part of "Project Safe Childhood," a nationwide federal Justice Department initiative designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse launched in February 2006 by U.S. Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

The national effort is led by the United States Attorneys' offices, with help from federal, state and local resources to identify and rescue victims and to better locate, apprehend, and prosecute individuals who exploit children using the Internet.

McCormick's case was investigated by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Fulton, Mo., Police Department, the Missouri State Technical Assistance Team and the Missouri Division of Family Services.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Lawrence E. Miller will handle the prosecution in federal District Court.

More information about Project Safe Childhood can be found on the Web site, www.projectsafechildhood.gov.

The Taxpayers' Tab: Police Billed $27,000 In Travel Costs To Federal Grant (AEAGT)

By Stephanie Chelf And Zach Church, Staff writers

Andover (MA) Eagle Tribune, February 4, 2007

METHUEN - Methuen police Capt. Kristopher McCarthy treated himself and other top police brass to an afternoon snack of pretzels and water at an Atlanta mall in March 2005 and billed taxpayers $11.22.

Later on, someone wanted cheese sauce, and taxpayers picked up that tab, too - a bill for 45 cents at Mr. Pretzel.

These expenses were among $27,000 in travel costs billed to a $1 million federal grant meant to fight crime in the Arlington district, the city's poorest neighborhood. The receipts are just a small part of the police spending records subpoenaed by the federal government last August. The U.S. attorney's office will not discuss the subpoena, its investigation or whether it is looking into the travel costs. A spokeswoman did not return a call for comment for this story.

An Eagle-Tribune analysis of the records shows that between 2001 and 2006, the grant known as "Weed and Seed" paid for 11 trips to conferences across the country for seven people - police Chief Joseph Solomon, his secretary Patricia Giarrusso, Deputy Chief Joseph Alaimo, Lt. Kevin Mahoney, Sgt. Michael Havey, Capt. Katherine Lavigne and McCarthy.

For the first several trips, police officials documented their expenses with receipts backing up each reimbursement claim. But by 2005, police began using a per diem system granting themselves a daily spending allowance. Fewer supporting documents were provided.

During the March 2005 trip to Atlanta, Solomon, Giarrusso, Mahoney and McCarthy stayed for nearly six days at the Hyatt Regency on the government's dime. They had dinner at the Hard Rock Cafe, racked up a $70 breakfast bill for three at the Hyatt Hotel, spent another $203 for dinner at a Brazilian steakhouse and took more than $400 worth of cab rides.

McCarthy also expensed $8.06 for breakfast at Logan Airport in Boston. Solomon was paid $305.59 for food and transportation on the trip, but did not submit receipts to the city.

Five months later, the group got together in Los Angeles and did it all again.

Solomon, in a written response to questions for this story, said the trips "form an integral part of the Weed and Seed program" and that federal grant officials expect attendance.

Attempts to reach the other officers, as well as Giarrusso, were unsuccessful. Methuen Mayor William Manzi said the decision to attend conferences is up to the local grant administrators.

"As a general rule, I think that be it city or federal or state grant money, you should be frugal and parsimonious (in travel)," Manzi said. "I think when you're out there, you have to use your best judgment."

From Methuen's Broadway to the Vegas Strip

In 2001, the U.S. Department of Justice awarded Methuen a $1 million, five-year grant to launch a community policing effort in the Arlington neighborhood, a 12-block area near the Lawrence line where the median income for 4,000 residents is about $33,000. Almost a third of the homes are occupied by single-parent families.

DOJ_NMG_0127525

The grant's purpose is in its name - to weed out crime and seed the neighborhood with programs and initiatives. It has paid for officers' overtime and equipment, as well as many of the day-to-day expenses for Methuen Arlington Neighborhood Inc. at 1 Broadway, which provides resources for children and families.

The Justice Department invites those who receive Weed and Seed grants to attend conferences around the country in places like Los Angeles; Orlando, Fla.; New Orleans; and Las Vegas. The conferences are not mandatory, but a Justice Department spokesperson said they are highly recommended as a training tool and to provide technical assistance for law enforcement and other agencies involved in the program.

"Conferences offer workshops on crime-prevention techniques, day-to-day site management, recruitment and retention of volunteers, and measuring performance," according to a written statement from the Department of Justice. "Conferences provide the opportunities for attendees to work directly with program staff from Washington, D.C., and meet and exchange best practices with representatives from over 250 active Weed and Seed communities nationwide."

The police department is permitted to pay for travel expenses with the grant money, according to the statement.

Linda Soucy, director of Methuen Arlington Neighborhood Inc., said the trips were indispensable to police. Soucy attended one conference in Philadelphia, though the city's Weed and Seed money was not used to pay for the trip.

"You go for just a couple of days, and you learn so much," said Soucy. "We can take things from what other people are doing and having success there and bring them back to our community."

McCarthy, who is head of the Police Department's Neighborhood Services Bureau and the city's Weed and Seed coordinator, went to eight conferences in the five-year span. Giarrusso, secretary to Solomon and program assistant for the Weed and Seed fund, attended seven conferences.

Solomon made four trips out of state, two before he became chief in the fall of 2002. Alaimo attended three conferences. Mahoney attended three, Havey attended two, and Lavigne went to one.

Where they ate

Police charged round-trip airfare, cab rides, dinners and snacks such as the pretzels and sauce to the grant. The trip to Los Angeles in 2005, for example, cost the U.S. Department of Justice and taxpayers $5,468.70.

Meals during these 10 trips ranged from pedestrian - Applebees in San Antonio and Subway in Indianapolis - to classy - Emeril Lagasse's Nola in New Orleans and a Japanese steakhouse in Orlando. The Hard Rock Cafe was a favorite, too. Police ate there in at least five cities.

Generally, the group ate moderately priced meals, always deducting food for guests and alcohol from the bills they charged to the grant. But at times, the group ate at pricey chain and tourist restaurants, including Jimmy Buffett's Margaritaville.

During the February 2004 trip to Dallas, McCarthy, Havey and Giarrusso spent $192 on dinner at a Brazilian steakhouse chain called Fogo De Chao. By comparison, the grant also paid $116 to a local Borders for 18 books for Arlington neighborhood children.

A year later, on March, 23, 2005, in Atlanta, three of the four conference attendees dined at another Fogo De Chao, where each ordered a $45.50 fixed-price dinner and spent a total of $18.40 on coffee and three desserts. A receipt for $203.50 was submitted for reimbursement. The grant paid about the same amount for bus service for 16 Methuen children to visit the planetarium in Concord, N.H.

The record keeping for later trips was far less specific. Solomon, McCarthy, Giarrusso and Mahoney each received $400 reimbursement for food and transportation during the six-day trip to Los Angeles in 2005, for example. That allowed each $300 per diem for food, which does not require receipts, and another $100 for incidentals.

The group kept receipts that justify $357 of those expenses, all of which were for cab and subway rides.

On all of the trips, in fact, cab fare represented a significant amount of the bills.

McCarthy and Havey spent more than $250 in cab fare on a trip to Albuquerque, New Mexico. Solomon, Alaimo and Giarrusso spent $233 on cabs in Indianapolis. In Dallas, Havey, McCarthy and Giarrusso charged for 22 cab rides that collectively cost more than $450. On the trip to Atlanta, McCarthy expensed $25 for a cab ride from The Cheesecake Factory to his hotel.

'We have done so much good'

Back in Methuen, Soucy is still working with the federal grant to bring opportunity to the children of the Arlington Neighborhood.

All the money, including the costs for the trips, has been spent wisely, she said. Strategies and tips police have picked up at the conferences have sped up improvements at home, she said.

Solomon in his statement pointed to the Safe Haven Afterschool Homework and Computer Center, a Youth Leadership Academy and tri-city police patrols as three ideas developed during conferences and later implemented in Methuen.

There is a "myriad of initiatives, ideas, plans and programs that are presented at each conference," he wrote.

"We have done so much good with this money that it is unbelievable," Soucy said. "You take what's already working and you just run with it. And that's why we've been so successful, because we haven't tried to reinvent the wheel."

Manzi, too, said he was pleased overall with the results of the Weed and Seed program.

"I think overall the point here is that the Weed and Seed program has done good things for the community, has done good things for the target area," he said. "And if I had to accept it again, I would."

Are We All Gambling Criminals? (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

MILLIONS OF Americans have engaged in criminal behavior leading up to today's Super Bowl. You know who you are — those of you outside Nevada who placed bets on the Indianapolis Colts or Chicago Bears. It's estimated that about $5 billion will be on the line this afternoon in a nation in which even office pools are technically illegal in some states.

President Bush in October signed the Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, a law intended to resolve any ambiguities about the unlawfulness of placing bets online. Although most fans in the free world can place bets with regulated online casinos, U.S. law enforcement has been busy cracking down on the heinous crime, going after enabling credit card companies, detaining those who run legal foreign online sites if they deign to enter the country and subpoenaing major Wall Street investment banks involved in overseas initial public offerings of online casinos. It's another brazen attempt to extent prudish American mores to other jurisdictions.

One bemused Las Vegas sports handicapper told the Wall Street Journal last week that the ban on Internet gambling should be renamed the "Sopranos Support Bill," because the main beneficiaries of keeping closely regulated casinos from doing business online are bookies. Instead of protecting consumers and raising tax revenue from this popular entertainment, the government is protecting the turf of unsavory bookies, many of whom have ties to organized crime.

The gambling crackdown is part of a broader trend of a paternalist state protecting citizens from themselves, curtailing their freedoms in the process. We live in a nation still engaged in a war on terror and in a city struggling with escalating gang violence, yet precious law enforcement resources are being spent on prosecuting morality. But, for today, enjoy the game while pretending you don't know the spread. After all, that could prove incriminating.

CIVIL LAW:

FTC Slaps Telemarketer With $1M Fine (AP)

By Christopher S. Rugaber, Ap Business Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

FTC Penalizes Telemarketer With $1M Fine for Hanging Up on 64M People

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal regulators have slapped a $1 million penalty on a telemarketer that automatically dialed and then illegally hung up on more than 64 million people.

A Florida-based company known as The Broadcast Team settled charges brought by the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice by agreeing to a court order that will bar them from making similar calls in the future and require them to pay a $1 million penalty.

The Broadcast Team also called more than a million numbers on the national Do Not Call Registry, the FTC said.

The company's principals, Robert J. Tuttle and Mark S. Edwards, were also named in the FTC's complaint. Edwards did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

The FTC said that the company was able to deliver over a million recorded messages per day to voice mailboxes and answering machines. But the company violated the commission's telemarketing sales rule by calling tens of millions of numbers and, when the calls were answered by people, hanging up or playing a recording.

The commission's rules require that calls answered by a person rather than an answering machine be connected to a live representative within two seconds, and not be "abandoned" by hanging up or playing a recording.

Telemarketers that make sales calls or for-profit telemarketers seeking charitable contributions are bound by the restrictions on abandoning calls, the commission said.

And the Broadcast Team received more than $2 million in revenue for telemarketing calls that violated the FTC's telemarketing sales rules, the commission said last year.

The Justice Department first filed a complaint in federal court at the FTC's request in December 2005. The complaint said the company abandoned 64 million calls on behalf of debt management companies and more than 450,000 calls made for charities and other purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0127527

The complaint also said that the company violated the law by calling numbers on the national "Do Not Call" Registry and for making calls without paying the required annual fee for access to that Registry.

The company has agreed to a proposed court order that bars TBT from hanging up or playing a recording when a person answers its calls, and prohibits the company from calling numbers on the "Do Not Call" list.

The proposed order would also impose a civil penalty of $2.8 million, with $1.8 million suspended due to the company's inability to pay.

The company's agreement with the court order does not constitute an admission by the defendants that they violated the law, the commission said.

Michael Tankersley, a spokesman for the FTC, said the order would become final when signed by a federal court judge, which is expected to occur imminently.

ITT To Settle U.S.-China Technology Case, People Say (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt And Tony Capaccio

Bloomberg, February 4, 2007

Feb. 2 (Bloomberg) -- Defense contractor ITT Corp. may pay as much as $100 million to resolve U.S. charges the company violated export control rules by allowing the transfer of night- vision technology to China, people familiar with the case said.

ITT, the world's biggest maker of night vision goggles, is in advanced talks with Justice Department prosecutors in Virginia, said the people who asked not to be identified because negotiations with the government are continuing and the size of the settlement could still change. The agreement probably will be announced within a few weeks, the people said.

China has been energetic in trying to obtain so-called Generation 3 night-vision technology and develop ways to counteract the devices, analysts say. The goggles, binoculars and scopes are used by soldiers to see clearly when fighting in darkness and low light.

``The Chinese are aggressive collectors of all kinds of military-related technologies," said Steven Aftergood, a senior research analyst at the Federation of American Scientists in Washington.

The settlement would be ITT's second in a little more than two years for export control violations. In November 2004, the company agreed to settle a State Department civil case by paying $8 million and improving its internal controls for preventing sensitive technology from falling into the wrong hands.

The company must still honor the terms of the settlement in that case, which involved export violations of night-vision technology and remote sensing equipment for satellites. The agreement with the State Department requires ITT to submit to heightened government scrutiny, including arranging for on-site audits at the request of the agency, until 2009.

War-Fighting Devices

``The night vision devices produced by ITT contribute critical war-fighting capabilities to the U.S. military," the State Department said in an October 2004 document on the agreement. ``The ability to observe and target potential hostile forces at night is an important force multiplier for the U.S. military and its coalition partners."

Generation 3 is the most sophisticated night-vision technology available and, because it is considered critical by the U.S. military, can't be exported without the permission of the State Department.

ITT bills itself on its Web site as ``the world's leading developer, producer and supplier of Gen 3 night-vision devices, specialty cameras and high-voltage miniaturized power supplies for U.S. and allied military forces as well as federal, state and local law enforcement."

Regulatory Filing

The company, based in White Plains, New York, disclosed the more recent probe, by the U.S. attorney in Roanoke, Virginia, last March in a regulatory filing. ITT also said it was conducting an internal probe of the matter and didn't reveal the nature of the violation or what country was involved.

The company said it expects to reach an agreement with the government soon. ``Because the negotiations are ongoing, we cannot speculate on the exact timing or the final terms -- financial or otherwise," ITT said in a statement.

The company reported today that its fourth quarter profit was $140.8 million, or 75 cents a share, compared with a loss of $84 million, or 45 cents, a year earlier. ITT shares fell $1.09 to $59.51 as oft 4:02 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Failure to Safeguard Data

The export-control case is being investigated by the Pentagon's Defense Criminal Investigative Service, the State Department's trade controls office and the Department of Homeland Security's Immigration and Customs Enforcement. The probe began in 2002.

The case involves the failure of ITT to safeguard technical data on the manufacture and characteristics of the night-vision devices used by the U.S. military, according to the people familiar with the probe. The investigators suspect ITT technical data was illegally transferred to China between 2001 to 2005 by a Singapore-based subcontractor, the people said.

John Schoeneweis, the senior resident agent for the Richmond Office of the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, declined to comment, saying the case was ``an open investigation."

Heidi Coy, a spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Roanoke, declined to comment.

The company said in a statement in December and repeated today that it was taking a $25 million charge in connection with the investigation. That money, plus other reserves, would cover a settlement ``resolving all outstanding issues relating to this investigation that began several years ago," the company said.

``ITT is committed to having a world-class compliance culture," Chief Executive Officer Steven Loranger said in the Dec. 15, statement. ``We are working diligently with the government to resolve this matter by early next year."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

As Officers Stop And Frisk, Residents Raise Their Guard (NYT)

By Trymaine Lee

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

At 14, Rocky Harris knows the routine: You raise your hands high, you keep your mouth shut and you don't dare move a muscle.

Then the police officer's gloved hands go up and down each leg, around your waist, across your chest and back, then down your shoulders to your wrists.

When they don't find guns or drugs, Rocky said, they let you go. He said that he had been searched, fruitlessly, at least three times since last summer, and that he had friends who had been searched repeatedly.

"They tell you that you're selling drugs. But I don't do nothing wrong. I just play ball," he said, walking through the Red Hook East housing development in Brooklyn yesterday morning, headed to a community center for a game of basketball.

On Friday, the New York Police Department released a report showing that police officers stopped 508,540 people on city streets in 2006, an average of 1,393 a day and quintuple the number from 2002. While it was difficult to find a consensus on the significance of those statistics — good patrolling, overly aggressive officers and more faithful recordkeeping are just a few explanations — it was not hard yesterday in Red Hook to find a handful of that number walking around.

More than half of those stopped, and sometimes frisked, by the police were black. The Red Hook projects have a large black population, a history of crime problems and, at least in a few young men, a wariness of the police.

Mikel Jamison, 32, said that "he came up in these Brooklyn streets," and that it is "hard being an African-American, hard to live and walk down the street without the police harassing us."

Mr. Jamison said some young men bring the unwanted attention of police on them, "with their pants down to their ankles and drugs in their pockets." He then urged that he and this reporter keep their voices down because "some of the dealers, they're out here right now."

But he said he blames police practices like the stop-and-frisks for tension between the community and the police. He said many officers might want to stop crime in the community, but many cannot discern between common criminals and the common people who live among them.

After having a police officer jam a gun in his chest a few years ago, in an incident he said he would rather not discuss, Mr. Jamison said he converted to Islam and is now more conscious of the way the community is affected by such police actions.

Anthony James, 28, who works for a large sanitation company and, as such, often keeps late hours, said the police frequently stop him as he leaves or comes home. He said that the stops had become such a problem that he has taken to carrying his work identification badge home to prove to the police that he has a job and is not selling drugs.

"You see where you're standing. This is the Red Zone," he said, mapping with his hands a section of the projects from Columbia Street to Clinton Avenue. "This is the war zone. If they catch you in here alone they're going to stop you. And they'll play mind games with you. Ten minutes after searching you, they'll come back by, just staring."

Mr. James, who said his "bad-boy days" are behind him, said officers doing the stops will say that the basis of the stops is that people are coming out of known "drug buildings."

"But we live here. I put my 7-year-old son to bed here. We have grandmas and old ladies up in here. This ain't just a drug building, this is home," he said. "It's serious and dangerous out here, and they wonder why some people want to pull out their guns and start blasting."

DOJ_NMG_0127529

Dorothy Shields, 74, has served as president of the tenants association at the Red Hook East housing development for 33 years, and said she believes the issue is less about people being picked on by the police, and more about a new generation of young people who do not have respect for authority, or their neighbors for that matter.

Ms. Shields said she doubted some of the reports of overaggressive patrolling. "Some of them young men are not telling the truth about the police officers," she said. "A lot of them feel they should be able to do anything they want do, wherever and whenever they want to."

Ms. Shields said she thinks frisks, at least in her neighborhood, are happening but not as much as some suggested.

"Some people just don't care for the police, no matter how right or wrong they are," she said.

At a press conference outside police headquarters yesterday, representatives of black and Hispanic officers' groups called the data damning, and renewed calls for Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly to step down.

"These numbers substantiate what we've been saying for years," said Noel Leader, a co-founder of 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care. "The New York Police Department under Raymond Kelly is actively committing some of the grossest forms of racial profiling in the history of the New York Police Department."

The Police Department said that officers stop people only if they are suspected of committing a crime, and that the practice is vital in getting guns off the streets. About 21,000 of the stops ended in arrests and about 29,000 in summonses.

"I think it is one tool," Deputy Police Commissioner Paul J. Browne said yesterday. "One law enforcement tool that is used to apply pressure. One of many."

Responding to complaints of profiling, the department noted that while 55.2 percent of those stopped were black, 68.5 percent of reported crimes involved suspects described as black.

Mr. Browne said he could not speak about patrolling in Red Hook with any authority, but that in general the increase in reported stop-and-frisks was a result of the more scrupulous recording of such stops.

"I think some of the individuals who have been critical of the department in the past will be critical of the department for this as well," he said.

At the community center in Red Hook where Rocky Harris had gone to play basketball, a 50-year-old man named Stanley, who is a big brother of sorts at the center, was shooting pool.

When asked if he had been stopped and frisked by the police, Stanley, who said he did not want his last name published, said, "I'm an old man now, and they don't bother me one bit. It's the youth that they're after. Not me."

Officer In Louima Case Returns To State To Finish Sentence (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

A former police officer convicted of perjury in the 1997 assault on Abner Louima, a case that scarred both the city's race relations and its police force for years, has been released from prison to a halfway house in upstate New York, his lawyer said yesterday.

The officer, Charles Schwarz, 41, was released from a minimum-security facility on a former Air Force base in Duluth, Minn., more than two months ago, said the lawyer, Ronald Fischetti. Mr. Schwarz is expected to complete the remainder of his five-year sentence in May.

"I talked to him five minutes ago," Mr. Fischetti said in a telephone interview yesterday. "His frame of mind is excellent because he knows he only has a few more months, and he can take his wife and child and move and put this episode behind him completely."

Mr. Fischetti would not disclose the location of the halfway house but said Mr. Schwarz's wife, Andra, and 2-year-old son, William, lived nearby.

Mr. Schwarz "plans to relocate in a different area and doesn't plan to come back to the city," Mr. Fischetti said, because of unwanted press attention.

"He's looking for opportunities in the northern area of the country" outside law enforcement, Mr. Fischetti said. "Something outdoors, maybe carpentry."

Mr. Schwarz's release was first reported yesterday in The Daily News.

In August 1997, Mr. Louima, a Haitian immigrant arrested after a nightclub disturbance, was beaten in a police station's bathroom by an officer who then sodomized him with a broomstick. The officer, Justin A. Volpe, later pleaded guilty and was sentenced to 30 years in prison.

Mr. Louima has contended that there was a second officer in the bathroom, Mr. Schwarz. Mr. Schwarz has denied the allegation, and Mr. Volpe also said Mr. Schwarz was not there.

DOJ_NMG_0127530

After a tangled path through the courts — a conviction was reversed and two juries were hung — Mr. Schwarz agreed not to appeal a perjury conviction and was sentenced to the federal prison camp.

"The worst that Chuck did is that he saw Mr. Volpe walking Mr. Louima toward the bathroom, and when he was asked about that, a cop being a cop, he said he didn't remember it," Mr. Fischetti said.

Mr. Louima, who now lives in South Florida, could not be reached for comment yesterday. He sued the city and accepted an $8.75 million settlement in 2001.

At a March 2006 hearing on Mr. Schwarz's sentence, Judge Reena Raggi said that he had failed to accept responsibility for lying to protect other officers, including Mr. Volpe. She told Mr. Schwarz she was convinced that there had been another officer in the bathroom, and that "it was either you, which I think is highly probable — in fact, I think it's more than highly probable — or it was someone else."

Taser Task Force Will Get To See Weapon's Effects (MERCN)

By S.I. Wykes

The San Jose Mercury News, February 4, 2007

The members of the Palo Alto Taser Task Force, beginning their journey toward a decision about whether stun guns should be a part of any police officer's equipment in the city, will get as close as they can Tuesday to test-driving the experience.

Part of Palo Alto Police Chief Lynne Johnson's presentation will include videos of people being shocked with a stun gun.

These videos were taken in real-life situations by other police agencies, Johnson said.

At last week's meeting, Johnson told the panel that the presentation would include a live Taser stunning of a volunteer from the police department.

Some members of the task force balked at the idea, not wanting to be directly responsible for a deliberate infliction of pain, so Johnson changed to the video format.

But she held fast to the idea that if the task force is going to educate itself as wholly as possible, the use of a stun gun is important to see.

``It is painful. It is an unpleasant experience, but hopefully, after our presentation, people will understand the myths and misconceptions and misunderstandings" about such weapons, she said.

Santa Clara County Deputy District Attorney Jay Boyarsky is on the task force and knows that even just watching a video will not be a welcome sight. He compared it to what juries must sometimes go through when hearing cases involving child molestation or rape. ``It's scarring and unpleasant," he said, ``but it is done in the service of the greater good."

It will not be an easy job. Taser use has generated many questions about how dangerous it is and under what circumstances it is used.

In November, the family of a Fresno man, who died after being stunned by San Jose police, filed a federal lawsuit claiming he was the victim of excessive and unreasonable force. The Santa Clara County coroner included the use of the Taser and pepper spray as a contributing factor in the man's death -- one of the first times that has happened in Santa Clara County.

More than a quarter-million Tasers are in use by police departments nationwide and justified as a control method far less lethal than a gun.

The San Jose Police Department was the first in the Bay Area to use the weapon. Other Taser-carrying departments now include Gilroy, Fremont, Morgan Hill, Belmont, San Bruno, San Mateo and San Mateo County SWAT teams.

The Taser inflicts five seconds of 50,000 volts of electricity, and its effect on the body is not completely predictable. The American Civil Liberties Union and Amnesty International have been lobbying hard for its use to be suspended.

The ACLU recently asked the San Jose City Council to produce a report on stun-gun incidents. The city gave Tasers to its officers in 2004, and five months after its institution released a summary of its use, but has not done so yet for 2005.

The U.S. Justice Department is reviewing its use and researchers at Wayne State University in Indiana are applying biomedical engineering to determine if a stun gun can be made safer by lessening its power.

The Palo Alto Task Force includes a physician, a public defender, a mediator, a nurse, two members of the city's Human Relations Commission, a rabbi, a member of the NAACP, a city attorney, a Palo Alto police captain and the attorney hired by the department to act as its auditor.

The group expects to have a recommendation to make to the city council this spring.

IF YOU'RE INTERESTED

The task force will meet at 6 p.m. in the meeting room of the city's Art Center, 1313 Newell Road.

Curb Cuts: Going With The Flow Easier For All (MCT)

By Frank Greve, McCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

DOJ_NMG_0127531

McClatchy Newspapers, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — The barricades that quadriplegic Ed Roberts and his comrades stormed nearly 40 years ago were a few inches high. Yet today, millions of Americans pass daily through the breaches they created.

Curb cuts, the breaches are called. Or curb ramps.

Since 1990, the Americans with Disabilities Act has required them in construction, renovation and wherever a city does major street or sidewalk work. All this curb-ramp building has helped the United States lead the world when it comes to providing public access for people with disabilities.

"For all this country's many faults, one thing we do better than anybody is architectural-barrier removal," said Mary Lou Breslin, the co-founder and senior policy adviser of the Disability Rights Education and Defense Fund, based in Berkeley. By her estimate, more than 60 countries are trying to catch up.

Curb ramps also are a boon for bicyclists, stroller-pushers, skateboarders and in-line skaters. They're a help, too, for travelers with wheeled luggage and delivery truckers with hand carts.

In fact, nine out of 10 unencumbered pedestrians will veer off course to take advantage of a curb ramp, according to Jim Terry, an architect specializing in accessible design who studied pedestrian behavior at a shopping mall in Sarasota, Fla.

Roberts, quadriplegic because of polio, had none of this in mind when he enrolled at the University of California at Berkeley in 1962.

His dorm — and that of a dozen other students with severe disabilities who joined him over the next few years — was Cowell Hospital, high on a hill on the eastern end of the campus.

"I had to plan my classes so that each was downhill from the former one," recalled Michael Pachovas, who got around campus in an ineffectual powered wheelchair called a Motorette. "At the end of the day, I'd hitch rides with people or ask them to push me back uphill."

City of Berkeley was first?

Roberts and his cadre were determined to escape Cowell Hospital and live off campus.

"They were adults, living in a hospital with nursing charts and dating patterns being recorded (visitors, in other words), and it was no way to live," recalled activist Ken Stein, now a program administrator for the Mayor's Office on Disability in San Francisco.

Roberts, by then a graduate student, was the first to escape, but found himself confronting obstacles to independence at every street corner. Unassisted wheelchair users in those days would wheel to driveways at alleys or loading docks, then roll along in the street to the next driveway that tended in the right direction. It was slow, it wasn't always possible and it was often dangerous.

An ally of Roberts, Hale Zukas, persuaded the city of Berkeley's public works department in 1969-70 to create some cement curb ramps at intersections on Telegraph Avenue just south of the campus. Although two Illinois campuses had poured some curb ramps in the '50s, Berkeley's are thought to be the first built by a city government to promote independent living for people in wheelchairs.

Within a year, Roberts and Berkeley's other students with disabilities — by then politically charged enough to call themselves the Rolling Quads — were demanding curb ramps faster than the city's permitting procedure could provide them.

"We had a Wednesday night poker game in those days, and a lot of good ideas came up over those games," recalled Pachovas, 58. "One night, we decided to put in some curb ramps on our own after the game.

"A couple of our attendants did construction work, so they had access to cement, and I had a wheelbarrow."

They set out sometime after midnight.

"We didn't cut curbs; we just added skirts to existing curbs," Pachovas said. "The police threatened to arrest us, but they didn't."

The early results were crude. "You needed a running start to get up them, and going down, you could end up on your head in the street," Breslin said.

It didn't take long, however, to see how much the ramps enhanced mobility.

Curb ramps are crucial to independence for people who use wheelchairs, according to architect Bill Hecker of Hecker Design Ltd. in Birmingham, Ala., a specialist in access for people with disabilities.

Most wheelchair users rely on public transportation and need to cross several streets between their homes and the nearest mass transit stop, Hecker said.

"If you take out the curb ramp, which is the key link between the two, you've taken a huge, huge chunk out of accessibility," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127532

It's unclear how many ramps are in existence or how much they've cost. The simplest single curb ramp runs about $900, according to Hecker. As a rule, cities put them in when it's convenient or when the Justice Department convinces them that they must.

Among the most accessible cities, disabled-rights activists say, are Portland, Ore.; Sacramento; Chicago; Kansas City, Mo.; and, of course, Berkeley, where Roberts died in 1995 at the age of 55.

The chair that he took his curbs in is now in the Smithsonian Institution's National Museum of American History in Washington.

Outside the museum, all the corners are ramped, enabling what Breslin described as "the seamless inclusion of people with disabilities into the mainstream."

Felts: Seizure Of Home In '03 Violated Rights (MONNS)

By Johnny Gunter and Stacy Temple

Monroe (LA) News-Star, February 4, 2007

Another volley has been fired in the dispute between the Ouachita Parish Sheriff's Office and some of its former deputies.

Former deputy Stan Felts said he has filed a federal civil rights complaint against Lt. Mike Rowlan and Chief Deputy Joe Davis.

Felts was a 16-year employee of the Sheriff's Office and headed up the department's Special Crimes Apprehension Team before resigning Jan. 4 with the rank of sergeant. His resignation came in the middle of an Internet scandal that accuses the department of corruption. The complaint alleges that Davis and Rowlan, who has been the major target of the Internet postings, conspired under color of the law to deprive Felts and his wife of their civil rights to privacy.

The complaint states that Rowlan, under Davis' direction, tried in July 2003 to remove a personal computer from Felts' western Ouachita Parish residence without probable cause or without trying to obtain a search warrant.

Felts' federal filing follows a lawsuit filed Jan. 25 by Rowlan naming three former deputies — Gene Caviness, Jacob Greer and Todd Newton — claiming defamation, invasion of privacy and Internet stalking. The postings on the Copwatch.com Web site accuse Rowlan of illegal activity and accuse Sheriff Richard Fewell of covering up for him. Rowlan works with Metro Narcotics Unit, and the postings on Copwatch.com revealed his identity by showing his driver's license photo and even his home address.

Only Greer was employed by the department at the time of the Internet postings and was fired after an internal investigation revealed he passed along his personal identification number to Newton so Newton could enter the Thinkstream law enforcement information center. Newton had left the Sheriff's Office for a job with the West Monroe Police Department.

Caviness was working with the FBI Task Force through his employment with the East Carroll Parish Sheriff's Office. After the internal investigations by the Sheriff's Office and West Monroe police, Caviness resigned his job with FBI Task Force but still works with the East Carroll Sheriff's Office.

Even though he passed a polygraph test that showed he wasn't participating in the Internet postings on Copwatch.com, Felts was demoted to deputy and reassigned to the department's work-release program. He said the demotion resulted in an approximate $350-a-month cut in pay.

Felts, who is now employed by the Sterlington Police Department, said he did not file any complaints when the incident occurred because he feared for his job. He said at that time he still supported the sheriff and that the next election was upcoming.

"I am now coming forward with this information because I am no longer under threat of termination by exposing it and that his (Rowlan's) criminal actions ... must be dealt with," Felts wrote in his letter to the FBI, a copy of which he furnished to The News-Star.

The FBI's Monroe office referred The News-Star to the New Orleans office for confirmation of receipt of the complaint. Public Information Special Agent Sheila Thorne would not confirm nor deny receipt of the complaint. She did say such civil rights complaints are passed on to the U.S. Attorney's Office and the Justice Department to determine if such cases are to be pursued.

According to written reports and notes received from the Sheriff's Office, Felts had been running intelligence for almost a year on a white supremacist living in the Calhoun area with the approval of Maj. Royce Toney, head of investigations.

Meanwhile, Rowlan apparently became aware of the white supremacist and mentions in notes on the incident that local FBI Special Agent Niki Allen asked him to gather intelligence.

Rowlan also admits in his notes that he did not follow the chain of command by letting his boss, Toney, know what he was doing. Rowlan also believed, because of things he was told, that Felts may have been involved with the white supremacist group, Aryan Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0127533

In his complaint to the FBI, Felts states Rowlan's motive for attacking him may have been because (Rowlan) and another person were possibly involved with the supremacist group.

Rowlan called for Lt. James Purvis, Felts' immediate boss, and Felts to meet with him at his office at Metro Narcotics. Rowlan asked Felts if he would share the information he had gathered, and Felts agreed.

"When we left that meeting, Lt. Purvis asked me if I felt like I might be a part of the investigation, and I told him he was overreacting," Felts said.

Felts said he agreed to turn over his information to Rowlan and tried to do so the next day when Rowlan and other Metro Narcotics Unit agents showed up at his house.

The only information Felts could not give them were some e-mails that were lost when his computer crashed several months prior. Felts said he advised Rowlan that the e-mails from the white supremacist could be retrieved and was willing to let a technician come to his house and do so. He said Rowlan wanted to take the computer, and Felts did not like the accusatory tone taken by Rowlan. Felts told Rowlan the computer hard drive would not leave his house without a search warrant.

At this point, notes from Felts and Rowlan both state that Rowlan contacted Davis, and Rowlan was told to send Felts to his office to discuss the issue. Felts had to wait on his father to come to the house before leaving for Davis' office because he needed someone to watch his son.

In his notes, Rowlan said Davis asked him about getting a search warrant. Rowlan said he had contacted the FBI's Allen, and she advised against the search warrant because she did not want to reveal the agency's involvement in the intelligence gathering.

In his federal filing, Felts states that shortly after he left for Davis' office his wife returned home and that Rowlan "held his house" for nearly three hours. He explained that when officers have probable cause, they can "hold a house" to protect the evidence, giving them time to get a search warrant.

According to Felts' filing, Rowlan attempted to get a fellow Metro agent to write the search warrant, but that agent advised Rowlan he didn't have probable cause.

Rowlan left without a search warrant or the computer.

Fewell said that after he reviewed the facts of the case, he determined it occurred because of miscommunication among all the departments involved. The sheriff said he did not see where any laws or procedures were violated, so no disciplinary action was warranted.

Fewell said Rowlan was acting at his direct request.

Rowlan's notes only mention Davis and not Fewell.

Davis said Friday he was unaware of Felts' filing and that he would have no comment.

Harsh Accusations Intensify In L.I. State Senate Contest (NYT)

By Bruce Lambert

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

The already ferocious campaign to fill a State Senate seat on Long Island reached a new pitch yesterday with a mass mailing featuring Osama bin Laden, accusations of improper donations, and a request for federal monitors to guard against voter intimidation at the polls on Tuesday.

The contest has drawn intense statewide political attention because a Democratic victory would edge that party closer to controlling the Senate. Unions and other special interest groups are funneling money and workers into the contest, which could become New York's most expensive state legislative race.

Gov. Eliot Spitzer has taken a direct role by campaigning and filming a television commercial for the Democratic nominee, Craig M. Johnson. Equally determined to preserve their majority, top Republicans are marshalling their forces behind their candidate, Maureen O'Connell.

Citing fears that Republicans will challenge the legitimacy of Democratic voters on Election Day to sway the outcome, the Democratic campaign formally asked the United States Department of Justice to dispatch monitors to polling places to prevent "voter intimidation" and voting delays.

"Independent federal monitors are critical to ensure a fair election," the request said. A Justice Department spokeswoman said the request was under review.

The Democrats cited past voting problems in the election district, in northwest Nassau County, and repeated incidents in last November's closely fought election for the Senate's 35th District in Westchester County, where the Democratic candidate, Andrea Stewart-Cousins, upset the longtime Republican incumbent, Nicholas A. Spano.

DOJ_NMG_0127534

The Republican Party chairman for New York State and Nassau County, Joseph N. Mondello, said in an interview that he would "join in that request" for federal monitors. But he countered, "Perhaps that will help prevent the onslaught of people from New York City being bused here and trying to vote."

Democrats deny using such tactics and say that Republican operatives in Westchester challenged legitimate voters in Democratic areas in November, causing confusion, delays and discouragement.

In Nassau on Wednesday, Republican election officials sought to include forms for challenging voters in the kits prepared for polling place workers. The Democrats blocked the move, but there is nothing to stop Republican workers from taking the forms to the polls and using them.

Mr. Mondello served notice that his field workers would closely scrutinize voters. "Our poll watchers and election inspectors will challenge people to show some kind of identification as to who they are," he said. "They have a right to ask for identification to make sure you are John Smith. Our people have been cavalier about this in the past. This time, in this election, we're dearly concerned."

Among other last-minute issues, Ms. O'Connell's campaign sent out a flier on domestic security that featured a photograph of Osama bin Laden. And she was pictured with Michael A. L. Balboni, the popular Republican who held this seat until Governor Spitzer crossed party lines to appoint him as the new homeland security chief, thus creating the Senate vacancy.

Above Mr. Balboni's head in the leaflet is what appears to be the official seal of the State Office of Homeland Security. But it is slightly different from the real seal, and the homeland security office issued a rebuke: "It is completely inappropriate for a political candidate to use a falsified seal in the context of a political campaign. Politicizing security issues is inappropriate and trivializes the law enforcement efforts of New York's Office of Homeland Security."

The office also said that "such actions are arguably illegal" under the section of the state's criminal impersonation law regarding anyone who "wears or displays with authority any uniform, badge, insignia or facsimile thereof."

In another dispute, Mr. Mondello called for an investigation into whether Democrats effectively "purchased" the Working Families Party endorsement of Mr. Johnson. Mr. Mondello quoted a complaint from Chuck Pohanka, who calls himself the Working Families Party chairman in Suffolk County, that the statewide party received $225,000 from the Johnson campaign.

But the state party's executive director, Dan Cantor, denied the charge. He said that Mr. Pohanka led a small splinter group that did not represent the party in Suffolk but instead did the bidding of Republicans. He said Democratic donations helped finance Working Families operatives for Mr. Johnson, who knocked on the doors of 45,000 homes.

Final Push In Nassau State Senate Race (NSDY)

By Celeste Hadrick, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 4, 2007

Nassau's two major political parties begin their final campaign blitz Saturday in the hard-fought 7th Senate District race after Democrats on Friday called for federal poll monitors while a Republican mailing featuring Osama bin Laden and former Sen. Michael Balboni drew barbs.

The campaign manager for Democrat Craig Johnson, a Nassau legislator running against Republican County Clerk Maureen O'Connell in Tuesday's special election, faxed a request for federal monitors to the Justice Department, contending "there has been significant voter intimidation in previous elections within the 7th District."

Democrats raised the issue of intimidation this week after Republicans requested that poll inspectors be supplied with voter challenge forms and validation oaths.

Nassau Republican Chairman Joseph Mondello said, "We welcome federal monitoring because it will prevent anyone from running people in from New York City who are not eligible to vote in Nassau County."

Mondello acknowledged he was "very concerned" that Democrats may bring in Queens residents to vote illegally in the district, which runs from Port Washington to Elmont and is bordered on the west by Queens. Democrats deny that.

A Justice Department spokeswoman said the agency is considering Johnson's request and will decide by Monday "if there is a factual and legal basis that warrants" monitors.

A new campaign flier that pairs O'Connell with Balboni, the district's former Republican senator who resigned to become the state's homeland security chief, hit mailboxes Friday.

It features a photo of bin Laden and states, "As long as New York and Tel Aviv are targets for terrorists, we need Maureen O'Connell protecting us in the Senate." Inside, there is a photo of O'Connell next to Balboni in front of a mock-up of the state Homeland Security seal.

Balboni said he has not endorsed any candidate and was not aware of the mailing. "To the extent that it implies that there is a governmental agency supporting the candidacy of anybody, that is incorrect and inappropriate," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0127535

State homeland security office spokesman Dennis Michalski added in a statement, "It is completely inappropriate for a political candidate to use a falsified state seal in the context of a political campaign."

National Jewish Democratic Council also blasted the mailing. "This is a desperate and shameful attempt to try to use Israel as a wedge issue," said deputy executive director David Goldenberg.

O'Connell spokesman Mike Arens called both complaints "a smokescreen" to deflect allegations by Suffolk County Working Families Chairman Chuck Pohanka that Johnson bought the party's nomination through contributions. Pohanka requested a federal investigation.

State Working Families Chairman Dan Cantor dismissed the Pohanka complaint "as a political hit job by a Republican Party that's using this guy."

Meanwhile, Mondello expects 800 Republicans to rally this morning at the Williston Park American Legion hall to begin a walk-through of the district, visiting the houses of all Republican, Independence and Conservative party members, while Democratic Chairman Jay Jacobs said 800 to 1,000 of his party's workers will be out knocking on Democrats' doors.

Albany bureau chief Errol A. Cockfield Jr. contributed to this story.

Iraq's Shadow Widens Sunni-Shiite Split In U.S. (NYT)

By Neil MacFarquhar

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

DEARBORN, Mich. — Twice recently, vandals have shattered windows at three mosques and a dozen businesses popular among Shiite Muslims along Warren Avenue, the spine of the Arab community here.

Although the police have arrested no one, most in Dearborn's Iraqi Shiite community blame the Sunni Muslims.

"The Shiites were very happy that they killed Saddam, but the Sunnis were in tears," Aqeel Al-Tamimi, 34, an immigrant Iraqi truck driver and a Shiite, said as he ate roasted chicken and flatbread at Al-Akashi restaurant, one of the establishments damaged over the city line in Detroit. "These people look at us like we sold our country to America."

Escalating tensions between Sunnis and Shiites across the Middle East are rippling through some American Muslim communities, and have been blamed for events including vandalism and student confrontations. Political splits between those for and against the American invasion of Iraq fuel some of the animosity, but it is also a fight among Muslims about who represents Islam.

Long before the vandalism in Dearborn and Detroit, feuds had been simmering on some college campuses. Some Shiite students said they had faced repeated discrimination, like being formally barred by the Sunni-dominated Muslim Student Association from leading prayers. At numerous universities, Shiite students have broken away from the association, which has dozens of chapters nationwide, to form their own groups.

"A microcosm of what is happening in Iraq happened in New Jersey because people couldn't put aside their differences," said Sami Elmansoury, a Sunni Muslim and former vice president of the Islamic Society at Rutgers University, where there has been a sharp dispute.

Though the war in Iraq is one crucial cause, some students and experts on sectarianism also attribute the fissure to the significant growth in the Muslim American population over the past few decades.

Before, most major cities had only one mosque and everyone was forced to get along. Now, some Muslim communities are so large that the majority Sunnis and minority Shiites maintain their own mosques, schools and social clubs. Many Muslim students first meet someone from the other branch of their faith at college. The Shiites constitute some 15 percent of the world's more than 1.3 billion Muslims, and are believed to be proportionally represented among America's estimated six million Muslims.

Sectarian tensions mushroomed during the current Muslim month of Muharram. The first 10 days ended on Tuesday with Ashura, the day when Shiites commemorate the death of Hussein, who was the grandson of the Prophet Mohammad and who was killed during the bloody seventh-century disputes over who would rule the faithful, a schism that gave birth to the Sunni and Shiite factions.

The Shiites and the Sunnis part company over who has the right to rule and interpret scripture. Shiites hold that only descendants of Mohammad can be infallible and hence should rule. Sunnis allow a broader group, as long as there is consensus among religious scholars.

Many Shiites mark Ashura with mourning processions that include self-flagellation or rhythmic chest beating, echoing the suffering of the seventh-century Hussein. As several thousand Shiites marched up Park Avenue in Manhattan on Jan. 28 to mark Ashura, the march's organizers handed out a flier describing his killing as "the first major terrorist act." Sunnis often decry Ashura marches as a barbaric, infidel practice.

DOJ_NMG_0127536

Last year, a Sunni student at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor sent a screed against Ashura to the Muslim Student Association's e-mail message list. The document had been taken off SunniPath.com, one of many Web sites of Islamic teachings that Shiite students said regularly spread hate disguised as religious scholarship.

Azmat Khan, a 21-year-old senior and political science major, said that she, like other Shiites on campus, was sometimes asked whether she was a real Muslim.

"To some extent, the minute you identify yourself as a Shiite, it outs you," Ms. Khan said. "You feel marginalized."

Yet some Shiite students said they were reluctant to speak up because they felt that Islam was under assault in the United States, so internal tension would only undermine much-needed unity among Muslims. At the same time, the students said, the ideas used by some Sunnis to label Shiites as heretics need to be confronted because they underlie jihadi radicalism.

At the Ann Arbor campus, Shiite students set up a forum for all Muslims to discuss their differences, but no Sunnis who had endorsed the e-mail message about Ashura showed up, and the group eventually disbanded.

Trying to ease tensions, the Muslim Student Association this year invited a prominent Shiite cleric to speak.

"I don't want Shiite students to feel alienated," said Nura Sediqe, the president of the Ann Arbor student group. "But the dominant group never sees as much of a problem as the minority."

At the University of Michigan's campus in Dearborn, the Muslim association pushed through rules that effectively banned Shiites from leading collective prayers.

Apart from a greater veneration among Shiites for the Prophet's descendants, there are slight variations in practice. Shiites, for example, pray with their hands at their sides, while Sunnis cross them over their chests.

"Most Sunni Muslims can't pray behind a Shiite because if you are praying differently from the way the leader is, then it doesn't work, it's not valid," said Ramy Shabana, the president of the association on the Dearborn campus.

Shiite students at various universities said they faced constant prejudice. Some Sunni students have refused to greet Shiites with "Salamu aleikum," or "Peace be upon you," to slight them.

At Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, Salmah Y. Rizvi, a junior who stocked a reading room with Islamic texts, said the Muslim Student Association there told her to remove them because too many were by Shiite authors.

Students have also taken note of attacks on their faith from the broader world through the Internet. One YouTube video showed Catholics bleeding by crucifying themselves and then showed Shiites bleeding through self-flagellation, as the Arabic voiceover suggested that Shiites were more Catholic than Muslim.

Not all campuses have been affected. Some, like Georgetown University and Cornell University, were considered oases of tolerance.

At Rutgers University, the tension started last year after 15 to 20 conservative Sunni students began openly mocking Shiites, and considered barring women from leading the student association. "They felt it was time to correct individuals within the organization, cleansing the beliefs of the students," said Mr. Elmansoury, who opposed the rift.

Several students involved said the group was heavily influenced by teachings from Saudi Arabia. The puritanical Wahhabi sect there holds that Shiite reverence for the Prophet's family smacks of idolatry.

Shiite advocates believe that that thinking has influenced some mainstream American Muslim organizations like the Islamic Society of North America and the Council on American Islamic Relations, which they said were slow to criticize attacks against Shiites abroad until the violence in Iraq escalated. As a consequence, Shiites founded their own national lobbying organizations.

Both organizations denied that they disregarded Shiite issues.

Still, some Muslims said that prejudices had continued.

After Saddam Hussein's execution Dec. 30, one Sunni cleric near Dearborn reportedly gave a sermon concluding that the Prophet Mohammad forgave his enemies, so why couldn't certain people in Iraq?

Much of the Middle East tension stems from the sense that Shiite power is growing, led by Iran. The grisly video of Mr. Hussein's execution, with his Shiite executioners mocking him, fanned the flames.

"As a Shiite, I was taking in this event very differently from the Sunnis," said Shenaaz Janmohamed, a graduate student at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor. "In a lot of ways Saddam has become this martyr figure who sort of represents Shiite unruliness."

It is not the first time Shiite-Sunni tensions have spilled over into the West. Britain has experienced periodic outbursts for years. Stabbings and other violence between Sunni and Shiite prisoners in New York state jails prompted a long-running lawsuit by Shiite inmates seeking separate prayer facilities.

Some Muslims worry that the friction might erupt in greater violence in the United States. Others, in both camps, think the tension could prove healthy, forcing American Muslims to start a dialogue about Muslim differences.

With Jails Full, California Eyes Other States (NYT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0127537

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Feb. 3 (AP) — As many as 5,000 California convicts will be transferred out of state to ease an overcrowding crisis in the state prison system, the top corrections official said Friday.

"We are severely overcrowded, and the need for more space is absolutely critical," James E. Tilton, the secretary of the Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation, said in a statement. "This decision is being made to protect public safety."

In December, a federal judge warned that he would start releasing inmates early or prohibit convicts from being sent to state prisons from county jails unless the state acted immediately to ease overcrowding.

The threat followed an executive order signed by Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in October authorizing voluntary and involuntary transfers of up to 5,000 inmates. At the time, a survey found that nearly 20,000 inmates were willing to be sent voluntarily to other states.

Since then, however, only about 380 inmates have volunteered, despite a marketing campaign by the corrections department that included videos showing inmates in better conditions in out-of-state prisons. In one video, a former California inmate boasts about having television selections that include ESPN.

California's 33 state prisons are designed to hold 100,000 inmates but currently house about 174,000. About 16,000 inmates sleep in gymnasiums, hallways and other common areas filled with beds.

"We will continue to seek volunteer inmates who are willing to serve their sentences in other states," Mr. Tilton said. "But we also will begin to move inmates involuntarily so that they are no longer sleeping in gymnasiums, day rooms and other inappropriate areas of the prisons."

The first transfers could start within days, although administrative appeals by inmates could delay some for up to 10 weeks.

Prison guards fear some inmates will turn violent if forced to transfer.

"This is lighting a match to an already tense powder keg," said Lance Corcoran, spokesman for the California Correctional Peace Officers Association.

But the pressure from the court is forcing the state to act, Mr. Tilton said. "We have tension now, and every day we don't move inmates, it just gets worse."

Private prisons in Mississippi, Arizona and Oklahoma are likely to get transfers.

Lawsuits have left federal courts in charge of various aspects of California prisons, with overcrowding at the root of many of the system's problems.

ANTITRUST:

Letters Of Ill Repute (SLPD)

By Rachel Melcer, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 4, 2007

Biotech crop giant Monsanto Co.'s proposed purchase of the nation's largest cottonseed company is alarming some farmers and agribusiness competitors — but Charles Martin isn't one of them.

Martin said he doesn't know how a letter opposing the deal, bearing his name, address and purported signature, was sent to a U.S. senator by a former congressional colleague as part of a lobbying campaign.

The letter identifies Martin as a longtime family farmer. "Somebody is using my name falsely," said Martin, a retired mechanical engineer from Hawkinsville, Ga. "I've never farmed. … I can't even raise dust."

The letter is one part of varied efforts aimed at derailing Creve Coeur-based Monsanto's plan to buy Delta & Pine Land Co. of Scott, Miss., for $1.5 billion. Opponents say the acquisition would give Monsanto too much control over American cotton.

Some opponents are pushing for congressional hearings on the deal, which Washington observers say are unlikely. Letter-writing campaigns are sparking interest among states' attorneys general; 32 have requested information from Monsanto. Staff at a Minneapolis public-relations firm are e-mailing appeals for an outcry in regions where no cotton is planted.

"There's a level at which this is just the way the game is played, by getting hearings and building pressure from stakeholders. … [It's] political hardball," said Jarol Manheim, a professor of media and public affairs and of political science at George Washington University School of Media in Washington.

However, "the letters from people who didn't write them — if that happens, that's clearly unethical," Manheim said.

Thomas Susman, a lawyer who is chairman of the professional ethics and standards committee of the American League of Lobbyists, said doing so "is never a standard or usual practice — period. Certainly not for lobbyists, whose reputation is their stock [in] trade."

DOJ_NMG_0127538

Monsanto already provides — and profits from — genetic traits that last year protected nearly 86 percent of the U.S. cotton crop from worms, herbicide or both, according to data from the Agriculture Department.

If Monsanto buys D&PL and fulfills a related promise to sell its own Stoneville cottonseed business, Monsanto's share of the U.S. cottonseed market will jump to nearly 50 percent, up from about 12 percent. In a half-dozen Southern states where D&PL is the preferred brand, that market share would top 85 percent.

The combined company would control both valuable parts of the cottonseed market — the natural germplasm, or inherited traits that make particular hybrid seeds valuable, plus the genetic traits that are added to protect those seeds from herbicide and pests.

The annual cotton crop is worth about $4.7 billion to farmers, according to the National Cotton Council, a trade group.

Deal involves 'big players'

"There's a lot of money involved. There are some big players in this" and that is attracting attention, said Layne Lindebak, an assistant attorney general in the Farm Division of Iowa Attorney General Tom Miller's office.

Lindebak's division is coordinating a review of the deal's competitiveness on behalf of more than a dozen states' attorneys general — a role it has taken in other farm-related mergers due to its experience in agriculture and antitrust issues.

The Iowa attorney general generally is concerned with maintaining open agricultural markets, even when it comes to a crop unconnected with the state, such as cotton, Lindebak said. He said the interest of his office has nothing to do with the headquarters of agribusiness Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc. in Des Moines.

"It's not like we play favorites for the neighborhood guy," he said. "They're obviously big enough to play on their own without our little help, if they want to. They've got more resources than we do."

Indeed, Pioneer is taking an active role. "We are telling our side of the story," said Doyle Karr, the company's spokesman.

The Monsanto—D&PL deal "is anti-competitive, and we have concerns about the impact it would have on farmers and the ag industry — and on consumers, ultimately," Karr said.

To make that point in Washington, Pioneer hired Tim Hutchinson, a former senator who is now a lobbyist. He is a Republican from Arkansas who is associated with Dickstein Shapiro LLP, a law firm in Washington with which Pioneer's parent, DuPont, has a long-term relationship.

Hutchinson declined to detail his efforts. But in an e-mail response to a request for an interview, he wrote: "Our client, DuPont, and others do not believe that Monsanto's proposed acquisition of Delta & Pine Land is conducive to fair competition and farmers' choice. We believe the acquisition should be rejected by federal and state regulators."

Letters to a senator

One federal official on the receiving end of Hutchinson's communication is Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., who until this year was chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee; he now is the ranking minority member.

Chambliss' office received an e-mail on Dec. 29 from Hutchinson containing seven letters apparently written by Georgia constituents in opposition to the Monsanto—D&PL deal, said the senator's spokeswoman, Erin Hamm. Two of those letters were addressed to Chambliss and the remainder to Georgia Attorney General Thurbert Baker; the latter group included the one purportedly written by Martin.

Baker's office could not confirm receiving any from that bundle, though it has received about a dozen others expressing concern about the Monsanto deal, said spokesman Russ Willard.

Of the seven letters e-mailed by Hutchinson, two others are suspect: One sent by Virginia Adams of Adams Farm, a self-pick strawberry-and-produce operation in Fayetteville, Ga., who said she has not written any letters about Monsanto; the other bore the purported signature of Georgia State Rep. Terry England.

When England learned of its existence, he fired off a letter on Jan. 3 to clear the air with Chambliss. "I received a copy of the letter on my House of Representatives letterhead bearing a signature that is not mine, making charges that I do not agree with," he wrote. A stance against Monsanto's acquisition of D&PL "is not, nor has it ever been, my position."

In an interview, England said his district includes just one cotton farm of about 50 acres — and that farmer plants neither Monsanto nor D&PL seed.

"I don't really have a dog in that fight," England said. "It's free enterprise and a free market. If two companies want to get together they ought to be allowed to, so long as the consumers … and farmers are protected from it being a complete monopoly."

England investigated the false letter and found that someone outside of his office, whom he would not identify, solicited it from a member of his staff, who mistakenly drafted it. "It was someone [here] doing what they thought I would want to be done, but obviously not," he said.

State legislator seeks letters

Among the genuine letters in the batch is one from Don Collins of Pike County, Ga., who raises pecans, not cotton. He said he is concerned about any business deal that limits competition. He said he wrote the letter at the request of a "good friend," Georgia state Sen. Ronnie Chance.

Douglas Dickens, a cotton farmer in Watkinsville, Ga., said he, too, sent a letter through Chance's office.

Chance "owns a public relations firm that's been working on this and 100 other things," said England. Chance had brought up the Monsanto deal with England while talking as a state legislative colleague, he said.

Chance did not return calls seeking comment. Hutchinson said in an e-mail that he does not know Chance and has not worked with him. Hutchinson did not respond to questions about the letters he sent to Chambliss.

Meanwhile, on another front, staff at ASI Communications, a public-relations firm based in Minneapolis, have e-mailed farmers and agriculture leaders with personal appeals urging that opposition letters be written to officials such as state attorneys general.

In one such missive, addressed to "Dear Illinois Corn Grower," ASI also asks for a copy so it can be compiled "in the likely case that Monsanto be taken to court."

ASI declined to comment or to disclose its client.

Daryn McBeth, executive director of the Minnesota Agri-Growth Council, a St. Paul-based agriculture trade group, said he received an e-mail from ASI that he found strange on several levels:

·Monsanto as well as its competitors are members of his council.

·Minnesota is not a cotton-growing state.

·"And it's odd that I was getting this from ASI and they were putting themselves in the shoes of being concerned about this," rather than disclosing the letters are being sent on behalf of someone in the industry, McBeth said.

Farmers are concerned

While some communications about the Monsanto—D&PL deal may be suspect, the subject is raising concerns among some cotton farmers.

Dickens plants Monsanto's Roundup Ready cotton and said it is a valuable tool. But he worries about the increasing cost of Monsanto's technology and the power the company will have as owner of D&PL.

It's important that regulators take a close look at the deal, he said. "I want to be sure that it's done properly because Monsanto could corner the market. … I want to make sure research is continued into other kinds of chemicals and genetic traits."

The Arkansas Farm Bureau passed a resolution opposing the deal shortly after it was announced, and considered promoting a similar measure in January at the Beltwide Cotton Conference, a national meeting of the Cotton Council, said president Stanley Reed.

"We got [Monsanto's] attention," Reed said.

Monsanto representatives met with Arkansas farmers, as well as with others around the country, to listen to concerns and try to allay their fears. At the Beltwide conference, the company unveiled initiatives such as a crop-failure guarantee in certain states, funding for cotton research and more transparent pricing strategies.

As a result, the Arkansas Farm Bureau is less opposed to the Monsanto—D&PL deal, but still concerned about the need to ensure choices for farmers, Reed said.

Reed and his bureau have been lobbied by Monsanto competitors "and those companies have the same concerns that we have. But my response back to them is, 'If you don't like it, why don't you buy Delta & Pine Land?' Then we'd have more options and that's what we want. All they do is complain, but they don't want to rise to the occasion."

Efforts by Monsanto

Monsanto, like its competitors and nearly all corporations, employs lobbyists to promote its views among politicians and industry leaders. However, the company considers that a regular part of doing business and keeping open the lines of communication, regardless of any pending acquisition, said spokeswoman Lori Fisher.

"We feel like we've been addressing it from a business point of view, but some parties who are opposed to the deal seem to be politicizing the process," she said.

Monsanto has a lot at stake.

The company tried to buy D&PL once before, in 1998, but the acquisition fell apart when a Justice Department review dragged on.

Since then, the cotton industry has changed and become more competitive; D&PL's U.S. cottonseed market share has dropped to about half from 71 percent. If the deal again falls through, Monsanto stands to pay D&PL a fee of up to $600 million.

"You just have to let the Department of Justice do their job," Fisher said. Monsanto hopes for a positive outcome and that the deal will close as soon as possible. In the meantime, the "noise level" being generated by opponents "is more disappointing and frustrating than anything," Fisher said.

Grinstein Stood Tall As Delta's Defender (AJC)

By Dave Hirschman, Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 4, 2007

At first glance, the battle for Delta Air Lines seemed likely to be a rout.

The youthful, dynamic executive team at US Airways seized the initiative last fall when it launched a surprise takeover bid that caught a wounded Delta off guard.

The group had already transformed a second-tier airline, the Tempe, Ariz.-based America West, into a major player by buying US Airways and taking its name a year earlier. By snatching Delta from bankruptcy court, 45-year-old Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker would get a tarnished gem and create the world's biggest airline in a single audacious stroke.

All that stood in the way was lame-duck Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein who, at 74, already planned to step down as soon as the Atlanta icon got out of bankruptcy court. He led a corps of untested executives who got their jobs when the previous executive team bailed out with controversial bonuses and protected pensions. Delta's 45,000-member work force had been battered by a string of layoffs, pay cuts and benefit reductions.

Grinstein vowed to resist the US Airways offer, but some wondered if the opposition would wilt. Many airline analysts — always eager to see fewer players in the fractious industry — thought the deal would be a long-awaited catalyst for consolidation.

"Wall Street declared us dead," said Ed Bastian, Delta's chief financial officer.

What neither US Airways nor Wall Street anticipated, however, was the high-spirited campaign Grinstein and Delta workers waged to defeat the merger proposal, which died last week when the airline's bankruptcy creditors refused to back it. Instead, they endorsed Delta's standalone reorganization plan, forcing Parker to abandon his $10 billion bid.

Delta's strategy took advantage of Grinstein's long experience as a smooth boardroom operator and persuasive leader, as well as workers' hunger for a positive cause to rally around.

It also benefited from the daunting obstacles that have long made large-scale airline mergers easier to talk about than pull off. While such deals may make financial sense, they are rarely popular with labor leaders, politicians or passenger advocates — and merger foes played those cards as well.

Creditors decide fate

With Delta in Chapter 11, the company's creditors — not its board or stockholders — got the final word on the US Airways proposal. The creditors are represented by a nine-member committee whose members included the biggest suppliers, banks and other groups with claims in Delta's bankruptcy case.

One of the members is Delta's pilots union, whose leaders vehemently opposed the merger. Jet maker Boeing, with close ties to both airlines, is also on board, as is the federal pension agency. But US Airways also had allies on the committee, including bond-trading firm MacKay Shields, which backed the takeover from the start.

Soon after US Airways' initial bid, Delta executives began holding daily 8:30 a.m. strategy meetings to plan and launch a broad counterattack.

Bastian was put in charge of two key fronts. One was finishing Delta's standalone reorganization plan, which laid out how the airline will leave bankruptcy and repay creditors. It also served as a counteroffer to the US Airways bid. Delta filed that plan in late December.

Bastian also arranged the financing Delta would need to make its standalone plan credible, and he pushed deals on various side issues with key creditors, including Boeing.

Chief Operating Officer Jim Whitehurst, who oversees daily operations, was charged with making sure Delta met performance projections already given to creditors. He also dissected US Airways' proposal for antitrust issues, which Delta hoped would add to creditor doubts about whether the deal would fly with antitrust regulators.

Unlike most proposed or completed airline mergers that married complementary route networks, this one involved two carriers whose routes were centered along the Eastern Seaboard. Still, Parker exuded confidence that, in a post-9/11 landscape where older carriers faced extinction, regulators would approve such a deal.

Grinstein steps to front

Grinstein — a longtime Delta board member from Seattle who became CEO when Leo Mullin abruptly left at the end of 2003 — had preferred to put Bastian and Whitehurst out front as the bankruptcy case proceeded. But he took a leading role in the US Airways battle.

Charming and grandfatherly, the reluctant CEO had built a reserve of goodwill among many Delta employees despite the Chapter 11 filing and cutbacks. His first-year salary was $500,000, but he took only half. Usually mild-mannered, Grinstein bluntly set Delta's tone.

DOJ_NMG_0127541

"No airline has ever been taken over in a hostile merger," he said in one meeting, "and we're not going to be the first." He termed US Airways "the worst of all potential merger partners."

It didn't take much to get Delta workers excited about the anti-merger campaign.

Bill Morey, who represents reservations workers on a Delta employee council, said he was inundated by e-mails after US Airways' bid.

"Everybody was asking, what are we doing [to fight it]?" he said. "People were just flabbergasted." Soon Morey's board was selling T-shirts and distributing buttons with the "Keep Delta My Delta" slogan.

Delta's pilots union, which had warred with management over two deep pay cuts negotiated since 2004, helped organize rallies and set aside $15 million to spend on anti-merger activities. Lee Moak, a scrappy former Marine Corps pilot who heads the union, relished his role as merger buster and likened Parker to fictional Wall Street raider Gordon Gekko.

By last week, Delta workers had collected more than 100,000 signatures from people backing their drive to remain independent. The continuous show of force was aimed at raising doubts among creditors that US Airways could smoothly integrate the larger airline.

"Airlines depend on their people to provide skilled labor and excellent customer service," aviation consultant Michael Boyd said. "They've got to be wholeheartedly on board for any merger to have a chance."

Playing political angles

Grinstein, who spent a chunk of his early career as a U.S. Senate staffer, personally worked the political angles. One of his first calls was to Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.).

Isakson had helped Delta pull off what many saw as an improbable victory last year by getting a bill approved that let the airline stretch out its pension funding obligations. That saved Delta's main pension plan from termination during the Chapter 11 case.

By contrast, US Airways had dumped its pension plans during an earlier bankruptcy case, adding $4.8 billion to the federal pension insurance agency's obligations. Isakson had his pitch as he lobbied colleagues to oppose the merger: If US Airways were to take control of Delta, would it turn around and abandon its pension obligations? Isakson said he contacted White House officials to make sure they understood how much both Republicans and Democrats objected to the deal.

"There wasn't anyone of any consequence that didn't know this was a big issue," he said.

Isakson also pushed for a Senate Commerce Committee hearing on the competitive effects of big airline mergers, which took place a few days before last week's deadline for a decision by the creditors.

Isakson introduced Grinstein, and the hearing room's walls were lined with uniformed Delta pilots. Hundreds of employees and retirees filled hallways outside. Parker and a few US Airways executives were also there but had no visible support among either spectators or senators.

"There is no question in my mind that the visibility of employees was a significant factor" in creating a political climate that was hostile to the transaction, Isakson said.

The significance of that: While Congress plays no direct role in deciding airline mergers, the political opposition buttressed Delta's argument that anti-trust approval of the deal was anything but assured.

Down to the wire

Through it all, the creditors committee sent few public signals about its leanings. After Delta filed its standalone plan, the committee hired colorful ex-Continental Airlines Chief Executive Gordon Bethune — at $250,000 for 10 days' work — as an adviser. Bethune ran Continental during a time when it had repeated merger discussions with Delta, leading some to view the move as a positive sign for US Airways.

In early January, US Airways sweetened its cash-stock bid by about 20 percent, to around $10 billion.

But by mid-January the tide appeared to turn. A seemingly deflated Parker said in interviews that he'd had no response from the creditors to the sweetened bid.

The decision point came during a three-hour creditors committee meeting Tuesday in New York that was to end in a vote by secret ballot. That morning, Delta announced it had lined up six powerhouse Wall Street firms to supply $2.5 billion in exit financing for its standalone reorganization — a critical step.

But Delta also may have made a few concessions. It gave creditors the right to name more board members in the reorganized airline, as well as Grinstein's successor. It also agreed management's stake in the company will be between 2.6 percent and 4 percent — about half as big as what United Airlines' management got in that carrier's case.

The committee voted about 6 p.m., with an agreement that only the result — not the count — be revealed.

Delta prevailed.

The battle had lasted 77 days.

DOJ_NMG_0127542

Boyd, the airline consultant, said Grinstein secured his legacy. "He wasn't trying to make a name for himself. He was trying to do the right thing for Delta. That counts for a lot."

Said Paul Lapides, director of Kennesaw State University's corporate governance center: "It was the first time in a very long time that rank-and-file workers had wanted to support their management."

Questions about Delta's future remain. The company still has to complete its restructuring and prove it can survive without the shield of bankruptcy protection. There's lingering speculation about other merger scenarios down the road.

But for now, the battle seems to have put air under the company's wings.

Wednesday night, a few hours after US Airways withdrew its bid, Delta officials symbolically relit the long dormant "Fly Delta Jets" sign atop the company's big hangar at Hartsfield-Jackson International Airport. Hundreds of employees watched as the retro neon lights — dark for years in an apparent cost-saving move — came to life.

Timothy Burns, a Delta mechanic attending the event, said years of hard times took a deep personal toll on many Delta workers. Some 25,000 jobs have been cut in the last six years.

"We all rode this horse to the ground," said Burns, 48, of Fayette County, "and now we're building it back up. We've been through hard times together. But I honestly believe the worst is over."

Cox Washington Bureau staff writer Marilyn Geewax contributed to this article.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

In Drill, CDC Practices For Influenza Pandemic (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

ATLANTA -- A 22-year-old Georgetown University swim team member just back from Indonesia eats dinner with his teammates but then develops a fever and doesn't accompany them to a meet in New York.

That is how a flu pandemic in the United States started.

A winter storm bears down on saltless and plowless Atlanta, closing schools and scaring commuters.

That is how it ended.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention held a pandemic "war game" here last week but aborted it at midnight Wednesday, halfway through its planned 24-hour run. The reason -- ironically, but perhaps not surprisingly -- was concern about public safety. CDC did not want a hundred of its most valuable employees rushing on Thursday morning over ice-slick roads to a mock disaster.

A real pandemic, which is considered inevitable, won't be stopped by weather, which in this case turned out to be mostly rain. In fact, it probably won't be stopped by anything. But public health experts believe it could be made less disastrous with practice and preparation.

For that reason, CDC's director, Julie L. Gerberding, who spent Wednesday facing nail-biting pseudo-decisions -- and made the real one to call things off -- was happy with half a pandemic.

"The long-frame view is that this was a tremendous success. We exercised, we learned and we are definitely committed to this process," she said when it was over.

The federal government is hard at work trying to ready the country for a global outbreak of a new, highly transmissible strain of influenza -- a pandemic. Such events occur at unpredictable intervals. There were three in the last century, in 1918-19, 1957 and 1968.

The H5N1 strain of avian influenza, or bird flu, has killed millions of birds and 164 people, mostly in Asia, since 2003. It does not pass from person to person efficiently. But it is highly lethal and still evolving; many experts believe it has the potential to cause a pandemic.

Last week's exercise was conducted by MPRI, an Alexandria-based consultant with a $7 million contract to help CDC plan for pandemic flu. Founded in 1987 as Military Professionals Resources Inc., the company is run principally by retired officers.

Horace G. "Pete" Taylor, a retired Army lieutenant general, led a team of 24 people who wrote the outbreak scenario, "injected" new information as the exercise ran, played the roles of non-CDC decision makers, and are now helping the agency analyze its performance. Taylor, 69, used to run war games at the Pentagon.

The exercise began Jan. 12 with e-mail traffic to CDC officials describing H5N1 flu activity in Indonesia. With six cases and five deaths in 2007, that country is currently the most active place for bird flu.

DOJ_NMG_0127543

A week ago a fictional element appeared in the e-mails in the form of the Georgetown student's story. Two days before the exercise began, his virus was identified as H5N1. When the game began at 7:30 Wednesday morning, he was a few hours from dying and two of his housemates were down with the flu, its type not yet identified.

About a hundred people -- many in the Navy-like uniforms of the U.S. Public Health Service -- filled the CDC's emergency operations center, typing and clicking at benchlike workstations, milling and meeting as maps, presentations and video feeds filled screens at the front of the room.

The exercise sought to capture the elements that make outbreaks hazardous and decisions difficult.

For example:

The ill person came from a country with less-than-optimal disease surveillance and laboratory testing. Nobody was certain what the facts of the Indonesian outbreak were. Was there casual spread of the illness in Jakarta? Were there outbreaks in other parts of the country? These are not minor details. They help determine whether the World Health Organization -- with lots of CDC help -- will try to mount a mass distribution of antiviral drugs in a one-shot effort to snuff out the virus at its source.

A passenger on one of the student's flights had died in Chicago and another was sick in Baltimore. Was this just a coincidence? It was flu season, and regular influenza virus makes some people very sick -- killing some of them.

The number of people who might be incubating flu grew by the hour. Should the whole swim team be quarantined? How about all the other swim teams at the meet?

The federal government has 20 million doses of oseltamivir (Tamiflu). When should this stockpile be distributed to the states? At the first hint of a pandemic, when many doses might prevent cases but also be wasted? Or later, when the outbreak is confirmed and the drugs will go only to the ill, possibly saving their lives?

There were hints that the Georgetown student might not be the only source. A passenger on a flight from Singapore to Hawaii developed fever and "respiratory distress." Did he have some link to Indonesia? Should all flights from Asia be diverted to the 20-odd airports that can screen and quarantine passengers? Should CDC push to have people leaving certain countries be medically evaluated?

And then there were the small annoyances.

The scenario said the student was "living in an on-campus dorm." But this was wrong. He lived in a rented house in Northwest with 10 people -- an error that gave headaches to the two cartographers who were marking satellite photos of the District -- all the places the "index patient" had been.

The exercise included a mock news conference. CDC media officers questioned Gerberding while four real reporters (from The Washington Post, the New York Times, the Associated Press and the Canadian Press) watched.

Gerberding ran two high-level meetings like an experienced college professor in a freshman seminar. She regularly summarized the avalanche of facts, cleared the air with concrete questions and demanded unambiguous answers from her advisers.

"We probably have to assume the worst," she said at one point, noting that even with woefully incomplete data from Indonesia it appeared that one-third of the people there with the flu were dying. Later, she asked: "So, do we agree there is strongly supporting evidence that we have a pandemic?" The senior staff agreed there was.

In the news conference, however, she avoided eye contact with reporters, emphasized uncertainty and concentrated on the paucity of facts. A news release quoted her as saying: "We have not yet seen sustained or repeated human-to-human transmission of H5N1. It's important for people to remember that one case does not mean that a pandemic has begun." She later admitted she hadn't had time to read the quotations attributed to her.

The game will pick up in April with an exercise in which pandemic flu has spread to many states. In a final round in May, the virus gets to Atlanta and takes out 40 percent of CDC's workforce.

It's unlikely there will be any snow to save them.

Can Washington Get Smart About Science? (LAT)

By Chris Mooney, Alan Sokal

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

By beginning to investigate the Bush administration's interference with scientists' work on global warming, the Democratic Congress has embarked on a key task: restoring respect for science — and more generally, for evidence and reason — in the federal government.

That we need such reform, and from Democrats, is a historic irony, because it's the Republicans who have often tried to paint themselves as defenders of "sound science" against ideologically motivated attacks.

In the 1990s, conservatives such as Dinesh D'Souza, Gertrude Himmelfarb and Roger Kimball wrote best-selling jeremiads attacking postmodernist academics who, they insisted, were taking over American universities and subverting the standards of scholarship. Although much exaggerated, this contained a grain of truth. Some self-described leftist academics did seem determined to reduce the real world to mere "discourse." No worldview, they insisted, could be considered objectively more valid or factual than any other. Even the findings of science were described as reflecting societal conditions and struggles for power and dominance rather than something true about the nature of the world.

DOJ_NMG_0127544

One of us — Sokal — was sufficiently disturbed by these trends to try an unorthodox experiment: write a parody of postmodern science criticism to see whether a trendy academic journal would accept it as a serious scholarly article. Asserting up front that "physical 'reality' [note the scare quotes] … is at bottom a social and linguistic construct," Sokal averred that the latest conceptions of quantum gravity support deconstructive literary theory, Lacanian psychoanalysis, "postmodernist epistemology" and, of course, progressive politics. The cultural-studies journal Social Text ate it up.

After Sokal revealed his hoax in the magazine Lingua Franca, a debate exploded about the nature of science and rationality, popularly known as the "science wars." It pitted scientists and their staunch defenders within and outside of the academic community — spanning the political spectrum from left to right — against a band of intellectuals from the humanities, virtually all of them situated on the left.

Sokal took on his postmodernist colleagues because he feared that the rejection of a rigorous, evidence-based standard for assessing claims of purported fact would disarm us not only in the face of quack medical remedies or alleged paranormal occurrences, but also when confronted by distortions of scientific information having major public-policy implications. A classic example is the tobacco industry's well-documented campaign to sow doubts about the health risks of smoking. Another is the interminable push by religious fundamentalists to undermine the teaching of evolution in American schools.

As these cases suggest, attacks on science by ideologues and special interests have a long history in this country. A stance of postmodernist relativism — or, on the part of the media, of giving "equal time" to unequally substantiated viewpoints — weakens us in the face of such strategic campaigns to undercut well-established knowledge.

But the abuse of science has lately materialized in an even more disturbing form, this time within the corridors of our own government. Driven by the Bush administration and its congressional allies, the new American "science wars" have reached an alarming stage.

HOW AND WHY did the science wars move out of academia and reemerge in Washington, with political poles reversed? During the Clinton years, many of the worst science abusers — such as anti-evolution fundamentalists — remained politically out in the cold, at least at the federal level. That began to change in 1994, as the Gingrich Republicans, highly sympathetic to the party's emerging socially conservative "base" and to the interests of private industry, laid claim to Congress.

They proceeded to attack evidence demonstrating a human role in climate change, all as well as in the depletion of the ozone layer as part of a sweeping attempt to undermine environmental regulation. Simultaneously, they dismantled Congress' world-renowned scientific advisory body, the Office of Technology Assessment, which had provided our elected representatives with reliable scientific counsel for more than two decades.

Meanwhile, the focus on the academic left's undermining of science following the Sokal hoax was generating worthwhile debates and even real soul-searching. For instance, the prominent French sociologist of science, Bruno Latour, has wondered whether his earlier work questioning the objectivity of scientific knowledge went too far: "Was I wrong to participate in the invention of this field known as science studies? Is it enough to say that we did not really mean what we meant?"

In truth, there was nothing wrong with inventing science studies; the error was to leap from the valid observation that science arises in a social context to the extreme conclusion that it is nothing more than politics in disguise.

Such introspection on the academic left has been a heartening sign, and the pronouncements of extreme relativism have subsided significantly in recent years. This frees up defenders of science to combat the enemy on our other flank: an unholy (and uneasy) alliance of economically driven attacks on science (on issues such as global climate change, mercury pollution and what constitutes a good diet) and theologically impelled ones (in areas such as evolution, reproductive health and embryonic stem cell research).

The potency of this combination has become apparent during the six years of the Bush administration, as many if not most scientific agencies of our government have become embroiled in scandals involving the misrepresentation or suppression of scientific information, gag orders on scientist employees, or other interferences with the processes by which science feeds into decision-making. Tracing these intrusions back to their source, we almost always uncover the same pattern: It concerns an issue in which one of the two principal constituencies of the current administration — religious conservatives or big corporations — has a vested interest.

Perhaps they wish to disrupt the path of Plan B emergency contraception (the "morning-after" pill) through the Food and Drug Administration on its way to over-the-counter availability. Or perhaps they don't like the way global warming has been discussed in government documents.

DOJ_NMG_0127545

That's at the core of a case recently investigated by the new Congress: A lawyer who had formerly worked for the American Petroleum Institute and had moved to the Bush White House's Council on Environmental Quality was accused in 2005 of editing government climate science reports in such a way as to raise doubts about global warming and downplay the strong consensus of mainstream scientists. Following the initial scandal, the lawyer went to work for Exxon Mobil Corp.

In these and countless other cases, members of the Bush administration appear to have efficiently channeled their constituents' grudges, leading to a distortion of the scientific evidence and a steady stream of scandals.

TO ADDRESS this new crisis over the relationship between science and politics, we propose a combination of political activism and institutional reform. Congress needs to establish safeguards to protect the integrity of scientific information in Washington — strong whistle-blower protections for scientists who work in government agencies would be a good start.

We also need a strengthening of the government scientific advisory apparatus, starting with the revival of the Office of Technology Assessment. And we need congressional committees to continue with their investigations of cases of science abuse within the Bush administration, in order to learn what other reforms are necessary.

At the same time, journalists and citizens must renounce a lazy "on the one hand, on the other hand" approach and start analyzing critically the quality of the evidence. For, in the end, all of us — conservative or liberal, believer or atheist — must share the same real world. Antibiotic-resistant bacteria do not spare deniers of evolution, and global climate change will not spare any of us. As physicist Richard Feynman wrote in connection with the space shuttle Challenger disaster, "nature cannot be fooled."

To avoid nature's punishment, we must take steps now to restore reality-based government.

CHRIS MOONEY is the Washington correspondent for Seed magazine and the author of "The Republican War on Science." ALAN SOKAL is a professor of physics at New York University and the coauthor of "Fashi

At Humanity's Doorstep (NYT)

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Should Congress require any further reason to move aggressively to limit greenhouse gas emissions, it need only read Friday's report from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, the world's authoritative voice on global warming.

A distillation of the best peer-reviewed science, the report expresses more than 90 percent certainty that man-made emissions from the burning of fossil fuels have caused the steady rise in atmospheric temperatures, with the destruction of tropical rain forests playing a lesser but important role.

The report warns that if society keeps to its current course, emissions will increase to twice their preindustrial levels by the end of this century, causing temperatures to rise 3.5 to 8 degrees. The consequences will include rising seas, more powerful hurricanes, disappearing coral reefs and more intensive droughts in subtropical countries.

The report also offers hope, suggesting that what humans have caused, humans can mitigate; that even though the world is committed to centuries of further warming, the process can be slowed and the worst effects averted by swift and decisive action to limit and reverse emissions.

This is the fourth in a series of studies that began in 1990. The first left open the possibility that the warming that began with the onset of the Industrial Revolution and increased in the 1950s was "largely due to natural variability." The second and third reports detected a bigger human role, and this one lays the whole problem at humanity's doorstep.

A later paper will address specific remedies. But many climate experts believe the world must embark on a swift and sustained shift in the way energy is produced and used — away from fuels like oil and coal, and toward cleaner alternatives.

That is the objective of the many global warming bills now circulating in Washington. The best of these would put a price on carbon through a mandatory cap on emissions from sources like power plants and cars, thus making coal and oil relatively more expensive while driving the market toward cleaner sources of energy.

As we have learned over the years, talk is cheap in Washington, while meaningful action is almost certain to be expensive. President Bush has brandished those very real costs of moving to a new energy-delivery system again and again to argue against mandatory caps on emissions and to make the case for his own cost-free (and demonstrably inadequate) program of voluntary reductions. Yet what the panel is telling us is that the costs of doing nothing, especially to future generations, will be far greater than the price of acting now.

This is not a report compiled by a bunch of activists or alarmists. It is a consensus document, the inherently conservative product of three years of study and debate among mainstream scientists from 150 countries with often competing agendas. And in its modesty, it is alarming enough.

DOJ_NMG_0127546

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gang `capital' Steps Up Fight (CHIT)

By Michael Martinez, Tribune National Correspondent

Chicago Tribune, February 4, 2007

Stung by failure to quell problem, L.A. goes gung-ho

LOS ANGELES -- Here in the nation's "capital" for street gangs, Jose Aleman is an ex-gangbanger with 26 bullet fragments in his brain. Lucky to be alive and well, Aleman is eating a Mexican pasta soup in the Homegirl Cafe, run by former female gang members, when he's interrupted by an aspiring gangster half his age.

They hug. Aleman, who has spent a third of his 36 years in Folsom and other prisons, is like a mentor and confessor.

"I've got a job, man. I'm going to be working full-time now," says Richard Hernandez, 18, who for the past few months has been unemployed and painting gang graffiti with his "tagging crew." Now Hernandez is going to quit running from the police, he says.

That's good news, Aleman later remarks. It's one less recruit in a city that Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa says is "the national epicenter" for gang activity.

With one recent study enumerating 40,000 members in 700 gangs in Los Angeles, the city is the originator and exporter of dangerous gangs gone national, such as the Bloods, the Crips and Mara Salvatrucha 13 (MS-13), said FBI spokesman Kenneth Smith.

"We have Blood and Crips sets in Indianapolis and Chicago, Cincinnati, Louisville--you know, that middle part of the country where people don't think they have a gang problem," said Smith, who was an Indianapolis police officer for eight years until 1997.

Chicago Crime Commission President Jim Wagner acknowledged Los Angeles as a breeding ground for gangs that are now in Chicago's western suburbs. "We are seeing in the suburban areas a growth in the presence of MS-13," he said.

After more than 20 years trying to eradicate Los Angeles' gangs--whose violence influenced American culture from video games to movies--officials were sharply rebuked for ongoing failures in a new study by a local civil rights group.

Indeed, as gang fighting has turned racial between blacks and Latinos, the mayor, Police Chief William Bratton and other local officials have launched a high-profile campaign with such blunt rhetoric that visitors and tourists may think twice about Los Angeles.

"We're the gang capital of the United States of America," Villaraigosa said in one interview.

Gangs aside, officials insist the city is as safe as it was in 1956, when Los Angeles had the same overall crime rates as in 2006. "L.A. is the second-safest city in America just behind New York," said mayoral spokesman Matt Szabo.

However, on Wednesday, local officials and the FBI office in Los Angeles will host a long-planned summit with law officials from the U.S., Canada and Central America on "transnational" gangs such as MS-13, which has ties to El Salvador. During the conference, the mayor and police chief are expected to announce anti-gang programs emphasizing prevention and intervention, officials said.

Gang crime on the rise in L.A.

To longtime Los Angeles activists, the renewed government pledges are welcomed, but the fervor appears a political response to a stinging report by civil rights lawyer Connie Rice of the Advancement Project, in which she calls for a "gang czar" and "a Marshall Plan" to end the gang epidemic.

"This is the third time that the Los Angeles City Council has officially asked the question, `Why are city gang reduction strategies failing?'" the report said.

The gung-ho response by officials appears to be a tactic to secure federal funds to combat the problem, said Rev. Greg Boyle, 52, a Jesuit priest who said over the past 19 years he has saved tens of thousands of youths and adults from gangs.

With the slogan "nothing stops a bullet like a job," Boyle oversees several employment enterprises under the umbrella group Homeboy Industries--which the mayor cited as a model program--that also includes the Homegirl Cafe. In fact, 18-year-old Hernandez's new job is mopping, sweeping and cleaning Boyle's 3,000-square-foot headquarters for $7.50 an hour. Aleman also works for Boyle as a motivational outreach speaker for $8 an hour.

"You would ask yourself what would be the interests of the police chief and the mayor to call Los Angeles the nation's epicenter for gangs," Boyle said. "We'd think it would be a PR blunder, but if you scratch ever so slightly, you'll see that they'll be able to get federal money.

DOJ_NMG_0127547

"Otherwise it would look insane: Wouldn't that upset tourists?" asked Boyle, who adds he believes that gang violence was worse in the 1990s.

Statistics, however, show a recent upswing in gang crime, though the city's overall crime rate is down, officials said.

Last year marked a 14 percent increase in gang-related offenses, and of the city's 481 homicides, more than half involved gang members, said Sgt. Lee Sands, a police spokesman.

A few of those homicides involved conflict between Latino and black gangs, especially as the city's Hispanic population grows and the African-American community doesn't.

The racial conflict isn't as prevalent as media coverage suggests, said police Lt. Paul Vernon.

He added: "We'll never arrest our way out of this.

"Society in general has to let their children know there are alternatives in life, that there isn't la vida loca. ... `Today I party and tomorrow I die.' That is not a mindset that young people in America should have."

`Hospitals, death, prison'

Overcrowded prisons, a 50 percent high school dropout rate and the lack of job training and after-school programs contribute to gang growth, officials said. Another factor is that Los Angeles is the "most underpoliced big city" in the country, with 9,000 officers compared with New York's 37,000 and Chicago's 13,500.

In the meantime, Aleman said, he's promoting Criminals and Gangmembers Anonymous, an organization that is modeled after Alcoholics Anonymous' 12-step program. In it, former gangsters help active ones to quit what Aleman calls the "addiction" of leading a violent life on the streets.

"I share everything I can in order to expose the truth that gangs never tell you: There's no future to it. There's only three dead ends to gangs: hospitals, death, prison," said Aleman, who was released from prison in 2004 after serving time for involuntary manslaughter. He credits Boyle with motivating him to quit the gangs.

---

mjmartinez@tribune.com

Gun Charges Dismissed On Suspected Hit Man (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 4, 2007

Appeals court overturns conviction of man already acquitted of two previous killings

Jason Korey, suspected by police of being a serial hit man and once described by one detective as "John Dillinger Jr." and by another as the "closest to the devil I'll ever come," again has proved a slippery target for prosecutors.

Already acquitted of two killings, and with charges of attempting a third withdrawn, he's won another legal battle.

An appellate court has thrown out a federal gun conviction that would have sent him to prison for three decades. The case was built largely on evidence from a homicide trial that the district attorney's office lost.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled last month that faulty jury instructions by U.S. District Judge Gary Lancaster might have influenced jurors to convict Mr. Korey in 2005.

The appellate court also took the unusual step of admonishing the judge for his handling of an inappropriate remark by the prosecutor. Judge Lancaster allowed an assistant U.S. attorney to launch into a speech to the jury instead of apologizing after the remark.

U.S. Attorney Mary Beth Buchanan is now considering whether her office will retry Mr. Korey, 24, of Baldwin Borough, whose ability to escape homicide charges has long frustrated Pittsburgh police.

He was acquitted in 2000 in the 1999 slaying of William Kuhn III, 24, a South Side cocaine dealer. The decision outraged detectives, especially because they believed that Mr. Korey had beaten another murder charge in 1999 when he was acquitted in the killing of Joseph Brucker, 17, of Whitehall.

Police didn't give up, though, and turned instead to the federal court system.

As part of Project Safe Neighborhoods, a U.S. Justice Department crackdown on illegal guns, they teamed up with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives to link Mr. Korey and the .22-caliber pistol used in the Kuhn killing.

A jury found him guilty of using a gun during a drug-trafficking crime and Judge Lancaster sentenced him to nearly 33 years in prison.

But among several challenges to the sentence, his public defenders said he was denied a fair trial because of prejudicial jury instructions and because the judge allowed Assistant U.S. Attorney James Love to issue an "apology for foul language that bolstered the prosecutor's reputation."

The appellate court said the judge was wrong to tell jurors they could find Mr. Korey guilty if they agreed with the government's contention that he accepted cocaine from drug dealer Ray Erfort as payment for killing Mr. Kuhn.

DOJ_NMG_0127548

The 3rd Circuit judges said that alone wasn't enough to prove Mr. Korey was involved in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine, as required by the statute under which he was charged.

"We do not mean to suggest with our holding in this case that a hit man hired by a drug distribution conspiracy cannot be a part of the conspiracy," Judge D. Michael Fisher wrote. "Rather, we simply hold that the jury instructions in this case did not properly instruct the jury about all of the elements the government must prove to establish participation in such a conspiracy."

The appellate judges didn't rule on Mr. Korey's other challenges, but they did take Judge Lancaster to task for how he handled a testy remark by Mr. Love.

As the judge was telling public defender W. Penn Hackney that he could look over police reports he hadn't previously seen and then cross-examine homicide Detective Tom Foley, Mr. Love blurted out, "Jesus Christ."

Federal courtrooms, big on decorum, aren't good places for intemperate comments.

"What did you say?" Judge Lancaster demanded. "What did you say?"

"What did I say?" Mr. Love replied, according to a transcript.

The judge stopped the trial and demanded to see Mr. Love in chambers. When they emerged, Mr. Love gave a rambling apology to the jury in which he recounted his experience and reputation as a prosecutor.

Mr. Hackney said that wasn't fair because it influenced the jury. The appellate judges agreed.

"The resulting comments inappropriately injected the character and experience of the attorney into the trial in a manner that has worried us in the past," Judge Fisher wrote.

Mr. Love said he couldn't comment. Mr. Hackney didn't return a message, but public defenders almost never comment on cases. Chief Public Defender Lisa Freeland, who argued the appellate case, said she could not comment beyond the public record.

Pittsburgh homicide Detective Steve Hitchings, whom Mr. Korey taunted after his federal court conviction, said he couldn't talk, either, and referred questions to the U.S. attorney's office.

After the 2005 verdict came in, Mr. Korey glowered at Detective Hitchings and shouted: "It took you two trials to get me!"

"You'll get prison for life," Detective Hitchings growled back.

He didn't get life, though, and it's not clear what will happen next. The case was returned to district court last week.

"We are reviewing the appellate court's decision to determine our course of action," Ms. Buchanan said.

More legal sparring is certain if she chooses to try Mr. Korey again, because a new prosecution could be challenged on double jeopardy grounds at both the state and federal levels.

Essentially, Mr. Korey has been tried twice on the same set of facts: Mr. Kuhn's killing.

Lawyers are likely to argue that the government should not get a third crack at him.

Despite the vacated sentence, he's not going anywhere soon.

He's in state prison on a drug charge until at least August 2008 and still has to complete 33 months of federal prison time on other weapons charges to which he pleaded guilty during the 2005 trial.

One of those charges was possession of a silencer for the .22 used in the killing of Mr. Kuhn.

For Police, Ill-Gotten Gains Become Money Well Spent (NYT)

By Shelly Feuer Domash

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

IN 2001, federal Drug Enforcement Administration agents gave the Nassau County Police Department Asset Forfeiture Unit a license plate number that was registered to an elderly woman in the county. It was the only lead they had on a suspected major drug and money-laundering operation, but it paid off in arrests — and, for the Nassau police, much more.

After a two-year investigation started by that lead, the Forfeiture Unit executed six search warrants in Nassau County, New York City, Miami and Boston and seized guns, drugs, $300,000 in jewelry, $600,000 in vehicles, $750,000 in cash and $3 million in real property — assets with a total value of more than $4.6 million. Spinoff investigations are continuing, and officials expect that the total forfeitures will eventually exceed an additional $5 million.

Most of that money will wind up in the bank accounts of law enforcement agencies instead of the criminals', paying for a wide array of crime-fighting equipment.

By confiscating equipment used in a crime, like cars; the proceeds of a crime; or items purchased with those proceeds, like jewelry or houses, asset forfeiture is designed to strip criminals of their ability to continue illegal activities. But it also has financial benefits for the police and taxpayers.

Although the Suffolk County Police and some municipal departments have also received forfeiture money, the Nassau County Police have been in the forefront locally in getting it. And the payoff has been substantial.

Nassau County established its forfeiture office in 1992. Twelve years later, Suffolk County started a unit as part of its narcotics bureau.

In the last five years, Nassau County has averaged $2 million a year in seizure money, allowing major additions to law enforcement capabilities without cost to taxpayers. Among purchases made with forfeiture money were Global Positioning System devices costing about $532,000 that were recently installed in 207 county patrol cars; two fast-response boats for the North and South Shores, costing a total of $500,000; and hazardous-materials suits and tactical gas masks for every member of the department, costing $750,000.

The department's photo evidence system was replaced with digital imaging equipment at a cost of more than $1 million, and a relocated and larger police academy was opened in Massapequa — all using forfeiture money.

In addition to equipment, Detective Lt. Michael Fleming said, "We spend a significant amount of forfeiture money on training."

"Without this money, we could not have made these advances," he said.

In Suffolk County, the police commissioner, Richard Dormer, said money from the asset forfeiture program enabled his office to "enhance training, purchase equipment that an officer can use on the streets and assist communities with their efforts to fight crime."

Specifically, he said, the money has been used to lease vehicles for the gang unit and for narcotics enforcement, computers and technology upgrades.

He said that since the Suffolk forfeiture unit was created, it had, with the help of other law enforcement agencies, seized shopping centers, apartment buildings, houses and vehicles. The department expects to be credited with a total of $1.2 million as its share of seizure money, Commissioner Dormer said.

The majority of the 19 local departments in Nassau County have also received forfeiture funds. Federal and state agencies often receive a share of seized assets, too.

"The share that a law enforcement agency receives is commensurate with the amount of work they contribute to the investigation that led to the seizure," Lieutenant Fleming said.

The Hempstead Police, one of the most active departments on Long Island, uses its forfeiture funds — tens of thousands of dollars a year — for training and equipment, said Detective Lt. Joseph Wing. He said this did not include money from seizures in collaborations with federal agencies that could yield $30,000 to $50,000 for each investigation.

How much a department receives varies from year to year, making it imprudent to budget for it, police officials say. Budgeting seizure money could also be unwise "because if you do, your motive for prosecuting a case could be challenged," Lieutenant Fleming said.

He said that the process must be closely monitored so it is not abused. A panel of senior department members oversees how forfeiture money is allocated.

"The principal objective is effective law enforcement," Lieutenant Fleming said. "Extravagant purchases are prohibited."

The forfeiture process is overseen by federal, state and local regulations. Once a prosecution begins, the forfeiture action runs parallel to it, but the distribution is not made until the criminal action is completed.

Distribution is determined by federal and state laws that first require an administrative or judicial finding that the property seized is an instrument or proceed of criminal conduct. The laws then address how the seized assets will be distributed, including the share that each law enforcement agency involved in the investigation will receive.

In November 2005, the Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section of the federal Department of Justice formed a working group to review the forfeiture program nationwide. Its purpose is to identify the program's strengths and weaknesses and develop a national strategy, working with other law enforcement agencies to develop consistent goals and policies.

The working group includes federal agencies like the F.B.I., the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the United States Marshals Service. The only state or local police department represented is Nassau County's.

Richard Weber, the chief of the Asset Forfeiture and Money Laundering Section of the Justice Department, said he picked Nassau's department because he had worked with it and it is "a model for the country when it comes to asset forfeiture."

He cited the forfeiture unit's ability to work with other law enforcement agencies, the skills of its detectives and the "significant and complex financial investigations they had worked on with the New York asset forfeiture task force."

IMMIGRATION:

Acrobat Admits Guilt In Visa Scam (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

A former acrobat has pleaded guilty to charges of helping as many as 870 foreign nationals enter the United States illegally and making false statements in visa applications, the Justice Department said.

Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said Kristo Ivanov, 70, of Orlando, Fla., entered the plea Thursday before U.S. District Judge Donald P. Dietrich in federal court in Orlando.

In his plea agreement with federal prosecutors, Ivanov admitted that from 2001 to February 2006, he helped the illegal aliens enter or remain in the United States through fraudulent means, preparing visa applications falsely saying they were circus performers coming to work in Florida.

Mrs. Fisher said none of the aliens had been hired by any of the circuses listed in the visa applications, adding that they were "simply a means for the aliens to enter or remain in the United States." She said Ivanov charged each alien from $500 to $2,500 to prepare the applications.

"Ivanov admits to helping hundreds of illegal aliens into the United States under false pretenses so that he could benefit financially," Mrs. Fisher said. "We will not allow this type of exploitation of our immigration system, which poses a risk to the security of our nation."

A Bulgarian native who is now a naturalized American citizen, Ivanov came to the United States in 1980 as an acrobat for Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus. He has owned and operated a circus booking agency, Magic Star Entertainment, of Lake Mary, Fla., for more than five years and used that agency to sponsor illegal aliens to enter or remain in this country.

As part of his plea agreement, Ivanov agreed to forfeit $600,000 he earned in smuggling fees.

Sentencing is scheduled for next month.

"Businesses who knowingly sponsor foreign nationals under false pretenses should know that you will be caught," said FBI special agent in charge Robert Weber, who heads the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Office of Investigations in Tampa, Fla.

"The federal government will not tolerate the exploitation of our nation's visa system."

Contractors Walking Immigration Tightrope (DENP)

By Elizabeth Aguilera, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, February 4, 2007

Tony Milo of the Colorado Contractors Association says contractors are doing their best to hire within the law. He's standing near Interstate 25 and the Yosemite Bridge, part of a T-REX project he says could not have been finished without immigrant labor. (Post / John Prieto)

Facing growing public criticism from activists opposed to illegal immigration, Colorado's construction contractors have begun to shed their reluctance to debate the issue publicly.

Contractors are joining a growing chorus of business leaders - including hotels, restaurants and agriculture - who say they are trying to hire only legal workers but lack a foolproof system for confirming an employee's legal status.

A company's best option is the beleaguered Basic Pilot Program, which uses Social Security numbers to verify worker eligibility. But federal authorities acknowledge that Basic Pilot can't reliably show when someone is misusing a citizen's identity.

As a result, the state's contractors say they are left with a difficult choice: Use Basic Pilot and risk hiring undocumented workers or aggressively profile prospective employees, which could lead to legal penalties.

"Employers are walking this tightrope of anti-discrimination laws and immigration laws," said Tony Milo, executive director of the Colorado Contractors Association.

"We've certainly been feeling the squeeze. We've now got this complex web of state and federal regulations that sometimes conflict with each other."

Milo and other Colorado contractors began speaking out following a national television report on "Dateline NBC" in December that revealed how undocumented workers were employed by Roaring Fork Valley contractor Mark Gould.

Gould, who uses Basic Pilot, spoke to "Dateline" about the challenges of balancing the need to verify employees' citizenship with his need for manual labor.

His explanations, however, didn't satisfy state Sen. David Schultheis, R-Colorado Springs, one of Colorado's leading advocates for tougher immigration laws.

Schultheis says employers such as Gould can do more to avoid hiring illegal immigrants. He told The Denver Post that he wants employers to profile potential employees based on their ability to speak English.

"If the person cannot speak English, in many cases they can presume the person is fresh from the border," Schultheis said. "You have to take a little bit of a risk obviously."

DOJ_NMG_0127551

What Schultheis is suggesting, however, is illegal, according to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

"Whether an accent would indicate immigration status is a matter of opinion, but it has nothing to do with the rights of workers in America," said James Ryan, spokesman for the EEOC. "It's wrong to make any kind of prejudicial assumption because a person has an accent or a certain national origin."

Gould says Schultheis' point of view is another example of the pressure and dilemma that contractors face. "People don't realize that when you have an employee in front of you, you don't get to ask more questions if they have brown skin," he said. "We are regulated in a very strict way so that we do not discriminate."

Colorado contractors, in general, support comprehensive immigration reform that includes a guest-worker program, a path to legalization for qualified illegal immigrants and a more reliable form of Basic Pilot.

"Everyone deserves a fair chance," said Mike Villia, a partner at Denver-based Paramount Construction Group, which hires contractors as partners. "We require that contractors hire legal people. I'm not sure I agree with all the laws out there, but we have to follow them."

Swift was "following ... rules"

Like contractors, meatpacking company Swift & Co. has walked both sides of the line when hiring, each time leading to federal scrutiny, observers say.

The company's efforts to confirm citizenship of its foreign applicants led to a Justice Department investigation in 2000. The company eventually paid a $200,000 settlement in 2002 and increased its reliance on the Basic Pilot Program. By 2006, however, federal authorities suspected Swift had become a job haven for illegal immigrants. In December, federal authorities raided six Swift plants and arrested 1,282 undocumented workers, many suspected of or charged with identity theft.

"Swift Co. got into trouble ... despite the fact that it had been participating in the Basic Pilot and following all the rules," said Wayne Cornelius, director of the Center for Comparative Immigration Studies at the University of California, San Diego.

Some observers say Colorado's construction industry is equally vulnerable for such trouble. The construction industry employs about 167,000 people and demographers estimate that 10 percent to 20 percent are undocmented. The only real way to lower such high numbers of illegal-immigrant employment is to create a high-tech, universal identification card embedded with biometrics, Cornelius said.

Until then, he added, "the contractors and other employers will be dealing with a deeply flawed system of employment-eligibility verification."

Basic Pilot has "bugs"

After the "Dateline" segment, Gould received more than 1,000 calls. Some people were looking for a job; others left hateful messages.

Gould and other state contractors say they are frustrated by the negative attention from the report and are speaking out.

Former Colorado Gov. Dick Lamm, a proponent of tougher immigration laws, said everyone should go through the same screening process, and it would be unfair to do otherwise.

"If (employers) are using the Basic Pilot program, that is all they should need to do," Lamm wrote in an e-mail. "There are bugs in that system, but they are being worked out. ... There is only so much I would want to put on the employer."

Staff writer Elizabeth Aguilera can be reached at 303-820-1372 or eaguilera@denverpost.com.

The Price Of Citizenship (NYT)

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

With one hand, Lady Liberty lifts her lamp beside the golden door. With the other, she roots around in an immigrant's wallet, plucking out bills. It's not an appealing image, but that's where we are, now that Citizenship and Immigration Services, the beleaguered federal bureaucracy that makes new Americans, has announced plans to increase fees sharply to cover its costs.

The agency is distinctive in the federal government for being entirely dependent on fees it collects. It is also notable for backlogs and what its director, Emilio Gonzalez, acknowledges are "dingy buildings" and "rude employees." Mr. Gonzalez promises that if the agency is granted an average increase of 66 percent in the price of visas and citizenship papers, it will process applications more quickly and take other steps to fulfill its responsibilities, the costs of which have risen sharply since 9/11.

What this means for aspiring immigrants is simple: more cash upfront. The application fee for citizenship would rise to $595 from $330. The fee for permanent residency would increase to $905 from $325, and charges for bringing in a foreign spouse or employee would more than double. Refugees and victims of human trafficking or sex crimes would still have their fees waived, and other applicants could request hardship waivers.

DOJ_NMG_0127552

There are no easy formulas for pricing services like these, but advocacy groups on both sides of the immigration debate agree that the increases are exorbitant, and we agree. The proposed fees would become a means test for new Americans, slamming the door on many people who desperately want to be part of this country and have much to contribute.

The blame clearly lies with Congress, which has required the agency to support itself entirely with fees. Congress should abandon this misguided rule and allocate the money to run the agency adequately and efficiently. All Americans benefit from the healthy, invigorating flow of naturalized citizens, and all Americans — not just the newest, least powerful ones — should help pay for it.

TAX:

Court Upholds Evasion Ruling In A Tax Case (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

The federal tax court has ruled in favor of the Internal Revenue Service in a 14-year-old evasion case involving a now-dead lawyer who was one of the nation's leading tax advisers, millions of dollars in reported real estate kickbacks and a Supreme Court ruling that ended a longstanding practice of secrecy in tax court.

In the decision last week, Judge Harry A. Haines of the United States Tax Court ruled that the lawyer, Burton W. Kanter, and two associates had accepted kickbacks from the Pritzker family of Chicago, which owns the Hyatt hotels, and then evaded taxes on the payments.

Lawyers for the three said they were stunned by the decision and would appeal it, expecting it to go to the Supreme Court for a second time.

They said the decision ran counter to the findings of a special trial judge who heard the case in 1994. That judge, they said, determined that small amounts of tax were due because of technical violations but that there was no civil fraud.

The two associates are Claude M. Ballard, a former general partner at Goldman Sachs who before that was a real estate executive at Prudential Insurance, and Robert W. Lisle, a Prudential real estate executive who died before the original trial. Mr. Kanter died in 2001.

The case involved a San Francisco hotel that Mr. Lisle had Prudential, now Prudential Financial, build in 1973. He then steered the management contract for the hotel, which became the Hyatt Embarcadero, to the Pritzkers in 1973. In return, court papers say, A. N. Pritzker, the family patriarch, agreed to pay 10 percent of the hotel's profit to the three men and two others, who soon left the deal. The I.R.S. audited the deal, leading the three men to sue the I.R.S., resulting in a 1994 trial before the special trial judge, D. Irvin Couvillion.

Five years later, a regular tax court judge, Howard A. Dawson Jr., issued the formal judgment, describing Mr. Kanter as the architect of a long-running scheme to evade taxes.

Judge Couvillion had reached the opposite conclusion, but the tax court maintained that the original report could not be disclosed.

The Supreme Court held otherwise in 2005, ending the tax court's practice of withholding such findings. When the report was made public, it showed that the trial judge had found no fraud. Mr. Kanter regarded himself as the nation's premier expert at legally eliminating taxes, his son Josh and several lawyers said Friday. If the decision stands, Mr. Kanter's estate will owe about $20 million.

The Netherlands, The New Tax Shelter Hot Spot (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Oh, a storm is threat'ning
My very life today
If I don't get some shelter
Oh yeah, I'm gonna fade away
"Gimme Shelter," The Rolling Stones

Amsterdam

LAST spring, Keith Richards, the craggy-faced and hard-partying lead guitarist for the Rolling Stones, fell from a tree at a beach resort in Fiji, slamming his head against the trunk on his way down. Mr. Richards was flown to New Zealand, where a surgeon provided emergency care to treat swelling in his brain. While the accident forced the Rolling Stones to cancel part of their summer tour, Mr. Richards, 62, handily survived his plunge.

DOJ_NMG_0127553

"It's not the first brush with death I've had," Mr. Richards later told Rolling Stone magazine. "I guess what I learned is, don't sit in trees anymore."

What two of the other three Rolling Stones apparently learned, including Mick Jagger and Charlie Watts, was that Mr. Richards's near-death experience meant that it was time to think about their heirs. For that, the aging rockers turned to a reclusive Dutch accountant, Johannes Favie, whose company, Promogroup, has helped them minimize their tax bills for more than 30 years. (The fourth Rolling Stone, Ron Wood, handles his finances apart from Promogroup.)

And so, last August, according to details disclosed in documents maintained by the Handelsregister, the trade registry of the Netherlands, Promogroup helped the three performers set up a pair of private Dutch foundations that will allow them to transfer assets tax-free to heirs when they die. Other Dutch shelters that Promogroup has arranged for the three have already paid off handsomely; over the last 20 years, according to Dutch documents, the three musicians have paid just $7.2 million in taxes on earnings of $450 million that they have channeled through Amsterdam — a tax rate of about 1.5 percent, well below the British rate of 40 percent.

The Rolling Stones are not the only celebrities sheltering income in the land of tulips, windmills and Rembrandt. The rock powerhouse U2 has transferred lucrative assets to Amsterdam, as have other pop singers and well-known athletes, all of whom have used or continue to take advantage of the Netherlands' tax shelters, according to a Dutch tax lawyer who requested anonymity because of client confidentiality agreements.

Entertainment companies and others that benefit handsomely from the Dutch shelters include EMI, the giant record label, and CKX Inc., the entertainment company that owns stakes in "American Idol," the Elvis Presley estate and the soccer pin-up idol David Beckham.

When it comes to attracting celebrity wealth seeking shelter from taxes, the Cayman Islands and other classic Caribbean tax havens are receding in favor like so many waves on the beach, according to tax experts here and overseas. While old-school, offshore tax havens — the warm ones with tropical fish, off-the-shelf holding companies sporting post-office-box addresses, and scant regulation or transparency — still attract money, they are largely patronized, tax lawyers and entertainment bankers say, by hedge funds and private equity firms looking to protect lush trading profits from taxes.

But for earnings derived from intellectual property such as royalties, the Netherlands has become a tax shelter of choice. With celebrities lending their names and images to clothing lines, licensing their hit songs to corporate sponsors, seeking roles in Hollywood and engaging in other ventures that generate significant taxable income, the Dutch system, which does not tax royalties, offers a nifty shelter.

As they flock to Amsterdam, celebrities are taking a leaf out of the playbook of major corporations that also use Dutch tax shelters to help reduce or eliminate the royalty taxes on patents, another form of intellectual property.

"The Caribbeans are thinking about trading profits, not royalties, so the smaller European countries like Holland have had to be creative, tax-wise," said David Pullman, an investment banker in New York who caters to entertainers and athletes. "They are going for the high-end stuff and don't want to be seen as shady like some Caribbean haven."

Many of the world's multinational corporations, like Coca-Cola, Nike, Ikea and Gucci, have set up holding companies here in recent years to take advantage of tax shelters nearly identical to the ones that the Rolling Stones and U2 use. An additional draw is the Dutch Finance Ministry's recent willingness to issue advance rulings that effectively bless the tax shelters, a fast-track process that has lured in companies and individuals seeking to use the Netherlands as a tax shelter.

Sun Microsystems, the giant American software and computer manufacturer, operates Dutch holding companies and is candid about why it does so. Until recently, on the Web site of the Netherlands Foreign Investment Agency, www.nfia.com, Sun offered the following blurb about the country's accommodating tax laws: "Let's face it: ask foreign companies why they're really located here, and nearly everyone will reply that it's because of the favorable tax ruling. The combination of this with the country's political stability, well-trained labor force, their linguistic skills and international attitude as well as the stable infrastructure for roads and telecommunications — this is why we're here." (A Sun spokeswoman declined to comment.)

The Netherlands is home to almost 20,000 "mailbox companies," Dutch shorthand for corporate shells set up by foreign companies and wealthy foreigners who use them to relieve taxes on royalties, dividends and interest payments, according to a report last November by SOMO, the Center for Research on Multinational Corporations, a nonprofit group in Amsterdam that monitors the business practices of large companies. Globally, some 1,165 companies use Dutch tax shelters to reduce or eliminate taxes on royalties and patents, according to SOMO.

The report, which is critical of the emergence of the Netherlands as a tax haven, says that the number of mailbox companies "has been increasing rapidly in recent years" and that the shelters undermine efforts by governments worldwide to

DOJ_NMG_0127554

"ensure that a level playing field is created where each country receives the fair taxation due to it as a result of the commercial activities undertaken within its borders."

OFTEN mentioned as a candidate to receive the Nobel Peace Prize, or, perhaps less seriously, to run the World Bank, U2's 46-year-old lead singer, Bono, has toured Africa with senior American officials to campaign against AIDS, and hobnobbed with financiers and policymakers while speaking out on global poverty issues at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. He even mugged for the cameras in 2000 with Pope John Paul II, who tried on his sunglasses.

U2's riches are equally well-traveled and, like the Rolling Stones, the band has become sophisticated about finding overseas shelters for its money. When Ireland announced last spring that it would sharply curtail a lucrative tax break for musicians, painters, writers and sculptors, the shift posed a financial threat to U2, which has made the Emerald Isle its financial power base for nearly three decades. The Dublin-born-and-bred rockers built their fortune on hit songs and, in part, on Irish laws that forgive taxes due on royalties.

As of last year, U2 had amassed a net worth of 629 million euros — around $908 million — according to the annual "Rich List" of top earners in The Sunday Times of Britain. Royalties are the income that artists and athletes earn from recordings, performances, trademarks, brands, patents, copyrights, film rights, product endorsements, videos, films and the ever-extending commercialization of those assets — in short, the major portion of an artist's or an athlete's income.

Last June, with the Irish tax break about to shrink, U2 heeded the advice of its longtime business manager, Paul McGuinness, and moved its most lucrative asset — a song-publishing catalog with hits like "Where the Streets Have No Name" and "It's A Beautiful Day" — from Mr. McGuinness's firm, located near the Liffey River in Dublin, to Promogroup, which operates beside the elegant Herengracht canal in the heart of elegant, old Amsterdam.

Promogroup's headquarters are in a maroon-brick town house built four centuries ago for slave traders and spice merchants. Mr. Favie did not respond to repeated requests for an interview. To date, his company has not filed any information on funds flowing through U2 Ltd., the Dutch entity that holds U2's song catalog.

In another Amsterdam neighborhood known as the Financial Mile, not far from Promogroup's headquarters, Dutch firms like TMF, EQ Management Services, and Fortis Intertrust also cater to this high-end niche of tax-shelter devotees.

On its Web site, Fortis boasts that its clients are "the world's top composers, performing artists and personalities such as classical musicians, pop artists, DJs, and fashion models." The firm says it specializes in offering the "tax efficient exploitation of image rights," among other things.

"A lot of sponsor-sensitive sports people are also doing this — tennis players, golf players, soccer players," said Frank Lhoëst, an intellectual-property specialist at Fortis. The Dutch government is also in on the act, drafting an extensive network of tax treaties with countries worldwide that make it easy to shuffle money from Dutch companies to foreign subsidiaries, and creating other tax incentives.

"For non-U.S. musicians that receive a substantial portion of their income from non-U.S. source royalties, the use of a back-to-back licensing arrangement in the Netherlands provides significant tax savings," said Jeffrey L. Rubinger, a tax lawyer in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., at Holland & Knight.

The Dutch shelter is simple: royalties that flow into or out of a Dutch holding company are exempt from taxes. Although the nominal corporate tax rate in the Netherlands is around 30 percent, analysts say that domestic tax shelters bring that rate down substantially.

"For 90 percent of the people who do this, the motivation for using these structures is tax minimization, or avoidance," said Ton Smit, a tax lawyer at Tax Consultants International in Rotterdam, a firm that caters to celebrities, athletes and multinational corporations seeking to minimize their taxes.

HISTORICALLY, of course, the Netherlands has always looked outward, building global trading links and establishing the world's first stock exchange in the 17th century. That outlook has spawned legendary leniency, generosity and openness. Prostitution and some drugs are regulated but legal. State-funded benefits are substantial. Even witches are treated well: the government offers tax breaks to students studying witchcraft.

"It's not only tax-motivated, it's our culture — Dutch people are traders all over the world," Mr. Smit said.

Some experts see a darker side to the emergence of the Netherlands as a sought-after tax shelter. In 2000, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, based in Paris, black-marked the country as one of the world's top five industrialized tax havens for promoting "treaty shopping" for low-tax jurisdictions. The Netherlands tightened certain rules, requiring more substance for Dutch companies set up solely to reduce or eliminate taxes. But some analysts say that troubles persist.

In its report last fall, SOMO, the research group, said the Dutch shelters affect "both the capacity of developing-country governments to supply essential services to their populations and the capacity of developed-country governments to provide finance for development in the form of debt relief and official development aid." The report also said that "tax haven features of the Netherlands also facilitate money laundering and attract companies with a dubious reputation."

DOJ_NMG_0127555

While no one has suggested that any of the entertainers, athletes or celebrities making use of Dutch shelters are laundering illicit funds or engaging in illegal acts, the fact that some of them are gaming the tax system has invited criticism.

When news of the Rolling Stones' Dutch tax shelter first emerged last summer in Dutch and German newspapers, it did not particularly roil fans or the British tax authorities. After all, the Rolling Stones are widely regarded as one of the world's most commercial bands, with hundreds of officially licensed products ranging from Mick Jagger "quality resin" bobble-head dolls, Rolling Stones "Classic Rock" twin-bell alarm clocks, and "It's Only Rock and Roll" lava lamps to Rolling Stones Zippo lighters, Rolling Stones lounge pants and lingerie, leather jackets, diamond-encrusted gold and silver jewelry, and the band's ubiquitous trademark and calling card, the thick red Rolling Stones tongue.

But critics say that U2's tax move to Holland is threatening to tarnish the halo surrounding the well-regarded, affable and articulate Bono, by lending him a whiff of hypocrisy. After all, unlike Bono, Mr. Jagger is not out campaigning against third-world debt, or writing a foreword for "The End of Poverty," the most recent book by the prominent economist Jeffrey D. Sachs.

"Bono is a worldwide advocate for greater aid to the developing world, and I applaud him for that," said Joan Burton, the spokesperson for the Irish Labor Party's finance unit and a former cabinet minister, in a telephone interview. "But obviously the money for that comes from taxation, so it's very difficult to ask other people to pay tax to contribute to something very worthwhile while at the same time not paying taxes in a very modest environment."

IRELAND'S taxation of artists is, indeed, modest. Ireland currently allows unlimited tax-free earnings for artists from the sale of their work, but not from licensing or merchandising deals. The government set it up in 1969 to benefit resident struggling artists for whom books like "Blessed Art Thou a Monk Swimming" and "The Wild Red Deer of Killarney" — to name just two titles protected under the exemption — are unlikely to generate big licensing deals.

Next January, Ireland will cap the benefit at 250,000 euros, or around $319,000, after which a sliding tax scale sets in. The country already has a low corporate income tax rate of 12.5 percent.

Some tax advisers in Holland relish extolling the benefits of their service when compared with classic Caribbean tax regimes. In a pitch for the merits of the Dutch tax system, Gerwin de Widle, a tax lawyer at Greenberg Traurig in Amsterdam, observed that "it's better to be here than sit on an island, where they don't even take euros."

Amid such jousting, the fact that U2 is financially decamping to Holland has raised some eyebrows.

Jeff Swystun, a global director at Interbrand, a brand consulting firm based in New York, said that "the Stones will always be credible because of a very simple proposition: we want to have a great party." But U2, he said, "almost project themselves as a nonprofit, so the tax move doesn't really fit with the brand values that they're trying to communicate."

Not so, says U2.

"U2 is a global business and it pays taxes globally," said Mr. McGuinness, the band's business manager, who, in an unusual arrangement, shares equally in the band's earnings. "At least 95 percent of U2's business — including record and ticket sales — takes place outside of Ireland and as a result the band pays many different kinds of taxes all over the world. U2 is fully compliant with all Irish tax laws."

Mr. McGuinness said that Bono and U2 "continue to remain Ireland-based and are personal investors and employers in the country."

"Innovative tax policies have been the bedrock of Ireland's current prosperity," he added. "Like any other business, U2 operates in a tax-efficient manner."

A spokeswoman for the Rolling Stones, Fran Curtis, declined to comment, other than to say that the band members "don't like to talk about their business." But Mr. Jagger, in a declaration filed last June in a civil lawsuit against his band in an unrelated matter, offered a glimpse of some of the machinery that supports the Rolling Stones' money machine.

In the declaration, Mr. Jagger noted that some of the revenue from his group's recordings flows through the Netherlands. He pointed out that "the recording services of the Rolling Stones are provided by companies that have the right to such services to Promotone B.V., which in turn owns the recordings of the Rolling Stones. My understanding is that Promotone licenses exploitation of those recordings to EMI Music Netherlands B.V., which releases and distributes those recordings through other companies in the United States."

A spokeswoman for EMI declined requests for comment.

According to documents from the Dutch trade registry, Promogroup's Mr. Favie, the principal director of the Stones' holdings in the Netherlands, is now also the main director of U2 Ltd., the Dutch-based entity that holds the lucrative master tapes to U2's song library. Song catalogs typically account for a large portion of successful band's royalty income, so U2 Ltd. is likely to be the recipient of a major piece of U2's income, analysts say. Likewise, U2's financial move to the Netherlands is likely to save it substantial sums it might otherwise have paid in royalty taxes.

DOJ_NMG_0127556

Not everyone has access to Dutch shelters. Dutch tax benefits are typically available only to artists who are not citizens of the United States. While the Netherlands does not tax royalties going in or out of a Dutch company, the Treasury Department in the United States typically levies its standard corporate income tax rate of 35 percent on royalties coming into America from a Dutch entity.

Dutch holding companies set up to protect royalties often work in tandem with offshore Caribbean companies, shuffling money around to escape taxes, analysts say. For example, part of the Rolling Stones' Dutch-run assets are funneled through the Netherlands Antilles, a Dutch protectorate and a classic Caribbean tax haven, according to company registration documents.

"Ethically in my opinion, Bono's tax arrangements are entirely inconsistent with his calls upon government to support anti-poverty drives," said Richard Murphy, who runs Tax Research LLC, a research institute based in Norfolk, England, and was one of three co-authors of the SOMO report on Dutch tax shelters. "You cannot be demanding that resources be allocated to anti-poverty drives and then deny those resources to government."

Other tax experts say that such views are overly prim and that rock stars are simply following the leads of some of the world's biggest companies. U2 and the Stones "are taking advantage of this in the same way that all the drug companies are putting all their patents in favorable tax jurisdictions," said Prof. Michael J. Graetz of Yale, an authority on tax shelters and a self-described die-hard Rolling Stones fan. "I wouldn't go so far as to say it's fair, but it's not shocking either."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Budget's Ups And Downs Leave Big Chunk For War (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Pentagon is the big winner in President Bush's proposed budget for next year, while domestic items such as aid to schools and grants to local governments will get slight increases.

Medicare and Medicaid, the health program for the poor and disabled, would shoulder modest but politically difficult cost curbs in the budget the White House is submitting to Congress on Monday.

Some $18 billion in budget savings would come from farm programs over five years.

Bush's spending plan totals almost $3 trillion for the budget year starting October 1. It would produce a surplus in five years, helped by steady revenue growth and a squeeze on the one-sixth of the budget that covers domestic agencies such as the departments of Education, Energy and Health and Human Services.

Domestic agencies would not face an outright cut, as proposed last year, but would see increases averaging 1 percent, White House Budget director Rob Portman said. That is less than anticipated inflation, but higher costs for veterans' health care probably would result in a larger than average increase.

The Pentagon, which also consumes one-sixth of the overall budget, would get an 11 percent increase, to $481.4 billion in its core budget. And that is before accounting for an additional $235 billion in war costs over the next year and a half.

Bush's plan will get a skeptical reception from the Democratic-controlled Congress. Democrats say it meets the president's promise to balance the budget by 2012 by omitting war costs and expensive changes to the alternative minimum tax and assuming politically untenable cuts in payments to doctors under Medicare.

"There's this continuing deception about our real fiscal condition," the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee said in an interview Saturday. "Over and over again we see things left out of his budget that we know are going to have to be dealt with," said Sen. Kent Conrad, D-North Dakota.

Democrats also say Bush's estimated cost of about $6 billion for increasing U.S. combat troop strength in Iraq greatly understates the likely total.

For months, Conrad has worked in back channels to establish a group of administration officials and lawmakers who would try to rein in costly benefit programs such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. But the president's refusal to consider some tax increases has scuttled the idea, at least for now.

Bush pushed the balanced budget idea -- to applause -- before a meeting Saturday with House Democrats in Virginia. But he seemed to acknowledge that a large-scale budget agreement with Democrats is a long shot.

"I'm under no illusions of how hard it's going to be," Bush said. "The only thing I want to share with you is, is my desire to see if we can't work together to get it done."

There is room for some modest steps such as an increase in the maximum Pell Grant for low-income college students to $4,600, $550 more than the current cap. House Democrats last week passed an increase in the maximum grant to $4,310.Health care spending likely to be debated

DOJ_NMG_0127557

The federal contribution to the popular State Children's Health Insurance Program would rise slightly to address chronic shortfalls. States, however, would get less money to cover children in families at twice the poverty level or more. Democrats are pressing for far greater increases in the children's health program.

The White House's budget also would trim $12 billion from Medicaid, mostly through lower payments to states for administrative costs. About $5 billion or so would go toward addressing shortfalls in the State Children's Health Insurance Program, according to the White House budget office.

The proposed cuts to Medicare and Medicaid are relatively modest, given the overall size of the programs. The Medicare reductions would come in part from smaller inflation adjustments for hospitals, nursing homes, home health care providers and hospices. More higher-income older people would face increased premiums.

Hospitals in particular are a powerful lobbying group and often are some of the leading employers in lawmakers' districts and states. Smaller Medicare cuts of $36 billion proposed last year went nowhere in a GOP-led Congress, and Democrats quickly pounced on the new proposal.

"I think that sounds like the president is declaring war on us and the poor people in this country," said Rep. Pete Stark, D-California.

Stark and other Democrats probably will go after what they see as excessive payments to private managed care plans that provide care to about 8 million Medicare beneficiaries.

Democrats also must deal with a scheduled 8 percent cut in Medicare payments to doctors, a byproduct from a 1997 budget bill. Bush's budget would leave the cut in place, though Congress is virtually certain to provide relief as it has since 2003 with other scheduled payment cuts. Such a move would eat up Bush's proposed Medicare savings and then some.

All told, Bush is seeking $96 billion over five years from mandatory programs providing fixed benefits such as Medicare, farm subsidies and Medicaid and whose spending rises each year.

"Unless we act, we will saddle our children and grandchildren with tens of trillions of dollars of unfunded obligations," Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address. "They will face three bad options: huge tax increases, huge budget deficits or huge and immediate cuts in benefits."

Bush's Medicare Budget Would Raise Premiums (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3 — More and more Medicare beneficiaries would have to pay higher premiums for coverage of prescription drugs and doctors' services under President Bush's 2008 budget, to be unveiled on Monday.

Single people with annual incomes over $80,000 and married couples with incomes over $160,000 already have to pay higher premiums for the part of Medicare that covers doctors' services. The income thresholds rise with inflation.

Budget documents show that Mr. Bush will propose a similar surcharge on premiums for Medicare's new prescription drug benefit. In addition, the president will ask Congress to "eliminate annual indexing of income thresholds," so that more people would eventually have to pay the higher premiums.

The proposal, expected to raise $10 billion over the next five years, is one of many advanced by Mr. Bush in a $2.8 trillion budget that aims to eliminate the deficit by 2012.

In his budget request, Mr. Bush expresses alarm about what he calls "the unsustainable growth of federal entitlement programs," and he proposes savings in Medicare and Medicaid that far surpass what he or any other president has sought.

The president contends that he can make the rule changes without any action by Congress. But Congress could try to block some or all of the changes.

Democrats immediately denounced the proposals. "This is exactly the wrong approach," said Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who cited the proposals as evidence of what she called "the president's misplaced priorities."

Many Republicans like the idea of an "income-related premium," saying affluent beneficiaries can afford to pay a larger share of Medicare's costs. Democrats are divided. Some see it as a progressive way to finance the program. But others say it is fundamentally at odds with the idea of social insurance, and they fear that it could prompt some wealthy people to leave Medicare.

Administration officials said earlier this week that Mr. Bush would ask Congress to squeeze more than $70 billion from Medicare and Medicaid over five years. But the budget documents show that the actual figure is much larger: $101.5 billion of savings over five years.

The president's budget includes legislative proposals that would save $78.6 billion over the next five years — $65.6 billion in Medicare and $13 billion in Medicaid.

DOJ_NMG_0127558

In addition, the budget documents say that Mr. Bush will propose changes in federal regulations to save $22.9 billion more over the next five years: $10.2 billion in Medicare and $12.7 billion in Medicaid.

Lobbyists for hospitals, nursing homes and other health care providers plan a huge campaign to kill the president's proposals, which they say will ultimately harm beneficiaries.

Mr. Bush said his proposals would just slow the programs' growth. "Our budget reduces Medicare's average annual growth rate over five years to 5.6 percent, from 6.5 percent," Mr. Bush said, while Medicaid would grow 7.1 percent a year, instead of 7.3 percent.

In the past, Mr. Bush has proposed trimming Medicare payments to health care providers for a few years, but now he proposes to make the cutbacks permanent, so that hospitals and nursing homes would never receive a full update for inflation.

For the Children's Health Insurance Program, Mr. Bush requests $5.4 billion in 2008, a reduction of $223 million, or 4 percent, from this year's level. Beyond the current levels of spending, the White House is seeking an "additional allotment" of $5 billion over the next five years, which is less than half of what would be needed to maintain coverage for children currently enrolled.

Mr. Bush said he wanted to return the program to its "original objective" of covering children with family incomes less than twice the poverty level. Budget documents note that 16 states cover children above that level, and "one state, New Jersey, covers children up to 350 percent of the federal poverty level." A family of four is considered poor if its annual income is less than $20,650.

In a visit to the National Institutes of Health last month, Mr. Bush said, "The N.I.H. is one of America's greatest assets, and it needs to be nourished," adding, "It makes sense to spend taxpayers' money on cancer research."

But the president's budget for biomedical research is basically flat. He is requesting $28.9 billion for the health institutes in 2008, an increase of $232 million, or less than 1 percent. For the National Cancer Institute, Mr. Bush is requesting $4.8 billion, which is $9 million less than this year's level.

To fight childhood obesity, Mr. Bush asks Congress to set aside $17 million for a new program to promote "healthy behavior" among adolescents. But at the same time, he asks Congress to eliminate the preventive health services block grant, which provides $99 million a year to help states prevent obesity and other chronic conditions.

Mr. Bush proposes an 18 percent cut in the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program, which provides $2.2 billion to help people pay heating bills this year. At a time of high fuel prices, many lawmakers are likely to resist the cut.

Lawmakers See Pot Of Gold In Tax Gap (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — For members of Congress, thinking up bright ideas for spending tax dollars comes as naturally as breathing. But, constrained by big deficits and a pledge not to make them any bigger, lawmakers find themselves in an uncomfortable bind.

That's why Washington has suddenly discovered a new buzzword — the "tax gap" — and the roughly $300-billion pot of untouched gold that it promises. That's how much the Internal Revenue Service says taxpayers owe the government annually but, for various reasons, never pay.

The chances of significantly narrowing that gap appear slim. But as Congress gets ready to receive President Bush's 2008 budget Monday, Democrats and Republicans alike are talking it up as a way to fund politically appealing initiatives — and bring down the deficit to boot.

"Closing the tax gap has got to be one of our top priorities," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.).

The IRS is probably low-balling its estimate of the tax gap, he said, and there should be more than $300 billion available.

To boost efforts to harvest it, the chairman and the top Republican member of the Senate's tax-writing finance committee, Sens. Max Baucus of Montana and Chuck Grassley of Iowa, took the unusual step last week of visiting the IRS and asking some of its top bureaucrats about the tax gap — and presumably ways it might be closed.

Though the existence of the tax gap is real enough, the likelihood that any substantial part of it can be collected is more hope than fact. The gap has been around as long as there have been taxes, and past efforts to close it have yielded meager results.

"If the tax gap was easy to close, the IRS would already have done it," said Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Economy.com.

For one thing, the IRS would have to use tougher tactics to get more revenue — and that would make taxpayers squawk. The last time Congress addressed the subject of tax collection methods, in 1998, it reined in overzealous IRS agents.

DOJ_NMG_0127559

"The 1998 act tilted the table in tax disputes in favor of taxpayers suspected of noncompliance," wrote Max B. Sawicky, an economist at the Economic Policy Institute, in his book "Bridging the Tax Gap."

Collecting more would also require spending more for audits and investigations. In fact, the IRS last year had a smaller enforcement staff, and it conducted fewer audits — fewer than one individual return in 100 — than a decade earlier.

"You can ask for more audits, income-tax withholding and reporting of income to the IRS," said Mel Schwarz, a partner in the Washington office of the accounting firm Grant Thornton. "All of this would be invasive on a lot of taxpayers, many of whom already pay their taxes."

And as Robert D. Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute, pointed out, a lot of the money is owed by people who have gone bankrupt or moved overseas to escape the IRS' reach.

Also largely beyond the tax collectors' grasp is the huge underground cash economy, whose transactions go unreported to any financial authorities. It would take an American equivalent of the KGB to bring that into compliance with the U.S. tax code.

Measuring the tax gap is as much art as science. To find out what taxpayers should have paid on their 2001 income, the IRS conducted reviews of a random sample of 46,000 individual returns.

The IRS estimates that taxpayers still owed $345 billion after most 2001 tax payments were due. A combination of voluntary late payments and IRS enforcement actions shaved that figure to $290 billion. That means taxpayers paid 86.6% of the $2.157 trillion they owed — the vast majority of it voluntarily.

Like just about everything else with a dollar sign in front of it, the $290-billion tax gap has probably grown since 2001. Even if it stayed the same, it would be enough to balance this year's budget, with about $50 billion left over.

Underpayment of individual income taxes dominates the tax gap. The IRS estimated that individuals accounted for 71% of the 2001 tax gap, with the rest coming from underpayments of corporate income taxes, payroll taxes for Social Security and Medicare, and estate taxes.

The IRS traced most of the gap to taxpayers who underreported their taxable income, either by failing to report some income or by taking more deductions and credits than they were entitled to. Failure to file tax returns and failure to pay taxes owed accounted for much less.

Some of the tax gap is the result of honest mistakes on tax forms, which grow more complex every year as Congress adds new wrinkles to the tax code. The IRS can't say how big this category is.

But one thing is apparent from the IRS' research: The government has a much better chance of collecting the money it is owed if a portion of it is withheld in advance and if the income is reported by two sources — taxpayers and their employers.

In 2001, for example, taxpayers failed to pay taxes on only 1.2% of income in cases in which employers reported substantial information to the IRS and withheld at least some taxes from their workers' paychecks. But when substantial information was reported to the IRS but no taxes were withheld — as with interest and dividend income — the noncompliance rate nearly quadrupled, to 4.5%. And when the IRS received little or no independent information, the noncompliance rate was 53.9%, meaning it received less than half the taxes owed.

More withholding, or at least more reporting when money changes hands, would undoubtedly mean a smaller tax gap. But it wouldn't always be easy to arrange. It's one thing to ask a huge corporation to withhold taxes from its employees; it has a brigade of accountants to take care of that.

But the IRS would set off the modern equivalent of the Boston Tea Party if it required families to withhold taxes or file a report with the IRS every time they paid the plumber or bought an apple at the corner market. Short of a technological breakthrough, it will be the responsibility of the plumber and the corner grocer to report their full income.

Of course, tax cheating can grow to a scale far beyond the local plumber or grocer.

Two recent examples: A North Carolina man was sentenced to 41 months in prison for not reporting $850,000 in commissions that he paid himself for investments he solicited in a company he started. And a Washington state man got a year and a day in prison for failing to report at least $1 million in income from the U.S. Postal Service for installing and maintaining mailboxes.

A favorite tax dodge involves transferring funds to banks in countries with little or no income taxes and arranging the books so that all the profits seem to have been made there. Sen. Conrad said a single five-story building in the Cayman Islands, a notorious tax haven, was listed as the local address of 12,000 U.S. companies.

Conrad said that while he was North Dakota's tax commissioner, he found an oil company that showed losses at every step of the marketing chain in the United States — but made up for it and then some in the Cayman Islands, even though it has only one employee there.

"That man is really a hard worker," Conrad said. "He's down there producing millions in profits when thousands of employees in the United States produce none."

DOJ_NMG_0127560

Facing Inequality (WP)

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

THERE WAS a flurry of excitement when President Bush allowed the words "global climate change" to escape his lips in his State of the Union address. He didn't propose any useful response to the problem, but somehow we were supposed to feel grateful that in his seventh year in office he finally had acknowledged the phenomenon's existence. Last week came a similar epiphany, when Mr. Bush went to Manhattan and acknowledged for the first time the reality of income inequality.

"The fact is that income inequality is real," Mr. Bush pronounced. Not only that, but "it's been rising for more than 25 years." The historical addendum no doubt was intended to insulate the president from any blame in the matter. But it has the opposite effect. If rising income inequality was already a problem when Mr. Bush took office, his regressive reshaping of the tax code becomes even less excusable.

Mr. Bush is right on his history. Post-tax income of the top fifth of households was 6.7 times higher than incomes of the bottom fifth 25 years ago; the multiple has risen to 9.8. That wouldn't be so terrible if everyone's incomes were rising at a healthy clip, but between 1980 and 2004 wages of the typical worker actually fell slightly, when adjusted for inflation. Mr. Bush says that "the reason is clear," which must come as alarming news to an army of economists who make their living debating the relative importance of globalization, technology and other factors. Mr. Bush's diagnosis -- "we have an economy that increasingly rewards education" -- leads to a useful prescription, namely, as he said, "strengthening public education."

But as everyone knows, that's a tall order, and one in which the federal government has only a modest say. The federal government could make college more accessible and expand access to Head Start and similar early-childhood programs, which would improve equality of opportunity. But as we argued in a series on inequality last year, there's also much the federal government could do to address the problem more directly. The federal mortgage-interest deduction, for example, overwhelmingly benefits top earners; so do tax incentives to promote retirement savings and (as Mr. Bush, to his credit, recently pointed out) health insurance. In 2004, for example, the richest one-tenth of households reaped 49 percent of the tax subsidies for IRAs, 401(k)s and other defined-contribution pensions. All of these tax benefits could be reformed, without being abolished, to tilt a bit less in the direction of the wealthy.

The government can't solve the problem of inequality by taking from the rich and giving to the poor, and it shouldn't try. If a tax system becomes too onerous for top earners, it discourages innovation, entrepreneurship and the economic growth on which everyone depends. But in an era when largely uncontrollable forces are pushing against equality and fairness, the government shouldn't be needlessly pushing in the same direction. This week Mr. Bush will insist in his proposed budget that all of his tax cuts be extended. Those have proved enormously more beneficial to the super-rich than to anyone else. Given the reality that Mr. Bush has at last taken note of, such a policy just makes no sense.

In Washington, Contractors Take On Biggest Role Ever (NYT)

By Scott Shane, Ron Nixon

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3 — In June, short of people to process cases of incompetence and fraud by federal contractors, officials at the General Services Administration responded with what has become the government's reflexive answer to almost every problem.

They hired another contractor.

It did not matter that the company they chose, CACI International, had itself recently avoided a suspension from federal contracting; or that the work, delving into investigative files on other contractors, appeared to pose a conflict of interest; or that each person supplied by the company would cost taxpayers $104 an hour. Six CACI workers soon joined hundreds of other private-sector workers at the G.S.A., the government's management agency.

Without a public debate or formal policy decision, contractors have become a virtual fourth branch of government. On the rise for decades, spending on federal contracts has soared during the Bush administration, to about $400 billion last year from $207 billion in 2000, fueled by the war in Iraq, domestic security and Hurricane Katrina, but also by a philosophy that encourages outsourcing almost everything government does.

Contractors still build ships and satellites, but they also collect income taxes and work up agency budgets, fly pilotless spy aircraft and take the minutes at policy meetings on the war. They sit next to federal employees at nearly every agency; far more people work under contracts than are directly employed by the government. Even the government's online database for tracking contracts, the Federal Procurement Data System, has been outsourced (and is famously difficult to use).

DOJ_NMG_0127561

The contracting explosion raises questions about propriety, cost and accountability that have long troubled watchdog groups and are coming under scrutiny from the Democratic majority in Congress. While flagrant cases of fraud and waste make headlines, concerns go beyond outright wrongdoing. Among them:

-Competition, intended to produce savings, appears to have sharply eroded. An analysis by The New York Times shows that fewer than half of all "contract actions" — new contracts and payments against existing contracts — are now subject to full and open competition. Just 48 percent were competitive in 2005, down from 79 percent in 2001.

-The most secret and politically delicate government jobs, like intelligence collection and budget preparation, are increasingly contracted out, despite regulations forbidding the outsourcing of "inherently governmental" work. Scott Amey, general counsel at the Project on Government Oversight, a watchdog group, said allowing CACI workers to review other contractors captured in microcosm "a government that's run by corporations."

-Agencies are crippled in their ability to seek low prices, supervise contractors and intervene when work goes off course because the number of government workers overseeing contracts has remained level as spending has shot up. One federal contractor explained candidly in a conference call with industry analysts last May that "one of the side benefits of the contracting officers being so overwhelmed" was that existing contracts were extended rather than put up for new competitive bidding.

-The most successful contractors are not necessarily those doing the best work, but those who have mastered the special skill of selling to Uncle Sam. The top 20 service contractors have spent nearly $300 million since 2000 on lobbying and have donated $23 million to political campaigns. "We've created huge behemoths that are doing 90 or 95 percent of their business with the government," said Peter W. Singer, who wrote a book on military outsourcing. "They're not really companies, they're quasi agencies." Indeed, the biggest federal contractor, Lockheed Martin, which has spent $53 million on lobbying and $6 million on donations since 2000, gets more federal money each year than the Departments of Justice or Energy.

¶Contracting almost always leads to less public scrutiny, as government programs are hidden behind closed corporate doors. Companies, unlike agencies, are not subject to the Freedom of Information Act. Members of Congress have sought unsuccessfully for two years to get the Army to explain the contracts for Blackwater USA security officers in Iraq, which involved several costly layers of subcontractors.

Weighing the Limits

The contracting surge has raised bipartisan alarms. A just-completed study by experts appointed by the White House and Congress, the Acquisition Advisory Panel, found that the trend "poses a threat to the government's long-term ability to perform its mission" and could "undermine the integrity of the government's decision making."

The House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, whose new Democratic chairman, Representative Henry A. Waxman of California, added the word "oversight" to signal his intentions, begins a series of investigative hearings on Tuesday focusing on contracts in Iraq and at the Department of Homeland Security.

"Billions of dollars are being squandered, and the taxpayer is being taken to the cleaners," said Mr. Waxman, who got an "F" rating last year from the Contract Services Association, an industry coalition. The chairman he succeeded, Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, earned an "A."

David M. Walker, who as comptroller general of the United States leads the Government Accountability Office, has urged Congress to take a hard look at the proper limits of contracting. Mr. Walker has not taken a stand against contractors — his agency is also dependent on them, he admits — but he says they often fail to deliver the promised efficiency and savings. Private companies cannot be expected to look out for taxpayers' interests, he said.

"There's something civil servants have that the private sector doesn't," Mr. Walker said in an interview. "And that is the duty of loyalty to the greater good — the duty of loyalty to the collective best interest of all rather than the interest of a few. Companies have duties of loyalty to their shareholders, not to the country."

Even the most outspoken critics acknowledge that the government cannot operate without contractors, which provide the surge capacity to handle crises without expanding the permanent bureaucracy. Contractors provide specialized skills the government does not have. And it is no secret that some government executives favor contractors because they find the federal bureaucracy slow, inflexible or incompetent.

Stan Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, which represents government contractors, acknowledged occasional chicanery by contractors and too little competition in some areas. But Mr. Soloway asserted that critics had exaggerated the contracting problems.

"I don't happen to think the system is fundamentally broken," he said. "It's remarkable how well it works, given the dollar volume."

Blurring the Lines

Wariness of government contracting dates at least to 1941, when Harry S. Truman, then a senator, declared, "I have never yet found a contractor who, if not watched, would not leave the government holding the bag."

DOJ_NMG_0127562

But the recent contracting boom had its origins in the "reinventing government" effort of the Clinton administration, which slashed the federal work force to the lowest level since 1960 and streamlined outsourcing. Limits on what is "inherently governmental" and therefore off-limits to contractors have grown fuzzy, as the General Services Administration's use of CACI International personnel shows.

"Hi Heinz," Renee Ballard, a G.S.A. official, wrote in an e-mail message to Heinz Ruppmann, a CACI official, last June 12, asking for six "contract specialists" to help with a backlog of 226 cases that could lead to companies being suspended or barred from federal contracting. The CACI workers would review files and prepare "proposed responses for review and signature," she wrote.

Mr. Amey, of the Project on Government Oversight, which obtained the contract documents under the Freedom of Information Act, said such work was clearly inherently governmental and called it "outrageous" to involve contractors in judging the misdeeds of potential competitors. CACI had itself been reviewed in 2004 for possible suspension in connection with supplying interrogators to the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq. The company was ultimately cleared, though the G.S.A. found that CACI employees had improperly written parts of the "statements of work" for its own Iraq contract.

The price of $104 an hour — well over $200,000 per person annually — was roughly double the cost of pay and benefits of a comparable federal worker, Mr. Amey said.

Asked for comment, the G.S.A. said decisions on punishments for erring contractors "is indeed inherently governmental." But the agency said that while the CACI workers assisted for three months, "all suspension/debarment decisions were made by federal employees." A CACI spokeswoman made the same point.

The G.S.A., like other agencies, said it did not track the number or total cost of its contract workers. The agency administrator, Lurita Doan, who previously ran a Virginia contracting firm, has actively pushed contracting. Ms. Doan recently clashed with her agency's inspector general over her proposal to remove the job of auditing contractors' proposed prices from his office and to hire contractors to do it instead.

On some of the biggest government projects, Bush administration officials have sought to shift some decision making to contractors. When Michael P. Jackson, deputy secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, addressed potential bidders on the huge Secure Border Initiative last year, he explained the new approach.

"This is an unusual invitation," said Mr. Jackson, a contracting executive before joining the agency. "We're asking you to come back and tell us how to do our business."

Boeing, which won the $80 million first phase of the estimated $2 billion project, is assigned not only to develop technology but also to propose how to use it, which includes assigning roles to different government agencies and contractors. Homeland Security officials insist that they will make all final decisions, but the department's inspector general, Richard L. Skinner, reported bluntly in November that "the department does not have the capacity needed to effectively plan, oversee and execute the SBInet program."

A 'Blended Work Force'

If the government is exporting some traditional functions to contractors, it is also inviting contractors into agencies to perform delicate tasks. The State Department, for instance, pays more than $2 million a year to BearingPoint, the consulting giant, to provide support for Iraq policy making, running software, preparing meeting agendas and keeping minutes.

State Department officials insist that the company's workers, who hold security clearances, merely relieve diplomats of administrative tasks and never influence policy. But the presence of contractors inside closed discussions on war strategy is a notable example of what officials call the "blended work force."

That blending is taking place in virtually every agency. When Polly Endreny, 29, sought work last year with the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration, she was surprised to discover that most openings were with contractors.

"The younger generation is coming in on contracts," said Ms. Endreny, who likes the arrangement. Today, only the "Oak Management" on her ID badge distinguishes her from federal employees at the agency's headquarters.

She said her pay was "a little higher" than that of comparable federal workers, and she gets dental coverage they do not. Such disparities can cause trouble. A recent study of one NOAA program where two-thirds of the work force were contractors found that differences in salary and benefits could " substantially undermine staff relations and morale."

The shift away from open competition affects more than morale. One example among many: with troops short in Iraq, Congress in 2003 waived a ban on the use of private security guards to protect military bases in the United States. The results for the first $733 million were dismal, investigators at the Government Accountability Office found.

The Army spent 25 percent more than it had to because it used sole-source contracts at 46 of 57 sites, the investigators concluded. And screening of guards was so lax that at one base, 61 guards were hired despite criminal records, auditors reported. Yet the Army gave the contractors more than $18 million in incentive payments intended to reward good performance. (The Army did not contest G.A.O.'s findings and has changed its methods.)

DOJ_NMG_0127563

A Coalition for Contracting

Mr. Soloway, of the contracting industry group, argues that the contracting boom has resulted from the collision of a high-technology economy with an aging government work force — twice as many employees are over 55 as under 30. To function, Mr. Soloway said, the government must now turn to younger, skilled personnel in the private sector, a phenomenon likely to grow when what demographers call a "retirement tsunami" occurs over the next decade.

"This is the new face of government," Mr. Soloway said. "This isn't companies gouging the government. This is the marketplace."

But Paul C. Light of New York University, who has long tracked the hidden contractor work force to assess what he calls the "true size of government," says the shift to contractors is driven in part by federal personnel ceilings. He calls such ceilings a "sleight of hand" intended to allow successive administrations to brag about cutting the federal work force.

Yet Mr. Light said the government had made no effort to count contractors and no assessment of the true costs and benefits. "We have no data to show that contractors are actually more efficient than the government," he said.

Meanwhile, he said, a potent coalition keeps contracting growing: the companies, their lobbyists and supporters in Congress and many government managers, who do not mind building ties to contractors who may hire them someday. "All the players with any power like it," he said.

That is evident wherever in Washington contractors gather to scout new opportunities. There is no target richer than the Homeland Security Department, whose Web site, in a section called "Open for Business," displays hundreds of open contracts, including "working with selected cities to develop and exercise their catastrophic plans" ($500,000 to $1 million) and "Conduct studies and analyses, systems engineering, or provide laboratory services to various organizations to support the DHS mission" ($20 to $50 million).

One crisp morning in an office building with a spectacular view of the Capitol, Alfonso Martinez-Fonts Jr., the agency's assistant secretary for the private sector, addressed a breakfast seminar on "The Business of Homeland Security." The session drew a standing-room crowd.

Mr. Martinez-Fonts, a banker before joining the government, said he could not personally hand out contracts but could offer "tips, hints and directions" to companies on the hunt.

Joe Haddock, a Sikorsky Helicopters executive, summed up the tone of the session. "To us contractors," Mr. Haddock said, "money is always a good thing."

Capitol's Newcomers Try A Little Openness (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Jon Tester stands out from the other 99 members of the Senate in these ways:

The organic farmer wears cowboy boots with his dark business suits. He sports a buzz haircut that is more Marine drill sergeant than wavy-haired senator. He passes more people on his five-block walk from his Washington apartment to the Capitol than he might see in a week in Montana.

And then there's this: He posts his daily schedule on his Web site for all the world to see.

In a culture where lawmakers spend hours in closed-door meetings, and their activities out of the public eye are considered proprietary, Tester is a trailblazer bent on opening up the inner workings of his office. His radical practice comes after irate voters in November tossed out longtime incumbents implicated in lobbying scandals and as public interest groups clamor for more transparency in the way Congress does business.

Tester's early days in office have been filled by half-hour meetings that start at 8 a.m. and stretch until sundown. He's hosted the Montana Wheat & Barley Committee and Big Timber Montana. He sat down with the Burlington Northern Santa Fe, the major freight railroad in the West, as well as the union which represents its labor force, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Trainmen. One day, he had three separate meetings with three different Indian tribes.

Every session with lobbyists, constituents and other lawmakers is conscientiously recorded, including names, affiliations and the duration of the meeting.

"I just wanted to give people an opportunity to see who I meet with," said Tester, a freshman Democrat who unseated three-term Republican Conrad Burns, helping the Democrats win control of the Senate. "I believe in transparent government and this is my effort."

Before the newcomer's staff got his Web site up and running, they taped a paper copy of his daily schedule to his office door. "But we realized that doesn't do a lot of good for the people back in Montana," said Matt McKenna, his communications director.

DOJ_NMG_0127564

Tester's schedule is quite detailed, including entries describing his visits to the Senate gym and dinners with his wife, Sharla. "I just thought it would be easier than trying to explain gaps in time," he said.

In the House, Rep. Kirsten Gillibrand, a freshman Democrat from Upstate New York, is doing something similar. Although she gives less detail than Tester, Gillibrand lists her work-related meetings each day on her Web site.

"I was trying to think what are ways to restore public's confidence that special interests don't have overwhelming influence," said Gillibrand, who promised during her campaign to publicize her schedule. "And I figured the best way is to provide information about who members are meeting with."

She does not describe the duration of meetings or include personal appointments. "If I have lunch with a girlfriend, I don't want that on the schedule," Gillibrand said. "This is not Reality Congress, where you live the life of a congressman. I'm not going to post how many calories I eat today. This is about ethics reform, letting people know who's bending your ear."

Richard A. Baker, the Senate historian, cannot find a precedent for what Tester and Gillibrand are doing. Former Democratic senator Bob Graham of Florida was known for his eccentric habit of keeping a running log of his every waking activity, including the brand of breakfast cereal he consumed, but he never published the 4,400 notebooks he filled over 26 years of scribbling.

During her campaign for office, Gillibrand signed a pledge circulated by the Sunlight Foundation, a nonpartisan organization dedicated to bringing greater transparency to government. Of the 92 congressional candidates nationwide who agreed to the pledge, Gillibrand was the only one to win office.

"This is a recognition that 60 percent of Americans punch a clock, report on time sheets how much time they work and how they spend at time," said Ellen Miller, executive director of the foundation, which would like nothing more than a law requiring lawmakers to make their schedules public. "Why shouldn't members of Congress do the same?"

The Sunlight Foundation is archiving Tester's and Gillibrand's daily schedules at http://www.congresspedia.com in a format to allow searches and analysis.

Bill Frenzel, a scholar at the Brookings Institution who was a Republican member of Congress for 20 years, takes a dimmer view. "It sounds pretty silly," said Frenzel, who represented a Minnesota district. "People don't need to know who you're meeting with, they need to know whether you're available to meet with them."

He said he was reminded of former senator Richard Stone of Florida, who took the door to his office off its hinges to emphasize his own transparency. "Grandstanding is what you'd call it in minor league baseball," Frenzel said.

Tester and Gillibrand said their constituents like the public schedules and none of the lobbyists have grumbled about them. "If they're nervous about it it's probably someone I shouldn't be meeting with," Tester said.

According to his schedule, Tester sat down with AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney and the union's legislative director, William Samuel on Jan. 24 for a half-hour. "I'm fine with it," Samuel said. "Unlike others in Washington, we have no interest in covering our tracks . . . We might have known more about how the Republicans were coming up with energy plans and prescription drug plans if we knew how much time they were spending with their corporate lobbyists."

Tester and Gillibrand both rode to office emphasizing corruption scandals and the need to bring new openness to Washington.

Tester, who was president of the Montana Senate in a Republican-leaning state, hammered on the fact that Burns accepted $150,000 in campaign contributions from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, his firm and his clients. Burns later returned the money but Tester made Burns's connection to Abramoff a major part of the campaign. Tester was heavily outspent by Burns but won by 2,565 votes.

Gillibrand won her seat after painting her rival, Republican John E. Sweeney, as ethically troubled. Sweeney, an eight-year House veteran, took a trip to the Northern Mariana Islands with an Abramoff associate. Late in the campaign, it became public that police responded to a domestic violence call involving Sweeney and his wife.

Miller said the Sunlight Foundation plans to lobby other members of Congress to post their schedules. But with just two of 535 participating, there is a lot of work ahead.

Gillibrand said she wants to create a special caucus of like-minded members. She already has a name -- the Sunshine Caucus. Now all she needs are members, she said.

Balking On Bundling (WP)

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

DISTURBING, though not particularly surprising, rumblings are emanating from the House of Representatives to the effect that some Democrats are balking at requiring lobbyists to disclose the campaign contributions they arrange or collect for lawmakers.

DOJ_NMG_0127565

This important requirement was included in the lobbying and ethics package that recently passed the Senate; Reps. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.) and Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.) have introduced the same measure in the House and want to see it included in the lobbying legislation that the House plans to take up in the next few months. A similar provision was overwhelmingly approved by the House Judiciary Committee last year but unceremoniously disappeared from the final version of the legislation, which never became law in any event.

The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call reported last week that some Democratic House members, egged on by K Street lobbyists, are agitating to have the provision removed. That can't be allowed to happen. Mr. Van Hollen, who's responsible for helping to raise big money from K Street and elsewhere as the new head of the House Democrats' campaign arm, nonetheless understands that providing accurate information about the real influence of lobbyists is a critical piece of reform.

As it stands, lawmakers who happily take the cash and the lobbyists who harvest it for them are all too aware of how much the former are indebted to the latter. The public is left in the dark. If House leaders want to have credibility on cleaning up the "culture of corruption" they decry, they will see to it that the lobbying package that passes the House is as strong on this score as the Senate version.

Cardin Finds Passion For Speeches (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

There were jokes on the Maryland campaign trail last year that Benjamin L. Cardin would easily win the race to succeed longtime Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes because voters thought they were the same man.

Both are liberal Democrats, studious, reserved and -- after each spent years in the Maryland legislature and Congress -- prone to long-winded discourses on policy intricacies.

Neither was known for inspired oratory.

Since he took the oath last month as Maryland's freshman senator, however, Mr. Cardin has distinguished himself from his predecessor with bold words and an aggressive style.

In his first speech on the Senate floor, delivered a week after taking office, Mr. Cardin denounced President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq and called for the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

"We need a surge in U.S. troops coming home, not a surge in those going to war," said Mr. Cardin, adding that the plan wasn't new but more of the same, "just now with more American troops in harm's way."

Mr. Cardin, 63, also spoke passionately about global warming as a member of the Environment and Public Works Committee.

"The impact of global warming is real and right before our eyes," he said. "It's a crisis that affects every human being on this Earth, and we must take action now."

He rose on the Senate floor in support of increasing the federal minimum wage, saying, "I believe it is wrong that millions of hard-working Americans who play by the rules still live in poverty and are unable to provide for their families."

Mr. Cardin's quick transition from 20-year House veteran to up-and-coming freshman senator has not gone unnoticed by his colleagues.

"He brings a fresh spirit to the Senate," said Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, a Democrat who for two decades has been Maryland's firebrand senator beside the stately Mr. Sarbanes, now retired.

"Ben Cardin certainly shares Paul Sarbanes' integrity and dedication to the state of Maryland," Miss Mikulski said, "but Ben is his own man and will create his own legacy."

Mr. Cardin told The Washington Times that he is still finding his way as a senator, and he confided that "it is a thrill" every time he performs the freshman duty of presiding over the Senate.

"I still wake up every morning very thankful for the opportunities I have being a United States senator," he said. "I still have a smile on my face."

He also said he welcomed comparisons to Mr. Sarbanes and Miss Mikulski, two lawmakers he emulates. Still, Mr. Cardin said he would continue to build his own reputation.

"I have my own way of doing business," he said. "I call it my own brand name. I think I've developed a reputation of my own, and that's what I want. ... I've got a little Mikulski and Sarbanes in me, as well as a lot of other people. Certainly, there's a lot of my mother and father in me."

Pathologists Protest Defense Site's Closure (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127566

Medical specialists and former military officials are protesting the planned dismantling of a Defense Department health agency whose origin dates to the Civil War, saying the move would eliminate an invaluable tool in the diagnosis and understanding of disease.

The Armed Forces Institute of Pathology is scheduled to be broken up as part of the federal base-closing process that will shutter Walter Reed Army Medical Center by 2011. The AFIP board of governors will meet today to make final recommendations about how to proceed.

The institute is a descendant of the Army Medical Museum, created in 1862 to be a repository for tissue specimens from injured and diseased Civil War soldiers. With more than 800 employees, the AFIP provides pathology consultation, research and medical education for the military, other federal agencies and the civilian medical community. It has a repository of 95 million tissue samples that helps government scientists track disease and provide second opinions in difficult pathology cases.

"It's sort of like the Supreme Court for pathology," said Gretchen Schaefer, a spokeswoman for the College of American Pathologists.

The institute made headlines last year when a team reconstructed the virus behind the 1918-19 Spanish flu, which killed 50 million people worldwide. The team used material from the AFIP collection -- tiny dried pieces of lung tissue from two soldiers who had died in the pandemic -- as a source of virus fragments, which were then amplified and reassembled into a working virus. The project is helping scientists understand what made the 1918 flu so contagious and so fatal as they seek ways to combat future pandemics.

But agency officials and outside experts say work of that caliber will no longer be possible after the breakup of the institute, with some functions moving to other Defense Department facilities and others discontinued. In particular, they object to plans to outsource to civilian laboratories the 55,000 second-opinion pathology consultations AFIP specialists provide each year, along with some initial-diagnosis work, and to move the tissue repository to another Defense facility in the Washington area. More than 400 support staff members and scientists would lose their jobs, said Prakash Jha, a pathologist at the agency.

The pathologists and other scientists at the institute have unmatched expertise and routinely handle the hardest cases, such as determining whether biopsied bone tissue is cancerous, said Vernon W. Armbrustmacher, the retired Air Force colonel who headed the agency from 1991 to 1995.

"There's a great variety in the way these things present, and to give a reliable answer requires a lot of experience," he said. "I don't think there's a comparable organization that looks at these kinds of problems in that depth."

Moreover, the repository -- which government scientists draw upon in analyzing new samples and add to in the course of their work -- will stagnate "like a library that can't get new books," he said.

Stephen L. Jones, principal deputy assistant secretary of defense for health affairs, said that the agency has done "tremendous work" but that commercial laboratories are capable of doing the civilian pathology consultations. He said the base-closing process and reviews by the institute's governing board have ensured that critical functions will be preserved.

Between the work of the Base Realignment and Closure Commission and the institute's board, Jones said, he thinks "we will not lose any capabilities that are necessary for national security purposes."

Jones said the department is studying ways to ensure that the tissue repository remains useful. "We want to make maximum benefits of any assets that it may have, from a research or an advancement-of-science standpoint," he said.

The agency's advocates, unconvinced, have urged the Defense Department to consider transferring the pathology services and other functions to the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences in Bethesda, a move that would keep the scientific expertise in-house and ensure continued growth of the tissue repository. That idea has been backed by 30 groups, including the American Medical Association, the American Society for Clinical Pathology and the National Association of Medical Examiners, and by at least seven Democratic lawmakers, including Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) and Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.).

BearingPoint, hired by the Defense Department as a consultant, also recommended that course in a report last year, concluding that retaining the pathology functions would help with homeland security missions such as rapidly responding to bioterrorism. That option would cost $18.2 million, however, compared with about $5 million for outsourcing the work, according to BearingPoint.

Health Coverage's Momentum (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Piece by piece, the stage is being set for the long-overdue effort to rebuild America's creaky health-care system into one that can meet the needs of the 21st century. It probably won't happen until 2009, but the outlines of the big change are starting to become clear.

DOJ_NMG_0127567

As is always the case, the driving force is coming from the people. More and more families are experiencing the terror of living without health insurance -- about 47 million uninsured at last count. And additional millions are facing rising premiums and co-payments that strain family budgets.

As the costs rise, more and more employers are bailing out of providing health coverage, and the pressure for help from government is rising. With Congress wary of systemic reform after the collapse of the Clintons' initiative in 1994, states are being forced to improvise their own solutions.

Last year, Massachusetts, with Republican Gov. Mitt Romney and the Democratic legislature collaborating, devised a plan to provide coverage for all its residents. Now, the first cost estimates have come in, and monthly premiums are projected to be almost twice as expensive as Romney predicted. It's not clear whether the plan can go forward.

Meantime, California's Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has offered his own universal coverage proposal-- based on the Massachusetts model -- to tackle the much larger challenge of his state's millions of uninsured. The Democratic-controlled Legislature is studying it, and its fate is uncertain.

Both the Massachusetts and California plans step away from the 65-year-old pattern of tying health insurance to the place of employment, a historical oddity now visibly failing in this far more mobile society. Instead, these plans require every individual to purchase health insurance, with subsidies as needed to be financed by government, business and, in Schwarzenegger's plan, hospitals and doctors.

A major barrier to all such schemes is the feature of the federal tax code that subsidizes job-based health insurance by making its cost deductible to the business and tax-free to the employee. As C. Eugene Steuerle of the Urban Institute testified to Congress last week, this represents a $200 billion-a-year subsidy, with most of the benefits going to the well-to-do -- a sum that could be much better spent on helping the uninsured.

President Bush has proposed a partial remedy for that problem, substituting a flat deduction for the value of every health insurance policy costing the employer and worker up to $7,500 a person. He would use the savings to help lower-income workers buy policies.

Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, the ranking Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, joined many Democrats in saying that Bush's proposal can be improved by using tax credits, rather than deductions, to distribute the benefits.

But the door has been opened by the president to a negotiation that could lead to a conversion to individual insurance, along with a guarantee of universal coverage. Democratic Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon, who has written and vetted a plan for doing just that, told me last week that his conversations with some Republican colleagues convinced him that "there may be a window this year" for moving such a bill.

Chances are, however, that this session, Congress will simply renew and expand the existing program that provides health insurance for children. There is bipartisan support for that measure, and one of the newly formed coalitions of business, labor, consumer and provider groups has called for that as a first step toward covering everyone.

The emergence of these coalitions -- at least two of them are active -- is one more sign of the growing momentum for systemic reform.

Last October, health-care experts Drew Altman and Robert Blendon wrote in the journal Health Affairs that "the presidential candidates' level of attention will be decisive to where health ranks on the national agenda going into the 2008 election and the 2009 Congress. If they do play a leadership role on health, the media will follow, and the agenda-setting power of a debate driven from the top will meet the public's concern rising up from the bottom like two weather fronts colliding."

Exactly that is happening. As he seeks the GOP nomination, Romney is touting his plan for universal coverage, and last month Democratic Sen. Barack Obama committed to the same goal -- without saying how to get there. On her first trip to Iowa, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton showed her mastery of the subject, explaining what had gone wrong in 1994 and the lessons learned.

The bar has been raised to the point that any presidential candidate in either party without a plan for universal coverage may be seen as falling short. And that in turn could make 2009 the long-awaited breakthrough year.

A Billion-Dollar Election Warning (NYT)

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Once upon a time, Washington managed to fully confront a corruption scandal and invent a government solution that actually worked for 30 years. The scandal was Watergate. The solution was the innovative option of providing public financing to presidential campaigns as a means of curbing the influence of big money donors like those who ran amok in President Richard Nixon's 1972 re-election.

Since then, candidates opted for the subsidies — and the spending limits that come with them — in every general election. And most did in the primary elections, too. But not next time. Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and John McCain have already signaled their intentions to make a shameful and lucrative retreat to private fund-raising. The Clinton camp is creating a new honored donor category for those who bag at least a million dollars each, with strategists mirthfully debating whether to dub these fat-cat groomers “Pathfinders” or “Hillraisers.” We suggest Recidivists.

DOJ_NMG_0127568

Whoever the two nominees are, they will very likely ring up the first $1 billion presidential cycle between them. All of this is because past Congresses failed to update the public financing option to keep pace with the costs of running a modern campaign.

The new Congress already has a bipartisan proposal in the works to update the public financing formula in time for 2012. It roughly triples subsidies for a participating candidate to $150 million in the primaries, and increases them by a third, to $100 million, in the general election. There would be a four-to-one match of donations up to $200 instead of the current one-to-one, plus an extra subsidy if a privately funded candidate’s checkbook overwhelms competitiveness. Funds would be available earlier for the ever-earlier primary cycle.

Public financing served the nation well. In three of six races in which an incumbent president ran, the challenger won — a healthy dynamic in a capital city where only one in 20 House incumbents is toppled by a challenger.

The new Congress pledged to clean up big-money corruption; it can make a good start by rescuing the good that came of Watergate.

Farm Bill Doesn't Go Far Enough (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

THINKING ABOUT HOW much money Congress is gearing up to waste in the next farm bill makes us yearn for some help from on high. Not from heaven, mind you, but Canada.

The Bush administration last week unveiled its proposal for the 2007 farm bill, a blueprint spelling out U.S. agricultural subsidies and food stamp payments for the next five years. For anybody interested in fairness, government waste, free trade or economic growth, it was a deeply disappointing document, even if it is a major improvement over the trade-distorting porkapalooza that was the 2002 farm bill.

The trouble is, even this modest fix is being heavily resisted by the farm lobby and its backers in Congress.

Canada to the rescue, to cite a rarely uttered line. The Canadian government could prove to be the U.S. taxpayers' best friend in the upcoming legislative battles. That's because Ottawa has taken the initial steps toward a complaint against Washington at the World Trade Organization, claiming that U.S. corn subsidies violate international trade laws.

The corn case comes on the heels of a 2004 WTO decision, in a case filed by Brazil, that some U.S. cotton subsidies were illegal and ordered dismantled. Though the U.S. has been flouting the ruling, the Bush administration does seem more committed than Congress to making sure that farm subsidies don't run afoul of international trade rules.

Farm subsidies are a New Deal legacy once aimed at helping poor farmers. The program has become a form of corporate welfare for big agribusiness. The problem isn't just that these subsidies are unfair to farmers in other countries that aren't insulated from market realities by their governments. It's that many farm subsidies, with their built-in price supports, pervert those markets by stimulating inefficient production that affects global prices.

Say the price target for corn is $3 a bushel, but the actual price suddenly drops to $1 (and say the cost of production is $1.50 a bushel) because there's a glut. Normally, that would send a signal to farmers that they should stop growing corn and plant something else. But if the government makes up the $2 difference, they're encouraged to keep growing corn at an artificial profit. All that excess has to be sold on the world market at low prices. U.S. farmers don't care because they've got their subsidies, but corn growers overseas are wiped out.

So why should Americans care? First, because other nations retaliate against U.S. exports. Second, because subsidies kill competition with foreign growers that would ultimately lower prices on some produce in this country. Third, because taxpayers are shelling out roughly $20 billion a year in subsidies to an agribusiness juggernaut that neither needs nor deserves the money at a time of ballooning deficits. And fourth, because the poor countries most harmed by our trade policies are the ones most likely to become failed states, embittered by our hypocritical preaching on the merits of "free trade."

Members of the WTO have been trying since 2001 to pass a multilateral deal under the Doha round of trade talks that would lower trade barriers around the world, but the prime sticking point is high agricultural subsidies in the U.S. and, more so, in Europe.

Bush's farm bill doesn't go nearly as far as it should to spur a successful Doha round. It would cut farm subsidies by about $4.5 billion over the next 10 years, hardly enough to generate excitement among our trading partners. But it does do away with some of the more outrageous inequities of the current bill, such as paying corporate welfare to farmers making more than $200,000 a year, and it de-emphasizes price supports in favor of direct payments to farmers, which are far less trade-distorting and bring the country under compliance with WTO rules.

DOJ_NMG_0127569

Most U.S. business interests would benefit from a relaxation of trade barriers worldwide, but the entrenched farm lobby is gearing up for a fight to protect its pork and to imperil Doha. So bring it on, Canada.

OTHER NEWS:

Giuliani On 2008 Bid: "A Real Good Chance" (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Rudolph W. Giuliani appeared to move a step closer to announcing his presidential ambitions yesterday, saying after an appearance in South Carolina that "there's a real good chance" he will run.

Mr. Giuliani's intentions have been all but taken for granted by most political observers. He has made two trips to New Hampshire — home of the nation's first primary — and has promised to make more. He has formed an exploratory committee, hired campaign workers and moved to divest himself from a large chunk of his consulting business to avoid conflicts in the event of a presidential bid.

But on the nascent campaign trail itself, the former New York City mayor has coyly stepped around the question of "Will he or won't he?"

After a 30-minute speech before Republican Party leaders in South Carolina, Mr. Giuliani fielded the question again, but this time came closer than he had before to giving a definitive response in public. "There's a real good chance," he told an Associated Press reporter.

Mr. Giuliani's aides declined to comment further on the remark.

Other signals of his impending bid can be seen in his tightly packed schedule of appearances and fund-raisers in the days and weeks to come. According a source close to the campaign, the itinerary includes fund-raisers in Florida on Tuesday followed by more stops across the country before appearing as the keynote speaker at the California Republican Convention in Sacramento on Saturday.

Mr. Giuliani is not alone among potential Republican White House contenders who have yet to formally declare their intentions. Others include Senator John McCain of Arizona and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts.

But Mr. Giuliani's delay has caused some political analysts to wonder if he is waiting too long, although others have said his name recognition gives him extra time before deciding to get into the race.

Patrick Dorinson, spokesman for the California Republican Party, said if Mr. Giuliani is thinking about announcing anytime soon, the convention in Sacramento could be an ideal setting.

"It's going to be very well attended," Mr. Dorinson said. "We've received a lot of media interest and members of the party are very excited about seeing Giuliani, so if he wanted to make an announcement, it certainly could be a place to do it."

In addition, Mr. Dorinson said, Mr. Giuliani will be the only potential presidential candidate speaking at the convention, so he will have the floor to himself.

The state party that propelled Arnold Schwarzenegger to the governor's mansion might also provide a warmer reception to Mr. Giuliani than, say, Iowa or South Carolina, where his moderate stands on abortion, gay rights and gun control are likely to find stiff resistance from social conservatives.

Mr. Dorinson said he had not heard any speculation that Mr. Giuliani would announce there and had not seen an advance copy of his speech. If it did happen, it would coincidentally come on the same day that Senator Barack Obama, a Democrat, has said he will formally declare his candidacy in Illinois.

"There's been so much talk about the Democratic race," Mr. Dorinson said. "We're just excited California Republicans will get to see a potential Republican candidate."

Rudy Giuliani Seriously Considering Presidential Bid (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

COLUMBIA, South Carolina (AP) — Former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani said Saturday he will probably run for president in 2008.

"There's a real good chance," Giuliani, a Republican, said after a 30-minute speech and question-and-answer session with party leaders in South Carolina.

On Giuliani's first visit to New Hampshire last weekend since setting up the committee, he told reporters he had received a tremendous amount of enthusiasm and support from people.

DOJ_NMG_0127570

But he said he had not yet decided whether he could make a "unique contribution" toward strengthening the United States that would justify a run for president.

He has emphasized his steady hand dealing with the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks. However, his moderate stances on gun control, abortion, gay rights and other social issues could be liabilities for him in a Republican presidential primary that includes hard-core conservatives as a central voting group.

For instance, in November, South Carolina voters overwhelmingly approved a constitutional ban on same-sex unions.

"The fact is I appeal to conservative Christians the way I appeal to everyone else," Giuliani said at a news conference. "I don't think you have separate appeals to people."

Giuliani formed a presidential exploratory committee in November to prepare for a possible bid for the Republican nomination in 2008. It lets him raise money and travel the country, gauging how much support there could be for him.

In his few first weeks, Giuliani took in $1.4 million. He collected donations online, and held a major fundraising event in New York in December.

Financial documents show that by the start of this year Giuliani had about $1 million available, having spent money to set up campaign headquarters, buy equipment and hire workers.

The Republicans' top tier of candidates for 2008 includes Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback.

Inspiring Strong Emotions, And Very Mixed Ones, Too (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

Flawed or flawless?

That is the subtitle of a new oral biography of Rudolph W. Giuliani. The book may not change the minds of readers who believe he is one or the other, but some of the insights of friends, former friends, and unforgiving foes — most of whom were interviewed by Deborah Hart Strober and Gerald S. Strober — are nonetheless revealing about the former mayor and about New York politics.

Some were glowing, some vitriolic. In “Giuliani” (John Wiley & Sons), they combine into what Mr. Strober described as “a mixed bag.” Here are excerpts.

Did race play a role in the 1989 election, when David N. Dinkins, a Democrat, barely defeated Mr. Giuliani to become the city’s first black mayor? Mr. Dinkins suggested that was a possibility: “How does one figure? Whatever frailties, whatever shortcomings I had were certainly not evident at that point, and whatever greatness there was in Rudy had not yet been revealed. So how come 1.9 million votes, and I win by the skin of my teeth?”

Mr. Giuliani and former Mayor Edward I. Koch are both larger than life. How did working for them compare? Henry J. Stern, the former parks commissioner, replied:

“Koch was more collegial than Giuliani, but people knew that if they disagreed with Koch they would pay a price.”

Lillian Barrios-Paoli, who also served under both mayors, was Mr. Giuliani’s welfare commissioner, among other jobs. She offered another perspective. If Mr. Koch said to his advisers that he wanted to kill all 12-year-olds, she said: “I can think of 10 people who would say, ‘Please, get a life! What, are you crazy? No way!’ And there’d be a big argument and at the end of the day, somebody’s judgment would prevail.

“If Rudy would say, ‘Let’s kill 12-year-olds,’ there would be deep silence in the room, and then somebody would say, ‘That’s brilliant!’ And then somebody else would say, ‘Have you thought of 13-year-olds, too?’ ”

Mr. Giuliani refused to meet with a number of prominent black leaders, including the Rev. Al Sharpton. Rudy Washington, who as deputy mayor was the highest-ranking black member of the Giuliani administration, explained why:

“Rudy didn’t play that game: You don’t call me a racist, Al Sharpton, and then expect to meet me and work out a deal. You declare me your enemy, fine. I’m going to be your enemy.”

Mr. Giuliani’s refusal to meet with certain black elected officials, even after the police shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed immigrant from Guinea, angered Mr. Koch so much that, he recalled, he even decided to participate in a demonstration.

“And so — only in New York City can this happen — I called Al Sharpton, who was in charge of the picketing in front of Police Plaza, and I said, ‘I want to get arrested. I have to get arrested early,’ because I was teaching at a college near Boston, Brandeis, and it was on a Monday, the one day I went there. ‘Can you arrange to get me arrested at 10 o’clock?’ ”

Why was Mr. Giuliani’s second term disappointing to some? Fran Reiter, a deputy mayor, said that Mr. Giuliani was not jubilant about his re-election in part because he realized that term limits made him a lame duck.

DOJ_NMG_0127571

"Psychologically, it makes for a very difficult approach to governing. This weighed very, very heavily on him and influenced how he governed in that second term. He seemed to lose his passion for the big projects. He got nitpicky."

Mr. Giuliani also was having marital problems, which he handled awkwardly. Herman Badillo, a mayoral adviser, said:

"As a matter of courtesy, you go and talk to your wife and say, 'I want a divorce.' You don't have a press conference to announce it."

His performance on and after 9/11 redeemed him in the eyes of many people. Some politicians, including Mr. Koch, criticized Mark Green, who was seeking the Democratic mayoral nomination in 2001, when he said he could have done the job as well as Mr. Giuliani or better. In the biography, Mr. Koch said:

"Nobody could have done it better than Rudy. But I believe that many, if not most, mayors would have done it as well because that's your job. And that saved Rudy's reputation: He became Mayor for the world, and you should not take any credit away from him. But to say that what he did was unique would be wrong."

Time may have altered Mr. Green's perspective on how he or his fellow Democrats might have performed:

"I can see some public officials overplaying the tough card, but I saw him up close during the weeks after 9/11, and he struck just the right note of toughness and compassion."

"Would someone else — Ruth Messinger or me or Dinkins — have done as well because the situation required that? I couldn't, and I wouldn't, say. You don't know until it happens."

Will Mr. Giuliani run for president? Interviewed in 2005, Mr. Sharpton said no.

"He knows that the honeymoon he's had with the media since 9/11 would be over if he ran and had to defend things that they don't now bring up."

"It's better to live the reinvention than to have somebody move the veil and see that the wizard really isn't the wizard. So right now, he can lead all the media and the national pundits on the Yellow Brick Road. He'd better never let us get near that veil. I know what's back there; I've pierced it before."

Suppose he runs and wins? Mr. Dinkins replied: "Rudy as president is kind of frightening. My question would be, Will I move to Bermuda? Where will I go?"

Saikou Diallo, Amadou's father, was equivocal: "He's a good leader, a very good leader, and very intelligent. If he changes his character, he may be a good president. But he has to change."

Frank Luntz, Mr. Giuliani's second mayoral campaign pollster, offered another perspective on the former mayor's personality:

"No one in New York, not even Ed Koch, could equal Rudy in the phrase, 'He says what he means and means what he says.'

"That's one of the reasons he won so overwhelmingly in that election. It wasn't about policy or issues. It was about character."

McCain's Advisers Once Made Ads That Drew His Ire (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — Senator John McCain, intent on succeeding where his freewheeling presidential campaign of 2000 failed, is assembling a team of political bruisers for 2008. And it includes advisers who once sought to skewer him and whose work he has criticized as stepping over the line in the past.

In 2000, Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, said the advertisements run against him by George W. Bush, then the governor of Texas, distorted his record. But he has hired three members of the team that made those commercials — Mark McKinnon, Russell Schriefer and Stuart Stevens — to work on his presidential campaign.

In 2004, Mr. McCain said the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth advertisement asserting that Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts had not properly earned his medals from the Vietnam War was "dishonest and dishonorable." Nonetheless, he has hired the firm that made the spots, Stevens Reed Curcio & Potholm, which worked on his 2000 campaign, to work for him again this year.

In October, Mr. McCain's top adviser expressed public displeasure with an advertisement against former Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., Democrat of Tennessee, that some saw as having racist overtones for suggesting a flirtation between Mr. Ford, who is black, and a young, bare-shouldered white woman, played by a blond actress.

The Republican committee that sponsored the spot had as its leader Terry Nelson, a former Bush campaign strategist whom Mr. McCain hired as an adviser last spring. In December, just weeks after the Ford controversy broke, Mr. McCain elevated Mr. Nelson to the position of national campaign manager.

DOJ_NMG_0127572

Taken together, the moves provide the strongest indication yet that Mr. McCain intends to run a far tougher campaign than the one he ran in the 2000 primary. And they come as he transitions from being a onetime maverick to a candidate seeking to gather his party around him and create an air of inevitability about his prospects for winning nomination.

As Mr. McCain assembles his team, he is also making it that much harder for his Republican challengers by scooping up a significant circle of the party's top talent.

In recent years, Mr. McCain has made a concerted effort to mend fences with Mr. Bush and reassure the Republican base that he is a reliable conservative. But his moves have focused new attention on the extent to which he may risk sacrificing the image he has long cultivated of being his own man, driven by principle rather than partisan politics.

Mr. McCain's advisers said he was not changing. But they were unapologetic about putting together a group dedicated to doing what it takes to reach the White House and employing lessons from his defeat at the hands of Mr. Bush in 2000.

"This is about winning at the end of the day," said John Weaver, Mr. McCain's longtime senior strategist. "I don't want to be in a knife fight ever again, but if I am, we're going to win it."

Mr. McCain's representatives said he would not provide an interview.

Seven years ago, Mr. McCain charmed the news media and the public with his Straight Talk Express bus tour. He had a lean operation befitting an upstart candidacy, and he regularly spoke out against attack advertising, a quaint notion in retrospect.

In the end, he ran his share of confrontational advertisements, once even leveling the ultimate Republican-to-Republican insult: that Mr. Bush was as dishonest as Bill Clinton. But he was perceived as having been knocked back on his heels by the rougher, tougher Bush campaign.

Now Mr. McCain is building a larger organization, bringing together the heart of the bare-knuckled Bush crew once overseen by Karl Rove while keeping most of the advisers who ran his shoestring effort of 2000.

"It's like an all-star World Wrestling Federation cage match, except that instead of fighting one another, all of the brawlers are on the same team," said Steve McMahon, a strategist for the Democratic National Committee. "There are very few people who play this game at the highest level, and on the Republican side these guys are among the best."

Mr. McCain has also hired Brian Jones, an adviser to Mr. Bush's 2004 campaign; Fred Davis, a media consultant for Mr. Bush in 2004; and Steve Schmidt, who oversaw Mr. Bush's 2004 war room, exploiting any tidbit that could help paint Mr. Kerry as a "flip-flopper."

The hires are another signal that the 2008 primary campaign could be a combative one all around.

On the Democratic side, John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina, has wasted no time attacking Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's position on Iraq. And Mrs. Clinton's team includes strategists who invented the concept of the modern campaign war room for her husband 15 years ago. But Senator Barack Obama of Illinois drew cheers at a party gathering on Friday when he warned his fellow candidates against attacking one another.

Mitt Romney, a Republican and the former governor of Massachusetts, has hired Alex Castellanos, a onetime Bush strategist who also famously produced the 1990 commercial for Jesse Helms, the former North Carolina senator, in which a pair of white hands crumpled a rejection letter as a narrator said, "You needed that job and you were the best qualified, but it had to go to a minority because of a racial quota."

Given Mr. McCain's history with some of the people on his team, the evolution of his staff may present an early challenge: How does he stay true to the "Straight Talk" spirit of his 2000 campaign, which helped him win the stature he has now, while also engaging in the political brinkmanship it can take to win?

The Democratic National Committee is already criticizing Mr. McCain for his hires, issuing a statement this week calling them "a testament to how far he's gone down the do-anything-to-win path."

Tony Fabrizio, a Republican pollster who is not yet allied with a candidate, said Mr. McCain was running the risk of looking "politically expedient" and of blunting his brand as "Senator Straight Talk." He said the risk was highlighted by Mr. McCain's recent suggestions that he may not use the campaign finance system he has long championed.

In 2000, Mr. McCain received money from the system, which gives public financing to candidates who agree to strict spending limits. Mr. Weaver, the senior strategist, said Mr. McCain was keeping his options open because others, including Mrs. Clinton, were planning to work around the system.

As Mr. McCain's aides often point out, for all its appeal, the McCain 2000 campaign was a losing one. And they said it would be unfair to suggest that because Mr. McCain was augmenting his team he was somehow preparing to change who he was.

"There are no negotiations regarding his principles," Mr. Weaver said.

In an interview on Friday, Mr. Jones, the campaign communications director, said Mr. McCain was not allowing his distaste over the Swift Boat commercials to interfere with his relationship with Stevens Reed Curcio & Potholm, with whom Mr. McCain has his own decade-long association. In addition, he said, Mr. McCain hired Mr. Nelson because of his breadth of experience in national campaigns. "The campaign," Mr. Jones said, "is not going to let past contests on the battlefield limit how it's going to go after talent."

DOJ_NMG_0127573

Presidential politics are rich in fungible allegiances. James A. Baker III ran the primary campaigns of Gerald Ford and the elder George Bush against Ronald Reagan, only to become Mr. Reagan's chief of staff. This year, David Axelrod is serving as a senior strategist for Mr. Obama; he was a senior strategist to Mr. Edwards in his 2004 campaign.

"You could dissect any campaign this way: this guy did this ad this one time," said Mr. Schriefer, the former Bush media strategist, who will run Mr. McCain's advertising team. "There's a tremendous history of foes becoming allies."

Mr. McKinnon, who led Mr. Bush's advertising group in 2004, said he saw no inconsistency in working for Mr. McCain. Mr. Bush was right for 2000, he said, and Mr. McCain is right for 2008. "At the end of the day, the campaign will be won or lost on the character of the candidate and his or her core message," Mr. McKinnon said. "Of course, I believe that will be John McCain."

Asked if the senator would avoid the attacks he criticized in 2000, Mr. Jones said that while Mr. McCain had yet to declare his candidacy, any campaign he ran would be "consistent with his beliefs and values."

Romney Targeting McCain (TSSC)

By Lee Bandy

The State, February 4, 2007

Mitt Romney's assignment in the 2008 S.C. Republican presidential primary is simply this: Derail John McCain's "Straight Talk Express."

If there were any doubts about Romney's mission, they were erased during the former Massachusetts governor's two-day visit to the state last week.

Romney attracted large, enthusiastic crowds at stops in Charleston, Aiken and Columbia. It was a shot in the arm for his campaign.

Romney's chief rival in South Carolina is McCain, the U.S. senator from Arizona who leads in the polls here and enjoys the backing of the state's GOP establishment.

Romney isn't impressed.

Endorsements never elected anybody, he says.

"A message is what people want to hear. When you decide who you want to vote for, you don't say, 'Gosh, I wonder what my city counselor is going to do.'"

In the 2000 S.C. Republican presidential primary, McCain won 43 percent of the vote, losing to then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush.

Today, McCain is polling about 38 percent against Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

Romney suggested his business experience better prepares him for the White House than the backgrounds of his two rivals.

"I come from a private sector, where talk is worth nothing and action is everything," said Romney, who spent 25 years managing businesses and making investments around the world.

He tends to dismiss the experience of his primary challengers.

Giuliani was a mayor and a prosecutor — "a very different experience," Romney said.

And McCain?

Oh, he has been a U.S. senator for a decade or more, Romney said.

Then he pointed out his differences with McCain.

Romney noted his foe from Arizona wrote the McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform law that restricts certain types of contributions.

"That's a terrible piece of legislation," Romney said. "It hasn't taken the money out of politics. ... (But) it has hurt my party."

Conservative Christians, who make up a third of the GOP primary vote, oppose McCain-Feingold.

But that's not all.

McCain opposed President Bush's tax cuts, Romney noted.

"I supported them," the former governor said.

McCain believes the president's interrogation of terrorist detainees was a violation of the Geneva Accords.

"I disagree with him," Romney said.

Of the McCain-Kennedy immigration bill, Romney said, "I think it was a mistake."

The former governor couldn't have been any clearer in pointing out his differences with McCain.

He let Giuliani slide.

Perfectly understandable; his S.C. mission is to "stop McCain."

DOJ_NMG_0127574

Mavericks Both, But Different Iraq Paths (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The first time Senator John McCain ran for president, few allies were more loyal than Senator Chuck Hagel, a fellow Vietnam veteran and co-chairman of his campaign, whose independent streak ran nearly as thick as Mr. McCain's.

Even after Mr. McCain lost that race seven years ago, the two friends seemed to revel in rankling the Republican establishment, often infuriating the White House from their side-by-side suites in the Russell Senate Office Building. A photograph in Mr. Hagel's office shows President Bush standing between the men, his arms slung around their necks.

Below the picture, the president scribbled, "Chuck, is it a rose between two thorns?"

But at the dawn of the 2008 presidential campaign, as a debate over the administration's Iraq policy intensifies on Capitol Hill, Mr. Hagel is standing alone.

Mr. McCain is perhaps the most influential and outspoken supporter in Congress of the president's plan to send more troops to Iraq. Mr. Hagel is the most outspoken critic of the war among Senate Republicans. Mr. McCain has moved to court conservatives. Mr. Hagel, conservative by any measure, seems to have assumed Mr. McCain's former role as their party's leading maverick.

And Mr. McCain is unambiguously running for president. Mr. Hagel is still trying to make up his mind.

The gulf between them is a personal manifestation of the broader national debate over the war and, to some degree, the legacy and lessons of Vietnam. It also speaks to the deep divisions among Republicans as they confront the political fallout from the war, the need to develop a post-Bush posture on national security and the fight over who should lead their party and the country.

The men's diverging views on Iraq set the parameters for the debate scheduled to unfold next week as the Senate opens its most extensive deliberations of the war since it began.

Mr. Hagel is a lead sponsor of a resolution intended to rebuke the president; Mr. McCain has offered a plan to give the administration one more chance in Iraq.

While the two senators may not talk as often as they once did, associates of both ascribed that to their chaotic schedules, particularly that of Mr. McCain, who often zips away on a political trip the moment the Senate is out of session. And both men insist their bond is rooted deep enough to withstand any dissension.

Mr. McCain, who once referred to Mr. Hagel as "a John McCain without the attitude problem," said his feelings had not changed. "You can disagree on an issue," he said, "without having it affect your relationship of many, many years."

Mr. Hagel, who once seemed certain to endorse his friend's candidacy if he did not seek the presidency himself, declined to say whether their differences on Iraq would keep him from supporting Mr. McCain. But, he added, "John McCain will always be one of my dearest friends, regardless of where this presidential campaign goes."

So how can two men, similar in temperament and background, come to such a different conclusions over military strategy in Iraq? Friends of both men say they believe that the respective Vietnam experiences of Mr. McCain, a prisoner of war for five years, and Mr. Hagel, an enlisted man on the front lines, offer a window into their diverging views.

"John McCain was a prisoner of war; I respect what he had to go through," said Senator Jim Webb, Democrat of Virginia and a combat veteran of Vietnam. "He did not see the ground environment, how difficult things really are on the ground. He did not really see how bad this country was torn apart by the war, for the unfortunate reason that he was in prison."

Mr. Webb, who opposes the plan to send more troops to Iraq, said he respected Mr. McCain immensely. But, he added, "Chuck Hagel and I both intrinsically understand how difficult it is in an infantry environment to carry out some of these goals and we both experienced what it was like to come back to a pretty hostile peer group."

Senator Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican who is close to Mr. Hagel and Mr. McCain, said that political calculations did not play a role in the views of either.

"It is not popular for a Republican to be doing what Senator Hagel is doing; it is not popular for somebody who wants to be president and trying to capture the independent vote to be doing what Senator McCain is doing," Mr. Graham said. "Both of them have come to different conclusions about the long-term national security interests of the country. They have polar opposite views of how to proceed, but the commonality is that they're not worried about the political moment."

Unlike Mr. Hagel or other combat veterans in the Senate, Mr. McCain seldom draws comparisons to his own decorated military service when he discusses Iraq strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0127575

“What drives my decisions is not experiences that I’ve had a generation ago,” Mr. McCain said. “What drives my decisions is my knowledge, information, study, consultation that makes me decide on any issue. My views on the world and life are not driven by my experience in Vietnam.”

Not so for Mr. Hagel, who has been a vocal critic of the administration’s Iraq strategy since the start. Four years ago, he said the mission had similarities to his war from a generation ago, but since then he has denounced the Iraq war as “an absolute replay of Vietnam.”

“I think I’m the only member of the Senate who was an enlisted man on the ground, who went over to Vietnam as a rifleman, a private, and I saw that war from the bottom up — really from the bottom up,” Mr. Hagel said. “I saw the human dynamic of war that has stuck with me.”

This week, on the same day that Senate leaders jockeyed over how to proceed with a bipartisan Iraq resolution, Mr. Hagel left the capital and flew back to Nebraska to attend the funeral of First Lt. Jacob N. Fritz, 25, who was abducted and killed on Jan. 20 in Karbala. Mr. Hagel appointed Lieutenant Fritz to the United States Military Academy at West Point.

In response to his forceful criticism, Mr. Hagel said, he has received letters calling him a “traitor” and “a yellow-chicken senator.”

“I’m called ‘a disloyal Republican’ and I’m called ‘not a real conservative Republican,’ ” Mr. Hagel said. “So conservative Republicans support the war and liberal Democrats don’t support war? You see how silly all that is? Republicans and Democrats both die in war.”

By being the fiercest Republican skeptic of the White House, Mr. Hagel acknowledged that his ambitions were also enmeshed in the politics of Iraq. He said he would decide in a few weeks whether he would run for president, re-election to the Senate or neither. If he seeks the presidency, he said, his views on Iraq will become suspect.

“Once you commit to being a candidate, your motives are impugned,” Mr. Hagel said. “Is that a reason not to do it? Yes, it is.”

A Bar, A Brew, A Drifting Senator (HARTC)

By Mark Pazniokas

The Hartford Courant, February 3, 2007

TORRINGTON -- Ollie's Café usually doesn't open until 3 p.m. on Fridays, when karaoke is the regular attraction. But two dozen patrons waited inside the dark, tiny bar at noon for a long-awaited beer with Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman.

Lieberman was a Democrat the last time he stood in Ollie's, asking conservative Democrats to stick with him in a tough re-election, when 65 percent of Democrats eventually would reject him over the war in Iraq. His supporters are still with him now, even as Lieberman drifts further from his old party.

He calls himself an independent, though he remains a member of the Senate Democratic caucus, giving it a one-vote majority. He publicly flirts with voting Republican for president in '08 - prompting speculation he might join Republican Sen. John McCain on a fusion ticket.

"No, that's not going to happen," Lieberman said Friday on his way into Ollie's. "My days of seeking national office are over. I'm very happy, particularly after what I went through last year to be the senator from Connecticut. I want to do the best job I can at that."

In Washington, six of the nine Democratic presidential hopefuls - including Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, D-Conn. - spent the morning addressing the Democratic National Committee. Dodd crowed that the Democratic takeover of Congress last fall represented a win by "the Democratic wing of the Democratic Party."

Outside Ollie's, Lieberman smiled when asked if he eventually might support Dodd, who opposes increasing U.S. troop levels in Iraq, a move that Lieberman supports.

"I am going to support the presidential candidate that I think is best for our country at a very tough time in our country's history," Lieberman said.

He said he would not rule out supporting a candidate who opposes the war, saying he would weigh a range of issues. Connecticut voters re-elected him, even though a majority disagree with him over the war.

"On matters of domestic policy I agree more often than not with Democrats," Lieberman said. "On matters of foreign and defense policy these days, I seem to agree more often than not with Republicans."

Nancy DiNardo, the Democratic state chairwoman, doesn't know what to make of Lieberman, her party's 2000 nominee for vice president and, briefly, a presidential candidate in 2004.

Reached by phone at the Democratic National Committee meeting in Washington, DiNardo said she and Lieberman have yet to discuss his place in the party.

DOJ_NMG_0127576

DiNardo supported Lieberman in the primary, then backed the eventual Democratic nominee, Ned Lamont, in the general election. It was a stance taken by Dodd and most other prominent Democrats.

"It has been awkward," DiNardo said of the three months since the election. "I think there have been bruised feelings on both sides."

DiNardo said she has found no road map, no precedent for how to deal with a major figure in the party who has one foot out the door, yet won't quite leave.

At Ollie's, no one found Lieberman's status awkward. He is the winner of the 2006 election, a hawk like them who came Friday to deliver on a promise to share in a celebratory beer.

"I am full of gratitude, I really am, to people who stuck with me last year and gave me the chance to continue to serve," Lieberman said. "So it's important for me to come back and say thank you - and also come back and listen."

Bill Battle and Lieberman threw their arms around each other inside the bar, which erupted in cheers. Battle stuck with him after the primary, quitting the Democratic town committee so he could run Lieberman's petitioning effort in Torrington, a community that went for Lieberman.

"What we have here is a robust common sense," Battle said.

The view at Ollie's is that America cannot afford to lose in Iraq.

Lieberman accepted a Samuel Adams winter lager in a frosted glass, then circled his way around the bar, pausing for photos and good wishes. He fell into a happy conversation by the door with Battle.

His driver reminded him of an interview he promised with National Public Radio.

Lieberman sipped a beer. Smiling, he shook his head and told his aide, "NPR will have to wait."

GOP's Conservatives Strain For Leadership (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

BALTIMORE -- Conservative House Republicans are disappointed that their leaders have no strategy to win back in 2008 the majority they lost in November.

"We think they need to be a lot more aggressive than they are," Rep. Steve King of Iowa said. "They don't seem willing to have blood on the floor, and there's got to be blood on the floor."

He and other House conservatives who came here from Washington for an annual meeting say they are united in thinking that the United States must win the war in Iraq.

That view, however, puts them at odds with the majority of voters, who say in poll after poll that they no longer support the war, think victory is unachievable and is not worth the cost in money or lives.

"We are united in understanding that we have to win the war," Rep. Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia said. "Our goal is to make sure we do whatever is necessary to strengthen and hold up Iraq's government and get that nation off on its own."

The 48 conservative lawmakers who met here for the annual House Republican Study Committee (RSC) retreat generally agreed that their 2008 presidential nominee would be Arizona Sen. John McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney or former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

"I don't see any one of them being singled out as a great front-runner by the House Republican members or any one of them being singled out as a 'no-go,' " Rep. Tom Price of Georgia said. "But whichever one of the three gets the nomination is going to have to have some link to the South, which is the bedrock of the Republican Party."

But the legislators also agreed they were not inclined to coalesce behind any one of the three and thought each of them fell short of the highest conservative standards.

Though the Heritage Foundation, sponsor of the annual retreat, had invited all three of the men to speak, only Mr. Romney showed up.

The lawmakers gave him a cordial hearing during his luncheon speech Friday, after which he took generally friendly questions from the members.

Mr. Romney said that while "no one wants to be at war with Iran," it's critical to make sure Iran "doesn't develop nuclear technology." He said engaging Iran in negotiations "is not the way to go."

On the divisive issue of illegal aliens, guest workers and amnesty, Mr. Romney said he eventually will take a position on whether citizenship should continue to be given automatically to anyone born on U.S. soil to parents who are not U.S. citizens. He also said that in approving immigration applications, U.S. officials should consider whether "someone has a high school or college degree and can bring skills to make them greater contributors to our society."

Former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay addressed the group Friday morning, but the most impressive performer, members said, was former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, who gave the dinner speech Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0127577

"We have to act independently of the White House. You do not serve the president, you serve with the president," Mr. Gingrich said, according to a Republican present at the dinner, which was closed to the press.

"Newt blew the group away," said another Republican who attended the dinner. "He is on such a different intellectual plane. He warned that the conference moves too slow and the RSC should be outmaneuvering the conference. He also said that the Republicans should neither blame nor support President Bush on issues that divide the Republicans from their base."

Underdogs Demand Iraq War's End, Troops Home (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

Democratic candidates whom many consider underdogs for the presidential nomination in 2008 continued their party's attacks on the Iraq war yesterday, demanding it be ended and the troops brought home immediately.

"We must stop this war," Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware declared on the final day of the Democratic National Committee's (DNC) three-day winter meeting here.

Democrats at the meeting approved a party resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq, calling instead for a "broadening of diplomatic initiatives" to end the conflict.

Mr. Biden, who is making a second bid for his party's nomination, said reducing the number of troops in Iraq, "not escalating America's troops, is the only way to force Iraq's leaders to seek a political settlement." "The surge in troops is not a solution," said Mr. Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "It is a tragic mistake, and I will do everything in my power to stop it."

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack went further than many of his Democratic rivals who are calling for a phased troop withdrawal from Iraq over the next year or two. He said that reducing the number of U.S. forces in Iraq over time would not represent "a real change" in policy on the war.

"The real change is we want our troops out now. The war must end, and our troops must be brought home now, not eventually but immediately," Mr. Vilsack said.

The two-term governor also reminded DNC members that the only Democrats to win the presidency in recent decades were governors who ran against the Washington establishment.

Identifying himself as "an outsider" who has run a government, balanced a budget and managed a state economy, Mr. Vilsack said "we win as outsiders." Though he did not mention any names, his remark was a reminder to his audience that a half-dozen of the party's presidential contenders -- including front-runners Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois -- are members of Congress.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, the only other state chief executive seeking the Democratic nomination, also raised the end-the-war ante against his party's pack of candidates in a speech that pointedly criticized the Democrats' pending nonbinding Senate resolution against Mr. Bush's troop surge.

"As someone who served in Congress for 14 years, I know the power they hold, should they choose to wield it. The Congress passed a resolution authorizing the war. They need to pass another that overturns that authorization ... and brings our troops home by the end of the year," he said.

And in an unusual twist in the increasingly heated debate over the war, Mr. Richardson offered an assessment with which even Mr. Bush might partially agree.

"The reality is, we have done in Iraq what we said we would do. We have rid the world of a brutal dictator. We have brought about free and fair elections three times over," he said. "The Iraqis now have a constitution, over 200,000 armed soldiers and they have oil revenue. It's time for our troops to leave with honor."

Moreover, at a time when foreign policy and national security have become central issues, the former U.N. ambassador who has brokered foreign policy disputes around the world, implicitly raised the lack of foreign policy experience among most of his party's candidates.

"I know the usual rap on governors -- that we don't know anything about foreign affairs," Mr. Richardson said. "Well, maybe you can say that about governors from Texas, but not this governor."

Democrats Split On How To End The War (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The war in Iraq is shaping the opening stages of the contest for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, just as it did in the 2004 campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0127578

After 10 candidates' speeches over two days at the winter meeting of the Democratic National Committee in Washington, the war proved again to be the central point of differentiation among the party's presidential contenders.

What emerged was a division over how to stop the war, one likely to intensify as Congress debates measures ranging from a nonbinding resolution condemning President Bush's proposal to send more troops to Iraq to more controversial legislation that would restrict or cut off funds for the military mission.

Four years ago, former Vermont governor Howard Dean tapped into the growing opposition to the war among party activists and turned a long-shot candidacy into a force to be reckoned with until his campaign imploded in Iowa.

Now everyone running opposes the war, but the self-styled outsiders in the race -- those not in the Senate -- see political gain in pressing for a speedy end to the war, and in the process they are putting pressure on prominent candidates such as Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) to follow suit.

"As someone who served in Congress for 14 years, I know the power they hold, should they choose to wield it," New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson told the DNC yesterday at the Hilton Washington hotel. "The Congress passed a resolution authorizing war. They need to pass another one that overturns that authorization and brings our troops home by the end of the calendar year."

Former senator John Edwards (N.C.) was equally adamant on Friday that members of Congress stand up against the president. "It is a betrayal not to stop this president's plan to escalate the war when we have the responsibility, the power and the ability to stop it," he said. "We cannot be satisfied with passing nonbinding resolutions that we know this president will ignore."

Edwards favors an immediate withdrawal of up to 50,000 troops, with the rest brought home within 18 months.

Former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack was just as pointed in calling for congressional Democrats to act boldly to stop the war. "I think Congress has a constitutional responsibility and a moral obligation to do it now," he said yesterday. "Not a cap, an end. Not eventually, immediately. Those who voted for the war, those who voted to continue to support the war, those who voted to continue funding the war can surely vote to stop the war."

Clinton on Friday defended her support for a nonbinding resolution expressing disapproval of the plan to send more troops to Iraq, but she made a point to say that she is now ready to press for tougher action.

"I want to go further," she told the audience of Democrats who will be delegates at the party's national convention in 2008. She outlined other steps she has proposed to cap the number of U.S. troops in Iraq and pressure the Iraqi government. But she has so far resisted embracing any timetable for bringing home the troops.

Obama, who is to formally launch his candidacy Saturday in Illinois, opposed the war initially and last week moved past Clinton with a proposal to withdraw virtually all U.S. forces by March 31, 2008.

But in his speech on Friday, Obama was less explicit than other Democrats about the way forward. Calling the war "a tragic mistake," he said, "We all have a responsibility now to put forth a plan that offers the best chance of ending the bloodshed and bringing the troops home."

Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, condemned Bush in harsh language yesterday. "Mr. President," he said, "the majority of Americans who oppose you in Iraq are not the ones emboldening the enemy. That's the one mission you have accomplished."

Biden said he would do "everything in my power" to block the president's decision to deploy more troops. His broader proposal calls for a political solution that would provide regional autonomy for Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds and guarantees by the central government that Sunnis would share in the country's oil revenues. He wants to draw down U.S. forces.

The weekend of speeches did little to reorder the Democratic race, with Clinton seen as the early front-runner and Obama and Edwards viewed as her most serious rivals starting out.

Based on conversations with DNC members and others who attended the meeting, Edwards and Richardson helped themselves more than any of the other candidates did. Edwards won repeated applause with his speech, and Richardson drew strong reviews for his.

Former senator Mike Gravel (Alaska), the fourth speaker at yesterday's session, was perhaps the harshest of any of the candidates in denouncing those Democrats who supported the war initially. But he did little to advance his dark-horse candidacy, according to party activists, by delivering a 25-minute speech, the longest of the weekend and 18 minutes longer than the routinely ignored seven-minute time limit imposed by the DNC.

By that measure, Biden was the big winner. The normally windy senator delivered the shortest speech of the weekend. He opened with another apology for describing Obama as an African American who is "articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy," a comment that ruined the opening day of his campaign Wednesday.

"So, how was your week?" he began, to laughter. He quickly turned contrite: "I want to say that I truly regret that the words I spoke offended people I admire very much."

DOJ_NMG_0127579

Richardson To Democrats: Bring Troops Home Now (ABQ)

By Woody Brosnan

Albuquerque Tribune, February 4, 2007

WASHINGTON — Gov. Bill Richardson told Democrats here today that Congress should repeal the authorization for the Iraq War and "bring our troops home by the end of this year."

Like the other Democrats running for president, Richardson used the two-day meeting of the Democratic National Committee Friday and Saturday to stake out his position on the central issue of the campaign.

Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Joe Biden of Delaware are supporting a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush on sending a surge of troops to Baghdad.

Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd said that's not enough. Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards said Congress should block the escalation. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois wants to set a March, 2008 deadline for withdrawing troops. Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio wants to cut off funds for the war.

Former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack is urging state legislatures and city councils to pass resolutions opposing the surge, but leave a combat force in northern Iraq.

"Those who voted for the war, those who voted to continue the war, can surely vote to end the war," Vilsack said today.

Richardson, who initially supported the war but now says it was a mistake, said the United States has accomplished its mission of getting rid of Saddam Hussein, bringing about elections and creating an Iraqi army.

"It's time for our troops to leave with honor," said Richardson. "A struggle between a country's warring factions, where both sides hate the United States, is not worthy of one more lost American life."

The speaking times of the candidates Friday and Saturday were chosen by lot, as were the delegates introducing them. But Richardson's introduction was written by Linda Lynch, wife of journalist Paul Salopek, who was released from a Sudanese jail through Richardson's intervention.

"He brought my Paul home," wrote Lynch.

Candidates were supposed to speak for only seven minutes, but only Biden, often criticized for talking too much, did so.

Richardson spoke for 24 minutes, using much of his speech to talk about his record in New Mexico, tailoring his remarks to appeal to the delegates.

Richardson drew applause when he bragged about reinstating collective bargaining for public employees, for raising teacher pay in New Mexico from 48th in the country to 27th, for passing a state hate crimes law and adopting policies to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

"Every one of these accomplishments can be done at the national level," he said.

Richardson also touted his experience as a negotiator with North Korea and Sudan.

"I know the usual rap on governors - that we don't anything about foreign affairs. Well, maybe you can say that about certain governors from Texas. But not this governor," said Richardson, drawing an appreciative laugh from the audience.

Richardson also called on all Democratic candidates to not attack each other and asked the DNC to pass a resolution to that effect. But DNC chairman Howard Dean said it would have to be taken up at their June meeting.

Richardson ended the speech by acknowledging his low standing in the polls but he asked the Democrats to "stay loose" and watch the campaign. Later, he told reporters, "I'm right where I want to be."

The state committee members represented at the meeting will automatically qualify as super-delegates, which also means most can wait until the primaries and caucuses are well underway before they commit to a candidate.

Former Mississippi Gov. Ray Mabus, who's backing Vilsack, said the advantage for candidates like Vilsack and Richardson is that all the attention on the so-called top three - Clinton, Edwards and Obama - allows them to get their "sea legs" in the race.

"It's all a beauty contest which means they (the top three) have nowhere to grow," said Richardson volunteer Kenneth Bulko, of Albany, N.Y., as he passed out bumper stickers and folders at the Richardson table.

Dustin Taylor, a 26-year-old University of New Mexico student, passed out stickers for Richardson along with a dozen or so other 20-somethings. Taylor, who is interning for Rep. Tom Udall, Santa Fe Democrat, said Richardson is "the most electable candidate."

Vilsack Calls For End To Financing Of Iraq War (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 4, 2007

Washington, D.C. – Presidential candidate and ex-Gov. Tom Vilsack painted himself as an outsider and a truth-teller before members of the Democratic National Committee here today, calling for an immediate end to financing of the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0127580

While some contenders for the Democratic nomination have advocated a cap on troops, the Iowa Democrat said that represents staying the course rather than real change. As president, he would withdraw the troops and force Iraqis to take charge, he said.

"Congress has the constitutional responsibility and a moral obligation to do it now," Vilsack said, to cheers, in a clear shot at opponents such as Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York, who said Friday that there aren't the votes in Congress for a speedy pullout.

"Those who voted for the war, those who voted to continue to support the war, those who voted to continue funding the war, can surely vote to stop the war," said Vilsack. "As an insider it's difficult to effect change . . . as an outsider we can change things . . . we win as outsiders."

Vilsack was the last of 10 presidential candidates to speak over two days to key Democrats from across the country shopping for their next nominee. His speech came amidst a busy weekend in the capital, with an appearance on MSNBC early today and an interview Sunday with Wolf Blitzer on CNN's "Late Edition."

Looking on was Democrat Anne Dowling of Canterbury, N.H., who said she already had seen Vilsack at a breakfast in her early-primary state. "I like him," she said. "He's very organized in his thinking, and he communicates well."

While her mind is not yet made up, she said Vilsack remains a possibility. "I think he has a nice calm about him," Dowling said.

Preceding Vilsack in today's lineup were Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Alaska Sen. Mike Gravel. Biden gained unwelcome and widespread attention earlier this week when he described Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois as "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean."

Biden opened his remarks today by asking: "So, how was your week?" as the hall rocked with laughter. But on a more serious note, he said that "I truly regret the words I spoke of people I respect very much."

On Iraq, he said the proposed increase in troops is a "tragic mistake" and "I will do everything in my power to stop it."

Richardson, the only other governor in the race, like Vilsack cited his success as the chief executive in a state and called on Democrats to approve a resolution calling on all the candidates to run clean campaigns.

"The American people need to know we're standing up for them and that we can get the job done," said Richardson, who also urged Democrats to "stay loose" and consider all the candidates.

Trent Armitage and Cameron Patterson, both 19 and students at Longwood University in Farmville, Va., said they are undecided on their first votes ever for a presidential candidate.

"I definitely want a strong Iraq war policy," said Armitage. "And I do really want a person who's going to do a lot for universal health care."

Patterson said he is leaning toward supporting Richardson or John Edwards, but "I'm willing to give Governor Vilsack a look," he said. "The fact he's a former governor would be a tremendous help, because he has strong executive experience."

Democrats Endorse Voting Measure (WP)

By Robert E. Pierre

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The District's effort to win a full seat in the House of Representatives won unanimous support yesterday from the Democratic National Committee.

It was the first step in a national lobbying campaign that will ask each of the presidential candidates to embrace the idea and will include grass-roots efforts in such early-voting states as Iowa and New Hampshire. The goal is to persuade members of the Democratic-controlled Congress to pass legislation by summer.

"We're very excited," said the DNC resolution's author, Donna Brazile, who ran Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign. "This is the beginning of a 50-state campaign."

For decades, the District has fought for a voting seat in Congress. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.), can vote only in committees and on amendments to legislation. But legislation introduced last month would add a full seat in Congress for the heavily Democratic District and one for Utah, which is solidly Republican.

Passage is far from certain. Republicans are divided on the issue, and the measure would need 60 votes in the Senate to avoid a filibuster. Democrats, who have concerns of their own, hold a one-vote majority. Brazile remained optimistic about gaining traction.

Local activists and elected leaders, including D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D), are also ramping up their efforts. On two days of lobbying and protest, one Feb. 15 and another in April, D.C. residents will take their message to Capitol Hill.

Biden Says He Regrets Remarks On Obama (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0127581

By Nedra Pickler
AP, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Senator Joseph Biden tried yesterday to stem the damage from the botched launch of his presidential campaign as underdog candidates in the Democratic field looked to gain momentum from the party faithful.

The Democratic National Committee wrapped up a three-day winter meeting that offered speeches from all 10 candidates already in the race or considering a bid. Those leading in the polls all appeared Friday.

The crowd thinned to less than half yesterday, but those in attendance were no less enthusiastic. Governor Bill Richardson of New Mexico stirred them by calling for a primary without negative campaigning and saying he would bring troops home from Iraq by the end of the year.

"Maybe I'm not up there in all these polls, but you are the deciders, not the man in the White House," Richardson said to cheers. "I say to you today, stay loose. We've got a year to go."

Tom Vilsack, former Iowa governor, positioned himself as a Washington outsider with a record of real change. He criticized senators in the race who refuse to cut the money that is paying for troops in Iraq.

Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York are advocating a cap to the number of troops and their eventual withdrawal.

"The reality of capping troops or reducing the number of troops at some point in the future is not real change," Vilsack said. "It is time for us to clearly say the war must end and our troops must be brought home now."

Biden got right to the matter that has threatened his candidacy before it even gets off the ground.

The Delaware senator spent his first day as an official candidate Wednesday explaining his statement that Obama is "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean," raising questions about how he viewed other black candidates.

"I want to say that I truly regret that the words I spoke offended people that I admire very much," Biden said.

Nominate Biden: America Needs The Comic Relief (NHUL)

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 4, 2007

The United States is pretty stressed out right now. Iraq is going terribly, Boston was shut down by a bomb scare, famous people keep using the n-word as if it were 1860 again, and global warming's Chicken Littles are terrifying everyone with their cries of doom. Like never before, America needs Sen. Joe Biden.

Last week Sen. Blowhard said this of his rival for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Barack Obama: "I mean, you got the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

The very first? Wow.

That was after Biden ripped a few of his Democratic opponents' Iraq plans, calling Hillary Clinton's plan "nothing but disaster," and saying of John Edwards' proposal, "I don't think John Edwards knows what the heck he is talking about."

And that was after Biden said of Indian immigrants last summer, "You cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent. I'm not joking."

And all of that was after Biden dropped out of the 1988 Presidential race for plagiarizing a speech by a British politician.

This guy is a one-man laugh factory.

Despite his lack of tact, we don't think Biden really is a bigot. He is, however, the court jester of the U.S. Senate. Bringing his act on the road would provide some much-needed stress relief for the American people.

If Democrats really cared about providing relief to the American people, they'd nominate a walking punch line so we could all spend the bulk of the election year laughing at the ineptitude of their candidate -- just like in 2004.

If we get really lucky, Biden will get the nomination and pick Dennis Kucinich as his straight man/running mate.

Twisting In Their Own Windiness (WP)

By Jim Hoagland
The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Ladies and gentlemen of the jury of public opinion, I rise not to defend Joe Biden, Jacques Chirac and Bob Gates but to draw your attention to extenuating circumstances that may have caused these accused and other gaffe-prone speakers to plant their feet deeply in their mouths in recent days.

What's that? Oh, yes. In the case of Gates, the new defense secretary, it should be made clear that he received help from Karl Rove and the White House in stumbling over his own infelicitous words. We will come to that shortly.

This outbreak of global political buffoonery is no accident. It spins out of a whirlwind of campaigns, elections and leadership changes sweeping across Britain, France, Russia, the United States and who knows where else over the next two years.

DOJ_NMG_0127582

In a globalized world, if you will, a permanent campaign is underway somewhere and everywhere all the time. Politicians get endless opportunities to say dumb things into tape recorders and cameras. That provides endless material for the new savants of the age of interconnectivity, the snark artists of television's false news shows, talk radio, blogs and, yes, newspapers, bless their fearful, tarted-up souls.

Sorry. I digress. But context is everything in the case of Joe Biden making the evening news by praising Sen. Barack Obama for being, well, " clean." Reporters who long ago learned to concentrate on Biden's ideas rather than on his ill-assorted nouns, verbs and adjectives had to treat this gaffe as momentous: Against much of the available evidence, Biden had just declared that he was a serious presidential contender.

The Delaware senator is a thoroughly decent, hardworking and thoughtful legislator. But I found it unnerving in his previous bid for the Democratic nomination, in 1988, to have him frequently deliver a loosely connected set of ideas during an interview and then look up to ask: "Am I making sense here?" So I say, plus Ã§a change.

Yes, this French adage moves us to President Chirac, who also made the front page of the New York Times on Thursday by furiously trying to deny and then retract words he had said to three reporters and a tape recorder. After months of formally declaring that Iran must not be allowed to develop nuclear weapons, Chirac confided that an Iran possessing one or two nuclear weapons would not be so dangerous after all, since Tehran could be razed in retaliation for inappropriate behavior.

Hmmm. Well, doesn't he have a point there? And this is familiar behavior, too. Chirac made unsettling remarks about Germany and Israel to the Washington Times back in 1986 and then firmly denied making them until his questioner produced an unexpected tape recording.

Interviewing Chirac has always been a constant struggle to identify what he intends as policy pronouncements, as his version of clever repartee to lighten the atmosphere or as just plain banality. This, after all, is a politician nicknamed "the brother-in-law." His bonhomie is often forced and capable of leading him astray.

One would never say that of Bob Gates, who interrupted his skillful effort to smooth all Washington feathers ruffled by Don Rumsfeld by calling a news conference Jan. 26 to warn darkly that congressional opposition to U.S. troop increases in Iraq "emboldens the enemy and our adversaries."

There is cause for legitimate concern on that score. But this is also language out of the White House political playbook for turning arguments about Iraq strategy into arguments about patriotism. And yes, you will hear people with great connections in this administration say that Rove and communications czar Dan Bartlett encouraged Gates in this mission. At least, I have heard that.

But Gates denies it. And you must consider who is damaged most by this poisonous approach. First of all, Gates. It revives the fading criticisms from his CIA days that he politicized national security judgments to please his political masters. It is not in his interest to have those memories recalled.

Second, this was nothing less than a thinly veiled attack on GOP icon Sen. John Warner and his dissent on Iraq. A White House assault on Warner's responsible effort to reduce polarization on Iraq risks destroying what remains of the unity of the Republican Party's foreign policy establishment. Heck, it threatens to destroy that establishment altogether. I would be amazed if Warner were not stung by "what they are putting Gates up to," as one Warnerite puts it.

So surely, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, you will see that Bush White House politicos would never risk such damage for short-term political gain. That would make them seem even more ridiculous than the most snarky parodymeisters ever could. And who could possibly want that?

Joe Biden's Just A Barrel Of Gaffes (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

DELAWARE Sen. Joe Biden has been telling people for months that he's going to run for president, as if nobody could actually believe it. Even when he formally announced last week, I still didn't believe it. In fact, I'm not quite sure what it would take to make me believe it. If I turned on the television and watched Biden formally accepting the nomination at the Democratic National Convention, I might believe it then. (On the other hand, I'd probably figure I was suffering some hallucinatory episode and check myself into a hospital.)

I'm not saying Biden shouldn't be president. I have tons of respect for him, and I think he'd do a terrific job if he could get it. I just find it amusing that he thinks there's some chance he could actually become president. It's a case study of that bizarre mental affliction that strikes so many senators. They see younger, less-experienced Senate colleagues — who are far less esteemed than they are — running for president, and they're offended. If the 100 senators were the only ones who could vote, Biden would probably beat Hillary Clinton or Barack Obama. Unfortunately for Biden, that's not how it works.

DOJ_NMG_0127583

Biden's charming cluelessness was on display in a recent ABC news interview. The famously verbose senator was asked to state in 25 words or less why Democrats should nominate him. His response was 45 words. I suppose that, by Biden's standards, coming in at just under twice his allotted length counts as a victory of sorts. Biden then explained why he could win: "If people learn my story, learn my record, I think I can compete. The question is, can I raise the money?" This is sort of like me saying that I think I can compete for a starting NFL quarterback job, but the question is, can I avoid injuries? It's a question, but it's certainly not the question.

In addition to his uncontrollable verbosity, Biden is a gaffe machine. He ran for president 20 years ago but had to abandon his campaign when it was discovered that he had plagiarized speeches from a British politician, substituting in key details to make the story his own.

In his latest effort, Biden wasted no time subverting his already microscopic chances. On the day of his announcement, he mused about Illinois Sen. Obama: "I mean, you got the first mainstream African American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy."

In Biden's defense, the quote was widely misunderstood. Having listened to it, it's obvious that Biden was not saying Obama is the first mainstream African American candidate who is also articulate and so on. He was saying he's the first mainstream candidate — meaning ideologically mainstream, unlike Carol Moseley Braun, Al Sharpton or Jesse Jackson — and that he's articulate and so on. He wasn't calling Jackson or the others inarticulate. To be sure, this is still a pretty cringe-inducing way for white people to talk about African Americans. There's a famous Chris Rock routine in which he complains about how people describe Colin Powell as "articulate," as if it were a surprise that a secretary of State can speak well.

And, of course, last summer Biden attempted to endear himself to an Indian American supporter by telling him that in Delaware, "you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent." Not only was this an offensive line, it didn't even make any sense: The observation, familiar to anybody who watched a comedian on cable television 15 years ago, is that Indian Americans are the only ones who work in convenience stores, not that they're the only ones who shop there. The man can't even keep his condescending cliches straight.

Biden looks as if he's the product of a laboratory experiment designed to create the world's worst presidential candidate. If the Obama gaffe doesn't knock him out of the race, something else will. I doubt he makes it to Iowa.

Yes, Biden's very knowledgeable and dedicated. But to win the presidency, you actually have to be good at mass politics. Why is Biden not smart enough to recognize that?

The Racial Politics Of Speaking Well (NYT)

By Lynette Clemetson

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

SENATOR JOSEPH R. BIDEN'S characterization of his fellow Democratic presidential contender Senator Barack Obama as "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy" was so painfully clumsy that it nearly warranted pity.

There are not enough column inches on this page to parse interpretations of each of Mr. Biden's chosen adjectives. But among his string of loaded words, one is so pervasive — and is generally used and viewed so differently by blacks and whites — that it calls out for a national chat, perhaps a national therapy session.

It is amazing that this still requires clarification, but here it is. Black people get a little testy when white people call them "articulate."

Though it was little noted, on Wednesday President Bush on the Fox News Channel also described Mr. Obama as "articulate." On any given day, in any number of settings, it is likely to be one of the first things white people warmly remark about Oprah Winfrey; Richard Parsons, chief executive of Time Warner; Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Deval Patrick, the newly elected governor of Massachusetts; or a recently promoted black colleague at work.

A series of conversations about the word with a number of black public figures last week elicited the kind of frustrated responses often uttered between blacks, but seldom shared with whites.

"You hear it and you just think, 'Damn, this again?' " said Michael Eric Dyson, a professor of humanities at the University of Pennsylvania.

Anna Perez, the former communications counselor for Ms. Rice when she was national security adviser, said, "You just stand and wonder, 'When will this foolishness end?' "

Said Reginald Hudlin, president of entertainment for Black Entertainment Television: "It makes me weary, literally tired, like, 'Do I really want to spend my time right now educating this person?' "

So what is the problem with the word? Whites do not normally object when it is used to describe them. And it is not as if articulate black people do not wish to be thought of as that. The characterization is most often meant as a form of praise.

DOJ_NMG_0127584

"Look, what I was attempting to be, but not very artfully, is complimentary," Mr. Biden explained to Jon Stewart on Wednesday on "The Daily Show." "This is an incredible guy. This is a phenomenon."

What faint praise, indeed. Being articulate must surely be a baseline requirement for a former president of The Harvard Law Review. After all, Webster's definitions of the word include "able to speak" and "expressing oneself easily and clearly." It would be more incredible, more of a phenomenon, to borrow two more of the senator's puzzling words, if Mr. Obama were inarticulate.

That is the core of the issue. When whites use the word in reference to blacks, it often carries a subtext of amazement, even bewilderment. It is similar to praising a female executive or politician by calling her "tough" or "a rational decision-maker."

"When people say it, what they are really saying is that someone is articulate ... for a black person," Ms. Perez said.

Such a subtext is inherently offensive because it suggests that the recipient of the "compliment" is notably different from other black people.

"Historically, it was meant to signal the exceptional Negro," Mr. Dyson said. "The implication is that most black people do not have the capacity to engage in articulate speech, when white people are automatically assumed to be articulate."

And such distinctions discount as inarticulate historically black patterns of speech. "Al Sharpton is incredibly articulate," said Tricia Rose, professor of Africana Studies at Brown University. "But because he speaks with a cadence and style that is firmly rooted in black rhetorical tradition you will rarely hear white people refer to him as articulate."

While many white people do not automatically recognize how, and how often, the word is applied, many black people can recall with clarity the numerous times it has stopped them in their tracks.

Melissa Harris-Lacewell, professor of politics and African-American studies at Princeton University, said her first notable encounter with the word was back in high school in Chester, Va., when she was dating the school's star football player. In post-game interviews and news stories she started to notice that he was always referred to as articulate.

"They never said that about the white quarterback," she said, "yet they couldn't help but say it about my boyfriend."

William E. Kennard, a managing director of the Carlyle Group and a former chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, recalled that in his days as partner at a Washington law firm in the early 1990s written reviews of prospective black hires almost always included the words, "articulate and poised." The characterization was so consistent and in such stark contrast to the notes taken on white job applicants that he mentioned it to his fellow partners.

"It was a law firm; all of the people interviewing for jobs were articulate," said Mr. Kennard, 50, who is also on the board of The New York Times Company. "And yet my colleagues seemed struck by that quality in black applicants."

The comedian and actor D. L. Hughley, a frequent guest on HBO's "Real Time With Bill Maher," says that every time he appears on the show, where he riffs on the political and social issues of the day, people walk up to him afterward and tell him how "smart and articulate" his comments were.

"Everyone was up in arms about Michael Richards using the N-word, but subtle words like this are more insidious," Mr. Hughley said. "It's like weight loss. The last few pounds are the hardest to get rid of. It's the last vestiges of racism that are hard to get rid of."

Sometimes the "articulate" moniker is merely implied. My colleague Rachel Swarns and I chuckle wearily about the number of times we have finished interviews or casual conversations with people — always white, more often male — only to have the person end the meeting with some version of the statement, "something about you reminds me of Condoleezza Rice."

Neither Rachel nor I look anything like Ms. Rice, or each other for that matter, so the comparison is clearly not physical. The comment seems more a vocalized reach by the speaker for some sort of reference point, a context in which to understand us.

It is unlikely that whites will quickly or easily erase "articulate" and other damning forms of praise from the ways in which they discuss blacks. Listen for it in post-Super Bowl chatter, after the Academy Awards, at the next school board meeting or corporate retreat.

But here is a pointer. Do not use it as the primary attribute of note for a black person if you would not use it for a similarly talented, skilled or eloquent white person. Do not make it an outsized distinction for Brown University's president, Ruth Simmons, if you would not for the University of Michigan's president, Mary Sue Coleman. Do not make it the sole basis for your praise of the actor Forest Whitaker if it would never cross your mind to utter it about the expressive Peter O'Toole.

With the ballooning size of the black middle and upper class, qualities in blacks like intelligence, eloquence — the mere ability to string sentences together with tenses intact — must at some point become as unremarkable to whites as they are to blacks.

"How many flukes simply constitute reality?" Mr. Hudlin asked, with amused dismay.

Well said.

DOJ_NMG_0127585

Clinton Camp Hasn't Written Off Fundraising Couple Who Helped Competitor (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

The life of a big-dollar Democratic donor isn't always easy. In between attending lavish parties and being wined and dined by various luminaries, sometimes you have to make tough choices.

Take Beth and Ron Dozoretz. The power couple are longtime heavyweights in national Democratic money circles; he is a health-care executive, she a former finance chairman for the Democratic National Committee.

They also happen to be close friends with the Clintons. The Dozoretzes were frequent guests at the Clinton White House, helped collect cash for the Clinton Presidential Library in Little Rock and chose Bill Clinton as the godfather for one of their children.

But, when the couple opened their Washington, D.C., manse on Friday for a fundraising event, it was New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, not New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, being feted.

"This is an opportunity for individuals to meet Governor Bill Richardson," reads a copy of the invite obtained by the Fix. "A contribution is not required to attend." Of course, if attendees do want to give money, the invite notes that checks can be written to the "Bill Richardson for President Exploratory Committee, Inc."

"They and the governor are longtime friends," Richardson communications director Pahl Shipley explained.

So does this mean that the Dozoretzes have picked their horse? Accounts vary. Some suggest that the couple has indicated privately that they will be with Richardson. Clinton communications director Howard Wolfson begged to differ.

"Beth Dozoretz is a good friend of the campaign, and she has made a major commitment to help Hillary," he said. "We appreciate her strong support."

Reached at home, Beth Dozoretz chose not to comment. The plot thickens. . . .

CLUB FOR GROWTH ON '08

The Club for Growth wants to play a role in the 2008 GOP presidential primary. Anyone who doubts the implications, give former senator Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) a call.

A political group for fiscal conservatives, the club has become a force in congressional elections, taking aim at moderate Republicans who don't support conservative causes such as tax cuts and spending discipline. Some GOP lawmakers privately blame the group for the party's loss of Senate control in November. The Club for Growth threw substantial resources behind a primary challenge to Chafee that wound up weakening the longtime incumbent financially and politically.

Chafee survived the primary but lost in the general election to Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse. Seven Club-backed conservatives, however, won House races in November. Despite the grumbling from some GOP quarters, the group has plenty of conservative admirers for its refusal to compromise its principles.

In the coming months, those unyielding standards will be applied to Republican White House hopefuls. The Club for Growth intends to scour every contender's record and advise its 40,000 members on who passes ideological muster.

One will not be Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor and the subject of "Presidential White Paper #1." Acknowledging that Huckabee pushed major tax cuts through his state legislature, the Club for Growth lists seven tax increases that he also supported, along with spending increases and a mixed record on school choice. "Calling oneself an economic conservative does not make one so," the paper concluded.

Tim Russert cited the findings on "Meet the Press" last week, after Huckabee announced his candidacy. "That's a tough record to sell to a Republican audience in primary states," Russert noted. "It shouldn't be if they look at the real record," Huckabee shot back.

Richardson Touts Unique Qualifications (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, February 3, 2007

KHARTOUM, Sudan - It‘s been said that Bill Richardson would negotiate with the devil. And by some definitions, he has — several times.

New Mexico‘s Democratic governor has bartered with some of the most notorious rulers of modern times: Iraq ‘s Saddam Hussein , Yugoslavia‘s Slobodan Milosevic , Cuba‘s Fidel Castro , Kenya‘s Daniel Arap Moi, Zaire‘s Mobutu Sese Seko, Nigeria‘s Sani Abacha and most recently, Sudan‘s Omar al-Bashir. Richardson has compared himself to Red Adair, renowned for his ability to put out erupting oil well fires.

DOJ_NMG_0127586

Richardson has more international experience than just about anyone else in the 2008 field. The 59-year-old was ambassador to the United Nations in the Clinton administration, served on the intelligence committee during his 14 years in the House and has done international work from his perch as a small-state governor.

"I have good news," Richardson told al-Bashir after four days of back-to-back meetings with all sides in the conflict, including two rare hourlong sessions with the elusive president. "We are going to leave today."

"With all that, we expect you to be the president of the United States!" he said in English, after speaking Arabic for the earlier discussions.

"I'm not one for tight bows or formal handshakes when a bear hug or a gentle fist on the shoulder is an available option," Richardson wrote in his autobiography, "Between Worlds."

Richardson had gone to Baghdad in 1995 at the request of the Iraqis to negotiate with Saddam for the release of two U.S. oil mechanics who had wandered over the border with Kuwait. Richardson has an impressive track record in convincing dictators that they should free U.S. prisoners from countries as isolated as North Korea , Cuba and Sudan.

After Saddam agreed to return, Richardson decided not to apologize but to continue making his case with respect and his feet firmly planted on the floor. Saddam authorized the mechanics' release after an hour of discussion.

Richardson can be prickly and demanding of his staff. But he also likes to lighten the mood by having fun with people's names and their backgrounds.

Richardson bonded with Castro over their shared love of baseball and with Iraq's then-Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz over their shared Catholic faith and penchant for cigars. As U.N. ambassador, Richardson took his colleagues from around the world to a game between the New York Yankees and Mets.

Richardson emerged from his diplomatic meetings with clear impressions. He has written:

_Castro had horrible dandruff, but was humorous, personable and extremely well-informed about U.S. politics and geopolitical issues.

_Mobutu was dignified and regal despite overseeing vast corruption. His successor, Laurent Kabila was street-smart and had no scruples.

_Saddam had a twitch on the right side of his face and made Richardson sweat by staring him down.

Richardson's first visit to Sudan was in 1996, when he went to free three Red Cross workers held by Marxist rebels.

Richardson learned the rebel leader had recently lost a daughter and a son was on his death bed in the rebels' disease-ridden camp. The rebel leader wanted $10 million. Richardson appealed to him by saying he could get him medicine, rice, vehicles and other aid so other children did not have to die.

Some criticized Richardson's effort because he violated a cardinal rule of hostage negotiators: never bargain for their release.

"If you give them money, that is negotiating with a terrorist," Richardson said in a recent Associated Press interview. "But a couple of Jeeps, a health study, medicine, that's what made it happen. It was a human connection with that rebel.

"I don't mind saying I try to psychologically go into their heads and see what's on their mind and what's important to them at the time," he said. "I do study my subject pretty intensely."

Richardson's freelance diplomacy has gotten mixed reaction from the White House over the years. President Clinton gave his private blessing to the Iraq trip, whispered to Richardson as the two were watching the premiere of the Spanish-language movie "Mi Familia."

David Goldwin, who worked in the Clinton State Department and later became Richardson's national security aide at the U.N., said the administration also was appreciative that Richardson negotiated for the release of two downed Army helicopter pilots in December 1994 in North Korea.

"They had no real diplomatic access in North Korea," Goldwin said. "He had good access first person. ... He's delivered them bad news every time he's dealt with them. But they feel listed to and respected by him and so they are willing to take that message."

James Dobbins, who worked for President Bush and his father as well as in the Clinton administration, said he does not recall anyone at the White House complaining about Richardson acting as a free agent.

"He was by and large taking missions that the president was happy to have him take," Dobbins said. "There have been many occasions where congressmen have been encouraged to go places where we have a difficult relationship or no relationship at all to see what develops."

Richardson writes in his book that Clinton administration officials urged him not to travel to Haiti to negotiate a peaceful transfer of power in July 1994, as Clinton was threatening military action.

Richardson went anyway, although it was Clinton's approach that eventually forced the military rulers to step down.

DOJ_NMG_0127587

Upon his confirmation as Clinton's nominee for U.N. ambassador, Richardson wrote that incoming Secretary of State Madeleine Albright ordered him to stop all independent diplomacy and warned him that others had been fired for trying to negotiate side deals.

Interest in different cultures is rooted in Richardson's childhood. He is the son of an American businessman father and a Mexican mother. He grew up in Mexico City and is fluent in Spanish. His father sent him to high school in the United States and Richardson has said he often felt trapped between two worlds.

Michael Dukakis, the former Massachusetts governor who was the 1988 Democratic nominee for president, said Richardson's combination of foreign policy and executive experience should be an asset in the 2008 race.

Governors often make stronger presidential candidates but can suffer from criticism that they are light on foreign affairs.

"Bill's foreign policy experience is a big plus for him," Dukakis said. "He has a lot more than most of us who began in state politics and came up through the ranks and became governors. ... And I think foreign policy is going to be a big issue in this campaign, especially in the Democratic primary."

Bill Weld, a Republican who was Massachusetts governor, was three years ahead of Richardson at the Middlesex School, a boarding school in Concord, Mass. Weld said Richardson does not need to prove himself like other governors who get most of their international experience through trade missions.

Richardson's experience in single-handedly brokering high-profile diplomatic deals and his time in the statehouse "is a very attractive combination," Weld said.

That is not to say all of Richardson's travels are successful.

Richardson was not able to achieve one his top goals on the trip to Sudan — persuading al-Bashir to allow U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur. But he persuaded al-Bashir to agree to a 60-day cease-fire with rebel armies while peace talks could be arranged. It didn't hold.

On The Run (NYT)

By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times Magazine, February 4, 2007

Q: As the popular governor of New Mexico but one of the less-popular candidates seeking the Democratic nomination for president, did you enter the race to actually win or merely to angle for another position at the national level? I want to be president. If I don't win the presidency, I am not interested in the vice presidency or in being secretary of state.

Why not? As a former ambassador to the U.N. under President Clinton, as well as a self-appointed global trouble-shooter, you seem like a natural for secretary of state. I can be a governor who practices foreign policy, as I do.

Right, just last month you toured a refugee camp in Darfur and went on to Khartoum, where you were able to arrange a 60-day cease-fire between rebel groups and the Sudanese dictator, Omar Hassan al-Bashir. What is he like? I met with him twice on that trip. He is very pragmatic and also very isolated. I got an American journalist out late last year, and as the American ambassador said, he likes me, Bashir. So I used that. That was the reason the Save Darfur Coalition asked me to go to try to get him to do a cease-fire.

How do you think Condoleezza Rice and the rest of the State Department view your interventions into foreign affairs? I am sure she would prefer that I not be involved, that her own diplomats take care of things.

So you think she considers you annoying? I would think so.

Do you hold her responsible for the unilateral thrust of this administration's policies? No, I believe it is President Bush, who is saying, "I don't talk to countries that exhibit bad behavior." And pretty soon, with that standard, we're only going to be talking to the Vatican.

In recognition of your diplomatic efforts in various countries including North Korea, you've been nominated four times for the Nobel Peace Prize. Have you lobbied for it? No, you're told that is the worst thing to do. Don't lobby, don't make public statements.

I once read somewhere that people who are obsessed with making peace between warring camps tend to have grown up in homes where there was a lot of arguing between the parents. Was that true in your case? In my case, my parents sent me away at a very early age. So I don't know if they fought. I was 12, and I was gone. I think I have tried to be a negotiator because of my bicultural background.

Your father was an American banker, and your mother was from Mexico, where you spent most of your boyhood. As the first Hispanic major-party candidate to seek the presidency, do you think this country should officially be bilingual? No.

Many people in New Mexico say they knew you were running for president a few months ago, when you suddenly began to shed pounds, which you seem to do every time you're seeking office. I think the American people want their leaders to be and look healthy. I've lost about 30 pounds in five months. I need to come down another 10 pounds.

DOJ_NMG_0127588

Why do I keep hearing about you and speeding tickets? We never did get a ticket, but I was speeding. I'm impatient. I try to get too many things done. But it happened twice, and then it became part of the lore.

Well, at least you drive your own car, instead of being chauffeured around town. No, I wasn't driving. The state police drive me. But it was my fault.

On what basis, other than your record-breaking speed, do you think you can win the presidency? A lot of other candidates can give speeches about renewable energy and Iraq and creating jobs. I've got the experience. I've got the background. I've got the training. I believe as a negotiator I can bring people and the country together.

Doesn't Hillary Clinton, for instance, also have experience? I don't want to get into that. I'm going to be positive in this campaign.

Obama Mentor Rallies Black Support (POL)

By Ben Smith

The Politico, February 3, 2007

A key supporter of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama urged united African-American support for his presidential bid, questioning whether black Democrats still "owe" Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton their support, according to several people who attended a meeting of black Democratic politicians.

The comments by Illinois Senate President Emil Jones Jr., which he confirmed Saturday, angered Clinton backers and deepened a sharp rift among African-American political activists.

"How long are you going to owe?" politicians for past favors, Jones asked in a speech Friday to more than 100 members of the Democratic National Committee's black caucus and other political operatives gathered at the Washington Hilton for the winter meeting of the DNC, according to people who were there.

Jones, a veteran black legislator, implored the black officials and operatives not to act like "crabs in a barrel' " the attendees said, and drag down a successful member of their community.

Jamal Simmons, a political consultant who was at the caucus meeting, said Jones' words and the heated response that followed highlighted the difficult, personal choice facing many black Democrats.

"The one thing that was extraordinarily clear this weekend is that many African-American political operatives are very conflicted internally about whether to support Obama or Clinton," he said.

Jones spoke after the DNC's chief of staff, Leah Daughtry, told the group that she and the DNC would remain neutral in the 2008 presidential nominating contests.

"This is no time for neutrality," Jones said in an interview Saturday. "We have a well qualified candidate, and I urged them to get behind his candidacy."

"I didn't mention Clinton by name," he said.

But the remarks by one of Obama's longtime political mentors in Illinois was widely taken to refer to a debt felt in the black political community to Bill Clinton, who enjoyed deep black support in the White House and rewarded black allies.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, N.Y., who is now mounting her own campaign for the presidency, is trying to collect that debt by pushing hard for the endorsements of black political leaders, an effort that could force Obama onto an explicitly racial terrain that clashes with his national image as a figure of new, post-racial unity.

But while Hillary Clinton continues to lead in polls of African-American voters, Obama's extraordinary potential as a black presidential candidate has a powerful appeal to many black voters and officials.

Jones concluded his speech with a reference to the jobs and appointments Bill Clinton had given blacks, including many people in the room, and asked when they would stop owing the Clintons for that patronage, attendees said.

"You could hear a pin drop," said one person in the room who doesn't currently support either Obama or Clinton. "It was one of those moments when you say, 'I can't believe he just said that.'"

Jones' call was received frostily by Clinton allies, including Minyon Moore, the former White House aide who now heads Hillary Clinton's black outreach, and former Clinton and Gore campaign aide Donna Brazile, according to some attendees.

Moore walked out of the room when Jones stopped speaking, according to two people who were there.

Neither Moore nor Brazile could be reached for comment. But another Clinton supporter who was who at the meeting said Clinton's camp took Jones' remarks as an affront.

"The feeling was, 'Who is [Jones] to tell us how to be black?' " said the Clinton supporter, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the political sensitivity of the issue.

Obama spokesman Bill Burton said Jones is "a mentor of the senator" but wouldn't comment on the substance of his speech. Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0127589

But there was no doubt in the Washington Hilton that Jones struck a nerve. Black Democrats were walking around the hotel Saturday repeating - in jest, but not without an edge - Jones' refrain of "How long? How long?"

Obamarama (NYT)

By William Safire

The New York Times Magazine, February 4, 2007

"Politics has become so bitter and partisan," Senator Barack Obama said, "so gummed up by money and influence. . . ." Though the rest of his sentence petered out into a bureaucratic "big problems that demand solutions," what struck me was the forceful word picture evoked by the verb phrase gummed up. Here was a presidential candidate unafraid to use a slang verb with verve.

It's an Americanism in the sense of "spoiled," first cited by the O.E.D. in the college slang at Yale in 1901. Rudyard Kipling helped it along to trans-Atlantic status with a pregnant observation in a 1932 short story: "Research is gummed up with thinking." (If you dare to hang that Kipling aphorism on the wall of a stiff-necked research institution or Washington think tank, then you're a man, my son.) Senator Bob Dole in 1982 cautioned against undue optimism about passage of an extension of the Voting Rights Act with "the works around here get gummed up pretty easily," and lest we forget, that senator went on to win the Republican nomination for president.

Obama, often described as a "media darling" (just as Senator John McCain was in 2000), is a politician who apparently chooses his words with care. Consider the adjective he chose to deal with questions about his purchase of a strip of land adjacent to his home from Tony Rezko, his longtime friend indicted (not convicted) last fall on charges of extorting kickbacks from companies seeking state business. At first, Obama acknowledged that "it was stupid," a harsh admission, but later found an adjective better suited to a candidate for high office: "I am the first one to acknowledge that it was a boneheaded move for me to purchase that strip from Rezko, given that he was already under a cloud of concern." (The usual metaphor is "cloud of suspicion"; Obama softened it to concern.)

Boneheaded was a perfect choice: not as condemnatory or self-flagellating as stupid, nor as dismissive as foolish, nor as formal as ignorant, nor carrying a secondary drug connotation as dopey, nor as frivolous as silly, nor as inapt as dumb (considered a slur by the speech-impaired). The successor adjective to blockheaded and woodenheaded, both in lexical desuetude, became fixed in American slang on or soon after Sept. 23, 1908, with the New York Giants facing the Chicago Cubs in the game that would ultimately decide which team would win the National League pennant.

In the bottom half of the ninth inning, with the score tied and Giants on first and third, the batter hit a single and the runner from third seemed to score with what should have been the winning run. But 19-year-old Fred Merkle, running from first, didn't bother to touch second. The Cubs' shrewd second baseman, Johnny Evers (remembered as the pivot man in Tinkers-to-Evers-to-Chance double plays), called the umpires' attention to this oversight; the game was ruled a tie and replayed at the end of the season, and the Giants lost. Merkle's innocent blunder became known as "the Great Bonehead Play."

Mixed Race

In a more serious vein, how does Senator Obama identify his personal racial mixture? The golf champion Tiger Woods told Oprah Winfrey that he likes to call himself a "Cablinasian," an amalgam of "Caucasian, black, American Indian and Asian," but perhaps that was jocular. Obama is the son of a white mother from Kansas and a black father from Kenya. The columnist Clarence Page, who is black, notes that the Illinois senator does not run away from the "black" label: "I can tell you a substantial number of black voters are mightily suspicious and even personally offended by black folks who don't want to be called 'black.' " In his recent book, "Audacity of Hope," the senator identifies himself as "a black man of mixed heritage."

Mixed-race is a coinage first spotted by the O.E.D. in The Guardian in 1971, when the British newspaper referred to "a delegation of six mixed-race Rhodesians." That new usage was acceptable to many in South Africa categorized as colored, but that description fell out of favor there as well as in the U.S. as recalling the era of apartheid and segregation. Colored had one sense of "neither all black nor all white" and another sense of a euphemism for Negro. Colored is now taken by many to be offensive, but people of color is embraced proudly. In the U.S., black is now widely acceptable, especially in a second reference to African-Americans. Nonwhite is acceptable to demographers but will likely wither as suggesting that whiteness is the norm. Mixed heritage, Obama's usage following black, suggests ethnicity more than race — like the offspring of British and Russian parents — which is why mixed-race is the compound adjective to keep your eye on.

Media Darling

One way to zap a hitherto little-known person getting a rush of publicity is to afflict him with the bogus title media darling. That's because media, when construed as singular — especially as mass media and mainstream media — connotes to its crowd of critics some manipulative monolith whose control of communication is to be resisted.

DOJ_NMG_0127590

In sports, “the hottest rookie in pro football” in 1983 was, according to The Boston Globe, Dan Marino, “embraced as the universal media darling.” In business, The Times hailed Steve Jobs as “reinventing Apple Computer as a media darling with its popular iPod.” (The Los Angeles Times updated the phrase by calling YouTube “a new-media darling.”) In April 1976, Clifford Terry wrote in The Chicago Tribune about the actress Louise Lasser, whose role in the TV series “Mary Hartman, Mary Hartman” was “becoming a media darling, sort of the Margaux Hemingway of the Crock Pot set.”

A Google search shows about 50,000 matches of the phrase with Barack Obama. One is this headlined prophecy from The Chicago Sun-Times: “Obama’s sticky switch from media-darling to media-hounded.”

Call It The "Andy Amendment" (LAT)

By Richard S. Tedlow

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

ANDY GROVE fled Hungary at the age of 20 in 1956, shortly after Soviet tanks rolled into Budapest to put down any illusion that freedom could flourish behind the Iron Curtain. He made his way to the United States and enrolled at the City College of New York, graduating first in his engineering class in 1960. He then went to UC Berkeley for his PhD in chemical engineering.

Grove's enthusiastic attachment to the U.S. began before he left his native country. There was never any question of his remaining in Europe once he escaped from communism. If ever there were a destination shopper in this life, it was Grove, and he pre-purchased the United States. He became a citizen in 1962, and he managed to extricate his parents from Hungary and bring them here as well.

Like millions of other naturalized Americans starting anew in this meritocratic nation of immigrants, Grove made the most of the opportunity this nation afforded him. In addition to becoming a wealthy man, Grove repaid his adopted nation nearly $200 billion, the increase in Intel's market capitalization during his tenure as chief executive of the microprocessor giant from 1987 to 1998.

Grove is one of three people most responsible, along with Bill Gates and Steve Jobs, for putting computers on our desks. Without Intel's chips, the computer revolution wouldn't have happened, and without Grove, Intel never would have managed the chip revolution as masterfully as it has. It was Grove who made Intel realize that "the PC is it," and it was his combination of managerial and technical expertise that put Intel inside so many PCs around the world.

Thankfully, no one questioned the depth of Grove's "Americanness" before he was entrusted with the responsibility of leading Intel. And no law prevented it.

The Constitution does not prohibit foreign-born individuals from leading a U.S.-based company. But what if it did? What if our Constitution had told Grove: "You can't change the world because you come from Hungary." Sound ridiculous? Of course it does. Imagine what else would have been lost if we faced such constraints in the business world.

What if the Constitution said:

· Pierre Omidyar, you can't found EBay here because you were born in France.

· Sergey Brin, you can't co-found Google here because you were born in Russia.

· Jerry Yang, you can't co-found Yahoo here because you were born in Taiwan.

And what would happen to that most American of industries, soft drinks? The chief executive of PepsiCo, Indra Nooyi, was born in India. The chief executive of Coca-Cola, E. Neville Isdell, was born in Ireland. He follows in the footsteps of Cuban-born Roberto Goizueta.

We are not just talking about entrepreneurs from recent years. Levi Strauss was born in Bavaria. Andrew Carnegie was born in Scotland. U.S. business has flourished in no small part because of the vitality and imagination of individuals among the "huddled masses" assimilated into this country.

It is odd that this freedom to harness the best and the brightest Americans, including immigrants, is a guiding principle at every address in our nation except for one: 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. Because he was born abroad, Grove is prohibited from serving as president, even though he has made significant and enduring contributions to U.S. business and society for decades. Although the Clintons and Bushes are the only dynasties threatening to control our government these days, we cling to an 18th century measure aimed at keeping European monarchs from scheming to control the then-young republic.

A noteworthy example of what the United States gained by its openness in business, but may have sacrificed because of this presidential prohibition, is the case of a man named James Couzens. Couzens was born the son of a grocery store clerk in Chatham, Canada. Some believe that he was the real brains behind the success of the early Ford Motor Co. a century ago. It was the United States' inclusiveness that allowed him to cross the border and play such a vital part in putting the nation on wheels.

DOJ_NMG_0127591

Eventually, sick of Henry Ford's increasing megalomania, Couzens left the company for public service. He became mayor of Detroit in 1919 and represented Michigan in the U.S. Senate soon thereafter. After his death in 1936, Couzens was described by President Franklin D. Roosevelt as "a leader whose convictions were a part of the best [to which] America aspires." But this "Americanness" notwithstanding, Couzens could never become president of the United States because he was born on the wrong side of the border. He knew it and didn't like it, even as a youth.

"I can never become king of England," he said sharply to his parents, "but if I had been born in the United States, I could be president."

The prohibition against naturalized citizens becoming president of the United States is as counterproductive as a similar prohibition on their becoming chief executives of major corporations would be. It is telling that no other governmental position in the country is similarly restricted. The other branches of government all welcome naturalized citizens. Foreign-born U.S. citizens have served with great distinction in the Cabinet, from Alexander Hamilton, President Washington's brilliant and indispensable secretary of the Treasury, who was born in the West Indies, to Prague-born Madeleine Albright, President Clinton's secretary of State.

Is a person who happens to be born on U.S. soil somehow more capable, more trustworthy or more dedicated to upholding the principles of this nation than those born elsewhere? The record of countless naturalized Americans who have been leaders in business, government and other areas of our society says no.

Permitting a naturalized American, whether it be Silicon Valley entrepreneurs such as Grove or governors such as Arnold Schwarzenegger and Canadian-born Jennifer Granholm of Michigan, to become the nation's ultimate chief executive would be an important way to reaffirm that openness. Let's allow voters to pick the best American for the job, wherever he or she was born.

Iran Has Guests In To See, But Not Inspect, Nuclear Site (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

ISFAHAN, Iran, Feb. 3 — Iran opened one of its nuclear sites to a large number of local and international reporters and a delegation of foreign ambassadors on Saturday in an effort to show the transparency of its program before a United Nations Security Council deadline this month.

Delegations from the Non-Aligned Movement, Group of 77 and League of Arab States arrived at the Isfahan Uranium Conversion Facility in central Iran with nearly 100 reporters. The delegation included representatives from the United Nations nuclear agency from Algeria, Cuba, Egypt and Malaysia, though none were official inspectors.

Iran has kept up efforts to give the Isfahan facility more publicity, and a senior tourism official said late last year that Iran planned to open it and other nuclear sites to foreign tourists.

Iran's ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, said Saturday that the purpose of the tour was to assure the world that Iran's program was peaceful.

"In fact we have representatives from all over the world," Mr. Soltanieh said. "We decided to have them come here and see for themselves." He emphasized that surveillance cameras of the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency were in place there.

Photographers and video camera operators were not allowed to take pictures in the outside area of the compound. But the visitors were given special clothes, gloves and masks to protect them from radiation and toured the main facility for nearly an hour.

The Isfahan site is where uranium ore is converted into yellowcake and gas. The gas is then transferred to a more sophisticated facility in Natanz, where it could be enriched with centrifuges.

Reporters on Saturday passed the Natanz enrichment facility but were not permitted to tour the site, where Iran recently said it was installing 3,000 centrifuges. The facility is near the main road, and like Isfahan, it was surrounded by antiaircraft artillery. The Isfahan site also had air-raid bunkers.

Iran insists that its program is for electricity production, but the United States and European countries contend that it is part of an effort that eventually could produce enough highly enriched uranium to make nuclear weapons.

The tour occurred as a United Nations deadline neared this month for Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment program or face tougher economic sanctions. The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 banning the trade of goods and technology related to Iran's nuclear program.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has brushed off the sanctions as insignificant and has vowed to continue with the program.

DOJ_NMG_0127592

Iran Shows Nuclear Facility To Diplomats (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

Iran on Saturday opened the gates to a key uranium conversion facility to visiting diplomats and journalists in an effort to show that its disputed nuclear program is peaceful and not a cover for nuclear bomb making.

The visit to the Isfahan plant in central Iran was the first such tour since Iran resumed uranium conversion in August 2005. The U.N. Security Council slapped economic sanctions on Iran on Dec. 23 over the country's refusal to halt uranium enrichment, which can be used for making weapons.

The visit also came ahead of a U.N. deadline for Iran to stop the enrichment. If Tehran doesn't comply by the end of the 60-day period stipulated by the U.N., the Security Council will consider new measures beyond the economic sanctions.

The United States and several of its Western allies believe that Iran is using the nuclear program to produce an atomic weapon — charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity.

The diplomats visiting the plant came from Sudan, Cuba, Egypt, Malaysia and Algeria. They represented the Arab League and two groups of developing nations known as the Nonaligned Movement and the G-77 — organizations that have asserted the rights of members to pursue national interests unfettered by Western countries.

The plant at Isfahan, 255 miles south of Tehran, is responsible for an early stage of the nuclear fuel cycle, turning yellowcake uranium into uranium hexaflouride gas, or UF-6, the feedstock for enrichment.

International concerns have recently focused more on the facility in Natanz, where uranium can be enriched using cascades of centrifuges. Only highly enriched uranium can be used for bomb-making.

But Iranian officials on Saturday's tour talked only of the program's peaceful purposes, which Iran is determined to pursue.

Ali Ashgar Soltanieh, head of Iran's delegation to the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency — the International Atomic Energy Agency — said the message of the visit was to show "that Iran is determined to continue its peaceful nuclear activities."

"This is an opportunity to see for yourselves what is going on and get first hand information about the activities here," Soltanieh told the diplomats and dozens of reporters.

The visitors saw several areas of the Isfahan facility, including two cameras installed by the IAEA to monitor activity where uranium gas is produced.

Soltanieh said the two cameras, which take photos every two minutes, are in place according to Iran's obligations under the Nonproliferation Treaty.

They are the only cameras at Isfahan. Iran removed others here when it stopped allowing the IAEA to conduct snap inspections, a measure it took after the agency referred it to the Security Council last February. IAEA inspectors visited the Isfahan facility twice in January.

Soltanieh said the tour was "an opportunity to see that the IAEA has full surveillance control over the activities of this facility."

At the end of the tour, Soltanieh told the visitors that all the 250 tons of UF-6 gas which Iran produced in 2006 have been safely stored at Isfahan's underground tunnels, but refused to answer questions about where the tunnels were located in the plant.

Anti-aircraft guns and radar stations surround the facility, much of which is built underground to protect it from airstrikes, which became a concern for Iran after Israel hit Iraq's main reactor in 1981.

On Friday, a top Iranian nuclear official said that U.N. inspectors have set up cameras at Natanz that would allow them to monitor the activity there. Centrifuge hookup is expected to start at Natanz next week.

Diplomats accredited with the IAEA in Vienna, Austria, said that hundreds of technicians and laborers have been "working feverishly" at Natanz over the past few weeks, setting up piping, control panels and electric cables before the centrifuge hookup.

But a U.N. official in Vienna, where the IAEA is based, said that Iran had met only some of the world body's requests for installing monitoring cameras at Natanz's underground site.

Tehran already has cascades of 164 centrifuges installed above ground at Natanz and has announced plans to operate 3,000 centrifuges below ground there, enabling it to speed up production of nuclear fuel.

Iran Gives Visitors Inside Look At Esfahan Nuclear Facility (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127593

ESFAHAN, Iran — The squat, tan buildings with barred windows can be reached only by driving well outside the city to a flat stretch of desert on the edge of the hills. The site is surrounded by an array of antiaircraft artillery emplacements, each with one or two soldiers at the ready, and a large metal fence topped with barbed wire.

Once inside the reception hall, visitors are greeted by a huge poster that reads, "Nuclear Energy Is Our Obvious Right."

Here, in a city considered the heart of its nuclear development program, is where Iran has been taking the initial technological steps to turn ordinary uranium into the makings of nuclear fuel.

In a rare invitation to foreign visitors Saturday, Iranian officials opened the doors of the normally closed facility. The officials reported that the fledgling conversion program, which was in its infancy only three years ago, has now manufactured 250 tons of uranium hexafluoride gas, the feedstock for Iran's controversial uranium enrichment program.

The group included visitors from all over the world, said Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency. "We have decided they would come here to have the opportunity to see themselves what is going on," he said as they walked through the large rooms of tanks, feeder lines, pressure gauges and control panels.

The official delegation of seven included representatives of the Non-Aligned Movement, the G-77 group of developing nations, and the Arab League, all accredited to the IAEA in Vienna. Iranian officials allowed a group of journalists to cover the visit.

"We want to remove these ambiguities and questions from our Arab brothers and sisters in the region. They have to know that everything is transparent and it is for peaceful purposes, and there is no concern as far as safety is concerned," Soltanieh said. "You will notice these facilities are of the highest standard, and a lot of investment has been made in order to prevent any environmental impact."

The uranium conversion facility at Esfahan is only a piece of Iran's nuclear program, which the Islamic Republic says it is pursuing to develop new sources of electrical power and maintain a high level of oil exports.

The next and most controversial step is conducted at an even more secret plant at Natanz to the north, where the feedstock material produced at Esfahan is processed through a series of centrifuges to enrich the uranium for use as fuel for nuclear reactors. Enriching it far more than that, a level beyond Iran's present capability, most experts believe, would be sufficient for use in a nuclear weapon.

The U.S. and some other countries believe that may be the ultimate goal of Iran's nuclear program, but Iran contends that it is opposed to nuclear weapons and would simply withdraw from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty if it wanted to build them.

The United Nations Security Council has adopted a first tier of sanctions against Iran. The measures freeze some assets and bar companies from selling materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear program. The U.S. has warned that it will seek to toughen the sanctions soon if Iran does not halt enrichment activities, and there are growing fears in Tehran that the U.S. or Israel could launch military strikes against Iranian nuclear targets.

The Arab League's representative to the IAEA, Mikhail Wehbe of Syria, warned that military action against Iran's nuclear program would be a mistake.

"These issues should be dealt with with the utmost standard of diplomacy, not with a threat. Because any threat to a nuclear facility, it could be catastrophic," he said.

Saturday's tour was mainly a publicity exercise; the delegates admitted that they understood little of what they were seeing. But it was clearly part of a strong effort on Iran's part to demonstrate its willingness to open up its nuclear program to inspection.

Not all of the uranium conversion facility was on view Saturday. Reporters were not allowed to see the storage chambers, reportedly built in underground tunnels to make them immune from airstrikes, where the hexafluoride gas is stored. That location is monitored by IAEA video cameras, Iranian officials say.

But visitors were allowed into what was described as the most sensitive part of the plant, the room where two IAEA video cameras are trained on the large, white, horizontal capsules in which hexafluoride gas is made from uranium yellowcake.

Soltanieh said the IAEA maintains a strict count on both the intake and outflow of the capsules to ensure none goes missing. The video cameras, he said, are a gesture to build "confidence" and to make sure the capsules are not moved when inspectors are not present.

Soltanieh also said Iran was proceeding with its previously announced schedule to install 3,000 new centrifuges at Natanz, part of an industrial-sized enrichment operation whose debut Iranian officials are expected to announce soon, perhaps as early as the Feb. 11 anniversary of the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

"The bullying forces ... are against Iran's advancement and that of independent nations. However, they should know that the era of their hegemony is over and that Iranians will overcome all obstacles facing them to access the peak of technology," President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Saturday in remarks carried by the Islamic Republic News Agency. "During the current week, great achievements will be introduced to the Iranian nation."

DOJ_NMG_0127594

Iran's Boast On Uranium Enrichment Is Put To Test (NYT)

By William J. Broad, David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

After decades of largely clandestine efforts, Iran is expected to declare in coming days that it has made a huge leap toward industrial-scale production of enriched uranium — a defiant act that the country's leaders will herald as a major technical stride and its neighbors will denounce as a looming threat. But for now, many nuclear experts say, the frenetic activity at the desert enrichment plant in Natanz may be mostly about political showmanship.

The many setbacks and outright failures of Tehran's experimental program suggest that its bluster may outstrip its technical expertise. And the problems help explain American intelligence estimates that Iran is at least four years away from producing a nuclear weapon.

After weeks of limited access inside Iran, inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency have reported that Tehran has succeeded in manufacturing parts for about 3,000 centrifuges, the devices that can spin uranium into reactor fuel — or bomb fuel. In recent days, the Iranians have begun installing the machines and supporting gear in a cavernous plant at Natanz, which would be a potential target if the United States or one of its allies decided that diplomacy would never keep Iran from getting the bomb.

What the Iranians are not talking about, experts with access to the atomic agency's information say, is that their experimental effort to make centrifuges work has struggled to achieve even limited success and appears to have been put on the back burner so the country's leaders can declare that they are moving to the next stage.

To enrich uranium on an industrial scale, the machines must spin at very high speeds for months on end. But the latest report of the atomic agency, issued in November, said the primitive machines of the Iran's pilot plant ran only intermittently, to enrich small amounts of uranium. And the Iranians succeeded in setting up just two of the planned six groupings of 164 centrifuges at the pilot plant.

"It looks political unless they've made progress that we don't know about," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a senior fellow at the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a weapons analysis group in London.

Iran's nuclear boasts come in the midst of an increasingly rancorous chess game between Tehran's mullahs and the Bush administration over the aims of Iran's nuclear programs, its role in Iraq and its ambitions to become the dominant power in the Middle East. The speculation about imminent conflict has grown so strong that President Bush's new secretary of defense, Robert M. Gates, who is intimately familiar with Tehran's nuclear ambitions from his days as director of the Central Intelligence Agency, declared on Friday, "We are not planning for a war with Iran."

Nuclear experts outside the United States government say that if Iran is successful in its latest move and carries out the enrichment, in open defiance of a United Nations demand that it suspend such activity, it could potentially yield fuel for an atom bomb in two or three years, faster than American intelligence has suggested.

Even so, Iran's very public declarations appear to contain large doses of domestic political posturing and outright bluffing.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has become the face of Iranian defiance, is under growing pressure at home because of unemployment and the squeeze of economic sanctions — and President Bush's advisers have said he may view a nuclear standoff with the United States as a way to help his standing. That, combined with evidence of problems at the pilot plant, suggest that the industrial push may be aimed as much at enriching Iran's political leverage as enriching uranium.

The Iranians insist their effort is solely to fuel nuclear reactors, a statement that in the recent words of R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, "no country that has seriously looked at the evidence believes."

At Natanz, where Iranian crews are installing the centrifuges, the desert south of Tehran gives way to barbed wire, antiaircraft guns and a maze of buildings. Two of those buildings are cavernous halls that, together, are roughly half the size of the Pentagon. They are buried deep underground to withstand attack.

The crews are installing pipes, wiring and control panels and are now stringing together the centrifuges into a "cascade" of connected machines, which spin in parallel to achieve enrichment. "They're working on the first cascade," a European diplomat said Friday.

The diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity as protocol, added that international inspectors who had just emerged from Tehran saw parts for 3,000 centrifuges. However, all of them are of the most elementary type, known as a P-1. The "P" stands for Pakistan, a legacy of the fact that Iran obtained the design from Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani rogue nuclear pioneer.

Mr. Ahmadinejad claimed last year that the Iranians were also working on a more sophisticated centrifuge, called the P-2, which would enrich uranium far faster. But inspectors have yet to be shown any of those — leading to speculation in Washington and Vienna about whether Iran has another, hidden facility.

DOJ_NMG_0127595

In the underground halls at Natanz, Iranian officials say, the country plans to expand the number of centrifuges from 3,000 to 54,000 eventually, in theory letting it enrich uranium by the ton and giving it the capability to make many reactor fuel rods or nuclear weapons.

However, Mr. Fitzpatrick, a former State Department official in the field of nuclear nonproliferation, said the industrial push made little sense given Iran's problems, as reported the I.A.E.A., in getting its experimental centrifuges to run smoothly at the pilot plant near the cavernous halls of Natanz.

"From a technical point of view," he said, "it's illogical to stand up 3,000 centrifuges before you know how to do it."

The dimensions of Iran's technical woes are suggested by its delayed schedules. Tehran originally planned to have all six cascades of its experimental plant operating by 2003, and to begin installing centrifuges in the industrial halls in 2005.

Mr. Fitzpatrick added that the industrial push made little strategic sense because the thousands of centrifuges would present a tempting target to an adversary. "You might as well draw a big bull's eye around them," he said of the cavernous halls.

Diplomats say they believe Iran plans to unveil its industrial push on Feb. 11, the anniversary of the Islamic revolution. Yesterday, as part of the anniversary celebrations, Iran took diplomats and journalists on a tour of another nuclear facility, at Isfahan.

Mr. Fitzpatrick said Iran would need this year to install the 3,000 machines at Natanz, next year to get them running smoothly, and 9 to 11 months of spinning to have them produce the fuel for a single bomb. He cautioned, however, that such an accomplishment would require all the machinery working more or less perfectly and the Iranians moving "as quickly as they can."

Iran's enrichment program, begun in 1985, was born in great secrecy and built on centrifuge plans obtained from the black market of Dr. Khan. In 2002, the covert program was exposed when an Iranian opposition group revealed the construction of the plant at Natanz.

At first, inspectors from the international atomic agency in Vienna had wide latitude to travel through Iran in an effort to comprehend the depth and breadth of the enrichment project — and assess its true nature, whether for war or peace. They toured centrifuge factories, found a hidden centrifuge factory behind a false wall in a small electric facility in downtown Tehran and hunted for signs of weapons-grade enrichment. They visited the cavernous hall at Natanz, until recently a huge, empty basement.

By the atomic agency's estimates, Iran could produce upwards of 100 centrifuges a month, and was stockpiling them.

Then, last February, after three years of unusual openness, Iran reacted to the growing pressure from Washington and Europe to suspend its enrichment — or face sanctions — by drastically reducing the access of international inspectors to Natanz and dozens of other atomic sites, programs and personnel.

No longer could the inspectors swab machines, scoop up bits of soil, study invoices, peek behind doors and gather seemingly innocuous clues. No longer would the Iranians let the inspectors investigate the origins of traces of highly enriched uranium or examine important documents from the Khan network. Now, the inspectors are limited to a narrow range of operations, leaving them partially blind.

The Iranians appear to have sped ahead. In interviews, diplomats and nuclear officials said recent inspector reports of rapid centrifuge mobilization and installation at Natanz show that Tehran had worked hard for the past year, even as it engaged in increasingly harsh language that some experts took as a cover for technical failings.

Mohamed ElBaradei, director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, recently suggested that the Iranian strides amounted to something of a bargaining chip that might be traded away to head off a larger confrontation.

The West, he proposed at Davos, Switzerland, on Jan. 26, might suspend its economic sanctions against Iran while Tehran simultaneously suspended its enrichment of uranium. He floated the idea for what he called a "time-out" after saying that Iranian officials had told him they planned to begin installing centrifuges this month at their Natanz industrial-scale plant.

"Enough flexing muscles, enough calling names," Dr. ElBaradei told reporters at the World Economic Forum conference. "It's time to engage."

Ex-U.S. Military Leaders Urge Iran Talks (AP)

By Jill Lawless, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

Three former high-ranking U.S. military officers have called for Britain to help defuse the crisis over Iran's nuclear program, saying military action against Tehran would be a disaster for the region.

In a letter to the Sunday Times newspaper, the three former officers urged President Bush to open talks "without preconditions" with the Iranian government to find a diplomatic solution.

DOJ_NMG_0127596

The signatories were retired Lt. Gen. Robert G. Gard, a senior military fellow at the Center for Arms Control and Nonproliferation in Washington; retired Marine Gen. Joseph P. Hoar, former head of U.S. Central Command; and Vice Admiral Jack Shanahan, former director of the Center for Defense Information.

They said Britain "has a vital role to play in securing a renewed diplomatic push" and urged Prime Minister Tony Blair to make it clear he would oppose any military attack on Iran.

The officers said an attack "would have disastrous consequences for security in the region, coalition forces in Iraq and would further exacerbate regional and global tensions."

"The current crisis must be resolved through diplomacy," they said.

The United States and several of its Western allies believe Iran is using its nuclear program as a cover to produce a nuclear weapon — charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity. Last week, a respected think tank, the International Institute for Strategic Studies, said Iran was likely two to three years from having the capacity to build a nuclear weapon.

The U.N. Security Council imposed economic sanctions on Iran last month for refusing to halt uranium enrichment, which can be used both for nuclear reactors and to make atomic weapons. The council said it would consider new measures if Iran's defiance continues.

The U.S. government has refused to rule out military action if Iran does not scale back its nuclear activities, and has beefed up the U.S. military presence in the Gulf. Bush also has vowed more aggressive moves against Iranian operatives in Iraq, where the United States accuses Iran of training and arming insurgents who attack U.S. troops.

In a separate letter, Muslim, Jewish and Christian leaders in Britain called for a peaceful resolution to the crisis with Iran.

There is "no justification in international law for attacking Iran militarily and the use of force is not an option at this juncture," said the letter to The Independent on Sunday newspaper, signed by Rabbi Tony Bayfield, head of reform Judaism in Britain; Lord Harries, the former Anglican Bishop of Oxford; and Imam Abduljalil Sajid of the Brighton Islamic Mission.

What To Ask Before The Next War (WP)

By Paul R. Pillar

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

Imagine that the famously flawed intelligence judgments about Iraq's programs to develop unconventional weapons had been correct. What difference would that have made to the American effort in Iraq?

The Bush administration would have had fewer rhetorical difficulties in defending its decision to go to war, even though any discoveries of weapons programs would have confirmed nothing about the use to which Saddam Hussein might someday have put such weapons or whether Iraq would eventually have acquired nuclear weapons.

But the war itself would be the same agonizing ordeal. An insurgency driven by motives having nothing to do with weapons of mass destruction and little to do with Hussein would still be going on.

Iraq's sectarian divisions and intolerant political culture would still have pushed it into civil war. Iraq would still have become the latest and biggest jihad, winning recruits and donors for al-Qaeda and boosting the militant Islamic movement worldwide. And the United States would still be suffering the same drain of blood and treasure in Iraq and most of the same damage to its global standing and relationships.

This thought experiment highlights how problems with the policy process (or, rather, the lack of a process) that led the United States into the Iraq quagmire went beyond the administration's manipulation of intelligence on weapons programs and terrorist relationships. The administration so successfully shaped the policy question around its chosen selling points involving these two issues that what passed for a national debate gave little attention to important questions about the likely nature and consequences of a war. The debate was largely reduced to contemplating the terms of a pseudo-syllogism: Hussein has weapons of mass destruction; Hussein supports terrorism; therefore, we must use force to remove Hussein.

Now, an accelerating debate about Iran and its nuclear program shows signs of the same dangerous reductionism. Some argue for an airstrike against Iranian nuclear facilities sooner rather than later. Whether the Bush administration will act on such advice in the next two years is uncertain, but it is taking confrontational steps, including augmenting forces in the Persian Gulf and raiding an Iranian consulate, that increase the chance of heightened tension escalating into a military clash.

A long argument over many barely addressed issues would be needed to get from a belief that Iran is seeking nuclear weapons to a conclusion that a military strike, or even policies that increase the risk of U.S.-Iranian hostilities, is advisable. One issue is the uncertainty of the intelligence about Iran's nuclear program, although this is getting some discussion thanks to the recriminations about the intelligence on Iraq.

Other questions that need answering include:

DOJ_NMG_0127597

What would be the urgency of taking forceful action, given that the announced estimate is that Iran is still several years from acquiring a nuclear weapon?

How malleable (and how well-defined) are Tehran's intentions, and what changes in Washington's policy might lead Tehran to abandon a weapons program? Even if Tehran's intentions do not change, what other options would impede or slow its nuclear program? If Iran were to acquire nuclear weapons, how would that change its behavior and affect U.S. interests? In particular, why would deterrence, which has kept nuclear peace with other adversaries, not work with Iran?

The likely hardening, concealment and dispersal of Iran's nuclear facilities raise questions about the impact any military strike would have on the program. How much would Iran's nuclear efforts be set back, especially given that bombs are not very good at destroying knowledge and expertise? Would the Iranian response be appreciably different from that of Iraq after Israel bombed its nuclear reactor in 1981 (Iraq redoubled its nuclear efforts while turning to different methods for producing fissile material)?

The most neglected questions concern other consequences of a U.S. strike or any other U.S.-Iranian combat, even if such combat did not lead to a prolonged occupation. How would Tehran respond to an act of war? What terrorism might it launch against the United States? How would it exploit U.S. vulnerabilities next door in Iraq, where it has barely begun to exploit the influence it has assiduously been cultivating? What other military action might it take, with the risk of a wider war in the Persian Gulf?

Other effects concern Iranian politics. How much would the direct assertion of U.S. hostility strengthen Iranian hard-liners, whose policies are partly premised on such hostility? How much would it add to all Iranians' list of historical grievances against the United States and adversely affect relations with future governments?

Broader regional and global ramifications include the impact on the oil market, whether other Middle Eastern nations would be less willing to cooperate with the United States and the prospect of exacerbating the damage the Iraq war already has dealt to U.S. standing worldwide.

Some might argue that the worst case that could ensue from an Iranian nuclear weapon is so bad that it trumps all other considerations. But there is no more reason than there was with Iraq to consider the worst case of only one side of the policy equation. And the worst case that could result from U.S.-Iranian combat is plenty frightening: thousands of Americans dead from retaliatory terrorist attacks, a broader war in the Persian Gulf, $150-per-barrel oil, a global recession and more.

That's not the most likely case -- neither is a vision of Iranian-generated mushroom clouds -- but it is plausible that substantial portions of that scenario would materialize.

Avoiding the next military folly in the Middle East requires that the agenda for analysis and debate not be so severely and tendentiously truncated as before Iraq. Not only must proponents of military action not be allowed to manipulate the answers, they also should not be allowed to define the questions.

The writer, a former national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia, teaches security studies at Georgetown University.

Report: N.Korea Considering Concessions (AP)

By Jae-soon Chang, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

North Korea is ready to freeze a key nuclear facility and allow international inspectors limited access to the country in exchange for millions of barrels of oil and an easing of U.S. financial restrictions, a Japanese news report said Sunday.

The report came one day after the main U.S. negotiator on North Korea said he believed the next round of six-nation disarmament talks with the communist state starting Thursday in Beijing could produce real progress.

The Japanese daily Asahi Shimbun reported Pyongyang will also demand at the Beijing talks that it be removed from Washington's list of state sponsors of terrorism.

The report quoted former U.S. State Department official Joel Wit, who met the North's chief nuclear negotiator, Kim Kye-gwan, and other regime officials during a visit to Pyongyang last week. It said the North was demanding half a million tons of oil a year — the equivalent of about 3.5 million barrels — in energy aid.

Hopes for progress at the upcoming talks are high amid indications that Washington and Pyongyang recently narrowed differences over a key financial dispute that has hindered negotiations.

Earlier this week, the two sides held bilateral talks on that issue in Beijing. The meetings ended inconclusively, but officials indicated that enough goodwill was generated to prevent the issue from disrupting the nuclear negotiations.

"From all accounts, it was a very useful couple of days' discussions," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Saturday upon arriving in Seoul to coordinate strategies for the coming talks. "Let's see how some of these useful substantive conversations we had can be put to use" in the nuclear talks.

DOJ_NMG_0127598

"I think we do have some reason to believe we can make some progress," Hill said.

The Japanese newspaper report said North Korean officials told Wit they were prepared to close the reactor in its main nuclear complex in Yongbyon and accept inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear watchdog.

But they said the reactor itself would remain off-limits and the North would not close the site used for its October nuclear weapons test, or allow inspections there. They also reportedly told the former U.S. official the North was not prepared to reveal details of its nuclear weapons program.

In return for its concessions, Pyongyang plans to demand oil in compensation for an aborted project to build two light-water reactors in the country, according to the report.

The North will also demand that Washington take steps to lift financial sanctions against North Korean assets, imposed over the regime's alleged counterfeiting of U.S. dollar bills and money laundering activities.

Hill said progress in the upcoming talks means beginning to implement a 2005 accord, in which North Korea pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

The negotiations, involving China, Japan, the two Koreas, Russia and the U.S., have made little headway since the 2005 accord — the only ever reached in the process.

Progress stalled soon afterward because of Pyongyang's objection to the U.S. financial restrictions.

At the latest round of disarmament talks in December — the first after the North's October nuclear test — Pyongyang refused to address disarmament issues and demanded the U.S. lift financial restrictions first. The North claims the measures show Washington's hostile attitude and illustrate its need for a nuclear deterrent.

On Road To Kosovo Independence, A Warning: Go Slow (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

MITROVICA, Kosovo, Jan. 29 — Thuggish Serbian "bridge watchers" still maintain their vigil on the north side of the Ibar River here, ready to punish any ethnic Albanian who dares to cross the unofficial boundary between Serbian and ethnic Albanian territory in Europe's unfinished war.

Kosovo, still officially a province of Serbia, is bitterly divided between Serbian enclaves, including a large chunk of the north, and the rest of the territory, which is overwhelmingly ethnic Albanian. Now, as the United Nations nudges Kosovo toward what it calls "final status" and Belgrade calls independence, many of northern Kosovo's Serbs are threatening to break away.

"Northern Kosovo will secede," warned Oliver Ivanovic, a moderate Serbian politician here. Mr. Ivanovic says he has been warning the United Nations, NATO, the European Union and the United States that, nearly eight years after a NATO bombing campaign drove the Serbian Army and other security forces out of Kosovo, it is still too early to settle the status of the disputed territory. "Kosovo's independence will leave no space for the moderates to act."

Secession by northern Serbs could provoke Albanian reprisals against Serbian enclaves elsewhere in Kosovo, warn Serbs and Albanians alike, and could destabilize a still fragile region full of ethnic slivers separated from their homelands.

Kosovo, which is more than 90 percent ethnic Albanian, has struggled since the early 20th century to free itself from the dominance of Belgrade. With the breakup of Yugoslavia in the early 1990s the fight began anew, but Serbia resisted fiercely.

The war was marked by atrocities on both sides and a horrific cycle of "ethnic cleansing," as the formerly mixed Serbian and ethnic Albanian populations pulled apart. Nearly 10,000 ethnic Albanians died as well as many Serbs. Thousands more, mostly ethnic Albanians, remain missing.

It ended with NATO's intervention in 1999, and the province has been administered by the United Nations ever since.

[A United Nations mediator, Martti Ahtisaari, presented his proposals for Kosovo's final status to officials in Belgrade and Pristina on Friday, but the two sides remained far apart. The Serbian president, Boris Tadic, immediately rejected the plans as a prelude to independence while Kosovo Albanians — who with the United States' blessing have said they will accept nothing less than independence — welcomed them. The continued standoff suggested that the intended end may instead be a prologue to another difficult chapter in a troubled history.]

Most of the Kosovo Serbs insist that they will never accept an independent Kosovo. Even if the government in Pristina does hoist a new national flag, they say, they will fight to recover the province that Serbs still consider their cultural heartland — the cradle and, in 1389 at the hand of the Turks, the grave of their great medieval empire.

"It would create a situation like Iraq or Lebanon here in Serbia," said Milan Ivanovic, a doctor at Mitrovica's hospital and head of Kosovo's hard-line Serbian National Council (no relation to Oliver Ivanovic). He cited the Christian reconquest of Moorish Spain and France's eventual recovery of the Alsace-Lorraine region from Germany as models. "We would fight to get Kosovo back with all legitimate means."

DOJ_NMG_0127599

Kosovo Albanians and their international supporters hope that a high degree of autonomy in Serbian areas with guarantees for the protection of Serbian rights and strict international oversight will eventually persuade Serbs in the territory to accept an Albanian-led government in Pristina.

"Hopefully, with independence, a local Serb leadership will emerge to address the needs of the Serbs within the Kosovo system," said Muhamet Hamiti, an adviser to Kosovo's president, Fatmir Sejdiu.

Some moderate Serbian politicians are already willing to work within a Kosovo national system, even if their political support in the Serbian community is small.

But Serbian enclaves, particularly northern Kosovo, still operate under Serbian national authority and draw most of their financial support from Belgrade, raising questions about how Pristina could enforce sovereignty over Kosovo Serbs without coercive actions that would risk provoking more violence.

Nowhere is the divide as clear as in the region around this northern city. A United Nations-financed train that links the rest of Kosovo's Serb enclaves with the north carries Serbs and Albanians alike until it reaches the Mitrovica station south of the river. There, even the Albanian conductor gets off. Only Serbs ride on for another 15 minutes across an iron railroad bridge to the end of the line.

"I'm not brave enough to go up there," the conductor said, watching the train pull away. "I survived the war. I don't need another challenge."

Cars carry Serbian license plates and the economy still operates on the Serbian dinar even though the Albanian areas of this long-disputed territory, now administered by the United Nations, long ago converted to the euro. Serbia's Ministry of Education in Belgrade has even set up what it calls the "University of Pristina, Temporarily Located in Mitrovica."

"How can they force us to accept independence?" asked Dr. Ivanovic, the Serbian politician, who like many people working for Serbian institutions in Kosovo's Serbian enclaves is paid an above average salary by Belgrade as a reward for his loyalty.

While many people see fixing Kosovo's eventual independence as the last chapter of Yugoslav disintegration, Serbs see it as the dismemberment of their homeland.

The province, ringed by snowy mountains and populated with great colonies of inky rooks that gave it its name (kos means blackbird in Serbian), is home to the Serbian Orthodox Church's most sacred sites.

"This is the spiritual center of the Serbian Church," said Sister Dobrila, a nun at the monastery of the Patriarchate of Pec, which was built around a richly frescoed Byzantine church from the 13th century that holds the tombs of Serbia's medieval archbishops.

She noted that western Kosovo, the site of the monastery, is called Metohija in Serbian, which means "church land." "It's sacred territory," she said.

Even the birds, which swarm over Pristina to settle in its trees at night, are woven into the nationalist myth. According to Serbian folklore, the birds are the souls of the dead from the 14th century battle of Kosovo, in which a Serbian-led Christian army sought to stop the Ottoman advance — an advance whose legacy is the nominally Muslim Albanian majority in the province today.

The common analogy given to Americans, imperfect but pertinent in the emotions it stirs, is the notion of secession by Florida or New Mexico, if the Spanish-speaking populations in those states became a majority. The analogy is imperfect because few Americans, most of whom are already long separated from their cultural roots, have as deep an emotional connection to place as many Europeans have.

That is why Europe, understanding the violence of such emotions, is not united behind the United Nations plan. Countries facing their own secessionist movements — Spain with the Basques, Romania with ethnic Hungarians, and Russia with Chechens and peoples of other rebellious territories — are skeptical of what they see as an American effort to jam a solution into place so Washington can turn its attention elsewhere.

"A forced solution is not a solution," said Marko Jaksic, head of the Democratic Party of Serbia and widely regarded as the most powerful politician in Mitrovica.

Palestinians Slam Major Powers Over Aid Boycott (AFP)

AFP, February 4, 2007

GAZA CITY - The rival Hamas and Fatah factions have both condemned the failure of the major powers involved in Middle East peacemaking to end a punishing Western aid embargo on the Palestinians.

"These decisions mean more suffering for our people. Continuing the siege is to continue the pain and injury we suffer from throughout the year," Palestinian prime minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas said from his home in Gaza City's Al Shati refugee camp.

DOJ_NMG_0127600

The so-called Mideast Quartet -- the United States, Russia, the European Union and United Nations -- met in Washington on Friday in a bid to revive efforts to achieve an Arab-Israeli peace deal and establish a Palestinian state.

But the Quartet stopped short of resuming aid dollars to the cash-strapped authority, as Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas had expected, an aide said.

"We were expecting that the Quartet would take a decision to lift the oppressive siege on the Palestinian people to stop the suffering and create a atmosphere suitable to reviving the peace process," Abbas adviser Nabil Abu Rudeina told AFP.

The aid boycott was slapped on the Palestinian Authority last March when Hamas took power after roundly beating the previously dominant Fatah in January legislative elections.

Considered a terrorist organization by the West, Hamas has steadfastly refused to recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by past peace accords -- conditions laid down by the Quartet if the flow of aid to the Hamas-led government is to resume.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice hosted the Washington meeting on a day when 25 people were killed in factional clashes in the Gaza Strip between forces loyal to the Western-backed Abbas and those of the radical Hamas.

The fighting, the worst yet in a year-long power struggle between Abbas's secular Fatah party and the Islamists, continued on Saturday after a ceasefire agreed late on Friday quickly collapsed.

In a final communique read out by UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon on Friday, the Quartet expressed its "deep concern" over the factional fighting and called for an end to continuing Palestinian militant attacks on Israel.

Palestinians "Nearer" Power Deal (BBC)

BBC.com, February 4, 2007

Rival Palestinian factions Hamas and Fatah have made progress towards agreeing a government of national unity, Egypt's president has said.

Hosni Mubarak's comments came as fighting between members of the two groups continued in the Gaza Strip. At least one man was killed.

More than 20 people have been killed and 100 wounded in recent days.

The factions have repeatedly agreed to ceasefires, aimed at ending a bitter power struggle.

Palestinian Interior Minister Saeed Seyam said on Saturday that he and Rashid Abu Shbak of Fatah agreed "an immediate ceasefire, removing gunmen from the streets and rooftops of buildings and removing all the checkpoints".

However the BBC's Alan Johnston in Gaza said a very similar plan was declared on Friday but failed to halt the violence.

A Fatah security official was shot dead in fighting near the faction's Gaza headquarters.

'Coherent strategy'

President Mubarak, speaking at a joint news conference with visiting German Chancellor Angela Merkel, said he was working to "seal the crack" between the two sides.

Gaza viewpoint

Factions locked in struggle

"What is happening now is a problem between the Palestinians themselves, and it is impossible for the Palestinian side to sit with the Israelis, as they are still not agreeing with each other," he said.

Ms Merkel, who also heads Germany's presidency of the European Union, praised Egypt's efforts to broker a deal between the two factions.

She also said she hoped the Middle East quartet of the US, UN, EU and Russia would develop a coherent strategy for peace rather than working in isolation towards peace in the region.

Bloodshed

Earlier Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas and Fatah leaders appealed for calm.

The calls followed hours of violence which shattered the truce declared on Friday.

There were fierce exchanges of machine gun and heavier fire in the central area around the Islamic University, a Hamas stronghold.

University workers ran for cover as Hamas and Fatah gunmen traded fire from the rooftops of nearby buildings, the Associated Press news agency reported.

About 60 people have been killed since 25 January, in the deadliest factional unrest in recent months in Gaza.

Reports say Palestinian Authority President and Fatah chief Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas political chief Khaled Meshaal will meet in Saudi Arabia next Tuesday to try to end the fighting.

This would be a second meeting for the two leaders after a summit in Damascus on 21 January ended without a breakthrough.

Hamas and Fatah have been trying to form a unity government for months.

DOJ_NMG_0127601

They are deadlocked over Hamas' rejection of international calls for it to recognise Israel.

Western donors have been withholding direct aid, resulting in a deep economic crisis in the Palestinian territories.

Hamas Fighters Appear To Tighten Hold In Gaza (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 3 — Forces loyal to Hamas appeared to consolidate their hold on northern Gaza and much of Gaza City on Saturday, with at least 12 more people wounded in continuing clashes between Palestinian factions, residents and doctors said.

What has been some of the worst internal Palestinian fighting in years ebbed overnight after the warring factions, Hamas and Fatah, met to try to arrange a cease-fire. But gun battles raged into Saturday, and masked men continued to hold positions and operate checkpoints throughout Gaza City.

Hamas forces appear to be in control of northern Gaza, bordering Israel, down through most of Gaza City, with Fatah forces concentrated around the government and security compounds of the Remal neighborhood, surrounding the main security headquarters, Saraya, and the presidential compound of Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, who is not in Gaza.

Hamas fighters at checkpoints were stopping all cars to look for Fatah members or members of the security forces, said Tawfiq Abu Khoussa, a Fatah leader in Gaza City. He demanded that "Hamas remove all the checkpoints throughout the Gaza Strip but mainly in Gaza City."

Detentions or kidnappings of fighters were reported, with Fatah accusing Hamas of detaining as many as 40 of its members or security officials at roadblocks. Hamas forces have also been overrunning and sometimes destroying headquarters of the Fatah-dominated Preventive Security forces in northern Gaza.

Few people ventured from their homes, and many stayed away from windows. On Friday, Wasi Kurdish, 20, was killed as he watched television when a bullet came through a window and hit him in the chest.

Ghada Abu Daoud, who works for the Gaza office of a Persian Gulf emirate, said: "Hamas is in control of the streets of Gaza City. It's Hamas that seems to initiate every raid, and the number of Fatah wounded seems higher."

Ms. Daoud said in a telephone interview that she ventured out on Saturday morning in a car, but that masked men stopped her at a checkpoint and strongly suggested that she return home. "Everyone is wearing black," she said. "But the Qassam Brigades seem stronger than anyone." The Qassam Brigades are the military wing of Hamas, which also dominates a separate, parallel police force known as the Executive Force.

Dr. Jumaa al-Saqqa, a surgeon and spokesman for Al Shifa hospital, Gaza's largest, said Hamas forces had taken over the hospital and were using it as a protected firing position. "We're extremely depressed," he said by telephone. "I'm afraid to walk to my office in the hospital. Even in my apartment I'm afraid of a bullet coming through the window."

Dr. Saqqa said that blood supplies were low, and that given the street fighting and what he called the "shame" of the internal fighting, few Gazans were going out to give blood. "People aren't willing to give blood for this internal fighting," he said.

Abed Salaam Shihada, a Gazan documentary maker, said: "One prisoner is punishing another. But Hamas feels itself under real threat; it's defending itself."

Mr. Shihada suggested that with the international boycott on Hamas and the increased pressure from the United States, including the prospect of $86.4 million in aid and training to Fatah forces loyal to Mr. Abbas, Hamas was asserting its presence in Gaza. "For them it's a battle for existence," he said.

Hamas sharply criticized the meeting of major countries involved in Middle East diplomacy on Friday in Washington. At the meeting, the so-called quartet — the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — expressed concern about the violence and pressed for a meeting soon of Mr. Abbas, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to find a clearer "political horizon" toward peace. But the group insisted that it would not deal with Hamas until it recognized Israel, forswore violence and accepted previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

Ahmed Youssef, an adviser to the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya, who is a member of Hamas, said the meeting produced nothing positive. He criticized Germany, as the current head of the European Union, for failing to end the boycott of Hamas.

A small protest against the internal bloodletting was called Saturday in Unknown Soldiers Square in Gaza City, near the parliament building, but few Gazans felt safe to venture out to join it, residents said. Scores had come in previous days, but only 20 or so on Saturday.

The United Nations issued a statement on Saturday deploring the violence on behalf of the many agencies that work in Gaza to provide food, education and medical care to refugees and others. With their own workers at risk and often unable to travel safely, the agencies said: "It is becoming extremely difficult for us to fulfill our humanitarian mandates to alleviate the suffering of the Palestinian people. The implications of this for a population already facing extreme hardship are grave."

DOJ_NMG_0127602

United Nations schools did not reopen Saturday after a vacation, leaving more than 200,000 students at home.

Mr. Abbas and the exiled leader of Hamas's political bureau, Khaled Meshal, are to meet Tuesday in Mecca at the invitation of King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia to continue talks on a unity government. Mr. Meshal, based in Damascus, is considered to have control over Hamas's military wing, which appears to ignore the authority of the Hamas-led Palestinian government and of Prime Minister Haniya.

Mr. Haniya and other noted Hamas leaders have been silent and apparently underground during these days of fighting, while many senior Fatah leaders left Gaza to go to the West Bank, taking their families.

Arab countries are embarrassed and angry about the fighting. The Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said Saturday that the infighting had harmed the Palestinian cause. "This appeared clearly in the results of the quartet meeting yesterday and its statement that questioned the ability of the Palestinian people to rule themselves," he said.

At least 17 people, mostly fighters, were killed Friday, and 6 on Thursday. More than 200 people have been wounded, and neighboring universities, Hamas's Islamic University and Fatah's Al Azhar University, were both attacked and damaged by fire.

The latest clash between Hamas and Fatah, breaking yet another cease-fire, began when Hamas forces attacked a convoy of trucks from Egypt. Hamas said the trucks were full of weapons and military equipment.

A spokesman for the Executive Force, Islam Shahwan, said Saturday that the containers included Kalashnikov rifles, ammunition, flak jackets and helmets intended for Fatah forces in Gaza. Fatah spokesmen say the trucks contained tents and medical equipment, and Hamas has provided no evidence that the trucks were full of weapons.

Fatah also said that caches of weapons were at the Islamic University, and that it had captured some Iranian weapons experts there. But there has been nothing to back up those charges and no release of documentary evidence, and most experts regard the Iranian charge, in particular, as Fatah propaganda.

Factional Clashes Shoot Holes In Palestinian Truce (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

JERUSALEM — Gunmen from rival Palestinian factions battled sporadically in the Gaza Strip on Saturday despite a tentative cease-fire.

The skirmishes between the ruling Hamas movement and its rival, Fatah, were not as sustained or heavy as those of the previous two days, which left 23 people dead and scores injured. Still, at least one person was killed and at least 10 were wounded Saturday.

By evening, representatives of the two groups agreed to restore the cease-fire, which began to unravel nearly as soon as it was announced Friday.

Under terms announced late Saturday by Interior Minister Said Siyam of Hamas, the groups agreed to withdraw their forces, dismantle impromptu checkpoints and leave the streets in the hands of police. But there was no immediate sign of a pullback.

For much of the day, gunmen were virtually the only people on the streets of Gaza City and areas to the north.

Shooting broke out early Saturday near a base used by security forces loyal to Fatah and around the compound of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who leads Fatah.

Meanwhile, Fatah forces occupied two ministries of the Hamas-led government, Agriculture and Communications. Hamas said the gunmen destroyed furniture and stole computer equipment.

Although the fighting had tapered off, the air in Gaza City was of a place besieged. Masked gunmen manned makeshift checkpoints to look for their rivals. Businesses, universities and most schools were shuttered, leaving more than 200,000 children without classes.

The United Nations called Saturday for an end to the violence, saying it was endangering aid workers and hindering the ability of humanitarian agencies to provide assistance.

Previous cease-fire deals have fallen apart, and there was no immediate sign that the new agreement would hold. The violent power struggle began after Hamas toppled the long-dominant Fatah in parliamentary elections in January 2006.

Both sides have heavily armed militias.

Most of the 70,000 members of the security forces are at least nominally loyal to Fatah. Hamas has thousands of its own armed militants and commands a new police agency, called the Executive Force, numbering about 6,000 men.

DOJ_NMG_0127603

Repeated efforts to negotiate a power-sharing deal have failed. Abbas is to travel to Saudi Arabia this week for talks with Khaled Meshaal, the exiled Hamas political leader who is based in Syria. The two men met in Damascus last month but didn't bridge their differences.

Abbas has tried to persuade Hamas to agree to a shared political program that would meet Western demands to recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by past Israeli-Palestinian agreements. Western nations cut off most aid to the Palestinian Authority after the election last year because they consider Hamas a terrorist group.

Hamas, Fatah Ignore Truce Deal In Gaza (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 4, 2007

Fatah and Hamas clashed at Cabinet ministries, universities and security headquarters Saturday in defiance of a truce that was to have calmed the seething Gaza Strip.

The cease-fire agreement was announced late Friday on the deadliest single day of battles between the two sides, who have been fighting for control of the Palestinian government since the Islamic militant Hamas ousted Fatah from power in last year's elections.

Palestinian officials said the deal was approved by Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah and Hamas' supreme leader, Khaled Mashaal. But the cease-fire — the second announced this week — showed no signs of taking hold.

Gunbattles raged across Gaza after the truce was announced, continuing through the night and early Saturday. With no casualties reported overnight, some Gazans, who had spent the previous two days huddled at home for safety, were emboldened to leave their houses to go to work.

But 12 people had been wounded by late morning, hospital officials said, and Fatah said Hamas had kidnapped 40 of its security officials at roadblocks. Hamas reported one of its followers had been kidnapped.

Factional kidnappings have become a routine part of the Gaza landscape, but so far abducted men have been released quickly and unharmed.

In Gaza City, the coastal strip's largest town, Fatah gunmen stormed the Agriculture Ministry, ransacking offices and stealing computers, servers and official documents, said Agriculture Minister Mohammed al-Agha.

Fatah-affiliated security officials said nothing was stolen or destroyed, and denied al-Agha's assertion that gunmen opened fire from the building's rooftops.

Officials at the Hamas-run Communications and Postal Ministry said Fatah gunmen fired two rocket-propelled grenades at the building. Gunbattles also erupted around the Interior Ministry, which Hamas controls, and the Fatah-dominated National Security headquarters.

Universities also continued to be the site of clashes. Armed men at Islamic University, a Hamas stronghold, traded fire with Fatah fighters who took up position on the rooftop of nearby al-Azhar University and surrounding buildings. In southern Gaza, gunmen stormed the Fatah-affiliated Al-Quds University campus in the town of Rafah, torching the student council building, university officials said.

Gunmen in Gaza City stopped cars and searched them for rivals.

Even before the gunfire intensified, the streets of Gaza City had been almost empty. And the U.N. said it would not reopen its schools in Gaza on Saturday after a midyear recess, as scheduled, because of the fighting — a decision that kept nearly 200,000 students at home.

More than 100 Palestinians have been killed in internal violence since Hamas, which rejects Israel's right to exist, won parliamentary elections a year ago and wrested power from Fatah, which advocates peacemaking with the Jewish state.

On Friday alone, the day's death toll reached 17, including four children, and more than 200 people were wounded. Casualties were so high that hospitals ran out of ambulances to transport the dead and wounded, and blood supplies were running low.

In Washington, the so-called Quartet of Mideast negotiators met on Friday to explore ways to jump-start peacemaking between Israel and Abbas despite the latest round of Palestinian factional violence.

"There's simply no reason to avoid the subject of how we get to a Palestinian state," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said after meeting with foreign ministers from the European Union, United Nations and Russia.

Pressure Grows For Blair To Depart Office Early (WT)

By Toby Helm, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0127604

LONDON -- The first cracks in Cabinet support for Prime Minister Tony Blair have emerged, with senior ministers questioning whether he can remain in office for another five months without inflicting lasting damage on the Labor Party.

Mr. Blair's defiant declaration Friday that he would not be hounded from office by a scandal over sales of knighthoods and other honors failed to stem growing pressure for him to quit before the midterm May elections.

Senior Labor members of Parliament have reported a collapse of morale within the party. The Daily Telegraph learned that at least three Cabinet ministers have been discreetly canvassing them about whether Mr. Blair should stay in office.

There are also reports that some senior Labor lawmakers are "actively encouraging" Cabinet ministers to wield the political dagger and allow Labor a fresh start under Gordon Brown.

Some wanted members of the Cabinet to urge Mr. Blair to quit "sooner rather than later," Channel 4 News reported.

A poll released yesterday indicated that more than half of British voters believe Mr. Blair should leave office immediately.

The survey of 1,014 adults by ICM for the center-right Sunday Express newspaper suggested 56 percent of the public want Mr. Blair to quit now, while 37 percent back him to stay on.

Mr. Blair says he plans to step down this summer.

Some lawmakers said they thought the only way to dislodge Mr. Blair would be for the Cabinet to persuade him to go voluntarily and put the party's interests before the desire to pass his 10th anniversary in office on May 2.

In an interview with the Daily Telegraph, David Cameron, leader of the opposition Conservative Party, said the Blair government was now "dysfunctional" and in a state of "paralysis."

"It seems to me it's got to that point where everyone in Parliament, everyone in government, everyone in the press, everyone in the country is thinking, 'Hello? It's over,' " he said.

The Conservative leader said that Mr. Blair was "losing it" and a "tipping point" had been reached.

In a highly charged interview on BBC Radio 4's Today program Friday, Mr. Blair dismissed suggestions that he was distracted from his work by the cash-for-honors inquiry after it emerged that he had been questioned by police for a second time last week.

He refused to bring forward his plans to leave office, saying: "You will have to put up with me for a bit longer."

But he appeared to acknowledge the damage the police inquiry was doing to his reputation, saying he was not going to "beg for my character in front of anyone."

Menzies Campbell, the Liberal Democrat party leader, said he detected "resignation" in Mr. Blair's voice.

Several other lawmakers said it was a low-key performance that reflected Mr. Blair's disappointment that his premiership is drawing to an end under a cloud.

Environment Secretary David Miliband pleaded for Mr. Blair to be allowed to carry on, saying there was a British tradition "that you are innocent until proven guilty."

But other Cabinet ministers are distancing themselves from Mr Blair.

Hazel Blears, the Labor Party chairman and minister without portfolio, acknowledged that the lengthy police investigation was creating "corrosive cynicism" that was damaging for the country.

Britons Strive To Contain Bird Flu (WT)

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

HOLTON, England -- Britain scrambled to contain its first outbreak of the highly pathogenic H5N1 strain of bird flu in domestic poultry yesterday after the virus was found at a farm run by Europe's biggest turkey producer.

About 2,500 turkeys have died since Thursday at the Bernard Matthews farm near Lowestoft in eastern England. The Department for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (DEFRA) said all 159,000 turkeys on the farm would be culled.

"We're in new territory," National Farmers' Union Poultry Board Chairman Charles Bourns said. "We've every confidence in DEFRA, but until we know how this disease arrived, this is a very apprehensive time for all poultry farmers."

The virus strain was identified as the highly pathogenic Asian strain, similar to a virus found in Hungary in January, DEFRA said.

It was the first time the deadly H5N1 strain was found on a British farm.

The outbreak mirrored a similar case in which hundreds of turkeys died at a farm in eastern France almost a year ago.

That outbreak was contained and there followed a lull in cases of H5N1 in European poultry until last month, when thousands of birds were culled after an outbreak among geese on a farm in Hungary.

Also yesterday, the World Heath Organization confirmed Nigeria's first human death from the strain. Nigerian health officials on Wednesday said several people had apparently contracted the virus, including a young woman who later died.

The strain tends to be transmitted to poultry by infected migrating wildfowl.

DOJ_NMG_0127605

The disease has killed at least 164 persons worldwide since 2003, most of them in Asia, and more than 200 million birds have died from it, or been killed to prevent its spread.

But it has not yet fulfilled scientists' worst fears by mutating into a form that can be easily transmitted between humans and possibly cause a global pandemic.

Avian-flu specialist Colin Butter of the Institute of Animal Health said the British outbreak was surprising as it had happened outside the main bird-migration period.

"The next thing we need to know is if this is a primary or secondary case. If this is a secondary case, it is much more serious. If this is the first case, or 'reference case,' and we can stamp it out, the outbreak will be controlled," he said.

A protection zone was established with a radius of 2 miles and a surveillance zone of 6 miles around the infected farm. Bird-related gatherings, such as bird shows and pigeon racing, were suspended nationwide.

Television news footage showed piles of slaughtered birds being funneled into an open tractor-trailer before being taken away for incineration.

Britain's poultry industry is worth $6.7 billion, with 800 million birds produced each year.

In May, 50,000 chickens at three farms in Norfolk, also in eastern England and home to some of Europe's biggest poultry farms, were culled after another strain, H7N3, was detected.

A wild swan found dead in Scotland in March had the H5N1 version of the virus. It was thought to have caught the disease elsewhere, died at sea and been washed ashore in Scotland.

Britain's deputy chief veterinary officer, Fred Landeg, said the virus was found in only one of 22 turkey sheds on the farm, owned by Bernard Matthews PLC, Europe's largest turkey producer.

Experts stressed the situation did not pose a public health threat, and that eating well-cooked poultry products posed no risk. However, close contact with sick birds, such as in slaughtering or plucking, could lead to transmission of the disease.

Deadly Bird Flu Confirmed In British Turkeys (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 4, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 3 — British authorities confirmed Saturday that an outbreak of bird flu discovered among turkeys at a poultry farm in eastern Britain had been caused by the deadly A(H5N1) strain, which has killed humans in other parts of the world.

The disease has killed 2,500 turkeys near Lowestoft since Thursday, making it the biggest outbreak of the strain reported in Britain since concern about its global spread began to take root in 2003.

An additional 160,000 birds will now be culled in an effort to contain the outbreak, government officials said.

The prospect of a mass slaughter recalled Britain's battle with foot-and-mouth disease in 2001, when nearly four million animals, mainly sheep, pigs and cows, were burned.

The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs said that veterinary authorities had imposed restrictions in areas within six miles of the infected farm in eastern England, owned by the Bernard Matthews company, one of Europe's biggest poultry businesses.

The department also said all bird shows and pigeon racing was banned while scientists tried to establish more detail about the virus and the level of risk it presented to humans. The department did not say what had caused the outbreak.

Fred Landeg, a senior government veterinarian, said there was no public health concern. "Avian influenza is a disease of birds," he said, "and whilst it can pass very rarely and with difficulty to humans, this requires extremely close contact with infected birds, particularly feces."

Britain's last brush with the virus was last April, when a dead swan that washed up in Scotland tested positive for the strain. Government scientists said it had probably carried the infection from Germany and posed no threat to humans.

Later that month, chickens in another part of eastern England — a center of poultry farming — died of a different strain of avian influenza, H7, which can cause mild symptoms in humans. At that time, a poultry farm worker fell ill with conjunctivitis, which was attributed to the virus.

The disease is commonly transmitted to farmed birds by infected migrating birds.

But since 2003, 164 people, most of them in Asia, have died of the A(H5N1) strain, and authorities worry that the virus could easily become transmissible among humans to create a global pandemic. About 200 million birds have either died or been killed in the same period.

On Saturday, the World Health Organization confirmed that the strain had killed a 22-year-old Nigerian woman, making her the first known human fatality in sub-Saharan Africa, [a news organization] reported.

DOJ_NMG_0127606

Tests carried out at a laboratory in London confirmed the findings of Nigerian health authorities, who announced on Wednesday that the woman had died after catching the virus from an infected chicken.

Bird Flu Detected On Turkey Farm In England (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 3 -- The deadly H5N1 Asian strain of bird flu, which has killed 165 people since 2003, has been confirmed on a commercial turkey farm in eastern England, health authorities said Saturday.

Officials said the disease had killed 2,600 turkeys on the Bernard Matthews company turkey farm in Suffolk county, northeast of London. All 159,000 turkeys at Bernard Matthews, one of Europe's leading producers, were being slaughtered as a precaution, and television footage showed thousands of carcasses being dumped into trucks.

The outbreak is the first confirmed case of H5N1 among British domestic poultry in more than 15 years, officials said, and it comes at a time of increasing concern that migrating birds are carrying the disease from its origins in Asia through Africa, the Middle East and deeper into Europe. While transmission of the disease from birds to humans is rare, the World Health Organization says 271 people have been infected with H5N1 since 2003, mainly in Asia. There have been no reported cases of human infection in Europe or the United States.

British health officials said the immediate risk to humans from the Suffolk case was "extremely low." The Health Protection Agency said transmission of avian influenza from birds to humans occurs "very rarely and with difficulty" and requires "extremely close contact" with infected birds. Health officials advised that properly cooked poultry and eggs were safe to eat.

"In parts of the world where widespread infection in poultry has been reported, transmission of the virus to humans has occurred very infrequently," Maria Zambon, an influenza specialist at the health agency, said in a statement. "To date there is no evidence that avian influenza H5N1 has adapted to spread easily between humans."

David Nabarro, bird flu coordinator for the United Nations, told the BBC that it was "exceedingly unlikely" that the outbreak in Britain would lead to human infections. "The numbers of human cases are very, very small indeed, even though the virus has been moving through poultry in at least 50 countries in the last year," he said. "This is really not a human disease; it is a poultry disease."

The cause of the current outbreak is not yet known, but the disease was most likely carried to the turkey farm by a wild bird, said a spokeswoman for the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Defra). She said that all of the turkeys were raised from eggs produced at a hatchery that is being monitored for signs of bird flu. So far, none have been found, she said.

Bernard Matthews officials issued a statement Saturday confirming the outbreak but noting that "none of the affected birds have entered the food chain and there is no risk to consumers." A company spokesman referred further inquiries to government officials.

The company's Web site says Bernard Matthews is the biggest turkey producer in Europe, raising 8 million birds a year on 54 farms in Britain. The company does about $800 million a year in business and employs more than 6,000 people, according to the Web site.

Fred Landeg, Defra's deputy chief veterinary officer, said that only one of the 22 turkey houses at the Bernard Matthews farm appeared to have been affected but that all turkeys on the farm were being killed as a precaution. Officials have imposed severe restrictions on poultry owners within a six-mile radius of the infected farm, requiring that all poultry be kept inside. Poultry owners in a larger "restricted zone" covering 1,300 square miles of eastern England are being advised to keep domestic birds isolated from wild birds.

Landeg said further tests showed the disease is "the highly pathogenic Asian strain" of the virus. Indonesia, the country hit hardest, had 46 human deaths from bird flu last year and five already this year. Health officials around the world have been closely monitoring the potential spread of infected birds, and some have warned of the potential for a deadly pandemic.

Defra officials said the H5N1 strain has been confirmed in birds in at least 45 countries. It first appeared in the European Union last year and has been confirmed in wild birds in at least 13 E.U. countries, officials said. Britain is the seventh E.U. country where H5N1 has been found in domestic poultry, following France, Sweden, Germany, Denmark, Romania and Hungary.

A strain less dangerous to humans, H7, was found in chickens at a farm in Norfolk, England, last April, leading to the slaughter of more than 30,000 birds.

Peter Bradnock of the British Poultry Council said the outbreak could have an economic impact on the poultry industry.

"I think people understand this is first and foremost a problem for poultry, not for people," he said. "I am hoping we will not see any particular change in buying habits."

DOJ_NMG_0127607

Deadly Bird Flu Virus Found In Britain (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

LONDON (AP) - Officials confirmed Saturday that the H5N1 strain of bird flu had been found in turkeys on a commercial farm - Britain's first mass outbreak of the disease that has ravaged Asia's poultry stocks and killed more than 160 people worldwide.

The virus strain that killed about 2,500 turkeys on the British poultry farm was identified as the highly pathogenic Asian strain, similar to a virus found in Hungary in January, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs said.

It was the first time the deadly H5N1 strain was found on a British farm.

Also on Saturday, the World Heath Organization confirmed Nigeria's first human death from the strain. Nigerian health officials on Wednesday said several people had apparently contracted the virus, including a young woman who later died.

Last month Hungarian officials killed thousands of geese after H5N1 was detected in the southeast of the country - the first known case of the strain within the European Union since August 2006.

Britain's deputy chief veterinary officer, Fred Landeg, said all 159,000 turkeys on the affected farm in eastern England would be slaughtered. He said the virus was found in only one of 22 turkey sheds on the farm, owned by Bernard Matthews PLC, Europe's largest turkey producer.

Bird flu has killed or prompted the slaughter of millions of birds worldwide since late 2003. It has killed at least 164 people worldwide, but remains difficult for humans to catch.

Experts fear it could mutate into a form that spreads easily among people, potentially sparking a global pandemic. So far, most human cases have been traced to contact with sick birds.

The English outbreak near Holton in Suffolk county, about 130 miles northeast of London, represented the first known instance of H5N1 in Britain since an infected wild swan was found in Scotland in March. Turkeys and chickens are more susceptible to H5N1 than wild birds, who can carry the virus over long distances without showing symptoms.

Television news footage showed piles of slaughtered birds being funneled into an open tractor-trailer before being taken away for incineration.

U.N. flu coordinator Dr. David Nabarro said experts had anticipated commercial flocks in Europe and elsewhere could be infected by migrating wild birds during the northern winter months.

"This virus is going to be in bird populations for years to come, and the way in which we'll deal with it is by implementing the well-rehearsed plan to stamp it out at source," he told British Broadcasting Corp. television. "We have to learn to accept that and not see it as a serious problem and just get on with normal poultry rearing and consumption."

Experts stressed the situation did not pose a public health threat, and that eating well-cooked poultry products posed no risk. However, close contact with sick birds, such as in slaughtering or plucking, could lead to the disease being transmitted.

"There is no need for immediate concern, but we do need to identify the source of the virus," said Colin Butter, a bird flu expert with the Institute of Animal Health. "If the virus has come from the wild bird population, we need to know which birds and how much of the population has been affected."

Last year, the H5N1 virus was discovered in countries in Africa, the Middle East, Central Asia and Europe.

Lab tests conducted by the World Health Organization in London confirmed that a 22-year-old woman was infected with H5N1 when she died on Jan. 17, Information Minister Frank Nweke Jr. said.

"It bears restating, therefore, that H5N1 is widespread and continuing in the poultry population in Nigeria," Nweke said.

Turkmen Candidates Practice Pliancy (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, February 4, 2007

MOSCOW -- Six presidential candidates are barnstorming the country and holding public meetings to talk about improving education, reforming health care, ensuring adequate pensions and boosting agriculture.

It could be Iowa -- if it weren't Turkmenistan.

Acting President Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov, 49, will almost certainly win when the Central Asian country's citizens go to the polls Feb. 11. His opponents, a deputy minister and four regional officials, are willing foils, according to analysts and exiled politicians.

Murad Karyev, the supposedly neutral chairman of the Central Election Commission, has already said Berdymukhammedov is the best man for the job.

DOJ_NMG_0127608

But the modicum of debate in a country that during its 15-plus years of independence lived under the megalomaniacal shadow of president-for-life Saparmurad Niyazov amounts to a slight thaw. For the first time, the country will hold a presidential election in which more than one candidate is running.

Each of the six candidates continues to pledge loyalty to the legacy of Niyazov. But their stump speeches contain some implicit criticism of the late president by acknowledging the need to reverse the erosion of social programs, in particular.

"We know who the winner is already," said Murad Esenov, director of the Institute for Central Asian and Caucasian Studies in Sweden. "However, there are other candidates, and the fact that they have the possibility to speak up is significant and good. I believe there will be certain changes, because everyone realizes they cannot live as they lived before."

The exiled opposition has been prevented from returning to take part in the election. A coalition of exile organizations chose Khudaiberdy Orazov, a former vice premier and head of the Central Bank, to run as their candidate, but he is sitting out the campaign abroad.

"They are trying to create an image of real elections, but of course these are not elections. It's some sort of clownery," said Orazov, who lives in Sweden. "I believe we are entering the second stage of dictatorship."

Agents from Turkmenistan's internal security service, the MNB, are shadowing five of the candidates to ensure they don't stray from their scripts and say things contrary to policies laid out by the leading candidate, according to the Eurasian Transition Group, a nongovernmental organization in Germany that is one of the few with a presence in Turkmenistan.

"The other five candidates have to attend security council meetings, where they receive their orders," said Michael Laubsch, executive director of the German group. "Everything is concentrated on Berdymukhammedov, and the MNB have total control over the other candidates."

For the outside world, the direction Turkmenistan takes will carry profound implications for energy security. The former Soviet republic is becoming the focus of competition among Russia, China and the West as they vie for its natural gas resources.

Most of Turkmenistan's gas is now exported through Russian pipelines. The supply could become vital to the ability of Gazprom, the Russian energy giant, to meet rising demand over the next decade. But Western governments would like to see construction of new export routes that bypass Russia and diversify the supply chain, something Niyazov had resisted.

China has already secured a deal to build a new pipeline that will deliver billions of cubic yards of natural gas annually over 30 years, beginning in 2009.

Russian President Vladimir Putin has embraced Berdymukhammedov. At a news conference Thursday, Putin mused favorably on the idea of an OPEC-like organization for natural gas, although he stressed, "We are not going to set up a cartel."

The United States and the European Union have stepped up contacts with Turkmenistan's new leadership. The opposition-in-exile has expressed frustration at what it sees as muted statements from those countries about the need for real democratic change.

Under Niyazov, who was 66 when he died of heart disease in December, Turkmenistan was one of the world's most isolated countries, subject to the bizarre whims of a leader who squandered vast amounts of revenue from natural gas resources on monuments to himself.

The country's education system, which forced students to study Niyazov's writings, was gutted. The number of years students spent in school was cut, and foreign degrees were not recognized. Pensions for 100,000 elderly citizens were summarily denied. Ballet and opera were banned as alien. Dissidents were jailed or forced into exile.

Exiled human rights activists have taken comfort from the release this week of an environmentalist who was given a three-year suspended sentence, rather than the usual prison term, after being convicted on a weapons possession charge that was widely seen as trumped-up. But that was offset by the ruthless suppression last month of a prison riot at a facility outside Ashkhabad, the capital. Twenty-three people were killed, according to human rights activists.

Berdymukhammedov, a dentist by profession and a former minister of health, has said that he will relax controls on Internet access, among the most stringent in the world, and that Turkmenistan may eventually move toward a multiparty system.

"I would like to be the president of a democratic country where people enjoy freedom and every condition to work and to rest, and where justice, peace and friendship dominate," Berdymukhammedov said, to sustained applause, at a televised meeting last month.

Whether such rhetoric is a short-term ploy to consolidate power by a governing class still unsure of its popular standing is unclear. But emerging regional and tribal concerns, suppressed under Niyazov, could also accelerate the need for broader power-sharing.

In a secretly conducted poll of 1,145 respondents across Turkmenistan after Niyazov's death, the Eurasian Transition Group found that 81 percent of those surveyed want a president who supports democratic reforms, and 55 percent believe their votes will not be counted on election day.

DOJ_NMG_0127609

"Berdymukhammedov needs to build up a certain respect, and I believe he will allow some relaxation," said Farid Tuhbatullin, a former political prisoner in Turkmenistan and now the director of the Turkmen Initiative for Human Rights, based in Vienna. "The opposition who live in the West may have a chance to build up a dialogue with the authorities, and then maybe later they may be able to legalize their activity in the country."

Hu Cultivates Source Of Industrial Materials (WT/AP)

By Joseph J. Schatz

The Washington Times, February 4, 2007

LUSAKA, Zambia -- Chinese President Hu Jintao yesterday brought his eight-nation African tour to Zambia, a copper-rich country where China's growing clout has prompted charges of exploitation and has emerged as a volatile political issue.

Huge photos of Mr. Hu and Zambian President Levy Mwanawasa greeted motorists on Lusaka's main roads in preparation for the tightly orchestrated three-day visit, which followed stops earlier this week in Cameroon, Liberia and Sudan.

"I am sure that this visit will serve to take Zambian-Chinese relations to a higher level," Mr. Hu said.

He has used the tour to cement China's increasing economic and political ties and its fast-growing role as a foreign donor throughout the continent.

The Chinese leader was expected to attend a state banquet and meet with Mr. Mwanawasa, who has cultivated close ties with China. The country is a major foreign aid donor to Mr. Mwanawasa's government, with investments in Zambia topping $500 million, according to China's state-run news agency, Xinhua.

China also has poured hundreds of millions of dollars into Zambia's copper sector, which accounts for 60 percent of the impoverished nation's exports.

Mr. Hu's visit to Lusaka is expected to focus on new Chinese aid for Zambia and the inauguration today of an economic partnership zone in Zambia's Copperbelt province, which has become a key source of copper for China's growing economy.

But the Chinese delegation decided against visiting the province, where 51 Zambian workers died in a 2005 explosion at a Chinese-run mine. Accidents and concerns over poor working conditions at Chinese-run copper mines -- plus resentment over an influx of Chinese traders into the local apparel industry -- fueled a political backlash in Zambia's presidential elections last September over the Chinese presence.

Opposition challenger Michael Sata won support in urban areas after criticizing what he called "exploiter" Chinese investors.

"They're not here to develop Zambia; they're here to develop China," said Guy Scott, a Sata ally who represents Lusaka's central district in parliament.

The government has not invited Mr. Sata's party to public events during Mr. Hu's visit, according to the state-owned Daily Mail newspaper.

Mr. Hu's visit was preceded by a raft of new Chinese commitments, including the release of more than $6 million for the construction of a new soccer stadium in the mining town of Ndola and a $39 million grant for road building.

New Hope For Genocide Resolution (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

LAST WEEK, Rep. Adam B. Schiff (D-Burbank) engaged in what has become a biannual congressional ritual: Introducing a nonbinding resolution instructing the president of the United States to call Turkey's Ottoman-era slaughter of Armenians a genocide. Unlike in years past, however, this time the symbolic but important legislation actually has a legitimate chance at passage.

Two recent developments have created momentum. First, the Democratic Party, which has historically been more sympathetic to the resolution, now controls Congress. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) in particular has taken a keen interest in bringing the matter to a vote. Second, a 17-year-old gunman last month executed in cold blood the respected Turkish Armenian journalist Hrant Dink on a crowded Istanbul street.

The slaying of Dink, who had been prosecuted for acknowledging the genocide, has sent a collective shiver down Turkey's spine, triggering street demonstrations and renewed calls for the government to change its policy. It is still a crime in Turkey to speak the truth about a period of history whose accepted worldwide interpretation Ankara still denies.

Schiff's resolution merely calls on the president to ensure that U.S. foreign policy "reflects appropriate understanding and sensitivity" regarding the genocide and that he use the G-word during his annual message commemorating the National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man on April 24, the date in 1915 when Turkey rounded up 250 Armenian intellectuals to be slaughtered. That the resolution is so mild makes the White House's opposition all the more vexing.

DOJ_NMG_0127610

Even though President Bush made a campaign promise in 2000 to use the word "genocide," his flip-flop is neither surprising nor mysterious — Ankara has considerable diplomatic influence, and Turkey is too valuable an ally to alienate with congressional resolutions. Yet the U.S. is at its best when it chooses truth over expedience, especially in matters as grave as genocide. It's hard to say "never again" convincingly if you're too afraid to speak bluntly about what you aim to prevent.

Relax, It's Not The End Of The World (LAT)

By Francis Fukuyama

The Los Angeles Times, February 4, 2007

IT IS EASY TO GET very discouraged when surveying the state of the world. Few Americans need to be reminded about the chaos in Iraq, Iran's ambitions as a regional and potentially nuclear power or the possibility of Sunni-Shiite conflict spreading throughout the Persian Gulf.

But there's also the fact that Russia has been regressing politically, using its energy wealth to muscle Belarus and Western oil companies that invested in it, while using gangster-style tactics to silence critics at home and abroad. Nationalism is resurgent in Northeast Asia, with younger generations of Japanese, Chinese and Koreans at each other's throats over wrongs committed more than half a century ago. This in turn blocks cooperation over the threat posed by North Korea's nuclear weapons.

In our hemisphere, anti-American populists have been elected in Venezuela, Bolivia and Ecuador, and are busy centralizing power and reversing the trend of the 1990s toward openness and economic integration. Around the world, authoritarian regimes are learning repression from one another. What political scientist Samuel Huntington labeled the "third wave" of democratization began in the 1970s with Spain and Portugal, spread through Latin America and Asia, and culminated in the collapse of communism. But this wave has clearly crested. Not wanting to see another democratic upsurge like Ukraine's 2004 Orange Revolution, Russia, Egypt, Syria and Venezuela have all passed laws closing off international funding for pro-democracy groups.

Underlying these worrisome trends is a huge decline in the prestige of the American model, which since the Iraq war has come to be symbolized less by the Statue of Liberty than by the hooded prisoner at Abu Ghraib.

The world's evident instability has led the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists to move the hands of its "Doomsday Clock" to five minutes to midnight, two minutes closer to the figurative end of civilization. Even the fact that hundreds of millions of people are pulling themselves out of poverty lays the groundwork for global warming.

But before we get too discouraged with the state of the world at the beginning of 2007, we should stop to consider a broader context in which things look a lot brighter. The single most notable but overlooked fact about today's world is that the global economy has been driving ahead full speed, raising living standards and closing the gap between the First and Third worlds. The economies of the world's two most populous countries, India and China, have been growing in recent years at nearly 9% and 10%, respectively. A decade after the 1997-98 financial crisis, East Asia as a whole has returned to its torrid pace of development.

But the rest of the world is growing steadily too. Latin America, despite instability in the Andes and a backlash against "neo-liberalism," has been averaging 4% to 5% growth based on exports. Sub-Saharan Africa, after three decades of decline, has seen greater than 5% annual growth in recent years, and the Middle East is not far behind. These trends in the developing world are increasingly driven by south-south trade, as India and China consume commodities and natural resources from Latin America and Africa. This has spawned world-class multinational companies from developing countries, such as Mittal (originally of India), Cemex (Mexico) and Embraer (Brazil). Even Europe, despite the dislike of many of its intellectuals for an American-led globalization, has seen rates of unemployment fall to levels without recent precedent as the European Union expands and integrates with the global economy.

What is even more striking than the fact of economic growth has been its robustness. The early years of the 21st century have not been peaceful ones, after all: The world has seen the 9/11 attacks on the United States; horrific bombings in London, Madrid, Istanbul and Bali; two wars in the Middle East and one in Afghanistan; and an enormous increase in commodity prices. Similar shocks in the 1970s sent the global economy into a tailspin, leading to recession and inflation in the U.S., the debt crisis in Latin America and stagnation in Europe. And yet the U.S. economy has not even suffered a technical recession (two back-to-back quarters of declining output) in the last decade.

Ah, many would say, but today's rosy economic picture masks huge vulnerabilities, particularly in the form of the twin American trade and budget deficits and the unsustainable buildup of U.S. dollars in foreign central banks. These deficits, and the global imbalances they represent, are indeed worrisome and unsustainable, but people misunderstand where they come from. They do not arise primarily from American profligacy but rather from decisions taken by non-Americans to build up dollar reserves and thus ensure themselves against financial risks. The decade following the fall of the Berlin Wall was marked by constant financial instability, but since the Asian financial crisis, countries have weaned themselves off short-term capital flows and built up reserves through export-led growth. The International Monetary Fund is in trouble today because it has run out of customers for its fire brigade services. We evidently suffer, as Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke once suggested, from a global oversupply of capital that keeps real interest rates low even as growth takes off.

DOJ_NMG_0127611

Economic growth by itself will not guarantee stability, any more than the period of globalization before 1914 could prevent the outbreak of World War I. But there is good reason to think that we have consistently overestimated threats to stability since 9/11 and that it is our reaction to this overestimation that has created special dangers. At the time of the Sept. 11 attacks, there were probably no more than a few dozen people in the world with the motivation and potential means to cause catastrophic harm to the United States. Once our mighty national security apparatus was turned to focus on this problem, the likelihood of a successful attack dropped dramatically. It was in deciding that we had to "make a statement" by invading Iraq that we created a brand new problem for ourselves, creating a new terrorist haven and shifting the power balance in the Persian Gulf in Iran's favor.

But various equilibrating forces are at work. The Sunni world is not sitting by idly as Iran's influence grows, but is mobilizing to contain the threat. At home, there are many more measures we could take to lower the risk of catastrophic terrorism, such as better port security and an upgrading of our public health system to deal with biological threats. Far more likely than a catastrophic attack on the U.S. using weapons of mass destruction are bombings, attacks on airplanes, assassinations and the like — terrible events, but ones we can deal with.

There are, of course, many good reasons to want to prevent rogue states such as Iran and North Korea from getting nuclear weapons. But countries — as opposed to stateless terrorist groups — have important equities to protect, and it is not clear why deterrence would not to continue to work to restrain them. Iran's foreign policy, despite frightening rhetoric, has remained relatively cautious from the start of the 1979 Islamic revolution whenever core national interests were involved. The most acute dangers presented by proliferation are those of miscalculation as new nuclear powers emerge and as other states are tempted to preempt them.

And although the behavior of the latest bunch of oil-empowered tyrants is disturbing, in the long run, many of today's troublesome political trends are unlikely to be sustained. Russia, Venezuela and Iran — leaders of the anti-democratic rollback — have been able to defy the normal laws of economics because they benefit from high energy prices. But oil prices have already come down from last year's high of $75 per barrel to about $57 per barrel Friday. This reflects the working of markets: Rising prices have stimulated heavy investment in new upstream capacity while persuading consumers to conserve or to switch to alternative sources of energy. It is unlikely that Venezuela will be able to waste another $25 billion trying to buy itself a seat on the U.N. Security Council anytime soon.

Even pessimism about Iraq is overdone. The Bush administration has indeed made a mess of things, creating a new terrorist base in Al Anbar province and facilitating the rise of Iranian and Shiite power throughout the Gulf. But we seem not to have noticed that the civil war engulfing Iraq involves two anti-American, radical Islamist groups that are increasingly interested in fighting one another rather than the U.S. This does not absolve Washington from moral culpability for bringing this situation about, but it does mean there are self-equilibrating forces in the region that will limit the damage that conflict will represent to U.S. interests once we disengage.

There are real dangers to being excessively pessimistic at this juncture. Growing numbers of people in the U.S. and Israel believe that Iran represents an existential threat, that it will behave irrationally and therefore cannot be deterred — and that we consequently have no choice but to preempt. It is this same logic — that our backs are against the wall — that led us to the Iraq debacle. But assuming a worst-case outcome is likely to make it a self-fulfilling prophecy.

For all of its stumbles in the last few years, the United States remains a rich and powerful country, with plenty of margin to absorb setbacks and make up for mistakes. The large part of the world that is modernizing successfully is dependent on us for continued progress, and perhaps for that reason is far less anti-American than those regions mired in conflict and stagnation. There are real risks out there today, but it may help to take a deep breath and assess calmly where we stand. Terrorists use the tools they do because they are weak and have no others. Americans need to remember that we are the 800-pound gorilla: We have choices, but we need to take care when we throw our weight around.

Francis Fukuyama is a professor at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies and the author of "America at the Crossroads: Democracy, Power and the Neoconservative Legacy."

DOJ_NMG_0127612

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, February 05, 2007 8:02 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, February 03, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070203.pdf; agnb070203.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Stimson Resigns Over Controversy Involving Detainees' Legal Defense....2
Three Prominent Guantanamo Detainees Face New Charges....3
Guantanamo Paralegal Alleged To Have Fabricated Torture Charges....3
Masri Vows To Pursue Rendition Case Against US Officials....3

Homeland Response:

FBI Arrests Missouri Palestinian On Weapons Charges....3
CBO Estimates Democrats' Antiterrorism Bill Will Cost $21 Billion Over Five Years....3
Federal Judge Allows Suits Against Corps Of Engineers Over Katrina....4

War News:

New National Intelligence Estimate Paints Grim Picture Of Iraq....4
Bush Will Request $245 Billion For GWOT....6
Intelligence Community "Divisions" Over Iran Analysis Detailed....6
GOP Strives To Block Iraq Debate....8
US Loses Fourth Helicopter In Two Weeks....8
Too Few Iraqi Troops Arrive In Baghdad....9
Troops Plan To Drive Taliban From Overrun Town....9
Pakistan Says Taliban Activity Hard To Curb....9
Veteran Personally Welcomes Troops Back....10

DOJ:

Arkansas US Attorney Seeks Dismissal Of Challenge To Appointment....10

Corporate Scandals:

DOJ Joins Siemens Probe....10
Redstone Settles Suit With Son Over Family Fortune....11

Criminal Law:

DOJ Seeking More Capital Punishment Sentences....11
Jury Convicts Former Coca-Cola Secretary Of Stealing Trade Secrets....11
Mover Shot By Maryland Official Dies....12
Federal Agents Announce Early Successes In NOLA Crime Crackdown....13
Virginia Men Plead Guilty In Fake "Purse Party" Scam....13
Marion Barry Rejects Plea Offer....13
US Cracking Down On Online Gambling....14
New York Fire Department Examining Promotions Involving Fake Diplomas....14
Former New York Judge Testifies To Political Pressures....15

Civil Rights:

California Teenagers Given Probation After Halloween Hate-Crime Beating....15
Judge Delays Decision On Port Chester, NY, Election....15
11th Circuit Finds No Discrimination In Georgia Farmworkers Case....15
Mississippi VRA Challenge Seen As National Test....16
Civil-Rights Era Killings Under Renewed Scrutiny....16
NYPD "Stop And Frisks" Soar....16
Michigan Court Rules Against Domestic Partner Benefits....17
WPost Endorses Voting Reform Paper Trail Requirement....17

Antitrust:

Viacom Orders YouTube To Remove Its Videos....17
Equity Board Rejects Vornado Offer, Endorses Blackstone Bid....18
Suit Claims Dell Did Not Disclose Intel Payments....18
Delta Creditors Approve Terms Of Bankruptcy Financing Program....19
MediaNews Purchases Santa Cruz Sentinel....19
Judge Rules Microsoft May Question Expert Who Discovered Violation....19

Express Scripts Sweetens Bid For Caremark 20

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Bush Administration Expresses Agreement With Global Warming Report 20
States' Ocean Habitat Rescue Initiatives Hailed 21
Tribe Challenges Interior Official's Recognition Authority..... 21

Congress-Administration:

Bush Budget Includes Additional Education Funding, Entitlements Cuts 22
Bush Backs Three Percent Raise For Federal Employees ... 23
Bush Said To Have "Adopted" Democrats' Rhetoric On Domestic Issues 23
Senators' Failure To Promptly Disclose Campaign Donations Draws Scrutiny 23
CHC Chairman Baca Rebuts Sanchez's Allegations 23
New Air Traffic Control System Could Cost As Much As $76 Billion 24
Football Fan Rice Picks Colts To Win Super Bowl 24
NYTimes Considers New NHTSA Crash Tests "Overdue." ... 24

Other News:

Jobs Report "Just About Perfect," Bush Economic Adviser Says..... 24
Leading Democratic Presidential Hopefuls Spar Over Iraq At Party Gathering 25
Clinton Up By 20, McCain By Seven, In ARG New Hampshire Polls 26
Clinton's "Flat Footedness" With Humor Seen As Gender Double-Standard 26
Obama Addresses Internet-Mobilized Supporters..... 26
Biden Appears On Sharpton's Radio Show 26
Romney Slams Clinton For "Timidity" Toward Iran..... 26
WSJournal Says Hagel Should Have Courage To Run For President 27
Two Arkansas Journalists Advise Huckabee To "Cool It."..... 27
At Least 19 Dead Following Florida Storms..... 27
Beltway Gossip Columns Multiply..... 27
US Preeminence In Stem Cell Research Said To Be Vulnerable 27
Noonan Notes Reagan's 1976 Fight Against GOP Establishment..... 28
Texans Richards, Connally, Ivins Remembered 28
Russia Challenges US On Engagement With Hamas, Syria .. 28
US Files WTO Case Against China 29
Top Chinese Official Warns Against Independent Legal System 30
China's Hu Said To Engage Khartoum On Darfur 30
Two Americans Arrested Near Somali-Kenyan Border 31
Morocco Said To Stifle Free And Open Media..... 31
Blair Vows Not To Resign During Honors Investigation..... 31
Serbia Pans Draft Plan For Kosovo..... 31
Bay Of Pigs Veterans Eye Return To Post-Castro Cuba 32
Cubana Airlines Bomber Said To Seek Quiet Life In Caracas 32

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 32

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 33

TERRORISM NEWS:

Stimson Resigns Over Controversy Involving Detainees' Legal Defense. The Washington Post (2/3, A6, 690K) reports Charles 'Cully' Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs "resigned yesterday, the Defense Department announced, three weeks after criticizing lawyers who represent terrorism suspects." Stimson "called it 'shocking' that major U.S. law firms represented Guantanamo Bay detainees free of charge and said they would likely suffer financially after their corporate clients learned of the work." Stimson "believed that the controversy 'hampered his ability to be effective in this position,' department spokesman Bryan Whitman said. He stressed that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates did not ask him to resign."

The New York Times (2/3, A12, Abruzzese, 1.16M) reports Stimson "named more than 12 firms that are defending detainees. 'I think, quite honestly, when corporate C.E.O.'s see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those C.E.O.'s are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms,' Mr. Stimson said." CNN.com (2/2) reports, "In a letter to the editor published in the Washington Post a week later, he said…'I apologize for what I said, those comments do not reflect my core beliefs.'" The Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K) also noted Stimson's resignation.

DOJ_NMG_0127615

Three Prominent Guantanamo Detainees Face New Charges. The AP (2/2) reports the Pentagon has "prepared new charges Friday against three of the best-known detainees at Guantanamo Bay — a key step toward resuming the military tribunals for terrorism suspects that were halted by the U.S. Supreme Court last year. Authorities drafted new charges — including murder, conspiracy and providing material support for terrorism — against Canadian Omar Khadr, Australian David Hicks and Salim Ahmed Hamdan of Yemen, said Air Force Col. Morris Davis, chief prosecutor in the Guantanamo war crimes trials."

Guantanamo Paralegal Alleged To Have Fabricated Torture Charges. The AP (2/2) reports a military defense lawyer "whose paralegal reported overhearing guards at the U.S. Navy base in southeastern Cuba brag about beating detainees said she was accused by a military investigator of filing a false statement. Army Col. Richard Basset, who was ordered by the U.S. Southern Command to investigate the allegations into guards' actions, told the paralegal, Marine Sgt. Heather Cerveny, that the guards denied her account of their September conversations in a Guantanamo bar, according to Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey. The investigator accused Cerveny of having made a false statement, Vokey told The Associated Press in a telephone interview."

Masri Vows To Pursue Rendition Case Against US Officials. BBC.com (2/2, Peter) reports, "A Lebanese-born German, who accuses the CIA of having kidnapped and tortured him, says he is determined to get an apology from the US authorities. Khaled al-Masri alleges that he was seized in Macedonia, flown to a secret jail in Afghanistan and tortured there. 'I'll pursue the case until the Americans admit what they did to me, give an explanation and make an apology,' he told the BBC News website. Munich prosecutors have ordered the arrest of 13 suspected CIA agents. Mr Masri says he was abducted at the end of 2003 and detained for five months before being released in Albania after the Americans realised they had got the wrong man."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Arrests Missouri Palestinian On Weapons Charges. Under the headline "Man Was Arming For 'War,' FBI Says," The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/2, Patrick) reported, "A St. Charles man obtained fully automatic weapons and tried to buy as many explosives as possible in preparation for what an associate called 'war,' the FBI says in court documents. He bought three rifles and a Claymore anti-personnel mine and negotiated for a case of hand grenades, documents obtained by the Post-Dispatch show." Palestinian immigrant Mousa M. Abuelawi "was arrested Dec. 29 and charged on complaints accusing him of three counts of illegal possession or distribution of a machine gun and conspiracy to violate machine gun statutes." The Post-Dispatch noted, "The context of the word 'war' was not explained in court filings; the FBI declined to comment. The man to whom the word was attributed, Thaer Abde Sumad, said in an interview Thursday that the purchases were not intended for terrorism but to make money supplying street gangs in a St. Louis turf war. … The FBI thinks it's a 'terrorist thing,' Sumad said, 'especially after 9/11. They're trying to make it bigger than what it is.' Sumad said Abuelawi was 'trying to make a few extra bucks.'"

CBO Estimates Democrats' Antiterrorism Bill Will Cost $21 Billion Over Five Years. The New York Times (2/3, A12, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "The antiterrorism bill that the House passed last month as part of the new Democratic majority's first-100-hours push would cost the federal government $21 billion over the next five years, according to a new Congressional estimate. The five-year estimate, issued Friday by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, is equal to roughly half the Homeland Security Department's entire budget for the current fiscal year, and Republicans called it proof that adopting the bill so quickly had been irresponsible. 'This bill was rushed to the floor without the Democratic leadership giving us any indication of its massive cost,' said Representative Peter T. King of New York, the senior Republican on the House Homeland Security Committee. 'And now we know why.'" House Homeland Security Committee chairman Rep. Bennie Thompson "defended the price tag. 'Perhaps there would not be such sticker shock if the Congress and the Bush administration had addressed these security gaps identified by the bipartisan 9/11 commission over three years ago,' Mr. Thompson said in a statement."

DOJ_NMG_0127616

The Washington Times (2/3, Seper, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The CBO said a bill to carry out the recommendations, which passed the House last month, would also raise airline passenger fees by nearly $1.3 billion between 2008 and 2011, with the money going to the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) to improve security at the nation's airports." President Bush "opposes the House bill, arguing it undermines many of the administration's own post-September 11 steps and it is impossible to scan 100 percent of all incoming cargo." CNN.com (2/2) reports the House "passed the bill January 9 during its heralded 'first 100 hours' of the new Congress. The Senate has not yet voted on the measure."

Federal Judge Allows Suits Against Corps Of Engineers Over Katrina. The New York Times (2/3, A10, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports, "Residents of several neighborhoods in the New Orleans area that were hardest hit by flooding after Hurricane Katrina can sue the Army Corps of Engineers over their claims that a government-built navigation channel was largely to blame, a federal judge ruled yesterday. … Since the flood, those who lived in the devastated neighborhoods near the east side of New Orleans — including the Lower Ninth Ward, New Orleans East and St. Bernard Parish — have contended that the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet caused much of their damage by intensifying the surge from the storm. The damage, they say, was foreseeable." Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of the Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, "cited previous cases saying that the channel was not a flood-control project. Instead, Judge Duval said, the cases say the channel — known locally as Mr. Go — was built as an aid to navigation, so the protection from liability might not apply. And so, he said, the questions deserved to be decided at trial."

Bush Nominates New Corps Commander. The New York Times (2/3, A10, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports President Bush "nominated a new leader for the corps, Lt. Gen. Robert L. Van Antwerp Jr. of the Army. If approved by the Senate, General Van Antwerp will succeed Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, who announced last August that he intended to resign."

WAR NEWS:

New National Intelligence Estimate Paints Grim Picture Of Iraq. Coverage of the new Iraq National Intelligence Estimate was eclipsed on Friday's network news broadcasts by the deadly storms in Florida, but many major newspapers put the story on the front page this morning. The reports are markedly negative, highlighting the bleak tone of the NIE. ABC World News (2/2, story 5, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "America's 16 spy agencies jointly, today, issued their estimate on the situation in Iraq. It is not encouraging. The report questions whether Iraqi leaders can improve security or get a political settlement in the next year and a half. And it says there's not one war underway, but many." ABC (Karl): "This sounds actually worse than civil war. It says you have at least four different wars raging in Iraq. You have a civil war between Sunnis and Shia. You have violence between those ethnic groups. You have the fight against al Qaeda. And widespread violence based on simple criminality." However, the report "warned of catastrophic consequences if US troops were to suddenly withdraw from Iraq."

The CBS Evening News (2/2, story 6, 2:18, Russ Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The release of a new intelligence report on Iraq paints a very bleak picture." CBS (Martin): "It's not just a civil war. Iraq is spiraling downward toward implosion. That's the stark picture painted by the national intelligence estimate. … One senior intelligence official rates the Iraqi government's chances at less than 50/50. Put another way, that means the US is closer to failure than it is to success."

NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 8, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The list of threats and dangers in Iraq is a long one in the form of the new national intelligence report prepared for the President and for Congress." NBC (Mitchell): "The National Intelligence Estimate paints a stark picture: a country torn by an accelerating cycle of violence like in Hilla yesterday. An Iraq where the Administration now admits sectarian violence is deadlier than attacks from al Qaeda."

The Washington Post (2/3, DeYoung, Pincus, 690K) reports on its front page, "The U.S. intelligence community yesterday released a starkly pessimistic assessment of the situation in Iraq, warning that even if security improves, deepening sectarian divisions threaten to destroy the government and ultimately could lead to anarchy, partition or the emergence of a new dictatorship. ... The estimate concluded that the Iraqi military will find it very difficult to carry out any new responsibilities or to operate independently against sectarian militias," causing the administration to struggle "yesterday to put the best face on the NIE's assessment." Congressional Democrats "embraced the estimate to bolster their rejection of Bush's plan." The" tough and unequivocal wording reflects the determination within the intelligence community to prove its independence from political pressure."

DOJ_NMG_0127617

Also on the front page, the New York Times (2/3, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports that the "bleak new" NIE "left the White House and its opponents vying over whether its findings buttressed their vastly different views about how to arrest the worsening sectarian chaos there." While the administration "seized on one conclusion — that American forces remain 'an essential stabilizing element in Iraq' -- to reinforce their view that more troops are needed to secure Baghdad, Democrats "said the estimate's conclusions supported their view that the best way to combat violence in Baghdad would be through new political and diplomatic programs." The NIE, "the first such estimate on Iraq in more than two years, described in sober language a rapidly unraveling country in which security has worsened despite four years of efforts by the administration." It "portrayed the violence as essentially 'self-sustaining,' and suggested that the involvement of outsiders, including Iran, was 'not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability.'" The New York Times (2/3, A6, 1.16M) prints the "key judgments" of the NIE.

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Miller, 850K) reports Iraq "is unraveling at an accelerating rate, and even if U.S. and Iraqi forces can slow the spreading violence, the country's fragile government is unlikely to deliver stability to its people during the next year, according to a much-anticipated assessment by U.S. intelligence agencies. ... The director of national intelligence took the unusual step of releasing the document's key judgments publicly even as the full, 90-page classified version was being delivered to members of Congress and senior government officials. ... The report offers a bleak assessment of the Iraqi security forces who are supposed to play the leading role under Bush's plan to stem violence.

The Washington Times (2/3, Gertz, 88K) emphasizes the report's warning "that pulling U.S. troops out of the country too soon would lead to a collapse of the Iraqi military, outside intervention and the creation of safe havens for al Qaeda terrorists," calling the conclusion "a blow to Iraq war critics in Congress and elsewhere who are advocating a pullout of U.S. troops." The Financial Times (2/3, Sevastopulo, Daniel) reports, "The Iraqi government will be 'hard-pressed' to achieve political reconciliation over the next 18 months as it tackles a 'civil war' and the insurgency, according to a key US intelligence report." The FT calls it "the first official US document released to the public that concluded that elements of the conflict in Iraq constituted a 'civil war.'"

BBC.com (2/2) reports that the NIE "says 'civil war' accurately describes certain aspects of the conflict, including intense sectarian violence." However, it "adds that the controversial term does not adequately sum up the complexity of the situation." CNN.com (2/2) reports that the NIE "does not address whether the president's plan to 'surge' up to 21,500 troops into Iraq will work, but it lays out an extremely chaotic and complex situation that will make it difficult for those troops to succeed, intelligence and military analysts told CNN." Former CIA deputy director John McLaughlin "said the intelligence community didn't make an assessment of whether the troop increase would work, in part, because it didn't have enough data to make a recommendation and, in part, because it did not want to weigh in on a debate that is essentially political."

NIE Said To Reflect Increased Pessimism Of Intelligence Community. The Washington Post (2/3, A11, Linzer, 690K) reports, in a pessimistic analytical article, "The intelligence community's bleak set of judgments about Iraq, made public yesterday, differs significantly from the flawed assessments of that country's alleged weapons programs that the White House released more than four years ago. Twenty-seven pages of confident assertions ... have been replaced, more than four years later, with heavily qualified glimmers of hope across a mere 3 1/2 pages laying out the prospects for reversing Iraq's dive into chaos." After US troops failed to find WMDs in Iraq, "the intelligence community -- particularly the CIA -- significantly altered the way in which it would conduct future analyses, highlight uncertainty and acknowledge dissent." The 2007 NIE "laid out three possible scenarios, each of which could have enormously negative consequences for Iraq: Chaos leading to partition, the emergence of a Shiite strongman who would seize power and rule by dictatorship, or a complete collapse of central control resulting in violent fiefdoms across the country."

Hunter Says NIE Confirms Need For Bush Strategy To Be Tried. Rep. Duncan Hunter said on MSNBC (2/2, Witt), "I've read the NIE, and it says it's a civil war if you look at it in a certain way and maybe not if you look at it in another way. I don't think it makes a lot of difference what you call it. You obviously have a high level of violence. And what we have to do right now is a very difficult and challenging second step in standing up a free nation. And that is, once you've stood up the government, the free government, you got to stand up a military apparatus that can protect that free government. … The operation in Baghdad that the President's initiated…this plan and this increase in forces, this reinforcement, is in progress right now. And what we have to do, I think, is get behind it and let's make sure this thing works."

Kucinich, Vilsack See Argument For Withdrawal In NIE. Rep. Dennis Kucinich said on MSNBC's Tucker (2/2, Carlson), "We've got to get out of Iraq. Six hundred and fifty thousand innocent civilians died, 3,100 of our brave soldiers died. … I'm the only who's running for president who voted against authorizing the war, and I'm the only one who's consistently voted against funding the war."

Ex-Gov. Tom Vilsack said on MSNBC (2/2, O'Donnell), "I think it's time for Congress to step up and cut off the funding to the status quo. I think it's time for to us end this war. I think it's very clear from the intelligence information and from the American public awareness that this has been a civil war for some time and our kids are in the middle of it. If we don't get our kids out of harm's way soon, another 1,000 will die, another 5,000 will be injured, and tens of thousands will be coming back home different than they left. It's time for Congress to step up."

Dowd Decries Administration For Lack Of Candor. New York Times (2/3, A15, 1.16M) columnist Maureen Dowd writes, "It's rare to get a simple apology when a complex obfuscation will do. Even after releasing parts of an intelligence report so pessimistic that it may as well have been titled 'Iraq: We're Cooked,' Bush officials clung to their alternate reality, using nonsensical logic and cherry-picking whatever phrases they could find in the report that they could use to sell the Surge. ... It's official. We're in a cycle of violence so complex and awful that withdrawing American troops will make it worse and keeping American troops there may also make it worse."

Bush Will Request $245 Billion For GWOT.

The Washington Post (2/3, A1, Abramowitz, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "President Bush will ask Congress for close to three-quarters of a trillion dollars in defense spending on Monday, including $245 billion to cover the cost of fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and other elements of the 'global war on terror,' senior administration officials said yesterday. Democrats said the gigantic spending request will precipitate 'sticker shock' on Capitol Hill ... If approved by Congress, the new war spending would bring the overall cost of fighting to about $745 billion since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States -- adjusting for inflation, more than was spent on the Vietnam War." "Top" House Democrats "sounded skeptical about the new defense numbers and said they will not give the president a blank check," but "[John] Spratt, [Nancy] Pelosi and other lawmakers did not rule out supporting the request."

The New York Times (2/3, A11, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration is seeking a record military budget of $622 billion for the 2008 fiscal year, Pentagon officials have said. The sum includes more than $140 billion for war-related costs. The administration is also seeking $93 billion in the current fiscal year, which ends on Sept. 30, to pay for military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, the officials said. ... 'It is the highest level of spending since the height of the Korean War,' said Steven Kosiak, a military budget expert with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a policy analysis organization here." The Times notes, "Few if any budget experts expect significant cuts in military spending while large numbers of troops are in combat in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Intelligence Community "Divisions" Over Iran Analysis Detailed. In an analysis of Administration deliberations entitled, "Rifts Emerge On Iran Policy," the Wall Street Journal (2/3, A4, Dreazen, Solomon, 2.04M) reports the Administration's "war of words with Iran is sparking divisions within the government over how heavily Tehran actually is involved in fomenting instability in Iraq -- and how aggressive a stance the U.S. should adopt in response." Washington's "opinion about Iran is far from monolithic, and divisions over the country's intentions and activities in Iraq are emerging within the military and the intelligence community. The skeptics are challenging key aspects of the Bush administration's justifications for its hard-line approach toward Iran, making it more difficult for the White House to rally public support." The Journal says many of "those tensions broke into the open with the release" of the Iraq NIE.

DOJ_NMG_0127619

US Unable To Prove Iranian Link To Iraqi Violence. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Reynolds, 850K) reports, "Bush administration officials acknowledged Friday that they had yet to compile evidence strong enough to back up publicly their claims that Iran is fomenting violence against U.S. troops in Iraq. ... despite several pledges to make the evidence public, the administration has twice postponed the release — most recently, a briefing by military officials scheduled for last Tuesday in Baghdad. 'The truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts,' national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley said Friday."

Gates Says US Not Planning War With Iran. The AP (2/2) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates said the "decision to send a second U.S. carrier to the Persian Gulf region does not mean the United States is planning for a war with Iran. … He quickly added that the movement of the carrier is to demonstrate that America is committed to the Gulf region. He also said that he has not seen any credible proof yet that any Iranians were involved in the ambush last week in Karbala that left five soldiers dead." CNN.com (2/2) reports, "Gates said he was reiterating what President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have said earlier. ... He said that 'explosively formed projectiles' with roots in Iran were killing troops."

The Washington Times (2/3, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates yesterday all but ruled out military strikes on Iran, declaring 'we are not planning for a war with Iran.' Mr. Gates, who has called military action against Iran an absolute last resort, made the denial during a flurry of press and Internet blogger speculation that President Bush is preparing to order strikes against Iran's nuclear facilities." Recent moves by Bush "stirred speculation that a war was in the offing," but "Administration officials say the buildup was done to mollify Persian Gulf Arab states who fear attacks from Iran, and to put pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad."

Iraq-Based Kurds Train To Fight Iran. The AP (2/2, Gannon) reports from eastern Iraq, "Here, recruits are training to fight Iran, one of the four countries that rule the fractured Kurdish people. And although they belong to an organization officially outlawed as terrorist by Washington, they appear to be operating unhindered either by Iraqi-Kurdish units or the limited U.S. force in Kurdish areas. ... The PKK and its affiliates are spread through a region of some 35 million Kurds that straddles Turkey, Iraq, Iran and Syria. PEJAK, the newest group, claims to number thousands of recruits, and targets only Iran."

Centrifuge Installation Begins At Natanz. The New York Times (2/3, Sanger, 1.16M) reports, "International nuclear investigators have confirmed that Iran is beginning to install equipment in the large underground chamber in Natanz." IAEA teams now claim the long-delayed centrifuges "are just now beginning to be assembled," which the Times says "signals a continued defiance of the" UNSC. Noting Tehran's call to view the Isfahan site this weekend, the Times says Washington "dismissed the invitation as a diplomatic stunt, meant to create a false sense of openness about the program." Ambassador Schulte is quoted saying, "Instead of inviting I.A.E.A. ambassadors, Iran should invite I.A.E.A. inspectors. Iran should give them access to all the documents, nuclear facilities and individuals that it has refused to provide access to in the last three years."

The AP (2/3, Jahn) cites IAEA informal reports that "technical crews have hauled centrifuges into Iran's vast underground Natanz complex and were on the threshold of launching a program that could be used to create nuclear arms." That "recent activity in Natanz increases the tension between Tehran and the world's major powers over the Islamic republic's nuclear program, and will likely spur U.S. efforts to sharpen existing U.N. sanctions on Iran for its defiance of a Security Council demand that it freeze enrichment efforts."

Chirac Said To Preview Acceptance Of Nuclear Iran. In an analysis of French President Jacques Chirac's comments this week about Iran, the New York Times (2/3, Sciolino, 1.16M) says he "inadvertently said aloud what some policy makers and arms control experts have been whispering: that the world may have to learn to live with a nuclear Iran." By "veering from the prepared script and letting the veil of caution fall, he became the first Western leader to imply that containment of a nuclear Iran is preferable to other options, especially war." The Times continues, "Among the Europeans, there is an overwhelming consensus that the American-led war in Iraq has been a disaster and that Washington's Iran strategy could end in an even more destabilizing military confrontation. … Even inside the Bush administration, some officials have acknowledged over the past year that Iran eventually may get a nuclear weapon — or at least the technology and components to assemble one quickly."

DOJ_NMG_0127620

Clark Does Not Rule Out Military Option, But Prefers Diplomacy. Retired Gen. Wesley Clark said on Fox News (2/2, Colby), "I think of course there's a military option. And the military option must remain on the table. But, by far, the best solution is to persuade the Iranians that they will be safer, more secure, more influential, be able to take care of their people better and advance their own interests if they don't have nuclear weapons rather than if they do. To make that case persuasively, it's not a matter sending another aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf. It really is a matter of this administration taking the lead in diplomacy in the region. We need to address, with the Iranians, exactly what they're afraid of. Why do they want a nuclear weapon? And what are they going to do with it? And what else do they have an interest in doing in the region?"

GOP Strives To Block Iraq Debate. The New York Times (2/3, A7, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, said Friday that his party would unite to block Senate debate next week on a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq unless the Democrats allowed votes on at least two Republican alternatives. Mr. McConnell said even Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is the chief author of the bipartisan proposal, and other Republicans backing his plan had agreed to prevent the resolution from reaching the floor Monday if Democrats did not agree to that demand." Majority Leader Harry Reid "responded that the Republican leadership was essentially filibustering a debate of Iraq policy to avoid a judgment on Mr. Bush." McConnell's vow "reflects the Republican leadership's strategy to force a Senate review of a series of competing resolutions, muddying the outcome with multiple votes, rather than allow the focus to be on a central proposal objecting to the troop buildup."

The Washington Times (2/3, Hurt, 88K) reports on its front page that Sen. John Warner "will join his fellow Republicans in voting Monday to block the resolution he wrote rebuking President Bush's Iraq war policy. ... Senate Republicans are opposed to a vote on the Warner resolution unless they also get votes on two other resolutions. One of those alternatives supports Mr. Bush's plan, and the other would prohibit cutting funds for the war. Republicans also want each resolution to require 60 votes to pass."

Dodd Says Public Expects More Than Resolutions. Sen. Christopher Dodd said on MSNBC (2/2, Witt), "I have great respect for my colleagues who are offering the sense of the Senate resolutions. These are expressions of people's views. And my position, my view here is, at this point, we need to be doing more than expressing our views on the matter. We ought to be taking some action on this. … The fact that we're going to spend a week next week debating Iraq is a positive thing. At the end of it, we'll be asked to choose between two resolutions, neither of which do anything at all except allow us to express our views. And I think the American public expects more from us here than just expressing our views."

King Opposes Resolutions. Rep. Peter King said on Fox News' Your World (2/2, Cavuto), "If a person has real opposition to the war, real opposition to the President's policies, they should have expressed it up to now. If they do want to express it now, then I think it would make more sense for them to come out and say that we should withdraw the troops. But the fact to have these nonbinding resolutions, which all they do is send a terrible signal overseas to our enemies, they send the wrong signal to our own troops. … I can't guarantee the President is right. But I can guarantee that, if we lose in Iraq, it's going to be an absolute disaster for the United States."

US Loses Fourth Helicopter In Two Weeks. The Washington Post, the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, and the AP all reported the downing of another American helicopter and the military's acknowledgment of an emerging, "disturbing" trend of such downings. The Washington Post (2/3, A11, Londono, 690K) reports, "A U.S. military helicopter crashed Friday morning north of Baghdad, killing two soldiers on board, officials said. It was the fourth fatal helicopter crash in Iraq this year. ... Military officials did not say what type of helicopter it was or how it crashed. But Iraqi police and an insurgent group that asserted responsibility for the crash identified the craft as an Apache and said it had been shot down by a shoulder-fired antiaircraft missile." The New York Times (2/3, A7, Santora, 1.16M) reports that the fourth such downing reflected "a trend that American military commanders acknowledged was disturbing. ... General Pace said he did not know if the recent strikes were the result of a new strategy, improved skills or simply a natural result of the military's heavy dependence on helicopters in the fight here."

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Zavis, 850K) reports, "The spate of attacks raised questions about whether insurgents were increasingly targeting aircraft, a crucial component of U.S. operations in Iraq." The downings come "at a time when roadside bombings are becoming less effective against U.S. vehicles, which are protected by improved armor plating, signal-jamming devices and other measures." The Washington Times/AP (2/3, Gamel) reports, "America's top general [Pace] acknowledged that U.S. aircraft were increasingly in danger from groundfire." His "comments marked the first time a military official has publicly acknowledged the recent crashes were caused by groundfire." The AP (2/3, Mroue) reports, "An al-Qaida-affiliated group claimed responsibility and said its fighters had 'new ways' to attack American planes."

DOJ_NMG_0127621

Too Few Iraqi Troops Arrive In Baghdad. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Barnes, 850K) reports, "The army brigades promised by the Iraqi government to help secure Baghdad have begun to arrive in the city, but with only a little more than half of their manpower, representing at least a partial failure in a crucial first test of the Bush administration's new war plan. ... Previous efforts to secure Baghdad failed in part because the Iraqi government was never able to deliver the forces it promised. ... Administration officials have sought to portray the new Baghdad security push as an Iraqi plan. But it was developed by Americans and was only reluctantly accepted by the Maliki government, according to officials who have described its formation. ... Because the Iraqis will be most needed in the later phases, U.S. commanders believe they still have time to build up the Iraqi troop levels to full strength." The AP (2/3) also reports the shortfall.

Troops Plan To Drive Taliban From Overrun Town. The AP (2/3, Abrashi) reports, "Afghan security forces supported by NATO-led troops soon will launch an operation to recapture a southern town that was overrun by Taliban militants, an Afghan official said Saturday. Gen. Mohammad Zahir Azimi, the spokesman for the defense ministry, said the Taliban remained in control of the town of Musa Qala in Helmand province, which British troops left after a contentious peace agreement in October. ... The militants' assault, days after a Taliban commander was killed outside the town, raises doubts about the future of the peace deal [between "elders and the Helmand governor"], which has been criticized by some Western officials as a NATO retreat in hostile Taliban territory." Western officials had "complained that the deal put the area, which had been a center for clashes between British troops and resurgent Taliban militants, outside of government and NATO control."

In earlier coverage, the New York Times (2/3, A7, Gall, Shah, 1.16M) stated, "Taliban militants overran the town of Musa Qala in southern Afghanistan just three months after NATO troops had withdrawn and handed over control to a tribal council, officials said Friday. The insurgents detained police officers and tribal elders, seized weapons and government equipment and bulldozed part of the district offices, according to residents. ... The attack ended a British-brokered experiment aimed at bringing some control over remote regions and keeping Taliban insurgents at bay. Under the plan, British troops agreed to withdraw from the town, leaving a tribal council in charge with a locally recruited police force, and Taliban forces agreed to withdraw to nearby villages. ... A Taliban commander, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, led the assault on the town Thursday in a rage, because his brother had been killed a few days before in a NATO airstrike, residents said."

Also in earlier coverage, the Washington Times/AP (2/3, Straziuso) reported, "Two residents of Musa Qala estimated that between 200 and 300 Taliban fighters had overtaken the town. They said the fighters took weapons from the police on Wednesday and destroyed the town's government center late Thursday. ... Late last month, NATO said an air strike outside of Musa Qala destroyed a Taliban command post, killing a senior militant leader and a number of his deputies. NATO said the Jan. 25 air strike 'was outside the area of the agreement' and did not violate it. However, [Helmand governor] Wafa said the Taliban told a gathering of elders last week that they considered the air strike a violation, and it appeared the assault was in retaliation."

AFP (2/3) reports, "The southern Afghan district of Musa Qala was under the control of the Taliban, the Afghan defence ministry said as NATO-led forces said the situation was still unclear."

Pakistan Says Taliban Activity Hard To Curb. The New York Times (2/3, A7, Masood, 1.16M) reports, "Faced with mounting criticism that Pakistan is not doing enough to thwart incursions into Afghanistan by Pakistan-based Taliban militants, the president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said Friday that securing the porous border was not the sole responsibility of this country. He also insisted that despite some lapses, Pakistan's security forces were fully behind him in an effort to root out the resurgent Taliban."

DOJ_NMG_0127622

Musharraf "said Pakistan would selectively fence 22 miles of the border in North-Western Frontier Province and would later erect a 155-mile fence in Baluchistan Province." Times correspondent Carlotta Gall "recently reported that she had found anecdotal evidence in and around Quetta to support charges by Western diplomats and Pakistani opposition figures that the Pakistani intelligence agencies were encouraging the Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan."

Pakistan To Fence Afghan Border. The AP (2/2, Pennington) reports, "Many observers have been skeptical that the [fencing] plan will prevent many militants from crossing, especially because the proposed fencing would cover only a tiny portion of the rugged frontier." Musharraf's "defense of Pakistan's efforts to fight terrorism — and his admission of lapses — follow criticism from U.S. military officials who say cross-border attacks into Afghanistan have risen threefold since Pakistan signed a September peace deal with pro-Taliban militants in its North Waziristan region."

Veteran Personally Welcomes Troops Back. ABC World News (2/2, story 9, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Finally tonight, our 'Person of the Week.' A man who believes that the first thing a soldier sees when returning to the United States is all-important." Burt Brady: "They're glad to see us. And we're tickled to death to see them, of course, because they're our heroes." Gibson: "Every morning, for over a year now, Burt Brady gets up ... to welcome home American troops, returning from Iraq and Afghanistan." Brady: "I went 300 days last year." Gibson: "Brady, a 69-year-old veteran, is part of the welcome home a hero program, trying to make sure every soldier who comes through Dallas gets a special homecoming."

DOJ:

Arkansas US Attorney Seeks Dismissal Of Challenge To Appointment. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (2/3, Satter) reports, "A filing last week challenging the constitutionality of the December appointment of Tim Griffin to be U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas is off base and should be dismissed, Griffin's office said Friday in a written response." The ADG continues, "The challenge and the response were filed in the case of Antoine Demetrius Baker of Little Rock, who is charged with capital murder and may face the death penalty if Griffin's office seeks and obtains permission to present that option to jurors in the event of a conviction. … Baker is accused of engineering the December 2002 shooting death of Jerry Otis, 21, who was scheduled to testify against Baker in an aggravated robbery and theft case stemming from an August 2002 altercation in which Otis was hit in the face with a pistol and robbed of $ 250." The ADG adds, "On Jan. 23, Baker's newly appointed attorney, John Wesley Hall of Little Rock, filed a motion to declare Griffin's Dec. 20, 2006, interim appointment by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales unconstitutional. Hall said an illegal appointment would prevent Griffin's office from legally carrying out its plan to add allegations to an existing indictment to justify seeking the death penalty against Baker." The ADG notes, "Hall said the interim appointment violates Article II, Section 2, of the U. S. Constitution, which covers presidential appointments, as well as a section of the U. S. Code that was altered last year as part of Congress ' reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act. … Assistant U. S. Attorney Patrick Harris, the lead prosecutor in Baker's case, said in an 18-page response that Hall's interpretation of the sections and his corresponding arguments 'lack merit,' and that Griffin's appointment 'was plainly lawful' and 'also entirely constitutional.' … Griffin's appointment immediately followed the resignation of Bud Cummins, who says the Department of Justice asked him to resign after five years on the job to give someone else a chance at the plum political appointment."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Joins Siemens Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A4, Esterl) reports, "German industrial giant Siemens AG, already weighed down by a cross-border corruption probe, faces heightened scrutiny after it disclosed that U.S. authorities also are investigating the matter." The Journal continues, "Siemens said the Department of Justice is investigating 'possible criminal violations of U.S. law by Siemens.' It also said it understands that the enforcement division of the Securities and Exchange Commission is conducting an 'informal inquiry' into the allegations of wrongdoing." The Journal adds, "The Munich-based conglomerate said in December that it had uncovered €420 million, or about $545 million, in suspicious transactions stretching back more than seven years. That disclosure came after more than 200 German police raided offices and homes of Siemens employees in mid-November, arresting several people linked to the company's telecommunications-equipment business. … German prosecutors are working with investigators in neighboring countries and said they suspect Siemens officials diverted funds through sham consulting contracts into slush funds to bribe customers abroad. Authorities released half a dozen people -- including a former Siemens management-board member and a former chief financial officer of the telecom unit -- before Christmas after they agreed to cooperate. … Siemens says that it is cooperating fully with investigators and that it has 'zero tolerance' for illegal behavior. It says any alleged wrongdoing was confined to 'individual acts' by certain managers but acknowledged in December that it had identified 'a material weakness' in its financial controls."

DOJ_NMG_0127623

Redstone Settles Suit With Son Over Family Fortune. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A2, Karnitschnig) reports, "Hollywood mogul Sumner Redstone, the chairman of both CBS Corp. and Viacom Inc., settled a lawsuit with his estranged son over the family's vast fortune, ending a potentially messy confrontation that threatened to complicate his succession plans." The Journal continues, "The terms of the agreement, filed in a court in Maryland where the family business, National Amusements Inc., is incorporated, weren't disclosed. But people close to the matter said the family company repurchased the one-sixth stake held by the son, Brent Redstone. … The sale also consolidates the elder Mr. Redstone's control over the family business. Before the settlement, Sumner Redstone owned two-thirds of National Amusements stock, while his son and daughter, Shari Redstone, shared equal ownership of the other third. Sumner Redstone now owns 80% of National Amusements and his daughter the remaining 20%. It was unclear how much National Amusements paid for the stake. The lawsuit valued the company, which holds a controlling stake in Viacom, CBS and a large cinema chain, at $8 billion." The Journal adds, "A spokesman for Sumner Redstone confirmed that a settlement had been reached but said the two sides had agreed to keep the details confidential. … Brent Redstone's suit, in which he alleged that his father led a campaign to 'freeze out' his son from the family business, offered a rare glimpse into the difficult personal relationships of one of Hollywood's most powerful men. Sumner Redstone expressed shock at the suit and said it had both pained and angered him."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Seeking More Capital Punishment Sentences. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A1, Conkey, Fields, 2.04M) reports, "At a time when many states are backing away from capital punishment, the federal government is aggressively pursuing -- and winning -- more death sentences, including in jurisdictions that traditionally oppose them. On Tuesday, federal prosecutors in New York persuaded a jury to give a death sentence to Ronell Wilson, a 24-year-old man convicted of killing two undercover detectives by shooting each in the back of the head. The decision -- the first time in more than 50 years that a federal jury in New York agreed to sentence someone to death -- marked something of a milestone for the Justice Department in its continuing effort to apply the death penalty more evenly across the country." The Journal notes there are "47 people on federal death row -- more than double the number six years ago -- and Mr. Wilson this week became the seventh sentenced in a state without a death statute of its own since the federal death penalty was reinstated in 1988. The ranks may grow in the months ahead, with several capital cases on tap in locales traditionally opposed to the death penalty."

Shifting Public Attitude Towards The Death Penalty Noted. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K) Andrew Cohen, CBS News' chief legal analyst, writes, "A majority of Americans still support capital punishment in one form or another (and there are still states, mostly in the South and the West, where juries are still handing down death sentences for murder). But there is a clear, marked trend toward limiting the circumstances in which capital punishment is applied and the manner in which executions are performed. As the Death Penalty Information Center notes, 'The number of death sentences per year has dropped dramatically since 1999.'"

Jury Convicts Former Coca-Cola Secretary Of Stealing Trade Secrets. The AP (2/3, Weber) reports, "A federal jury convicted a former Coca-Cola secretary Friday of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the world's largest beverage maker in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi." The AP continues, "Joya Williams faces up to 10 years in prison. No sentencing date was immediately set. … The jury of seven women and five men deliberated for 11 1/2 hours over three days. On Thursday, jurors told U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester they were "hung" and could not decide. Forrester told the jury to try again Friday. … She remains free on bond, pending sentencing." The AP adds, "Williams was fired as a secretary to Coca-Cola's global brand director at the company's Atlanta headquarters after the allegations came to light. … The government says Williams stole confidential documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, New York-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million. … Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Duhaney testified previously that Williams spearheaded the scheme. Dimson did not testify."

DOJ_NMG_0127624

The Financial Times (2/3, Ward) reports, "Jurors had been deadlocked over the verdict, but on Thursday the judge told them to keep trying to reach a decision. … The trial was in Atlanta, where Ms Williams worked as an administrative assistant to Javier Sanchez Lamelas, a senior Coke marketing officer." The Times adds, "Prosecutors played surveillance video taken inside Coke's headquarters showing the 41-year-old stuffing documents into her bag and handling bottles of prototype beverages, sometimes late in the evening. … Jurors heard that the stolen materials included details of a new Coke product code-named Project Lancelot. … The 120-year-old recipe of Coke's trademark cola – the so-called 'secret formula' -- was not involved. … Prosecutors explained how Ms Williams passed the stolen materials to her co-conspirators, both ex-convicts, who told PepsiCo they planned to sell to the highest bidder."

Former Duracell Employee Pleads Guilty To Stealing Trade Secrets. The AP (2/3) reports from Bridgeport, CT, "A former Duracell employee pleaded guilty Friday in Federal District Court to stealing trade secrets from the company, the authorities said." The AP continues, "Prosecutors said the former employee, Edward R. Grande, 48, a cell development technologist from Seymour, Conn., copied and downloaded computer research last year about Duracell's AA batteries. … Mr. Grande then sent the information to two Duracell competitors, prosecutors said. Neither of Duracell's competitors had requested or solicited Duracell's trade secret information, and both of the rivals sent the information back to Duracell." The AP adds, "Duracell, a unit of Procter & Gamble, generates more than $1 billion in revenue from the sale of AA batteries. … Sentencing is scheduled for April 23. … 'The theft of trade secrets is a serious crime that has the potential to cause significant economic damage to the owners of trade secrets and their shareholders,' the United States attorney for the district of Connecticut, Kevin O'Connor, said."

Mover Shot By Maryland Official Dies. The Washington Post (2/3, B1, Rich, Castaneda) reports, "A furniture deliveryman who was shot last week by a Prince George's County homeland security official died yesterday without having recovered to the point that he could describe the circumstances of the shooting, authorities and an attorney for his family said." The Post continues, "Brandon D. Clark, 22, of Oxon Hill succumbed to his injuries at Prince George's Hospital Center. He and a co-worker had been in critical condition there since they were shot by Keith A. Washington, who is a veteran county police officer, as they delivered a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to his home in Accokeek." The Post adds, "Police initially said that Washington, a former driver for County Executive Jack B. Johnson, apparently acted in self-defense and that Clark and his co-worker, Robert White, would probably be charged with assault. They have since backed off that statement, saying they would wait until detectives have completed their work before deciding whom to charge. … The movers were unarmed, authorities have said." The Post notes, "In a statement yesterday confirming Clark's death, Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High said, 'This is an unfortunate turn of events that now becomes a part of the internal and criminal investigation.' … The case has attracted wide attention because of a pattern of previous complaints against Washington, 45, who was appointed deputy homeland security director by Johnson in 2004."

Official Has History Of Conflict, Sources Say. The Washington Post (2/3, B1, Thompson) reports, "In the 10 days since Prince George's County homeland security official Keith A. Washington shot two unarmed deliverymen at his Accokeek home, some critics have told of run-ins with him dating back 15 years. They describe a man who loses his temper easily and has ended up in physical and verbal altercations." The Post continues, "Washington's supporters, including relatives and some county officials, have been reluctant to talk in the midst of an investigation, other than to say that Washington acted in self-defense. … The case took a turn yesterday when one of the men, Brandon D. Clark, 22, died at Prince George's Hospital Center. Clark, of Oxon Hill, and Robert White, 36, were delivering a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to Washington when they were shot during an altercation. White, of the District, remained in critical condition." The Post adds, "Washington has come under investigation at least three times by the Prince George's police department for assault complaints or "unbecoming conduct" and has been sued at least twice, including once by a D.C. police officer who said that Washington assaulted him and had him falsely arrested, according to interviews and court records. … 'Keith has a bad temper,' said Michon Charles, the mother of Washington's teenage daughter, Hali. 'He gets hot under the collar very quickly.'"

DOJ_NMG_0127625

Federal Agents Announce Early Successes In NOLA Crime Crackdown. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (2/3, Filosa) reported, "Federal agents announced a slew of arrests, indictments and convictions Friday, saying it marks only the start of their promise to team up with New Orleans police to end the violent crime wave plaguing New Orleans. … 'The feds are not screwing around,' said Jim Bernazzani, the FBI's special agent in charge of the New Orleans field division. 'The train has left the station.' In all, the federal, state and local partnership racked up two guilty verdicts, nine indictments of ten defendants, four arrests and one guilty plea in a plot to murder a Drug Enforcement Administration agent." The Times-Picayune added, "'In the federal system, there is no revolving door,' Bernazzani said. On Monday, FBI agents will meet with NOPD homicide detectives and begin pounding the pavement Tuesday, Bernazzani said. Fifteen agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration have been in the city since last week, embedded with the New Orleans Police Department, said Bill Renton, the DEA special agent in charge in New Orleans."

Virginia Men Plead Guilty In Fake "Purse Party" Scam. The Washington Post (2/3, B3, Markon) reports, "A father and son pleaded guilty yesterday to supplying phony designer purses at massive discounts for 'purse parties' in Northern Virginia and for kiosks they operated at malls throughout the Washington region." The Post continues, "Lalit Kumar Ohri, 63, and his son Gaurav Ohri, 28, both of Fairfax, admitted that they sold purses bearing the trademarks of some of the nation's leading designer labels, including Gucci and Prada. The pair had the counterfeit bags embossed with the sought-after labels or gave the labels to purchasers, some of whom affixed them to the purses with glue. The purses were purchased by the father and son from suppliers in New York. … 'I bought bags. They were counterfeit bags. . . . They were not genuine,' Gaurav Ohri, director of operations for the family company, Sonya Handbags, said as he pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to traffic in counterfeit goods. … 'We had the labels we put on the bags. They looked like the real labels,' Lalit Ohri, the company's owner, said as he pleaded guilty to the same charge in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Both face up to five years in prison when they are sentenced April 20." The Post notes, "With the last-minute pleas, they avoided a trial scheduled for Monday that had promised to be unusual at a federal courthouse that has hosted some of the nation's most prominent terrorism and spy cases. Representatives from Kate Spade, Louis Vuitton and other high-profile designers had been expected to testify, and prosecutors were planning to show the jury a sampling of hundreds of phony designer purses. … The case has focused attention on the trendy purse parties that began more than a decade ago in New York City and have been going on in Northern Virginia since at least 2000, according to partygoers. Held in private homes, the gatherings feature flowing wine and plentiful food, along with hundreds of designer handbags sold for hundreds of dollars less than the real deal. It is a crime to sell trademarked goods but not to purchase them. … Several women known as 'purse ladies,' who run the purse parties, had been expected to testify at the trial. The Ohris sold counterfeit purses to women who then re-sold them at purse parties 'throughout Northern Virginia,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeanine Linehan said in court yesterday."

Marion Barry Rejects Plea Offer. The Washington Post (2/3, B4, Cauvin) reports, "A D.C. Superior Court judge set a June 12 trial date yesterday for D.C. Council member Marion Barry on several traffic offenses -- charges that Barry and his attorney insist are unfounded." The Post continues, "Barry (D-Ward 8), a former D.C. mayor, has rejected an offer from prosecutors to plead guilty to operating a motor vehicle while impaired in an incident in which police said they detected the smell of alcohol. Had he accepted the offer, prosecutors would have dropped the other charges, including the more serious offense of driving under the influence. Prosecutors also would have dropped charges in connection with a subsequent traffic stop. … But in a hearing yesterday morning, Barry's attorney, Frederick D. Cooke Jr., told Magistrate Judge Milton C. Lee that there is little common ground between the D.C. attorney general's office and the defense and that a deal is unlikely. … 'He can't plead guilty to an offense he didn't commit,' Cooke said." The Post adds, "The charges against Barry, who stood next to his attorney during the brief hearing, stem from two traffic stops last year in the District. … In the first incident, Barry was pulled over Sept. 10 by uniformed Secret Service officers near the White House after allegedly running a red light. Police said he smelled of alcohol, and Barry was asked to take a breathalyzer test. An initial test came in below the legal limit, but officers said they wanted to conduct a urine test for alcohol, Cooke said in an interview. Barry declined to provide a urine sample, and according to Cooke, he said he was willing to take another breath test, which police chose not to administer. … The officers charged Barry with driving under the influence, which can be done when a driver refuses the urine test. But Cooke said that the officers should have given Barry another breath test unless they documented some reason why they could not. Absent that, Cooke said, all they have to stand on is Barry's .02 reading, which is below the legal limit."

DOJ_NMG_0127626

US Cracking Down On Online Gambling. The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Johnson) reports, "Federal prosecutors and agents in the FBI's organized crime unit have been mounting a large-scale crackdown on Internet gambling, with indictments against executives at gaming Web sites, arrests of foreign businessmen who process payments, and subpoenas to investment banks that may have helped bankroll the operations." The Post continues, "The aggressive campaign has gathered steam in recent weeks, as Americans prepare to wager more than $5 billion on tomorrow's game between the Chicago Bears and the Indianapolis Colts, the biggest betting day of the year, according to industry experts." The Post adds, "The arrests in California and in the U.S. Virgin Islands last month of two board members of Neteller, a British company that facilitates online money transfers, is spurring overseas executives with even modest gambling connections to avoid traveling to the United States lest they be nabbed. And it is leaving legal analysts and bettors crying foul about the government's approach. … Justice Department officials have long been on record as saying that Internet gambling breaks the law. They cite the long-standing Wire Act, a statute making it a crime to use telephone lines to place a bet within the United States or overseas. The 1961 law, which applies to businesses instead of individual bettors, was designed to eradicate the Mafia from the gambling arena. … But after the 2000 wire-fraud conviction of sports betting entrepreneur Jay Cohen for operating a Web site in Antigua, federal prosecutors enforced it only sporadically. The campaign heated up last year, after the government indicted two popular sports betting Web sites: Antigua's WorldWide Telesports Inc., and London's BetOnSports PLC. Both companies have announced they will no longer accept wagers from U.S. clients."

New York Fire Department Examining Promotions Involving Fake Diplomas. The New York Times (2/3, Buckley) reports that the New York City Fire Department "has not decided whether to take disciplinary action two days after a report revealed that 14 of its employees had used, or tried to use, bogus diplomas to be promoted or hired." The Times continues, "According to the report, by the Department of Investigation, the 14 employees paid hundreds of dollars to buy fake degrees from 'St. Regis University,' an online diploma mill that required no course work, to fulfill the department's educational requirements. … But a spokesman from the Fire Department and a fire union official said the report overstated the extent of the problem. While 13 employees and one job applicant bought the degrees from a fake online university to be promoted or hired, the fire department rejected the phony diplomas from all but three. Ten were hired or promoted anyway because they later legitimately obtained the required credits. The Fire Department also said it began rejecting diplomas in 2003 from the so-called university, which claimed that it was based in Liberia. … 'Of the 14 people, only 3 were promoted with that degree,' said Francis X. Gribbon, a department spokesman. 'We promoted 2,500 people since 2001. This is a handful of people we are talking about.'" The Times adds, "Yet according to Thomas Von Essen, who was fire commissioner from 1996 to 2001, the report underscored what he described as a lax attitude toward obtaining college credits in the department. Beginning in the late 1990s, Mr. Von Essen introduced requirements that higher-ranking Fire Department officials obtain a set number of college credits to be promoted. New hires would need college credits, too. … The Uniformed Firefighters Association, the fire officers' union, fought part of the new requirements. One of their arguments was that higher-ranking officers who came on the job when only high school diplomas were required should not need college credits to advance."

DOJ_NMG_0127627

Former New York Judge Testifies To Political Pressures. The New York Times (2/3, Lee) reports, "A former Brooklyn judge told a jury yesterday that she feared her career would be over if she did not pay $10,000 to associates of Clarence Norman Jr., the longtime leader of the borough's Democratic machine, for get-out-the-vote efforts and fliers during her re-election campaign in 2002." The Times continues, "The former judge, Karen B. Yellen of Brooklyn Civil Court, who ran on the Democratic ticket in the 2002 primary along with Mr. Norman, was the key witness for the prosecution in the weekold corruption trial against Mr. Norman, a former 12-term state assemblyman, in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn. … It is Mr. Norman's fourth corruption trial in two years. In this case, he is accused of pressuring Judge Yellen and another judicial candidate for thousands of dollars. In the week leading up to the 2002 primary, prosecutors say, Mr. Norman demanded that Judge Yellen pay his associates or be 'dumped' and lose the party's support." The Times adds, "Ms. Yellen's testimony repeated much of that given on Thursday by Jeffrey Feldman, Mr. Norman's former second in command. … Mr. Feldman and Ms. Yellen testified that Mr. Norman became angry when a member of the judge's camp asked what would happen if she did not pay. Prosecutors have said Mr. Norman wanted her to pay Ernest Lendler, a printer, $1,000 for a flier he designed, and William H. Boone III, a longtime associate of Mr. Norman's, $9,000 for get-out-the-vote efforts on Primary Day in the mostly black districts of central Brooklyn."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

California Teenagers Given Probation After Halloween Hate-Crime Beating. The AP (2/3) reports from Long Beach, CA, "Four of nine black teenagers convicted in the racially charged beating of three white women on Halloween were sentenced to probation Friday." The AP continues, "Punishment could have ranged up to confinement in a California Youth Authority lockup until age 25. The teens were ordered to serve 250 hours of community service, 60 days house arrest, and take anger management and racial tolerance programs. … 'It was an awful crime. Terrible, emotional and physical injuries,' Juvenile Court Judge Gibson Lee said." The AP adds, "Last week, Lee convicted nine teens — eight female and one male — of felony assault, with a hate-crime enhancement against all but one. … Among those sentenced Friday were an 18-year-old youth, his twin sister, their 16-year-old sister — who didn't receive the hate-crime enhancement — and another 16-year-old girl. … The other five defendants face sentencing next week. Names of the defendants were withheld because they are juveniles or were juveniles at the time and were tried as juveniles."

Judge Delays Decision On Port Chester, NY, Election. The New York Journal News (2/3, Sadler) reports, "A federal judged deferred a decision yesterday on whether to stop the March 20 (Port Chester) village election for two seats on the Board of Trustees." The News continues, "U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson will instead wait to hear arguments from both sides in the voting rights lawsuit filed by the U.S. Department of Justice against Port Chester, he said in a pre-trial conference. … The judge said he will presume that holding the election would cause irreparable harm, as the Justice Department alleges. The village must prove otherwise at trial later this month in order to proceed with the election." The News adds, "Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, argued that stopping the election would actually cause irreparable harm to the village because it would force a special election and disenfranchise voters. He said the trustee race would provide a good "snapshot" of Hispanic voter turnout because a Hispanic candidate is running. … But U.S. Attorney David Kennedy said 'this can only be decided after a full and fair hearing.' He said it would be 'informative but wrong' to hold the election in March." The News notes, "The Justice Department sued the village in December, asserting that its at-large method of electing its six trustees violates the federal Voting Rights Act. It is asking the judge to replace Port Chester's system with one in which trustees are elected from six districts. It is also asking the judge to stop the March trustee election until voting districts are implemented."

11th Circuit Finds No Discrimination In Georgia Farmworkers Case. The Moultrie (GA) Observer (2/3, Glenn) reports from Ellenton, GA, "The U.S. Court of Appeals 11th Circuit Thursday upheld a decision from the U.S. Justice Department that a Colquitt County farmer did not discriminate against 17 Puerto Rican farmworkers in favor of Mexican labor." The Observer continues, "The plaintiffs had traveled from Puerto Rico to Georgia in 2003 to work for Booth Farms under a contract approved by the U.S. Department of Labor. They arrived a few days after a group of federal H2A program workers from Mexico. … Producer Larry Booth, of Ellenton, had maintained that some of the citizen workers (Puerto Rico is a territory of the United States) were slow pickers and didn't pick enough to earn the equivalent piece rate of $7.49 an hour, the Adverse Effect Wage Rate at the time, so he fired them citing economic reasons. The plaintiffs complained that no Mexican H2A workers who didn't work up to Booth's standard weren't fired and subsequently filed a discrimination suit. Federal law requires that employers hire Americans over H2A workers, but the plainiffs said Booth favored Mexican workers over Puerto Rican regardless of production rates." The Observer adds, "The 17 workers, some of whom Booth said he didn't fire, were represented through the Georgia Legal Services Farmworker Division. Booth represented himself pro se with some assistance from friend and cousin former Georgia Senator Franklin Sutton, also of Ellenton. Booth wasn't able to secure financing for his farming operation because of the suit and had to sell out, he said. Plus, the same 17 plaintiffs have filed a suit in Puerto Rico against Booth Farms seeking about $383,000."

DOJ_NMG_0127628

Mississippi VRA Challenge Seen As National Test. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (2/3) editorializes, "Quietly, with little fanfare, a national test of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is under way in Mississippi." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "This month, U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee has been presiding over the first case in U.S. history in which the federal government has accused black election officials of violating the Voting Rights Act by discriminating against white voters. … The U.S. Justice Department is alleging that Noxubee County Democratic Party Chairman Ike Brown and other Noxubee County election officials have rigged the voting process against white voters by manipulating voter rolls, making public threats to ban some whites from voting, certifying candidates who did not live in districts they sought to represent, miscounting ballots to ensure white candidates lost and other discriminatory acts. … Brown has denied all allegations, accusing the white minority in Noxubee County of petty complaints after years of white discrimination against black voters there." The Clarion-Ledger concludes, "The key question facing Judge Lee isn't whether Noxubee County or Mississippi has a sordid history of white election officials discriminating against black voters. The county and the state are guilty on both counts. … The question is if Brown and other black officials in Noxubee have used their powers to do the very same thing to white voters. .. The Voting Rights Act must be enforced equally for voters of all races."

Civil-Rights Era Killings Under Renewed Scrutiny. The New York Times (2/3, Dewan) reports from Atlanta, "For every infamous killing that tore at the South in the 1950s and '60s, there were many more that were barely noted, much less investigated." The Times continues, "Virtually all such cases gained momentum only when the victims of the past found voices in the present, like those that helped arrest a 71-year-old man last month in connection with the Klan killings of two black teenagers in Mississippi in 1964. Rather than police officials, it has often been journalists and filmmakers who have combed through documents and tracked down witnesses, fueling some 15 years of successful prosecutions." The Times adds, "Only now, with time running out because potential witnesses and suspects are dying off, have law enforcement officials begun to take a systematic approach to unsolved civil rights crimes. The Federal Bureau of Investigation recently canvassed its field offices for the first time, compiling a list of 51 victims in 39 cases, most of which were never investigated by the bureau. … The list was prompted not by the string of convictions, but by a letter about the lynching of two black couples at the Moore's Ford Bridge, east of Atlanta, in 1946, said Chip Burrus, the assistant director of the F.B.I.'s criminal investigative division. … That a single letter prodded the F.B.I. to action illustrates how slender are the time-brittled fibers that knit together the outcome in these fading crimes. … In the case that produced the recent arrest, timing was crucial. If the bodies of the victims, Henry H. Dee and Charles E. Moore, had been found just three weeks earlier in the summer of 1964, their deaths might have been largely forgotten."

NYPD "Stop And Frisks" Soar. The New York Times (2/3, Baker, Vasquez) reports, "The New York Police Department released new information yesterday showing that police officers stopped 508,540 individuals on New York City streets last year — an average of 1,393 stops per day — often searching them for illegal weapons. The number was up from 97,296 in 2002, the last time the department divulged 12 months' worth of data." The Times continues, "After inquiries by the City Council and civil rights advocates, the department delivered four bound volumes of statistics to the Council in midafternoon. The raw data showed that more than half of those stopped last year were black: an average of 67,000 per quarter. … At the same time, the average number of people arrested per quarter as a result of such stops almost doubled to 5,317 last year, from 2,819 in 2002, and summonses nearly quintupled, to a quarterly average of 7,292 last year from 1,461 in 2002." The Times adds, "Until yesterday, the most recent information released by the Police Department about how and why it stops people to search them, sometimes looking for illegal guns, was from 2003, according to city officials and city and court records. Some officials have said that lag put the department at odds with a pair of legal requirements that sprang from public outrage at the 1999 fatal police shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed black street peddler. … The department, which rejects such assertions, has not released numbers from 2004 and 2005, or from the last three months of 2003. … Those who review the data are now grappling with dual issues: determining why the Police Department waited so long to release any new figures, and why it is stopping more people and searching them." The Times notes, "The issue of these police-public encounters — called 'stop and frisks' — became an emotional flashpoint after the shooting of Mr. Diallo, whose death in a barrage of 41 police bullets led to weeks of protests and scores of arrests outside 1 Police Plaza, in Lower Manhattan. … Many of the protesters contended that there was a pattern of racial profiling in stop-and-frisks. A state study later in 1999 confirmed racial disparities in such stops."

DOJ_NMG_0127629

Michigan Court Rules Against Domestic Partner Benefits. The New York Times (2/3, A10, Saulny, 1.16M) reports, "Same-sex domestic partners are not entitled to health benefits from public universities or local and state governments under the State Constitution's two-year-old marriage amendment, the Michigan Court of Appeals said in a ruling released Friday. In a reversal of a lower court ruling, a three-judge panel found that the amendment, which bans same-sex marriage, also prohibited government agencies from recognizing 'similar unions' like domestic partnerships for any purposes."

The Washington Times/AP (2/3) reports, "The appeals court agreed with the Michigan attorney general, Republican Mike Cox, who said in a March 2005 opinion that same-sex benefits are not allowed in a state that does not recognize same-sex unions. The legal challenge was mounted by 21 homosexual couples who work for the city of Kalamazoo, universities and the state."

WPost Endorses Voting Reform Paper Trail Requirement. The Washington Post (2/3, A14, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Lawmakers locally and nationally are moving in the right direction in pushing for improvements in how Americans vote. Foremost is the growing movement to require an independent way to verify the results of electronic voting. It's critical, though, that this reform effort be calibrated so that local election officials are given the time and resources to do the job properly. Congress is expected to consider legislation this year requiring that the nation's electronic voting machines produce a paper trail so that people can verify the accuracy of their votes and to facilitate recounts in disputed elections. … While we have not been in the camp of those seeing fanciful conspiracies in electronic voting, a backup system is without question the best way to safeguard security and ensure voter confidence."

ANTITRUST:

Viacom Orders YouTube To Remove Its Videos. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A3, Karnitschnig) reports, "Deciding that trading its copyright protection for Internet buzz was no longer viable, Viacom Inc. ordered Google Inc.'s YouTube to remove all of its content from the video Web site." The Journal continues, "Viacom's decision to force YouTube, which hosts a vast array of video content uploaded by its users, to take down more than 100,000 video clips from its Web site may yet prove to be a negotiating tactic aimed at drawing the company into a deal. But Viacom executives said privately they had determined that the marketing boost they once believed YouTube provided them has proved to be a mirage. … 'People are waking up to the fact that there is no marketing advantage,' a Viacom executive said. 'There's no novelty anymore.' YouTube Chief Executive Chad Hurley said in an interview that other media companies such as CBS and NBC that partnered with YouTube felt otherwise." The Journal notes, "Viacom's decision comes after the two camps failed to reach a distribution agreement despite months of negotiation punctuated by pointed rhetoric from Viacom, which owns a stable of cable networks that includes MTV, Nickelodeon and Comedy Central as well as the Paramount movie studio."

The Financial Times (2/3, Chaffin, Van Duyn) reports, "Viacom, which owns youth brands such as Nickelodeon and Comedy Central, made the demand after months of negotiations with YouTube and Google. It said more than 100,000 affected video clips on the YouTube site had generated more than 1.2bn video streams. … The move threatens to wreck Google's attempts to cement commercial relationships with traditional media groups, which supply most material."

DOJ_NMG_0127630

The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Musgrove) reports, "The dilemma for Viacom, as it yanks back control over clips from its popular networks, is whether YouTube is more of a marketing tool that helps it win new viewers, or a business threat. … Though YouTube, which was purchased by Google last year, said it would take down the clips, as of yesterday afternoon there were still thousands for shows like Comedy Central's 'The Colbert Report' on its site." The Post notes, "The tussle between the companies is indicative of a rocky transition for traditional broadcast interests, which must try to make business sense out of the online entertainment age, in which content is easy to produce, copy and distribute. Many networks are putting shows on their own Web sites, but YouTube, which is just a year old, has become the online nexus for trading both homemade and cribbed video. It serves up 100 million videos and its users upload 65,000 videos a day, and now that it's backed by Google's massive advertising machine, YouTube stands to become its own advertising behemoth."

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/3, Lee) reports, "The dispute reflects how popular San Bruno's YouTube has become as an online source of entertainment. And it highlights the dilemmas media companies face as they try to keep control of their material in the digital age. … Since exploding onto the Web less than two years ago, YouTube has drawn ire -- as well as millions of loyal fans -- for its vast and rapidly growing library of videos, many of them copyrighted clips from popular television shows and movies. The site's mushrooming popularity got the attention of Internet powerhouse Google, which bought YouTube for $1.65 billion last year."

USA Today/AP (2/3, Sutel) reports, "Under federal copyright law, online services such as YouTube are generally immune from liability as long as it responds to takedown requests such as these, which YouTube often does. Less clear legally is what happens when another user posts the same video, something commonly done on the free video-sharing site. … In November, YouTube agreed to delete nearly 30,000 files after the Japan Society for Rights of Authors, Composers and Publishers complained of copyright infringement."

Equity Board Rejects Vornado Offer, Endorses Blackstone Bid. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/3, D2) reports, "Equity Office Properties Trust, the target of the largest real estate takeover, yesterday rejected a $41 billion offer from Vornado Realty Trust, saying a $38.3 billion cash bid by Blackstone Group L.P. is less risky for shareholders." Bloomberg continues, "Equity Office said a sale to New York-based Vornado would take months to complete, while a buyout by Blackstone would close within days. Given the time delay, Equity Office put the value of Vornado's bid of $56 a share in cash and stock at $54.28 to $54.88. Blackstone's offer is $54 a share. … The stock closed yesterday at $55.38, up 23 cents a share." Bloomberg adds, "Equity Office of Chicago postponed a vote on the Blackstone bid by two days to Feb. 7 to give shareholders time to review its stance on the Vornado offer, according to a statement filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission. If Blackstone's bid is approved, the purchase would be completed on or about Feb. 9. … The decision by the board of the biggest U.S. office landlord is a setback to Vornado chief executive Steven Roth, who first pursued the company in July. Now Blackstone's Stephen A. Schwarzman must win approval of Equity Office investors to complete the biggest leveraged buyout ever and gain 543 buildings across the country."

Suit Claims Dell Did Not Disclose Intel Payments. The San Jose Mercury News (2/3, Poletti) reports, "Intel's program of rebates to its computer-making customers has come under serious fire again, this time in a massive class-action complaint claiming the chip giant's rebates to Dell inflated the troubled computer maker's profits by $800 million a year." The News continues, "A 252-page lawsuit was filed against Dell in federal court in Austin, contending that Dell did not disclose the rebates -- which the suit also called kickback payments -- from Intel. The suit claims that Dell's reported profits were propped up by about $800 million a year by rebates Intel paid to Dell in return for exclusively using Intel chips in its computers. … The suit was filed by a well-known law firm, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, on behalf some Dell shareholders, including Amalgamated Bank." The News adds, "Until last year, Dell was the only computer maker to solely use chips developed by Intel. While most PC and computer server makers have been using chips developed by Intel archrival Advanced Micro Devices, Dell was a major holdout. Last year, it began to use AMD chips. … The suit was filed Wednesday, the same day founder Michael Dell said he was returning as chief executive after Kevin Rollins resigned. The company's chief financial officer, James Schneider, stepped down in December and was replaced by board member Donald Carty."

DOJ_NMG_0127631

The AP (2/3, Koenig) reports, "Mary Blasy, one of the lawyers who filed the lawsuit, said in an interview that the plaintiffs don't claim that the payments were illegal. Rather, she said, they believed Dell cheated investors by concealing the payments, which the company didn't control and gave a false picture of Dell's financial strength." The AP adds, "The lawsuit charges that Dell got the Intel payments 'for shipping only Intel-based products and not doing business with AMD,' Advanced Micro Devices Inc. Dell began using chips from Intel's rival last year. … The payments to Dell were mentioned in an ongoing antitrust lawsuit that AMD filed against Intel in 2005. The Lerach law firm learned the size of the payments from Dell insiders, Blasy said."

Delta Creditors Approve Terms Of Bankruptcy Financing Program. The AP (2/3, Weber) reports, "Lawyers for Delta Air Lines Inc., the third-largest U.S. carrier, said Friday in court papers that the company's creditors' committee has approved the terms of the $2.5 billion in financing that Delta has secured to emerge from bankruptcy protection." The AP continues, "The disclosure was made as Delta amended its reorganization plan for a second time. Other technical changes also were made to the plan, which was first filed Dec. 19 and amended on Jan. 19. … Delta's chief bankruptcy lawyer, Marshall Huebner, said the official unsecured creditors' committee's support of the exit financing is a 'tremendous milestone for us as we move toward exiting Chapter 11 under our standalone plan.'" The AP adds, "The filing also provided a few new details of the behind-the-scenes discussions in recent weeks by Delta's board regarding US Airways' now withdrawn $9.8 billion hostile takeover bid. … Delta's board discussed US Airways' revised proposal several times before US Airways withdrew the bid on Wednesday, including that day. The board took no action. … Tempe, Arizona-based US Airways Group Inc. withdrew its bid for Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines Inc. after Delta's official committee of unsecured creditors said it supports Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the spring as a standalone carrier, thus rejected US Airways' merger offer."

MediaNews Purchases Santa Cruz Sentinel. The AP (2/3) reports, "MediaNews Group Inc. said Friday that it has acquired the Santa Cruz Sentinel from Community Newspaper Holdings Inc." The AP continues, "MediaNews, with 56 daily publications, said the California Newspapers Partnership -- which is majority-owned by MediaNews -- acquired the Sentinel, a daily. … MediaNews funded its share of the purchase through a revolving credit agreement. Gannett Co. and SF Holding Corp., the other partners, contributed their share of the purchase price. Financial terms were not disclosed." The AP adds, "Dean Singleton, MediaNews' chief executive officer, said the Santa Cruz newspaper will bolster the company's reach in California. 'The Santa Cruz Sentinel is a fine newspaper today but will be strengthened by the resources of our existing newspapers,' he said. … MediaNews, which owns the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers, acquired the Monterey County Herald, San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. last year. The complex $1 billion deal included $300 million in financing from the Hearst Corp., owner of the San Francisco Chronicle. The deal between MediaNews and Hearst is the subject of a federal antitrust lawsuit filed by a San Francisco businessman."

Judge Rules Microsoft May Question Expert Who Discovered Violation. The Des Moines Register (2/3) reports, "The computer expert who said he found evidence that Microsoft is violating a federal consent decree can be interviewed by Microsoft lawyers for up to five hours, Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg has ruled." The Register continues, "The expert, Andrew Schulman, is a witness for Iowa consumers suing Microsoft for anti-trust violations and up to $330 million in damages. … The consent decree ended a federal anti-trust case against Microsoft several years ago." The Register adds, "Schulman reportedly found evidence it was being violated while digging through mountains of secret computer code that is used to drive Microsoft products. … Microsoft lawyers had already questioned Schulman for seven hours in an earlier deposition, but he reported the violation after that testimony. His report caused Microsoft lawyers to ask for permission to question Schulman again before he testifies in court."

DOJ_NMG_0127632

Express Scripts Sweetens Bid For Caremark. Dow Jones (2/3) reports, "Express Scripts Inc. is expected to triumph in its bidding war with CVS Corp. for pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Rx Inc. with a sweetened offer price, one industry analyst concluded after conducting a survey of Caremark and CVS clients. … 'Absent a significant external event (pressure from Congress, material adverse change in the industry) or a stronger sales pitch from Caremark-CVS (entirely possible), we expect Express Scripts will acquire Caremark at a higher price,' Cowen & Co. analyst Kemp Dolliver wrote in a research note Friday. He assumed a $3-a-share increase to Express Scripts' current offer, to roughly $62 a share. … 'We continue to think that Express Scripts has the upper hand in the competition for Caremark,' Dolliver said. 'Our survey indicates that Caremark's and CVS' clients share the same uncertainty over the deal as the investment community.' … Dolliver subsequently reiterated an outperform rating on Express Scripts shares." Dow Jones adds, "Caremark in November agreed to a so-called 'merger of equals' with retail drugstore chain CVS Corp. in a deal that would give Caremark shareholders 1.67 shares of CVS share for each share held.The following month, Express Scripts launched a competing, hostile $26 billion cash-and-stock bid for its larger PBM rival which, at the time, represented a 15% premium over CVS' offer. … The Caremark-CVS bid was sweetened in January with a $2 a share onetime dividend."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Bush Administration Expresses Agreement With Global Warming Report. ABC World News (2/2, story 3, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The top climate experts from all around the world, speaking with one voice, issued a blunt and bleak assessment in global warming. They spoke of the damage already done and the fears about where we are headed." NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 4, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Some say it is a wakeup call loud and clear. But US Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman today called America a small contributor to it and called for a global discussion of today's report." ABC World News (2/2, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the White House "said it agreed with today's report. But officials rejected the idea of mandatory reductions in greenhouse gas emissions. If anything new and significant is to be done about global warming, businesses, individuals and governments will all have to play a role. … But some companies, and many scientists, say not much will depend without a push from government. Tough, new laws to force companies to cut greenhouse gases. And the Bush administration is against that, especially if other countries, such as China and India, do not do the same."

The Financial Times (2/3, Harvey) reports, "The world's leading climate scientists on Friday swept away the last doubts surrounding global warming." BBC.com (2/3) reports, "Governments around the world have called for urgent action to tackle climate change, after a major report said mankind was very likely the cause. The EU said it was the starkest warning yet, while the UK said climate change threatened world peace and prosperity. The US administration said the report was 'valuable', but rejected mandatory controls to reduce greenhouse gases."

The Washington Post (2/3, Eilperin, 690K), in a front-page article, reports, "Declaring that 'warming of the climate system is unequivocal,' the authors said in their 'Summary for Policymakers' that even in the best-case scenario, temperatures are on track to cross a threshold to an unsustainable level." The Post notes Bush administration officials "welcomed the report and emphasized that U.S. research funding helped underpin its conclusions. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Administrator Conrad C. Lautenbacher Jr., who oversees much of the nation's climate research, said in an interview that the international assessment will lead to 'a more objective and informative public debate.'"

The New York Times (2/3, Rosenthal, Revkin, 1.16M), also in a front-page story, reports the Bush administration, "which until recently avoided directly accepting that humans were warming the planet in potentially harmful ways, embraced the findings. …. Administration officials asserted Friday that the United States had played a leading role in studying and combating climate change, in part by an investment of an average of almost $5 billion a year for the past six years in research and tax incentives for new technologies. At the same time, Secretary of Energy Samuel Bodman rejected the idea of unilateral limits on emissions. 'We are a small contributor to the overall, when you look at the rest of the world, so it's really got to be a global solution,' he said."

The Chicago Tribune (2/3, Neikirk, 617K) reports the Bush administration "embraced the report but rejected demands for a mandatory system of capping 'greenhouse gas' emissions, such as carbon dioxide. Instead, the administration said President Bush would rely on his plans to develop more renewable fuel and require more efficient vehicles. But with Democrats controlling Congress, pressure is apt to build on the White House to take a tougher approach." Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid said, "President Bush should immediately work with Congress to pass legislation that requires reductions in the emissions of greenhouse gases, and he should call together the leaders of the world to obtain their binding commitment to reducing pollution around the globe."

DOJ_NMG_0127633

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Maugh, Kaplan, 850K) reports, "Although most of the scientific data behind the report have come out before, their aggregation into a single report, phrased in the boldest of terms, sparked an intense reaction Friday. 'The degree of certainty, which was already very high, is now as close to certain as scientists are willing to say,' said former Vice President Al Gore. … Echoing a phrase that was widely heard Friday, Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) called the report 'a scientific smoking gun.'"

US Scientists Claim New Report Underestimates Risks. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A4, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "U.S. government scientists Friday said the long-term outlook for global warming may be more dire than suggested by this week's United Nations' report, which they say doesn't fully address the impact of clouds and melting glaciers. … The computer models used for the IPCC report based their predictions only on the results of heating of the existing water in the world's oceans, causing the oceans to expand and sea levels to rise, said Tom Delworth, a climate modeler for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration." The AP (2/2, Borenstein) reports, "The worst could mean more than 1 million dead and hundreds of billions of dollars in costs by 2100, said the NOAA's Kevin Trenberth. … 'It's later than we think,' said panel co-chair Susan Solomon, the U.S. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration scientist who helped push through the document's strong language."

Gore To Testify At House Hearing On Global Warming. The Politico (2/2, Grim) reports former Vice President Al Gore "has accepted an invitation to testify next month in a congressional hearing on the highly controversial issue of climate change. … For people who make a parlor game of guessing Gore's intentions for 2008, the appearance will surely stoke speculation that he may yet be a late entrant into the Democratic presidential derby. Gore will appear at a joint hearing on Wednesday, March 21. He will be the only witness to appear before the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Energy and Air Quality and the Science and Technology Subcommittee on Energy and Environment."

IPCC "Supercomittee" Dismissed As Overly Political. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/3, A11, 2.04M) Philip Stott, Stott, professor emeritus of biogeography at the University of London, writes, "I confess I was afflicted by a profound world-weariness following the release yesterday of the latest gloomy machinations from the IPCC. … Unfortunately, the IPCC represents science by supercommittee. … Moreover, the IPCC does no original research, nor does it monitor climate-related data; its evidence is instead from selected secondary sources. But, above all, this supercommittee is more political than is often recognized, rule three firmly reminding delegates that: 'documents should involve both peer review by experts and review by governments.'"

States' Ocean Habitat Rescue Initiatives Hailed. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/3, A15, 690K) Leon Panetta and James Watkins, co-chairmen of the Joint Ocean Commission Initiative, write, "Buried beneath the headlines about warming oceans, harmful algae blooms and dwindling seafood stocks is the fact that it is within our power to make immediate, measurable progress toward solving the problems facing our oceans. Innovative state leaders are showing us the way, and the federal government needs to follow their example. Over the past three years, California, acting to preserve a vital state resource, has developed an Ocean Action Plan; launched the most comprehensive approach to marine protected areas in the nation; and invested more than $30 million in projects to improve water quality, protect ocean habitats and manage sand on its beaches. In the past year, at least 18 states have taken similar steps. … In most respects, though, the federal government and Congress lag behind states in efforts to protect our oceans."

Tribe Challenges Interior Official's Recognition Authority. Indian Country Today (2/3, Toensing) reports from Kent, CT, "The Schaghticoke Tribal Nation has challenged Interior Department Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason's authority to act as 'the decision-maker' in overturning the tribe's federal acknowledgement in October 2005." ICT continues, "In the latest twist in the Schaghticokes' decades-long quest for federal recognition, attorneys filed a motion Jan. 23 in U.S. District Court in New Haven, claiming that Cason violated both the Appointments Clause of the Constitution and the Vacancies Reform Act when on Oct. 12, 2005, he issued a Reconsidered Final Determination reversing the BIA's January 2004 positive federal acknowledgement decision. … Cason was functioning as an Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs but was not appointed by the president or confirmed by Congress, and therefore exceeded his authority by issuing decisions that only a 'principal officer of the United States' can lawfully render; therefore, the RFD is void, STN's attorneys wrote. … Cason also reversed that day the federal status of the Eastern Pequots, whose federal recognition had been issued two years earlier." ICT adds, "The motion is part of the tribe's appeal of the reversal of its recognition. The appeal alleges, among other things, that the RFD was arbitrary and capricious, a violation of the tribe's due process rights and the product of unlawful political influence and congressional interference. It asks the court to restore the tribe's recognition. Interior and its officials are named as defendants. … The appeal is 'the Tribe's remaining hope to regain the federal recognition that was wrongly taken from it in the RFD. It is no exaggeration to say that the Tribe is fighting for its very existence. What happened to this Tribe, including the circumstances in which it lost its prior positive recognition are, at a minimum, unusual and deserving of careful review. The Tribe has alleged since its federal recognition first came under attack that various political officials acted improperly to reverse that recognition. This improper delegation of authority to Mr. Cason is one more part of the story of the illegal handling of the Tribe's recognition. The Court should hear the full story of the Tribe's fate,' one of the attorneys said. … The Schaghticokes' claims have 'no merit,' said Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal, who led the state's relentless opposition to the tribe's federal recognition."

DOJ_NMG_0127634

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Budget Includes Additional Education Funding, Entitlements Cuts. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Havemann, 850K) reports, "In a bid to balance the federal budget in five years, President Bush will seek cuts in several key programs. But the spending blueprint he sends to Congress on Monday leaves room for some sweeteners, according to administration officials. Under the Bush plan, grants for college students would rise after remaining stagnant for three years, and some parts of the No Child Left Behind Act would receive additional funding. There would be new money to spur the manufacture of hybrid cars and production of ethanol. And a new farm bill would give farmers $1 billion more a year than the current law. At the same time, Bush will ask for substantial cuts in Medicare and Medicaid, the government's main healthcare programs." The Times goes on to report that the Pentagon budget, including "will hit $623 billion, according to a senior Defense official. That total includes $481 billion for the military's normal annual budget, a 10% increase over this year's spending. … The budget request also includes, for the first time, funding details for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan; in past years, these war costs have been approved as special emergency funding bills.'

Some Claim Bush Budget Numbers Are Unrealistic. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A2, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that President Bush's budget "will be an early effort to cement his legacy in domestic policy. The key question: Can he convince members of Congress that they can extend his cherished tax cuts, all of which expire by 2010, and still balance the budget? Mr. Bush has pledged to show a path to erasing the existing $248 billion. … Those projections will assume that Mr. Bush's tax cuts, which are estimated to cost about $450 billion over the next five years, are made permanent But the White House is expected to leave out or underestimate other key costs, including an expensive fix to the alternative minimum tax and additional funding for the war in Iraq beyond 2009. It will also include strong revenue growth that some economists may see as unrealistic. As the Bush budget will show, the deficit numbers are notoriously dependent on such assumptions."

NYTimes Praises Democrats For Cutting Earmarks. The New York Times (2/3, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "The Democratic-led House has made the most of a sorry budgetary business, stripping out billions of dollars in earmarked pork from a spending measure urgently needed to keep the government running this year. The $463.5 billion bill is an omnibus mop-up device necessitated by the fact that nine of 11 major spending bills were left unfinished last fall by the Republican leadership in its final weeks of power. The Democrats, who promised to cut out special-interest budget goodies, killed thousands of earmarks custom-designed by lawmakers. … The House measure now heads to the Senate as that rare piece of legislative sausage devoid of expensive, toothsome pork."

DOJ_NMG_0127635

Bush Backs Three Percent Raise For Federal Employees. The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Barr, 690K) reports Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at the OMB said President Bush "will propose a 3 percent pay raise for federal employees and military personnel in his fiscal 2008 budget, a senior administration official said yesterday." Johnson "said the president's civil service pay advisers and Pentagon officials had acted independently in coming up with their pay recommendations. If accepted by Congress, the raises would take effect next January." House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, "a longtime advocate for federal employees," said he "planned to study the budget proposal, particularly in the context of what he called 'an already significant pay gap between federal employees and their private-sector counterparts.'"

Bush Said To Have "Adopted" Democrats' Rhetoric On Domestic Issues. The Washington Post (2/3, A4, Fletcher, 690K), in an article titled, "Bush To Urge Democrats To Consider His Domestic Policy," reports that in "an attempt to sustain key elements of a domestic agenda pronounced dead on arrival by congressional critics, President Bush will challenge the newly empowered House Democrats to give his health-care and energy proposals serious consideration when he addresses them today during a retreat in Virginia. … On domestic matters…Bush has recently adopted the rhetoric -- but not the policy positions -- often associated with Democrats. He has invoked the menace of global climate change, lamented the nation's growing income inequality, and set ambitious goals to develop alternative fuels and cut gasoline consumption. He has also proposed a plan to make health insurance more affordable." According to the Post, Democrats "have greeted such offerings with suspicion. Leading House Democrats remain dismissive of Bush's health-care proposals, in particular." Joel Kaplan, Bush's deputy chief of staff "and a key figure in the development of the president's agenda, said the president's domestic plans confront 'real challenges faced by real people, and they provide real solutions.'"

Senators' Failure To Promptly Disclose Campaign Donations Draws Scrutiny. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Morain, 850K) reports, "Unlike candidates for president and the House, political action committees and most state offices, senators refuse to transmit their campaign donation reports over the Internet. Thanks to a labyrinthine process that takes weeks or months, they are able to delay public access to their campaign donors' identities — sometimes until after the election. Now that seven senators are running for the White House and using money raised as senators to jump-start their campaigns, the practice is under renewed scrutiny. Senators have blocked repeated efforts, backed by 25 of their colleagues from both parties, to change the law. … Like all federal officeholders, senators were required to submit year-end campaign finance reports by Wednesday. Such reports are public documents. But that doesn't mean they are publicly available. Nor will they be any time soon."

CHC Chairman Baca Rebuts Sanchez's Allegations. The Politico (2/2, Hearn) reports, "Amid roiling turmoil in the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, chairman Joe Baca Friday refuted accusations that he had called Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a 'whore,' had mismanaged the group's political arm, thwarted the advancement of female lawmakers and was improperly elected chairman. In a lengthy statement, Baca said he was 'deeply troubled' by the allegations made by several of his colleagues in the 21-member caucus. … 'A months-old internal CHC discussion has been repackaged into accusations with sexual overtones through irresponsible reporting and inflammatory headline writing,' he said. He reiterated his statement, issued Wednesday, that the claims were 'categorically untrue.' Aides to Sanchez and Reps. Hilda L. Solis and Linda Sanchez, two California Democrats who have been very critical of Baca, could not be reached for comment." Baca "dismissed Loretta Sanchez's charge that he had referred to her as a 'whore' during a meeting with California state legislators, including Democratic Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez. Specifically, Baca noted news reports that Nunez had said he has 'no recollection' of the remark."

LATimes Explores Animosity Between Baca And Sanchez. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K), in an editorial, notes "the bad feelings stretch back a year, when caucus PAC money was being used to boost the political fortunes of Baca's sons, Joe Jr. and Jeremy. Jeremy needed the money to help his family keep the state Assembly seat being vacated by Joe Jr., who was trying to extend the Baca empire into the state Senate. Both Baca brothers lost, despite the infusion of PAC money, and it may be worth noting that their opponents were women: Gloria Negrete McLeod defeated Joe Jr., and his old seat went not to his brother but to Wilmer Amina Carter. Sanchez and four other Californians — including her sister, Rep. Linda T. Sanchez (D-Lakewood) — and an Arizonan quit the PAC over the use of money for family members."

DOJ_NMG_0127636

New Air Traffic Control System Could Cost As Much As $76 Billion. The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Wilber, 690K) reports, "Federal aviation officials expect on Monday to begin introducing a proposal to finance a new air-traffic control system that they say will be needed to keep pace with increasing air travel over the next two decades. Without a new system, officials say, passengers would face delays that would dwarf last year's snarls. 'In the long term, we could see real gridlock,' said Federal Aviation Administrator Marion C. Blakey. … A debate is unfolding over how to finance the next-generation network, which could cost $69 billion to $76 billion, according to the Congressional Research Service. The Federal Aviation Administration and other government agencies want the system completed by 2025. They have not said how much it would cost. The FAA would use its trust fund, which accumulates aviation-related taxes, to pay for the new system. The fund's balance has dropped to $1.8 billion, however, the lowest in a decade, officials said."

Football Fan Rice Picks Colts To Win Super Bowl. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared on ESPN (2/2) to talk about her love of football and Sunday's Super Bowl game. Asked about the significance of this being the first Super Bowl where both coaches will be black, Rice said, "I think it's terrific and as an African-American, I'm really, really proud." Asked for her prediction on the winner of the Chicago Bears-Indianapolis Colts matchup, Rice said, "I have to like the Colts, because I think that offensively, they are a better football team. I also think that they've been playing very well defensively."

Super Bowl Security Efforts Previewed. The CBS Evening News (2/2, story 7, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) ran a detailed report on security planning for the big game, which has been designated a Level One National Security Event by the Department of Homeland Security, as it has been each year since the 9/11 attacks.

NYTimes Considers New NHTSA Crash Tests "Overdue." The New York Times (2/3, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes that the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration "is exploring ways to strengthen its tests and its ratings system for the crashworthiness of motor vehicles. The effort is long overdue but still likely to fall short of what's needed. In far too many cases, the tests are weaker than they should be and fail to address current kinds of accidents, like what happens when one of today's larger vehicles collides with a smaller one."

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Report "Just About Perfect," Bush Economic Adviser Says. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A3, Conkey, 2.04M) reports the Labor Department said Friday that "nonfarm payrolls rose by 110,000 jobs last month following December's gain of 206,000 jobs. The smaller increase in January -- together with a rise in the unemployment rate to 4.6% from 4.5% in December and a tepid 0.2% gain in the typical employee's pay last month -- suggests the economy is slowing somewhat after a strong finish to 2006." The Financial Times (2/3, Callan, Mackenzie) says the "signs of cooling in the labour market are consistent with the Federal Reserve's view that inflation pressures are starting to moderate as the economy coasts towards a soft landing." Ed Lazear, an economic adviser to President Bush, said, "This jobs report is just about perfect. It suggests that the economy is balanced. It suggests we can sustain this into the future."

The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Henderson, 690K) also says the report "fits with widespread government and private forecasts that the economy will slow to a cooler but still-solid pace of growth this year after expanding rapidly last year. That is expected to cause the drum-tight job market to ease and inflation pressures to ebb." The New York Times (2/3, C3, Peters, Porter, 1.16M) also has a report on the jobs numbers, and ABC World News (2/2, story 6, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) and NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 6, :10, Williams, 9.87M) briefly mentioned them as well.

Dow Down Slightly; S&P, Nasdaq Notch Up. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, B1, McKay, 2.04M) and the New York Times/AP (2/3, C7) report the Dow Jones Industrial average was down 20.19 points Friday to 12653.49. The S&P 500 was up 2.45 points to a six-year high of 1448.39, while the Nasdaq was up 7.50 points to 2475.88.

WSJournal Derides Economists Who Spoke Of "Jobless Recovery." The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A10, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "The good economic news keeps rolling in. Yesterday's new-jobs estimate for January, at 110,000, was below Wall Street expectations but it was accompanied by upward revisions of 81,000 jobs for the prior two months. Those revisions brought the 2006 monthly average up to 187,000 new jobs, or 2.2 million for the year. Readers will recall that the current expansion was derided right through 2004 as a 'jobless recovery.' We now know the economy has created 7.4 million new jobs since mid-2003, as revisions by the Bureau of Labor Statistics have added hundreds of thousands to its original monthly estimates. Thus the hand-wringers have had no choice but to move on, turning their laments to allegedly 'stagnant wages.' Well, that's now vanishing too."

DOJ_NMG_0127637

Leading Democratic Presidential Hopefuls Spar Over Iraq At Party Gathering. The Washington Post (2/3, A3, Balz, Kornblut, 690K) reports that "with Congress in their control and their eyes now on the White House, Democratic Party leaders took their first look at the party's field of presidential candidates yesterday at a forum in which the three front-runners presented their positions on Iraq and jockeyed over who can defeat the Republicans in 2008." Addressing the Democratic National Committee Winter Meeting, Sen. Hillary Clinton "presented herself as a tough, experienced pragmatist," while Sen. Barack Obama "offered himself as an inspirational critic of politics as usual," and John Edwards "made himself the keeper of the Democratic flame, delivering a call for Democrats to reclaim their heritage."

NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 7, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) said "as expected, one topic dominated the red meat political speeches before the sympathetic crowd: the war in Iraq." The New York Times (2/3, A12, Nagourney, Healy, 1.16M) says the contenders, "to shouts and cheers from thousands of Democrats," condemned the war but differed "over how to end it -- and particularly whether Democrats should settle for a nonbinding resolution expressing the Senate's opposition to Mr. Bush's war policies." Clinton, "who voted for the war and has since turned against it," drew the "most attention. Talking over a handful of hecklers, she argued that a bipartisan resolution, supported by a large number of senators and soon to be debated on the Senate floor, was the most powerful way for Congress to begin the process of blocking Mr. Bush from moving ahead with his plan to send 21,000 more troops to Iraq." But she "faced strong opposition from the left in the form of Mr. Edwards…who said that his former colleagues should not support the nonbinding resolution next week and should instead vote for measures to cut off funds for the war." On its Web site, The Hill (2/2, Youngman) reports Edwards "continued to move to the left of his leading presidential rivals" with his remarks.

ABC World News (2/2, story 7, 2:20, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "To a room full of Democratic activists, fund-raisers and party leaders needed for any presidential campaign, the candidates made their distinct pitches." Obama: "The campaigns shouldn't be about making each other look bad. They should be about figuring out how we can all do some good for this precious country of ours." Tapper: "The war in Iraq was another way to draw distinctions." Obama: "I was opposed to this invasion, publicly, frequently, before it began." Clinton: "I want to be very clear about this: If I had been President in October of 2002, I would not have started this war." Tapper: "Many Democrats think politicians expressing disapproval of the war, which is Senate is likely to do next week, is not enough. They want it ended now." Edwards: "We cannot be satisfied with passing nonbinding resolutions that we know this president will ignore. We have the power to stop the escalation of this war. We have to use this power. We have to be strong. We have to do what's right."

The Washington Times (2/3, Lambro, 88K) headlines its front-page story "Hillary Vows To End War," leading by reporting that Clinton said she "would end the Iraq war as president if the conflict was still raging when she took office." Clinton told the gathering, "If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will." Newsday (2/3, Thrush) also runs that quote from Clinton.

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Hamburger, Hook, 850K) reports on its front page that Democrats "have begun an increasingly harsh debate" over Iraq. The Times says that, "until recently, most Democratic presidential candidates, like the party generally, found success by bashing President Bush's Iraq strategy without offering comprehensive alternatives." But this week, Obama, "in a departure from his own past statements, introduced legislation that would begin a phased redeployment of troops by April and require that all combat troops leave Iraq by March 2008," which "set him at odds" with Clinton. The AP (2/2, Pickler) says Obama "reminded the party's rank-and-file -- twice -- that he was against the Iraq invasion from the beginning." The Financial Times (2/3, Luce) says Obama received a "rock star reception" at the meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0127638

The Washington Post (2/3, A3, Milbank, 690K) writes that despite a seven-minute time limit on the speeches, Edwards spoke for 17 minutes and 40 seconds, Clinton for 16 minutes and 12 seconds, and Obama for 15 minutes and 30 seconds. Sen. Christopher Dodd and Rep. Dennis Kucinich also spoke Friday; Dodd took 20 minutes and 15 seconds for his speech, which Kucinich finished after 12 minutes and 38 seconds, "but this was probably because the audience treated his appearance as a chance to start conversations or to visit the restrooms."

DNC To Consider District Of Columbia House Seat Resolution. The Washington Post (2/3, B1, Sheridan, 690K) reports the DNC meeting will today consider a resolution backing a bill to give the District of Columbia a full seat in the House. The resolution is expected to pass.

Clinton Up By 20, McCain By Seven, In ARG New Hampshire Polls. The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/3, DiStaso) reports that a new American Research Group poll finds Sen. Hillary Clinton widening her lead in the New Hampshire Democratic primary field. Clinton stands at 39%, with Sen. Barack Obama at 19%, John Edwards 13%, and no other candidate above two percent, with 21% undecided. In December, Clinton led Obama by just six points, 27%-21%. On the GOP side, Sen. John McCain leads with 27%, with Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney tied at 20% each, Newt Gingrich 11%, and no other candidate above one percent, with 21% undecided. ARG surveyed 600 likely voters (+/- 4%) in each party primary January 31-February 1.

Clinton's "Flat Footedness" With Humor Seen As Gender Double-Standard. In her Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K) column, Meghan Daum examines Sen. Hillary Clinton's campaign trail attempts at humor, saying it is likely her "flat footedness is a symptom of a double standard that rarely comes up in conversations about the challenges faced by powerful women. If there's anything that can hinder a woman's credibility faster than becoming visibly pregnant or getting caught watching Lifetime, it's revealing the ability to be genuinely funny. … Clinton, hyper-focused wonk that she is, has a personality that has long appeared to be the product of focus groups. … She has been so ravaged by the media, the public and, it would seem, her own perfectionism that she comes across less as a human being than as a historical figure whose legacy depends on keeping her humanity out of the equation. … But the fact that we're seeing a black candidate who seems infinitely more relaxed with himself than his female competitor speaks volumes about just how much we're likely to punish women who step outside the bounds of corporate-flavored gravitas."

Obama Addresses Internet-Mobilized Supporters. The Washington Post (2/3, A5, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "At his first rally since announcing his presidential exploratory committee," Sen. Barack Obama "appealed yesterday for support from the young people who had mobilized for the event online. The gathering of several thousand students at George Mason University in Fairfax underscored the potential power of online communities in the 2008 campaign. Its genesis was a group created last summer on Facebook.com, a Web site frequented by college students who post profiles and assemble virtually."

Obama Said To Have "Bubble Around Him." The Politico (2/2, Allen) writes that while "Clinton's opening slogan was, 'Let the conversation begin,'" Obama "just wanted the conversation to end. … Obama, riding an astonishing wave of glowing publicity for a candidate 21 months from an election, already has a bubble around him that is tighter than the one that surrounded Texas Gov. George W. Bush, who spent long hours of the fledgling days of his candidacy in bull sessions with reporters."

Biden Appears On Sharpton's Radio Show. Under the headline "Joe Biden Courts Al Sharpton," The Politico (2/2, Ben Smith) runs a brief item on the Delaware senator's appearance on Sharpton's radio show. When Biden "paused for breath at the end of his appearance," Sharpton told him, "I thought you were drowning in giving me flattery."

Romney Slams Clinton For "Timidity" Toward Iran. The AP (2/2, Dominguez) reports Mitt Romney accused Sen. Hillary Clinton "of 'timidity' regarding the security threat posed by Iran." Addressing the Republican Study Committee, Romney "lashed out at Clinton for telling a pro-Israel dinner that a dialogue with countries hostile to Israel -- including Iran and Syria -- is needed to promote peace in the Middle East." Romney said, "At this point, we don't need a listening tour about Iran. Someone who wants to engage Iran displays a troubling timidity toward a terrible threat of a nuclear Iran." Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee responded, "Sen. Clinton believes that no option should be taken off the table when it comes to preventing Iran from developing nuclear weapons. Given his record of flip flops, the only thing that's timid are Gov. Romney's convictions." On its Web site, The Hill (2/2, Kucinich) also reports on Romney's remarks.

DOJ_NMG_0127639

The Politico (2/2, Martin) reports Romney also "explained his shift on social issues" during his speech, presenting himself "not as a convert but as a student who had received an education on key social issues." Afterward, Rep. Wally Herger "said he was satisfied with Romney's explanation. 'I felt very comfortable,' said Herger, who is so far uncommitted in the presidential contest but offered that he could 'absolutely' back Romney." But Rep. Darrell Issa said that while Romney "said what he needed to say to the conservative audience, his address was short on specifics. … Asked about Romney's accounting of how he had come to oppose abortion rights, Issa acknowledged that it was 'artful,' but probably not quite as clear-cut as Romney tried to make it."

WSJournal Says Hagel Should Have Courage To Run For President. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A10, 2.04M) headlines an editorial "Hagel For President," but immediately says, "No, we don't mean this as an endorsement. The Journal doesn't endorse candidates, and on the big issues of the day we don't much agree with Chuck Hagel in any case. But with the Nebraska Republican loudly agitating for a rapid withdrawal from Iraq, we think it's time the Senator tested his ideas somewhere other than the Sunday talk shows." If Hagel "thinks his foreign-policy vision is superior to President Bush's or to Senator John McCain's, he should stop booing from the gallery and get into the fight for the Republican Presidential nomination. The primaries are only a year away, and the GOP field awaits a genuine antiwar candidate. It's one thing to win the Beltway media primary, another to prevail among actual voters, as Mr. Bush has done twice."

Two Arkansas Journalists Advise Huckabee To "Cool It." In a Wall Street Journal (2/3, A10, 2.04M) op-ed, Paul Greenberg and Kane Webb of the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette examine some of Mike Huckabee's clashes with the media during his time as governor of Arkansas, saying that "Huckabee, at times, can be the most elevating of speakers. … But, too many other times, Brother Huckabee just likes to wallow in the old invective, and the pettier his complaint, the longer he wallows." Huckabee "has a lot of potential as a presidential candidate, and a record of accomplishment here in Arkansas -- from getting health care to kids whose families couldn't afford it to fixing our interstate highways. He's been willing to take on the educational establishment in order to improve our schools, and early on he finally simplified this state's once byzantine requirements for something as basic as renewing your car tags." But his "campaign will be history soon…unless he learns to cool it. Which may not be possible for the Huck, given his showman's personality and rhetorical impulses."

At Least 19 Dead Following Florida Storms. The AP (2/2, Ellis) has an update on the situation in central Florida, where "powerful storms, including at least one tornado, smashed hundreds of homes…and killed 19 people or more." Gov. Charlie Crist has declared a state of emergency in four counties. ABC World News, the CBS Evening News, and NBC Nightly News all led with the disaster and had detailed coverage. CBS gave the story about nine minutes of coverage, NBC eight, and ABC five and one-half.

Beltway Gossip Columns Multiply. The New York Times (2/3, Leibovich, 1.16M), in a front-page article titled, "Titillating Or Not, Washington Gossip Blossoms," reports, "As the globe warms, Iraq burns and a presidential campaign heats up, Washington finds itself red-hot in gossip, or what passes for such here. … Ten publications carry a total of 14 columns focusing on political tidbits that appear regularly, up from three columns a decade ago. They include the Reliable Source and In the Loop columns, The Washington Post's entrenched offerings (the paper's Web site started a new enterprise, the Sleuth, last month); In the Know and Under the Dome, which dish in the tabloid The Hill; and Heard on the Hill, which appears in Roll Call. The Examiner offers Yeas and Nays, while the latest entry, The Politico, nourishes its politerati with Shenanigans and the Crypt."

US Preeminence In Stem Cell Research Said To Be Vulnerable. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/3, A15, 690K) Joseph Fuller, founder of the Monitor Group, and Brock Reeve, executive director of the Harvard Stem Cell Institute, write, "Many Americans assume that once the current restrictions on federal funding of embryonic stem cell research have been lifted, America will surge to the forefront. … But closer examination suggests that such confidence might be misplaced. If one analyzes the state of the industry along some of the same critical dimensions that contributed to our come-from-behind win in biotechnology, unnerving patterns emerge. … In short, the stem cell sector is at risk of experiencing a failure to launch at the national level."

DOJ_NMG_0127640

Noonan Notes Reagan's 1976 Fight Against GOP Establishment. In a column for the Wall Street Journal (2/3, P18, 2.04M) Peggy Noonan writes, "Next Tuesday would have been Ronald Reagan's 96th birthday, which is amazing when you consider he is, in a way, more with us than ever: his memory and meaning summoned in political conversation, his name evoked by candidates. … Lately we are hearing of President Reagan's famous 11th commandment: 'Speak no ill of a fellow Republican.' It's a good rule for both parties, but it's good also to remember how he approached it in practice. Ronald Reagan turned his own party upside down, enraged its establishment, and threatened its immediate future when, in 1976, he mounted a fierce challenge to an incumbent Republican president."

Texans Richards, Connally, Ivins Remembered. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/3, A15, 1.16M) Mimi Swartz, executive editor of Texas Monthly magazine, writes, "Last September, we lost both a former governor, Ann Richards, and a former state first lady, Nellie Connally. When the columnist Molly Ivins died on Wednesday, it seemed that a certain kind of Texas woman might be gone forever."

Russia Challenges US On Engagement With Hamas, Syria. Under the headline, "Russia Clashes With U.S. On Mideast Policy," the Washington Post (2/3, A10, Kessler, 690K) says Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "urged ending the isolation of the anti-Israeli militant group Hamas and including Syria in Middle East peace talks, exposing fissures in a high-level diplomatic group that [Secretary Rice] gathered yesterday in Washington to validate her new effort to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." Lavrov's "proposals run directly counter to Rice's strategy of rallying what she calls 'mainstream' Arabs to isolate what she calls 'extremist' elements in the region." Administration "officials were miffed at Lavrov's intervention, which overshadowed the group's endorsement of Rice's plans to bring together [Palestinian President Mahmoud] Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and push them to accelerate a long-dormant peace plan." An anonymous administration source "said the Russians did not suggest any of the ideas in preliminary meetings nor in yesterday's gathering of foreign ministers."

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Richter, 850K) adds the Quartet "blessed the latest American effort to restart the Middle East peace process, but not before signaling that divisions remained among its members." In "private talks, European officials signaled that they wanted to move faster than the Americans toward a deal to create a Palestinian state, diplomats said. And the Russian delegation urged the group to lift its economic boycott of the Palestinian government, saying the measure punished ordinary Palestinians without forcing Hamas to reform."

The AP (2/3, Gearan) uses similar language to describe the discussion, saying Washington and Moscow "clashed" over Lavrov's plan. Rice "expressed little enthusiasm for" engaging Syria. The AP says Washington has "expressed reluctance to reach out to Syria and Iran in a regional effort to reduce violence in Iraq, arguing that both countries' actions show they have little interest in stabilizing the area." For its part, the Quartet "reiterated the conditions they set for the Hamas-led Palestinian government to receive vital overseas financial aid and international political recognition." Assistant Secretary McCormack "said the internal divisions are issues for the Palestinians alone to resolve."

In somewhat more positive tones, the New York Times (2/3, Shanker, 1.16M) notes the Quartet "gave broad endorsement on Friday to American designs for three-way talks led by [Rice] and involving Israeli and Palestinian leaders. But discord immediately surfaced with Russian comments that Syria, too, could play a constructive role." AFP (2/3, Millikin) reports, "Major powers endorsed a US plan to accelerate efforts to achieve an Arab-Iraeli peace deal and establish a Palestinian state." However, that deal "initiative was marred by renewed Palestinian factional violence, a rift with Russia over whether to bring Syria into the process and a weary skepticism that Israeli and Palestinian leaders are strong enough to lead their people to peace."

The Washington Times (2/3, Kralev, 88K) adds Moscow "urged the United States and Europe yesterday to end a boycott of the Palestinians' Hamas-led government, exposing divisions in the group of international mediators known as the Quartet as it met in Washington in an effort to restart Middle East peace talks." The group "expressed support for Washington's initiative to begin talks between Israel and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who also leads Fatah." Lavrov "said the U.S. and EU policy of boycotting Hamas is not working."

DOJ_NMG_0127641

Gaza Deaths Leaves Truce "In Ashes." The Washington Post (2/3, A10, Wilson, 690K) reports, "At least 18 Palestinians, including two children, were killed in heavy factional fighting across the northern Gaza Strip on Friday, leaving a truce reached this week in ashes." At least 24 people have been killed and "more than 220 people" injured in two days of fighting, "described by witnesses in Gaza as some of the most sustained since Hamas took day-to-day control of the Palestinian government 10 months ago." The Post adds, "The fighting … appears increasingly resistant to efforts by party leaders to stop it."

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Ellingwood, Alouf, 850K) adds, "As gunmen battled in the streets, Egyptian officials sought to broker a fresh truce between" Hamas and Fatah. "By day's end, the two sides had announced a tentative agreement to restore the cease-fire reached Tuesday, but it seemed at best a fragile deal as heavily armed men continued to stalk the streets."

Hughes Says US "Trying To Work Very Hard." Undersecretary of State for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs Karen Hughes said on Fox News' On The Record (2/2, Van Susteren), "People don't recognize that we are trying to work very hard to create a situation where there are two states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace and security."

Bloomberg Visits Israeli Town Frequented By Rocket Attacks. The New York Times (2/3, B3, Cardwell, 1.16M) notes New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg "touched down by helicopter on a bare patch of dirt [in Sderot] on Friday, bringing his message against terror to a town shaken by persistent attacks from Palestinian militants firing rockets over the border from Gaza." Bloomberg "said that the country needed to work with its Arab neighbors, but added that if groups did not renounce terrorism, abide by their accords and recognize Israel's right to exist, 'I personally think Israel shouldn't talk to them.'" The Times adds, "In a tour that lasted just under an hour, Mr. Bloomberg made the traditional stops for a visitor here, including one to examine a pile of spent and rusty rocket shells at the police station."

US Files WTO Case Against China. The Washington Post (2/3, D3, Crutsinger, 690K) reports the Administration, "under pressure from the Democratic-controlled Congress to do something about America's soaring trade deficit, filed a trade case yesterday against China in a dispute involving government subsidies." The WTO complaint "alleges that China is using government support and tax policies to bolster local companies in competition against U.S. and other foreign firms." The Post notes the "action will trigger a 60-day consultation during which trade negotiators will try to resolve the dispute. If that fails, a WTO hearing panel will be convened to handle it." Also, "a victory by the administration would clear the way for the United States to impose economic sanctions against China if it refuses to change its subsidy program." US Trade Representative Susan Schwab is quoted saying, "We are seeking to level the playing field to allow U.S. manufacturers to compete fairly with Chinese firms."

The Financial Times (2/3, Callan, McGregor) notes the Administration "launched a major trade dispute with China over alleged subsidies for manufacturing exports in an escalation of economic tensions with Beijing." This "escalation…follows pressure from the new Democratic majority in Congress and for tougher action over a record annual trade deficit with China of $214bn." The filing of the suit "is viewed by White House advisers as necessary to advance their economic agenda during President George W. Bush's last two years in office."

The New York Times (2/3, C3, Weisman, 1.16M) pairs the complaint filing with the resignation of Treasury Undersecretary Timothy Adams, titling its coverage, "U.S. Trade Effort On China Suffers 2 More Setbacks." Administration "efforts to ease economic strains with China suffered two setbacks Friday with the resignation of a top official in charge of the China dialogue and an announcement that talks on a critical trade dispute had failed to resolve differences." The Times calls the WTO suit "a major escalation in American pressure," and says Adams' move "was the second departure in five months of the person at Treasury in charge of the overall dialogue with China."

G-7 Could Consider Chinese, Japanese Currencies At Meeting. Under the headline, "G-7 May Cast A Wary Eye On Valuations Of The Yuan, Yen," the Wall Street Journal (2/3, A2, Perry, 2.04M) reports, "When finance ministers from the Group of Seven leading industrial nations meet in Germany next weekend, look out for a tussle over two Asian currencies." The Administration "will continue to focus on China's weak yuan at the talks, … but European policy makers have said they will push for a discussion about Japan's currency to be included in the talks, as well." The Journal says Tokyo "is expected to fight back, and this time will find the U.S. on its side," because "Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said last week that the yen's value now accurately reflects Japan's economic situation."

DOJ_NMG_0127642

WPost Backs Trade Promotion Authority Extension. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (2/3, A14, 690K) credits "burgeoning American exports" for "the strong growth in the U.S. economy," and notes export growth is now triple import growth. The Post backs President Bush's "request to renew his trade promotion authority," saying that "important bilateral trade pacts" and the WTO Doha Round "probably won't be finished by midyear, so the extra time will be needed." Bush's farm bill, which "would reduce U.S. agricultural subsidies by $18 billion in the next five years," is "an important step" towards successfully completing the Doha Round, and key Democrats including Congressman Charles Rangel and Senator Max Baucus "appear to recognize the harm that would be caused if Congress torpedoed" it. "They have signaled a willingness to talk with the administration about the renewal of trade promotion authority," and, "with flexibility on both sides, a deal should be possible."

Top Chinese Official Warns Against Independent Legal System. The New York Times (2/3, A5, Kahn, 1.16M) reports comments by Chinese Politburo member Luo Gan that "'enemy forces' are seeking to use China's legal system to Westernize and divide the country, and the Communist Party must fend them off by maintaining its dominance over lawyers, judges and prosecutors." The Times calls Luo "China's top law and order official," and says he noted "that judicial officials had the responsibility to 'prevent infiltration that might threaten national security.'" Luo also "said that China is now part of the global community and that it must consider 'international factors' when making judicial decisions. But he drew a sharp line between such interests and allowing greater leeway for lawyers, judges and prosecutors to make decisions independently as they do in the West." The Times says Luo's remarks "appeared to amplify President Hu Jintao's past calls to guard against a Western-inspired 'color revolution' of the kind that brought political change in Central Asia, Central Europe and Lebanon."

Hu's Commitment To Free Press Questioned. The New York Times (2/3, A5, Kahn, 1.16M) also reports today on criticisms of the openness of the Chinese press. Reporters Without Borders "accused" Hu "of seeking to bring the media to heel and instigating an expanding crackdown on the press despite China's pledge to enhance media freedoms before the 2008 Olympics, which are to be held in Beijing. That group's report is quoted saying, ""The press is being forced into self-censorship, the Internet is filtered, and the foreign media very closely watched. Faced with burgeoning social unrest and journalists who are becoming much less compliant, the authorities, directed by President Hu Jintao, have been bringing the media to heel in the name of a 'harmonious society.'"

China's Hu Said To Engage Khartoum On Darfur. The Financial Times (2/3, England) notes Chinese President Hu Jintao "embarked on the most contentious leg of his African tour, visiting Sudan for the first time to buttress bilateral trade with a government accused of multiple human rights abuses in its western Darfur region." Hu "urged Khartoum, behind closed doors, to solve the crisis and pursue dialogue with rebel groups. But no public statement was made on the issue," and Chinese Ambassador Zhang Dong said "that China 'never interferes in Sudan's internal affairs.'" Beijing "insists it has played a positive role in tackling the Darfur crisis, but critics regard its relations with Sudan as an example of what they see as China's questionable role in Africa."

Under the headline, "Chinese President Pushes Sudan On Darfur," the AP (2/2, De Montesquiou) says Hu "told Sudan's leader on Friday he must give the United Nations a bigger role in trying to resolve the conflict in Darfur… In what appeared to be China's bluntest message to Sudan on the Darfur crisis, Hu urged President Omar al-Bashir in a face-to-face meeting to boost the U.N.'s 'constructive role in realizing peace in Darfur' along with the African Union." The AP adds that Beijing "usually refuses to mix human rights issues with diplomacy, but Hu has come under international pressure to use his clout with Sudan to push it to accept U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur." AFP (2/2, Saeed) notes Hu "has offered Sudan assistance for the peaceful resolution of the Darfur conflict but ignored Western pressure to make future aid conditional on the progress made." Beijing's "mild words on Darfur seem to underscore the Asian giant's no-strings-attached stance on doing business in Sudan."

DOJ_NMG_0127643

Two Americans Arrested Near Somali-Kenyan Border. The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/3) carries comments by a Kenyan police official that "two Americans were among at least 10 foreigners detained by Kenyan police at the Somali border after allegedly fighting on the side of Somalia's ousted Islamist movement." That source told that AP that "one of the Americans is wanted in the U.S. on suspicion of links to radical movements." The police force "said it seized the foreigners after they fled from Ethiopian troops who had helped oust the Islamists. It was preparing to deport them to their home countries."

Morocco Said To Stifle Free And Open Media. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (2/3, A15, 1.16M), novelist Laila Lalami discusses freedom of expression in Morocco. "In the United States, Morocco is often seen as a liberal country and a bulwark against Islamic extremism," and recent reforms "are steps in the right direction. But while the court cases against independent news magazines like Nichane, Le Journal Hebdomadaire and several others are within the bounds of Moroccan law, they appear to single out the independent press, to the exclusion of more partisan publications." The Administration "has time and again referred to Morocco as a moderate Arab state that deserves to receive millions of dollars of taxpayers' money to encourage democratic reforms. American officials point to" some successes, "but they turn a blind eye to problems of press freedom." Lalami concludes, "Without freedom of expression, Morocco's reforms are merely a varnish. Underneath it lies the same old country."

Blair Vows Not To Resign During Honors Investigation. The Washington Post (2/3, A12, Jordan, 690K) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "said Friday he will not resign because of a growing scandal concerning his party's financing and added that 'I am not going to beg for my character in front of anyone.'" The Post says "calls for his resignation have intensified," noting that "many" Britons "want him to leave now, as members of his own party publicly admit the damage this scandal is doing to" them. In addition, "there has been noticeable tension between police and the prime minister's office as the case has dragged on," and that Post notes that "no one has been charged with a crime. All four of those arrested have denied wrongdoing."

Serbia Pans Draft Plan For Kosovo. The New York Times (2/3, Smith, 1.16M) notes Belgrade "rejected a United Nations proposal on Friday that paves the way for an independent Kosovo, setting up a possible showdown between its supporter, Russia, and the West over the disputed territory's final status." That "response came almost immediately" after UN envoy Martti Ahtisaari "resented the complex plan to politicians" in Belgrade and Pristina. Detractors included President Boris Tadic and Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica. "The proposal, which is still subject to weeks of negotiation between the two sides, will require Russian acquiescence in order to win Security Council approval." Ahtisaari's plan "shifts the onus to Russia and, to a lesser extent, China, both of which have supported Serbia's territorial claims — in part, over concerns about ethnically motivated secessionist movements in their own countries." The Times explains, "While the plan does not mention independence, its provisions describe de facto statehood for Kosovo — providing for an army, constitution and flag — though it would still be protected by NATO and overseen by the international community for the indefinite future. The plan would also allow Kosovo to declare independence if the package is approved by the Security Council."

The AP (2/3, Kraja) adds, "Kosovo took its first tentative steps on the road to becoming what would look very much like a sovereign nation Friday after [Ahtisaari] unveiled a blueprint for the future of the tense, ethnically divided Balkan province." His "58-page roadmap spelled out conditions for internationally supervised self-rule — complete with the trappings of nationhood, including a flag, anthem, army and constitution and the right to apply for membership in international organizations."

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Farley, 850K) titles its coverage, "U.N. Kosovo Proposal Tries To Appease All Sides." Ahtisaari "unveiled a blueprint for Kosovo's future Friday that gives the province de facto independence without formal sovereignty, a compromise between the Serbian government's demand for control and the majority Albanians' wish for nationhood."

Under the headline, "Debt Is Key To Kosovo's Status," the Financial Times (2/3, MacDonald) portrays the report as saying that "the future status of Kosovo must open the way for international financing to repair its fragile economy." Kosovo "would be able to join institutions such as the International Monetary Fund, opening the way for credit and possibly foreign investment." Nearly one "quarter of the document deals with unresolved economic questions – including what to do about debt inherited from the former Yugoslavia, amounting to nearly €1bn ($1.3bn, £660m). The European Union wants to see the debt question cleared up before taking charge of a new supervisory mission to monitor the local authorities after the close-down of the UN Interim Mission in Kosovo."

DOJ_NMG_0127644

Bay Of Pigs Veterans Eye Return To Post-Castro Cuba. In a front-page feature entitled, "Bay of Pigs Vets Fight to Outlast An Ailing Castro," the Wall Street Journal (2/3, A1, Lagnado, 2.04M) notes the Brigadistas "have long lived with the hope of resuming their lives in a free Cuba. But today, many surviving members are just hoping to be buried there. The 80-year-old Mr. Castro's illness has given them a new lease on life."

Castro Said To Manipulate Enemies Even In Sickness. In an op-ed in today's Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K), editorial page assistant editor Tim Cavanaugh discusses recent rumors of a decline in Cuban President Fidel Castro's health. "Inevitably, Castro got the last laugh. Late Tuesday, Cuban state television released footage of the president-for-life looking slightly stronger than he had during his last appearance." The rumor "was not motivated by any actual news, and this is not unusual. So flammable is the Duraflame of the Castro deathwatch that it can ignite spontaneously, at any time." Castro "and his watchers bring generations of built-up agon and emotional commitment. The dictator's death will almost certainly occasion a mass public outpouring in Miami," and Castro "will retain, probably until his last breath, a genius for working the media and humiliating his enemies. This week's uptick in the deathwatch leaves just one question: Did Fidel, maybe, plan it this way?"

Cubana Airlines Bomber Said To Seek Quiet Life In Caracas. This week's New York Times (2/3, A4, Romero, 1.16M) "Saturday Profile" details the life of Freddy Lugo, who was imprisoned for the destruction of a Cubana Airlines flight over Barbados in 1976. He "has tried to put the past behind him. … But the past has a way of catching up with him. There is the occasional journalist to contend with, and glimmers of recognition from among the many Cubans who live" in Caracas. "As many Americans would recognize Mohamed Atta if he were alive and walking the streets of New York, to Venezuelans, Mr. Lugo's face is haunting."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Iraq Plans Divide 2008 Democratic Hopefuls."
"Grand Avenue Project Needs Help."
"Separation Of Church And Football."
"EBay Bans Auctions Of Virtual Items."

New York Times:

"Science Panel Says Global Warming Is 'Unequivocal.'"
"Push To Resolve Fading Killings Of Rights Era."
"Among Hispanics, N.F.L. Mania Hits Cultural Wall."
"Silicon Valley's High-Tech Hunt For Colleague."
"Titillating Or Not, Washington Gossip Blossoms."
"Analysis Is Bleak On Iraq's Future."
"Number Of People Stopped By Police Soars In New York."

Washington Post:

"Bush To Request Billions For Wars."
"Bleak Iraq Report Is Sent To Congress."
"U.N. Climate Panel Says Warming Is Man-Made."
"Missing Md. Teens' Car Found With 2 Bodies."
"In Va. House, 'Profound Regret' On Slavery."
"Brazilians' Arrest Focuses Scrutiny On Evangelical Groups."

Washington Times:

"Hillary Vows To End War."
"Warner To Help Block His Own Resolution On Iraq."
"Dungy And Smith Ready To Make History."
"Anti-Super Bowl Gatherings Give Women The Big Night Off."
"Vaccine Center Issues Warning."
"Beloved Panda Tai Shan Stays, At Least For Now."

Detroit Free Press:

"Pointes Warned Of Mother's Drug Den."
"Court Rejects Same-Sex Benefits."
"Crowning Moment?"
"Sluggish Pistons Wake Up In Time."
"GM: 100,000-Mile Used Car Warranties."
"Panel Calls For Major Tax Hike."
"Auto Dealer Glut Hurts U.S. Makes."
"Lodge Traffic Disruptions Begin."

DOJ_NMG_0127645

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Stray Bullet Kills Newton Co. Mom."
"Tapes Convinced Coke Jury."
"Search For Bodies In Fla. Storms."
"Horses Moved From Farm."
"City Takes Steps For Pedestrians."
"Blue Laws Don't Cover All Bases."
"Spy Agencies Pessimistic On Iraq."

Dallas Morning News:
"Couple's Families Await Id."
"Palestinian Family Gets New Chance At Asylum."
"Perry Orders HPV Vaccine."
"It's Time Irvin Got The Canton Call."
"Principal Resigns In DISD Inquiry."
"Church Of Convicted Pastor Owes Thousands In Tax Bills."
"Texans Still Paying Fee For Shuttered Grant Program."

Houston Chronicle:
"Perry's Vaccine Move Draws Financial, Sexual Concerns."
"Mexicans Abroad Send Home Record $25 Billion."
"New Chief At Bp's Texas City Plant Pushing Safety."
"Bush Will Seek $245 Billion In Defense Spending."
"Proposal Would Allow Houston To Sue Polluters."
"Texas' Future May Hold Heat, Drought, Dry Rivers."
"Regents Repay TSU For Children's Scholarships."
"Houston Ministry Aids Homeless."
"'Soul Bowl' T-Shirts Reflect Historic Super Bowl."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Florida Tornado; Florida Tornado Details; Global Warming Report; Response To Global Warming; Iraq NIE; Economic Report; HPV Vaccine; Veteran Welcomes Troops Home.
CBS: Florida Tornado; Tornado Damage; Volusia County Damage; Florida Governor's Response; Florida Weather Analysis; Iraq NIE; Homeland Security-Super Bowl; Super Bowl Turf.
NBC: Florida Tornado; Tornado Damage; Tornado Victim; Global Warming Report; HPV Vaccine; Economic Report; Democratic National Committee Meeting; Iraq NIE; Former Tennis Star; Alternative Programming On Super Bowl Sunday.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — 8:45 a.m. Departs The White House via Marine One. South Lawn. 10:10 a.m. Makes remarks to the House Democratic Caucus Issues Conference. Kingsmill Resort & Spa, Williamsburg, Va. 11:40 a.m. Makes a statement with House Democratic leadership. Kingsmill Resort & Spa, Williamsburg, Va. 1:15 p.m. Arrives The White House via Marine One. South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: DEMOCRATIC MEETING _ Winter meeting of the Democratic National Committee. Highlights:
9 a.m. General Session, with speakers in order of appearance: Governor Kathleen Sebelius of Kansas, Chair of the Democratic Governor's Association; Senator Joseph Biden; New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson; Senator Mike Gravel; and Governor Tom Vilsack. 2 p.m. Association of State Democratic Chairs. Speakers in order of appearance: Governor Howard Dean; Governor Kathleen Sebelius of Kansas, Chair of the Democratic Governor's Association. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW Contacts: Stacie Paxton, 202-863-8148

SHERIFF'S ASSOCIATION _ The National Sheriff's Association holds its 2007 Winter Conference. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW Contacts: n/a, 202-836-7827

ISLAMIC LAW _ The Washington College of Law holds a conference, "Islamic Law in the West: Theory, Doctrine and Practice." Location: Room 603, 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW. Contacts: n/a, 202-274-4279

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0127646

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Stimson Resigns Over Controversy Involving Detainees' Legal Defense ... 2
Three Prominent Guantanamo Detainees Face New Charges ... 2
Guantanamo Paralegal Alleged To Have Fabricated Torture Charges ... 2
Masri Vows To Pursue Rendition Case Against US Officials ... 2

Homeland Response:

FBI Arrests Missouri Palestinian On Weapons Charges ... 3
CBO Estimates Democrats' Antiterrorism Bill Will Cost $21 Billion Over Five Years ... 3
Federal Judge Allows Suits Against Corps Of Engineers Over Katrina ... 3

War News:

New National Intelligence Estimate Paints Grim Picture Of Iraq ... 3
Bush Will Request $245 Billion For GWOT ... 5
Intelligence Community "Divisions" Over Iran Analysis Detailed ... 5
GOP Strives To Block Iraq Debate ... 7
US Loses Fourth Helicopter In Two Weeks ... 7
Too Few Iraqi Troops Arrive In Baghdad ... 7
Troops Plan To Drive Taliban From Overrun Town ... 8
Pakistan Says Taliban Activity Hard To Curb ... 8
Veteran Personally Welcomes Troops Back ... 8

DOJ:

Arkansas US Attorney Seeks Dismissal Of Challenge To Appointment ... 9

Corporate Scandals:

DOJ Joins Siemens Probe ... 9
Redstone Settles Suit With Son Over Family Fortune ... 9

Criminal Law:

DOJ Seeking More Capital Punishment Sentences ... 10
Jury Convicts Former Coca-Cola Secretary Of Stealing Trade Secrets ... 10
Mover Shot By Maryland Official Dies ... 10
Federal Agents Announce Early Successes In NOLA Crime Crackdown ... 11
Virginia Men Plead Guilty In Fake "Purse Party" Scam ... 11
Marion Barry Rejects Plea Offer ... 12
US Cracking Down On Online Gambling ... 12
New York Fire Department Examining Promotions Involving Fake Diplomas ... 12
Former New York Judge Testifies To Political Pressures ... 13

Civil Rights:

California Teenagers Given Probation After Halloween Hate-Crime Beating ... 13
Judge Delays Decision On Port Chester, NY, Election ... 13
11th Circuit Finds No Discrimination In Georgia Farmworkers Case ... 13
Mississippi VRA Challenge Seen As National Test ... 14
Civil-Rights Era Killings Under Renewed Scrutiny ... 14
NYPD "Stop And Frisks" Soar ... 14
Michigan Court Rules Against Domestic Partner Benefits ... 15
WPost Endorses Voting Reform Paper Trail Requirement ... 15

Antitrust:

Viacom Orders YouTube To Remove Its Videos ... 15
Equity Board Rejects Vornado Offer, Endorses Blackstone Bid ... 16
Suit Claims Dell Did Not Disclose Intel Payments ... 16
Delta Creditors Approve Terms Of Bankruptcy Financing Program ... 16
MediaNews Purchases Santa Cruz Sentinel ... 17
Judge Rules Microsoft May Question Expert Who Discovered Violation ... 17
Express Scripts Sweetens Bid For Caremark ... 17

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Bush Administration Expresses Agreement With Global Warming Report ... 17
States' Ocean Habitat Rescue Initiatives Hailed ... 18
Tribe Challenges Interior Official's Recognition Authority ... 19

Congress-Administration:

Bush Budget Includes Additional Education Funding, Entitlements Cuts ... 19
Bush Backs Three Percent Raise For Federal Employees ... 20
Bush Said To Have "Adopted" Democrats' Rhetoric On Domestic Issues ... 20
Senators' Failure To Promptly Disclose Campaign Donations Draws Scrutiny ... 20
CHC Chairman Baca Rebuts Sanchez's Allegations ... 20
New Air Traffic Control System Could Cost As Much As $76 Billion ... 21

Football Fan Rice Picks Colts To Win Super Bowl 21
NYTimes Considers New NHTSA Crash Tests "Overdue." 21

Other News:

Jobs Report "Just About Perfect," Bush Economic Adviser Says 21
Leading Democratic Presidential Hopefuls Spar Over Iraq At Party Gathering 22
Clinton Up By 20, McCain By Seven, In ARG New Hampshire Polls 22
Clinton's "Flat Footedness" With Humor Seen As Gender Double-Standard 23
Obama Addresses Internet-Mobilized Supporters 23
Biden Appears On Sharpton's Radio Show 23
Romney Slams Clinton For "Timidity" Toward Iran 23
WSJournal Says Hagel Should Have Courage To Run For President 23
Two Arkansas Journalists Advise Huckabee To "Cool It." 23
At Least 19 Dead Following Florida Storms 24
Beltway Gossip Columns Multiply 24
US Preeminence In Stem Cell Research Said To Be Vulnerable 24
Noonan Notes Reagan's 1976 Fight Against GOP Establishment 24
Texans Richards, Connally, Ivins Remembered 24
Russia Challenges US On Engagement With Hamas, Syria 24
US Files WTO Case Against China 25
Top Chinese Official Warns Against Independent Legal System 26
China's Hu Said To Engage Khartoum On Darfur 26
Two Americans Arrested Near Somali-Kenyan Border 27
Morocco Said To Stifle Free And Open Media 27
Blair Vows Not To Resign During Honors Investigation 27
Serbia Pans Draft Plan For Kosovo 27
Bay Of Pigs Veterans Eye Return To Post-Castro Cuba 28
Cubana Airlines Bomber Said To Seek Quiet Life In Caracas 28

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 28

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington 29

TERRORISM NEWS:

Stimson Resigns Over Controversy Involving Detainees' Legal Defense. The Washington Post (2/3, A6, 690K) reports Charles 'Cully' Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs "resigned yesterday, the Defense Department announced, three weeks after criticizing lawyers who represent terrorism suspects." Stimson "called it 'shocking' that major U.S. law firms represented Guantanamo Bay detainees free of charge and said they would likely suffer financially after their corporate clients learned of the work." Stimson "believed that the controversy 'hampered his ability to be effective in this position,' department spokesman Bryan Whitman said. He stressed that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates did not ask him to resign."

The New York Times (2/3, A12, Abruzzese, 1.16M) reports Stimson "named more than 12 firms that are defending detainees. 'I think, quite honestly, when corporate C.E.O.'s see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those C.E.O.'s are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms,' Mr. Stimson said." CNN.com (2/2) reports, "In a letter to the editor published in the Washington Post a week later, he said…'I apologize for what I said, those comments do not reflect my core beliefs.'" The Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K) also noted Stimson's resignation.

Three Prominent Guantanamo Detainees Face New Charges. The AP (2/2) reports the Pentagon has "prepared new charges Friday against three of the best-known detainees at Guantanamo Bay — a key step toward resuming the military tribunals for terrorism suspects that were halted by the U.S. Supreme Court last year. Authorities drafted new charges — including murder, conspiracy and providing material support for terrorism — against Canadian Omar Khadr, Australian David Hicks and Salim Ahmed Hamdan of Yemen, said Air Force Col. Morris Davis, chief prosecutor in the Guantanamo war crimes trials."

Guantanamo Paralegal Alleged To Have Fabricated Torture Charges. The AP (2/2) reports a military defense lawyer "whose paralegal reported overhearing guards at the U.S. Navy base in southeastern Cuba brag about beating detainees said she was accused by a military investigator of filing a false statement. Army Col. Richard Basset, who was ordered by the U.S. Southern Command to investigate the allegations into guards' actions, told the paralegal, Marine Sgt. Heather Cerveny, that the guards denied her account of their September conversations in a Guantanamo bar, according to Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey. The investigator accused Cerveny of having made a false statement, Vokey told The Associated Press in a telephone interview."

Masri Vows To Pursue Rendition Case Against US Officials. BBC.com (2/2, Peter) reports, "A Lebanese-born German, who accuses the CIA of having kidnapped and tortured him, says he is determined to get an apology from the US authorities. Khaled al-Masri alleges that he was seized in Macedonia, flown to a secret jail in Afghanistan and tortured there. 'I'll pursue the case until the Americans admit what they did to me, give an explanation and make an apology,' he told the BBC News website. Munich prosecutors have ordered the arrest of 13 suspected CIA agents. Mr Masri says he was abducted at the end of 2003 and detained for five months before being released in Albania after the Americans realised they had got the wrong man."

DOJ_NMG_0127648

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Arrests Missouri Palestinian On Weapons Charges. Under the headline "Man Was Arming For 'War,' FBI Says," The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (2/2, Patrick) reported, "A St. Charles man obtained fully automatic weapons and tried to buy as many explosives as possible in preparation for what an associate called 'war,' the FBI says in court documents. He bought three rifles and a Claymore anti-personnel mine and negotiated for a case of hand grenades, documents obtained by the Post-Dispatch show." Palestinian immigrant Mousa M. Abuelawi "was arrested Dec. 29 and charged on complaints accusing him of three counts of illegal possession or distribution of a machine gun and conspiracy to violate machine gun statutes." The Post-Dispatch noted, "The context of the word 'war' was not explained in court filings; the FBI declined to comment. The man to whom the word was attributed, Thaer Abde Sumad, said in an interview Thursday that the purchases were not intended for terrorism but to make money supplying street gangs in a St. Louis turf war. … The FBI thinks it's a 'terrorist thing,' Sumad said, 'especially after 9/11. They're trying to make it bigger than what it is.' Sumad said Abuelawi was 'trying to make a few extra bucks.'"

CBO Estimates Democrats' Antiterrorism Bill Will Cost $21 Billion Over Five Years. The New York Times (2/3, A12, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "The antiterrorism bill that the House passed last month as part of the new Democratic majority's first-100-hours push would cost the federal government $21 billion over the next five years, according to a new Congressional estimate. The five-year estimate, issued Friday by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, is equal to roughly half the Homeland Security Department's entire budget for the current fiscal year, and Republicans called it proof that adopting the bill so quickly had been irresponsible. 'This bill was rushed to the floor without the Democratic leadership giving us any indication of its massive cost,' said Representative Peter T. King of New York, the senior Republican on the House Homeland Security Committee. 'And now we know why.'" House Homeland Security Committee chairman Rep. Bennie Thompson "defended the price tag. 'Perhaps there would not be such sticker shock if the Congress and the Bush administration had addressed these security gaps identified by the bipartisan 9/11 commission over three years ago,' Mr. Thompson said in a statement."

The Washington Times (2/3, Seper, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The CBO said a bill to carry out the recommendations, which passed the House last month, would also raise airline passenger fees by nearly $1.3 billion between 2008 and 2011, with the money going to the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) to improve security at the nation's airports." President Bush "opposes the House bill, arguing it undermines many of the administration's own post-September 11 steps and it is impossible to scan 100 percent of all incoming cargo." CNN.com (2/2) reports the House "passed the bill January 9 during its heralded 'first 100 hours' of the new Congress. The Senate has not yet voted on the measure."

Federal Judge Allows Suits Against Corps Of Engineers Over Katrina. The New York Times (2/3, A10, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports, "Residents of several neighborhoods in the New Orleans area that were hardest hit by flooding after Hurricane Katrina can sue the Army Corps of Engineers over their claims that a government-built navigation channel was largely to blame, a federal judge ruled yesterday. … Since the flood, those who lived in the devastated neighborhoods near the east side of New Orleans — including the Lower Ninth Ward, New Orleans East and St. Bernard Parish — have contended that the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet caused much of their damage by intensifying the surge from the storm. The damage, they say, was foreseeable." Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of the Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, "cited previous cases saying that the channel was not a flood-control project. Instead, Judge Duval said, the cases say the channel — known locally as Mr. Go — was built as an aid to navigation, so the protection from liability might not apply. And so, he said, the questions deserved to be decided at trial."

Bush Nominates New Corps Commander. The New York Times (2/3, A10, Schwartz, 1.16M) reports President Bush "nominated a new leader for the corps, Lt. Gen. Robert L. Van Antwerp Jr. of the Army. If approved by the Senate, General Van Antwerp will succeed Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, who announced last August that he intended to resign."

WAR NEWS:

New National Intelligence Estimate Paints Grim Picture Of Iraq. Coverage of the new Iraq National Intelligence Estimate was eclipsed on Friday's network news broadcasts by the deadly storms in Florida, but many major newspapers put the story on the front page this morning. The reports are markedly negative, highlighting the bleak tone of the NIE. ABC World News (2/2, story 5, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "America's 16 spy agencies jointly, today, issued their estimate on the situation in Iraq. It is not encouraging. The report questions whether Iraqi leaders can improve security or get a political settlement in the next year and a half. And it says there's not one war underway, but many." ABC (Karl): "This sounds actually worse than civil war. It says you have at least four different wars raging in Iraq. You have a civil war between Sunnis and Shia. You have violence between those ethnic groups. You have the fight against al Qaeda. And widespread violence based on simple criminality." However, the report "warned of catastrophic consequences if US troops were to suddenly withdraw from Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0127649

The CBS Evening News (2/2, story 6, 2:18, Russ Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The release of a new intelligence report on Iraq paints a very bleak picture." CBS (Martin): "It's not just a civil war. Iraq is spiraling downward toward implosion. That's the stark picture painted by the national intelligence estimate. … One senior intelligence official rates the Iraqi government's chances at less than 50/50. Put another way, that means the US is closer to failure than it is to success."

NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 8, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The list of threats and dangers in Iraq is a long one in the form of the new national intelligence report prepared for the President and for Congress." NBC (Mitchell): "The National Intelligence Estimate paints a stark picture: a country torn by an accelerating cycle of violence like in Hilla yesterday. An Iraq where the Administration now admits sectarian violence is deadlier than attacks from al Qaeda."

The Washington Post (2/3, DeYoung, Pincus, 690K) reports on its front page, "The U.S. intelligence community yesterday released a starkly pessimistic assessment of the situation in Iraq, warning that even if security improves, deepening sectarian divisions threaten to destroy the government and ultimately could lead to anarchy, partition or the emergence of a new dictatorship. ... The estimate concluded that the Iraqi military will find it very difficult to carry out any new responsibilities or to operate independently against sectarian militias," causing the administration to struggle "yesterday to put the best face on the NIE's assessment." Congressional Democrats "embraced the estimate to bolster their rejection of Bush's plan." The" tough and unequivocal wording reflects the determination within the intelligence community to prove its independence from political pressure."

Also on the front page, the New York Times (2/3, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports that the "bleak new" NIE "left the White House and its opponents vying over whether its findings buttressed their vastly different views about how to arrest the worsening sectarian chaos there." While the administration "seized on one conclusion — that American forces remain 'an essential stabilizing element in Iraq' -- to reinforce their view that more troops are needed to secure Baghdad, Democrats "said the estimate's conclusions supported their view that the best way to combat violence in Baghdad would be through new political and diplomatic programs." The NIE, "the first such estimate on Iraq in more than two years, described in sober language a rapidly unraveling country in which security has worsened despite four years of efforts by the administration." It "portrayed the violence as essentially 'self-sustaining,' and suggested that the involvement of outsiders, including Iran, was 'not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability.'" The New York Times (2/3, A6, 1.16M) prints the "key judgments" of the NIE.

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Miller, 850K) reports Iraq "is unraveling at an accelerating rate, and even if U.S. and Iraqi forces can slow the spreading violence, the country's fragile government is unlikely to deliver stability to its people during the next year, according to a much-anticipated assessment by U.S. intelligence agencies. ... The director of national intelligence took the unusual step of releasing the document's key judgments publicly even as the full, 90-page classified version was being delivered to members of Congress and senior government officials. ... The report offers a bleak assessment of the Iraqi security forces who are supposed to play the leading role under Bush's plan to stem violence.

The Washington Times (2/3, Gertz, 88K) emphasizes the report's warning "that pulling U.S. troops out of the country too soon would lead to a collapse of the Iraqi military, outside intervention and the creation of safe havens for al Qaeda terrorists," calling the conclusion "a blow to Iraq war critics in Congress and elsewhere who are advocating a pullout of U.S. troops." The Financial Times (2/3, Sevastopulo, Daniel) reports, "The Iraqi government will be 'hard-pressed' to achieve political reconciliation over the next 18 months as it tackles a 'civil war' and the insurgency, according to a key US intelligence report." The FT calls it "the first official US document released to the public that concluded that elements of the conflict in Iraq constituted a 'civil war.'"

BBC.com (2/2) reports that the NIE "says 'civil war' accurately describes certain aspects of the conflict, including intense sectarian violence." However, it "adds that the controversial term does not adequately sum up the complexity of the situation." CNN.com (2/2) reports that the NIE "does not address whether the president's plan to 'surge' up to 21,500 troops into Iraq will work, but it lays out an extremely chaotic and complex situation that will make it difficult for those troops to succeed, intelligence and military analysts told CNN." Former CIA deputy director John McLaughlin "said the intelligence community didn't make an assessment of whether the troop increase would work, in part, because it didn't have enough data to make a recommendation and, in part, because it did not want to weigh in on a debate that is essentially political."

DOJ_NMG_0127650

NIE Said To Reflect Increased Pessimism Of Intelligence Community. The Washington Post (2/3, A11, Linzer, 690K) reports, in a pessimistic analytical article, "The intelligence community's bleak set of judgments about Iraq, made public yesterday, differs significantly from the flawed assessments of that country's alleged weapons programs that the White House released more than four years ago. Twenty-seven pages of confident assertions ... have been replaced, more than four years later, with heavily qualified glimmers of hope across a mere 3 1/2 pages laying out the prospects for reversing Iraq's dive into chaos." After US troops failed to find WMDs in Iraq, "the intelligence community -- particularly the CIA -- significantly altered the way in which it would conduct future analyses, highlight uncertainty and acknowledge dissent." The 2007 NIE "laid out three possible scenarios, each of which could have enormously negative consequences for Iraq: Chaos leading to partition, the emergence of a Shiite strongman who would seize power and rule by dictatorship, or a complete collapse of central control resulting in violent fiefdoms across the country."

Hunter Says NIE Confirms Need For Bush Strategy To Be Tried. Rep. Duncan Hunter said on MSNBC (2/2, Witt), "I've read the NIE, and it says it's a civil war if you look at it in a certain way and maybe not if you look at it in another way. I don't think it makes a lot of difference what you call it. You obviously have a high level of violence. And what we have to do right now is a very difficult and challenging second step in standing up a free nation. And that is, once you've stood up the government, the free government, you got to stand up a military apparatus that can protect that free government. … The operation in Baghdad that the President's initiated…this plan and this increase in forces, this reinforcement, is in progress right now. And what we have to do, I think, is get behind it and let's make sure this thing works."

Kucinich, Vilsack See Argument For Withdrawal In NIE. Rep. Dennis Kucinich said on MSNBC's Tucker (2/2, Carlson), "We've got to get out of Iraq. Six hundred and fifty thousand innocent civilians died, 3,100 of our brave soldiers died. … I'm the only who's running for president who voted against authorizing the war, and I'm the only one who's consistently voted against funding the war."

Ex-Gov. Tom Vilsack said on MSNBC (2/2, O'Donnell), "I think it's time for Congress to step up and cut off the funding to the status quo. I think it's time for to us end this war. I think it's very clear from the intelligence information and from the American public awareness that this has been a civil war for some time and our kids are in the middle of it. If we don't get our kids out of harm's way soon, another 1,000 will die, another 5,000 will be injured, and tens of thousands will be coming back home different than they left. It's time for Congress to step up."

Dowd Decries Administration For Lack Of Candor. New York Times (2/3, A15, 1.16M) columnist Maureen Dowd writes, "It's rare to get a simple apology when a complex obfuscation will do. Even after releasing parts of an intelligence report so pessimistic that it may as well have been titled 'Iraq: We're Cooked,' Bush officials clung to their alternate reality, using nonsensical logic and cherry-picking whatever phrases they could find in the report that they could use to sell the Surge. ... It's official. We're in a cycle of violence so complex and awful that withdrawing American troops will make it worse and keeping American troops there may also make it worse."

Bush Will Request $245 Billion For GWOT. The Washington Post (2/3, A1, Abramowitz, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "President Bush will ask Congress for close to three-quarters of a trillion dollars in defense spending on Monday, including $245 billion to cover the cost of fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and other elements of the 'global war on terror,' senior administration officials said yesterday. Democrats said the gigantic spending request will precipitate 'sticker shock' on Capitol Hill ... If approved by Congress, the new war spending would bring the overall cost of fighting to about $745 billion since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States -- adjusting for inflation, more than was spent on the Vietnam War." "Top" House Democrats "sounded skeptical about the new defense numbers and said they will not give the president a blank check," but "[John] Spratt, [Nancy] Pelosi and other lawmakers did not rule out supporting the request."

The New York Times (2/3, A11, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration is seeking a record military budget of $622 billion for the 2008 fiscal year, Pentagon officials have said. The sum includes more than $140 billion for war-related costs. The administration is also seeking $93 billion in the current fiscal year, which ends on Sept. 30, to pay for military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, the officials said. ... 'It is the highest level of spending since the height of the Korean War,' said Steven Kosiak, a military budget expert with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a policy analysis organization here." The Times notes, "Few if any budget experts expect significant cuts in military spending while large numbers of troops are in combat in Iraq and Afghanistan."

Intelligence Community "Divisions" Over Iran Analysis Detailed. In an analysis of Administration deliberations entitled, "Rifts Emerge On Iran Policy," the Wall Street Journal (2/3, A4, Dreazen, Solomon, 2.04M) reports the Administration's "war of words with Iran is sparking divisions within the government over how heavily Tehran actually is involved in fomenting instability in Iraq -- and how aggressive a stance the U.S. should adopt in response." Washington's "opinion about Iran is far from monolithic, and divisions over the country's intentions and activities in Iraq are emerging within the military and the intelligence community. The skeptics are challenging key aspects of the Bush administration's justifications for its hard-line approach toward Iran, making it more difficult for the White House to rally public support." The Journal says many of "those tensions broke into the open with the release" of the Iraq NIE.

DOJ_NMG_0127651

US Unable To Prove Iranian Link To Iraqi Violence. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Reynolds, 850K) reports, "Bush administration officials acknowledged Friday that they had yet to compile evidence strong enough to back up publicly their claims that Iran is fomenting violence against U.S. troops in Iraq. ... despite several pledges to make the evidence public, the administration has twice postponed the release — most recently, a briefing by military officials scheduled for last Tuesday in Baghdad. 'The truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts,' national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley said Friday."

Gates Says US Not Planning War With Iran. The AP (2/2) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates said the "decision to send a second U.S. carrier to the Persian Gulf region does not mean the United States is planning for a war with Iran. … He quickly added that the movement of the carrier is to demonstrate that America is committed to the Gulf region. He also said that he has not seen any credible proof yet that any Iranians were involved in the ambush last week in Karbala that left five soldiers dead." CNN.com (2/2) reports, "Gates said he was reiterating what President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have said earlier. ... He said that 'explosively formed projectiles' with roots in Iran were killing troops."

The Washington Times (2/3, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates yesterday all but ruled out military strikes on Iran, declaring 'we are not planning for a war with Iran.' Mr. Gates, who has called military action against Iran an absolute last resort, made the denial during a flurry of press and Internet blogger speculation that President Bush is preparing to order strikes against Iran's nuclear facilities." Recent moves by Bush "stirred speculation that a war was in the offing," but "Administration officials say the buildup was done to mollify Persian Gulf Arab states who fear attacks from Iran, and to put pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad."

Iraq-Based Kurds Train To Fight Iran. The AP (2/2, Gannon) reports from eastern Iraq, "Here, recruits are training to fight Iran, one of the four countries that rule the fractured Kurdish people. And although they belong to an organization officially outlawed as terrorist by Washington, they appear to be operating unhindered either by Iraqi-Kurdish units or the limited U.S. force in Kurdish areas. ... The PKK and its affiliates are spread through a region of some 35 million Kurds that straddles Turkey, Iraq, Iran and Syria. PEJAK, the newest group, claims to number thousands of recruits, and targets only Iran."

Centrifuge Installation Begins At Natanz. The New York Times (2/3, Sanger, 1.16M) reports, "International nuclear investigators have confirmed that Iran is beginning to install equipment in the large underground chamber in Natanz." IAEA teams now claim the long-delayed centrifuges "are just now beginning to be assembled," which the Times says "signals a continued defiance of the" UNSC. Noting Tehran's call to view the Isfahan site this weekend, the Times says Washington "dismissed the invitation as a diplomatic stunt, meant to create a false sense of openness about the program." Ambassador Schulte is quoted saying, "Instead of inviting I.A.E.A. ambassadors, Iran should invite I.A.E.A. inspectors. Iran should give them access to all the documents, nuclear facilities and individuals that it has refused to provide access to in the last three years."

The AP (2/3, Jahn) cites IAEA informal reports that "technical crews have hauled centrifuges into Iran's vast underground Natanz complex and were on the threshold of launching a program that could be used to create nuclear arms." That "recent activity in Natanz increases the tension between Tehran and the world's major powers over the Islamic republic's nuclear program, and will likely spur U.S. efforts to sharpen existing U.N. sanctions on Iran for its defiance of a Security Council demand that it freeze enrichment efforts."

Chirac Said To Preview Acceptance Of Nuclear Iran. In an analysis of French President Jacques Chirac's comments this week about Iran, the New York Times (2/3, Sciolino, 1.16M) says he "inadvertently said aloud what some policy makers and arms control experts have been whispering: that the world may have to learn to live with a nuclear Iran." By "veering from the prepared script and letting the veil of caution fall, he became the first Western leader to imply that containment of a nuclear Iran is preferable to other options, especially war." The Times continues, "Among the Europeans, there is an overwhelming consensus that the American-led war in Iraq has been a disaster and that Washington's Iran strategy could end in an even more destabilizing military confrontation. … Even inside the Bush administration, some officials have acknowledged over the past year that Iran eventually may get a nuclear weapon — or at least the technology and components to assemble one quickly."

Clark Does Not Rule Out Military Option, But Prefers Diplomacy. Retired Gen. Wesley Clark said on Fox News (2/2, Colby), "I think of course there's a military option. And the military option must remain on the table. But, by far, the best solution is to persuade the Iranians that they will be safer, more secure, more influential, be able to take care of their people better and advance their own interests if they don't have nuclear weapons rather than if they do. To make that case persuasively, it's not a matter sending another aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf. It really is a matter of this administration taking the lead in diplomacy in the region. We need to address, with the Iranians, exactly what they're afraid of. Why do they want a nuclear weapon? And what are they going to do with it? And what else do they have an interest in doing in the region?"

DOJ_NMG_0127652

GOP Strives To Block Iraq Debate. The New York Times (2/3, A7, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, said Friday that his party would unite to block Senate debate next week on a bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq unless the Democrats allowed votes on at least two Republican alternatives. Mr. McConnell said even Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is the chief author of the bipartisan proposal, and other Republicans backing his plan had agreed to prevent the resolution from reaching the floor Monday if Democrats did not agree to that demand." Majority Leader Harry Reid "responded that the Republican leadership was essentially filibustering a debate of Iraq policy to avoid a judgment on Mr. Bush." McConnell's vow "reflects the Republican leadership's strategy to force a Senate review of a series of competing resolutions, muddying the outcome with multiple votes, rather than allow the focus to be on a central proposal objecting to the troop buildup."

The Washington Times (2/3, Hurt, 88K) reports on its front page that Sen. John Warner "will join his fellow Republicans in voting Monday to block the resolution he wrote rebuking President Bush's Iraq war policy. ... Senate Republicans are opposed to a vote on the Warner resolution unless they also get votes on two other resolutions. One of those alternatives supports Mr. Bush's plan, and the other would prohibit cutting funds for the war. Republicans also want each resolution to require 60 votes to pass."

Dodd Says Public Expects More Than Resolutions. Sen. Christopher Dodd said on MSNBC (2/2, Witt), "I have great respect for my colleagues who are offering the sense of the Senate resolutions. These are expressions of people's views. And my position, my view here is, at this point, we need to be doing more than expressing our views on the matter. We ought to be taking some action on this. … The fact that we're going to spend a week next week debating Iraq is a positive thing. At the end of it, we'll be asked to choose between two resolutions, neither of which do anything at all except allow us to express our views. And I think the American public expects more from us here than just expressing our views."

King Opposes Resolutions. Rep. Peter King said on Fox News' Your World (2/2, Cavuto), "If a person has real opposition to the war, real opposition to the President's policies, they should have expressed it up to now. If they do want to express it now, then I think it would make more sense for them to come out and say that we should withdraw the troops. But the fact to have these nonbinding resolutions, which all they do is send a terrible signal overseas to our enemies, they send the wrong signal to our own troops. … I can't guarantee the President is right. But I can guarantee that, if we lose in Iraq, it's going to be an absolute disaster for the United States."

US Loses Fourth Helicopter In Two Weeks. The Washington Post, the New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, and the AP all reported the downing of another American helicopter and the military's acknowledgment of an emerging, "disturbing" trend of such downings. The Washington Post (2/3, A11, Londono, 690K) reports, "A U.S. military helicopter crashed Friday morning north of Baghdad, killing two soldiers on board, officials said. It was the fourth fatal helicopter crash in Iraq this year. ... Military officials did not say what type of helicopter it was or how it crashed. But Iraqi police and an insurgent group that asserted responsibility for the crash identified the craft as an Apache and said it had been shot down by a shoulder-fired antiaircraft missile." The New York Times (2/3, A7, Santora, 1.16M) reports that the fourth such downing reflected "a trend that American military commanders acknowledged was disturbing. ... General Pace said he did not know if the recent strikes were the result of a new strategy, improved skills or simply a natural result of the military's heavy dependence on helicopters in the fight here."

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Zavis, 850K) reports, "The spate of attacks raised questions about whether insurgents were increasingly targeting aircraft, a crucial component of U.S. operations in Iraq." The downings come "at a time when roadside bombings are becoming less effective against U.S. vehicles, which are protected by improved armor plating, signal-jamming devices and other measures." The Washington Times/AP (2/3, Gamel) reports, "America's top general [Pace] acknowledged that U.S. aircraft were increasingly in danger from groundfire." His "comments marked the first time a military official has publicly acknowledged the recent crashes were caused by groundfire." The AP (2/3, Mroue) reports, "An al-Qaida-affiliated group claimed responsibility and said its fighters had 'new ways' to attack American planes."

Too Few Iraqi Troops Arrive In Baghdad. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Barnes, 850K) reports, "The army brigades promised by the Iraqi government to help secure Baghdad have begun to arrive in the city, but with only a little more than half of their manpower, representing at least a partial failure in a crucial first test of the Bush administration's new war plan. ... Previous efforts to secure Baghdad failed in part because the Iraqi government was never able to deliver the forces it promised. ... Administration officials have sought to portray the new Baghdad security push as an Iraqi plan. But it was developed by Americans and was only reluctantly accepted by the Maliki government, according to officials who have described its formation. ... Because the Iraqis will be most needed in the later phases, U.S. commanders believe they still have time to build up the Iraqi troop levels to full strength." The AP (2/3) also reports the shortfall.

DOJ_NMG_0127653

Troops Plan To Drive Taliban From Overrun Town. The AP (2/3, Abrashi) reports, "Afghan security forces supported by NATO-led troops soon will launch an operation to recapture a southern town that was overrun by Taliban militants, an Afghan official said Saturday. Gen. Mohammad Zahir Azimi, the spokesman for the defense ministry, said the Taliban remained in control of the town of Musa Qala in Helmand province, which British troops left after a contentious peace agreement in October. ... The militants' assault, days after a Taliban commander was killed outside the town, raises doubts about the future of the peace deal [between "elders and the Helmand governor"], which has been criticized by some Western officials as a NATO retreat in hostile Taliban territory." Western officials had "complained that the deal put the area, which had been a center for clashes between British troops and resurgent Taliban militants, outside of government and NATO control."

In earlier coverage, the New York Times (2/3, A7, Gall, Shah, 1.16M) stated, "Taliban militants overran the town of Musa Qala in southern Afghanistan just three months after NATO troops had withdrawn and handed over control to a tribal council, officials said Friday. The insurgents detained police officers and tribal elders, seized weapons and government equipment and bulldozed part of the district offices, according to residents. ... The attack ended a British-brokered experiment aimed at bringing some control over remote regions and keeping Taliban insurgents at bay. Under the plan, British troops agreed to withdraw from the town, leaving a tribal council in charge with a locally recruited police force, and Taliban forces agreed to withdraw to nearby villages. ... A Taliban commander, Mullah Abdul Ghafoor, led the assault on the town Thursday in a rage, because his brother had been killed a few days before in a NATO airstrike, residents said."

Also in earlier coverage, the Washington Times/AP (2/3, Straziuso) reported, "Two residents of Musa Qala estimated that between 200 and 300 Taliban fighters had overtaken the town. They said the fighters took weapons from the police on Wednesday and destroyed the town's government center late Thursday. ... Late last month, NATO said an air strike outside of Musa Qala destroyed a Taliban command post, killing a senior militant leader and a number of his deputies. NATO said the Jan. 25 air strike 'was outside the area of the agreement' and did not violate it. However, [Helmand governor] Wafa said the Taliban told a gathering of elders last week that they considered the air strike a violation, and it appeared the assault was in retaliation."

AFP (2/3) reports, "The southern Afghan district of Musa Qala was under the control of the Taliban, the Afghan defence ministry said as NATO-led forces said the situation was still unclear."

Pakistan Says Taliban Activity Hard To Curb. The New York Times (2/3, A7, Masood, 1.16M) reports, "Faced with mounting criticism that Pakistan is not doing enough to thwart incursions into Afghanistan by Pakistan-based Taliban militants, the president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, said Friday that securing the porous border was not the sole responsibility of this country. He also insisted that despite some lapses, Pakistan's security forces were fully behind him in an effort to root out the resurgent Taliban." Musharraf "said Pakistan would selectively fence 22 miles of the border in North-Western Frontier Province and would later erect a 155-mile fence in Baluchistan Province." Times correspondent Carlotta Gall "recently reported that she had found anecdotal evidence in and around Quetta to support charges by Western diplomats and Pakistani opposition figures that the Pakistani intelligence agencies were encouraging the Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan."

Pakistan To Fence Afghan Border. The AP (2/2, Pennington) reports, "Many observers have been skeptical that the [fencing] plan will prevent many militants from crossing, especially because the proposed fencing would cover only a tiny portion of the rugged frontier." Musharraf's "defense of Pakistan's efforts to fight terrorism — and his admission of lapses — follow criticism from U.S. military officials who say cross-border attacks into Afghanistan have risen threefold since Pakistan signed a September peace deal with pro-Taliban militants in its North Waziristan region."

Veteran Personally Welcomes Troops Back. ABC World News (2/2, story 9, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Finally tonight, our 'Person of the Week.' A man who believes that the first thing a soldier sees when returning to the United States is all-important." Burt Brady: "They're glad to see us. And we're tickled to death to see them, of course, because they're our heroes." Gibson: "Every morning, for over a year now, Burt Brady gets up ... to welcome home American troops, returning from Iraq and Afghanistan." Brady: "I went 300 days last year." Gibson: "Brady, a 69-year-old veteran, is part of the welcome home a hero program, trying to make sure every soldier who comes through Dallas gets a special homecoming."

DOJ_NMG_0127654

DOJ:

Arkansas US Attorney Seeks Dismissal Of Challenge To Appointment. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (2/3, Satter) reports, "A filing last week challenging the constitutionality of the December appointment of Tim Griffin to be U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas is off base and should be dismissed, Griffin's office said Friday in a written response." The ADG continues, "The challenge and the response were filed in the case of Antoine Demetrius Baker of Little Rock, who is charged with capital murder and may face the death penalty if Griffin's office seeks and obtains permission to present that option to jurors in the event of a conviction. … Baker is accused of engineering the December 2002 shooting death of Jerry Otis, 21, who was scheduled to testify against Baker in an aggravated robbery and theft case stemming from an August 2002 altercation in which Otis was hit in the face with a pistol and robbed of $ 250." The ADG adds, "On Jan. 23, Baker's newly appointed attorney, John Wesley Hall of Little Rock, filed a motion to declare Griffin's Dec. 20, 2006, interim appointment by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales unconstitutional. Hall said an illegal appointment would prevent Griffin's office from legally carrying out its plan to add allegations to an existing indictment to justify seeking the death penalty against Baker." The ADG notes, "Hall said the interim appointment violates Article II, Section 2, of the U. S. Constitution, which covers presidential appointments, as well as a section of the U. S. Code that was altered last year as part of Congress ' reauthorization of the USAPATRIOT Act. … Assistant U. S. Attorney Patrick Harris, the lead prosecutor in Baker's case, said in an 18-page response that Hall's interpretation of the sections and his corresponding arguments 'lack merit,' and that Griffin's appointment 'was plainly lawful' and 'also entirely constitutional.' … Griffin's appointment immediately followed the resignation of Bud Cummins, who says the Department of Justice asked him to resign after five years on the job to give someone else a chance at the plum political appointment."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ Joins Siemens Probe. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A4, Esterl) reports, "German industrial giant Siemens AG, already weighed down by a cross-border corruption probe, faces heightened scrutiny after it disclosed that U.S. authorities also are investigating the matter." The Journal continues, "Siemens said the Department of Justice is investigating 'possible criminal violations of U.S. law by Siemens.' It also said it understands that the enforcement division of the Securities and Exchange Commission is conducting an 'informal inquiry' into the allegations of wrongdoing." The Journal adds, "The Munich-based conglomerate said in December that it had uncovered €420 million, or about $545 million, in suspicious transactions stretching back more than seven years. That disclosure came after more than 200 German police raided offices and homes of Siemens employees in mid-November, arresting several people linked to the company's telecommunications-equipment business. … German prosecutors are working with investigators in neighboring countries and said they suspect Siemens officials diverted funds through sham consulting contracts into slush funds to bribe customers abroad. Authorities released half a dozen people -- including a former Siemens management-board member and a former chief financial officer of the telecom unit -- before Christmas after they agreed to cooperate. … Siemens says that it is cooperating fully with investigators and that it has 'zero tolerance' for illegal behavior. It says any alleged wrongdoing was confined to 'individual acts' by certain managers but acknowledged in December that it had identified 'a material weakness' in its financial controls."

Redstone Settles Suit With Son Over Family Fortune. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A2, Karnitschnig) reports, "Hollywood mogul Sumner Redstone, the chairman of both CBS Corp. and Viacom Inc., settled a lawsuit with his estranged son over the family's vast fortune, ending a potentially messy confrontation that threatened to complicate his succession plans." The Journal continues, "The terms of the agreement, filed in a court in Maryland where the family business, National Amusements Inc., is incorporated, weren't disclosed. But people close to the matter said the family company repurchased the one-sixth stake held by the son, Brent Redstone. … The sale also consolidates the elder Mr. Redstone's control over the family business. Before the settlement, Sumner Redstone owned two-thirds of National Amusements stock, while his son and daughter, Shari Redstone, shared equal ownership of the other third. Sumner Redstone now owns 80% of National Amusements and his daughter the remaining 20%. It was unclear how much National Amusements paid for the stake. The lawsuit valued the company, which holds a controlling stake in Viacom, CBS and a large cinema chain, at $8 billion." The Journal adds, "A spokesman for Sumner Redstone confirmed that a settlement had been reached but said the two sides had agreed to keep the details confidential. … Brent Redstone's suit, in which he alleged that his father led a campaign to 'freeze out' his son from the family business, offered a rare glimpse into the difficult personal relationships of one of Hollywood's most powerful men. Sumner Redstone expressed shock at the suit and said it had both pained and angered him."

DOJ_NMG_0127655

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Seeking More Capital Punishment Sentences. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A1, Conkey, Fields, 2.04M) reports, "At a time when many states are backing away from capital punishment, the federal government is aggressively pursuing -- and winning -- more death sentences, including in jurisdictions that traditionally oppose them. On Tuesday, federal prosecutors in New York persuaded a jury to give a death sentence to Ronell Wilson, a 24-year-old man convicted of killing two undercover detectives by shooting each in the back of the head. The decision -- the first time in more than 50 years that a federal jury in New York agreed to sentence someone to death -- marked something of a milestone for the Justice Department in its continuing effort to apply the death penalty more evenly across the country." The Journal notes there are "47 people on federal death row -- more than double the number six years ago -- and Mr. Wilson this week became the seventh sentenced in a state without a death statute of its own since the federal death penalty was reinstated in 1988. The ranks may grow in the months ahead, with several capital cases on tap in locales traditionally opposed to the death penalty."

Shifting Public Attitude Towards The Death Penalty Noted. In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K) Andrew Cohen, CBS News' chief legal analyst, writes, "A majority of Americans still support capital punishment in one form or another (and there are still states, mostly in the South and the West, where juries are still handing down death sentences for murder). But there is a clear, marked trend toward limiting the circumstances in which capital punishment is applied and the manner in which executions are performed. As the Death Penalty Information Center notes, 'The number of death sentences per year has dropped dramatically since 1999.'"

Jury Convicts Former Coca-Cola Secretary Of Stealing Trade Secrets. The AP (2/3, Weber) reports, "A federal jury convicted a former Coca-Cola secretary Friday of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the world's largest beverage maker in an effort to sell them to rival Pepsi." The AP continues, "Joya Williams faces up to 10 years in prison. No sentencing date was immediately set. … The jury of seven women and five men deliberated for 11 1/2 hours over three days. On Thursday, jurors told U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester they were "hung" and could not decide. Forrester told the jury to try again Friday. … She remains free on bond, pending sentencing." The AP adds, "Williams was fired as a secretary to Coca-Cola's global brand director at the company's Atlanta headquarters after the allegations came to light. … The government says Williams stole confidential documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, New York-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million. … Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Duhaney testified previously that Williams spearheaded the scheme. Dimson did not testify."

The Financial Times (2/3, Ward) reports, "Jurors had been deadlocked over the verdict, but on Thursday the judge told them to keep trying to reach a decision. … The trial was in Atlanta, where Ms Williams worked as an administrative assistant to Javier Sanchez Lamelas, a senior Coke marketing officer." The Times adds, "Prosecutors played surveillance video taken inside Coke's headquarters showing the 41-year-old stuffing documents into her bag and handling bottles of prototype beverages, sometimes late in the evening. … Jurors heard that the stolen materials included details of a new Coke product code-named Project Lancelot. … The 120-year-old recipe of Coke's trademark cola – the so-called 'secret formula' -- was not involved. … Prosecutors explained how Ms Williams passed the stolen materials to her co-conspirators, both ex-convicts, who told PepsiCo they planned to sell to the highest bidder."

Former Duracell Employee Pleads Guilty To Stealing Trade Secrets. The AP (2/3) reports from Bridgeport, CT, "A former Duracell employee pleaded guilty Friday in Federal District Court to stealing trade secrets from the company, the authorities said." The AP continues, "Prosecutors said the former employee, Edward R. Grande, 48, a cell development technologist from Seymour, Conn., copied and downloaded computer research last year about Duracell's AA batteries. … Mr. Grande then sent the information to two Duracell competitors, prosecutors said. Neither of Duracell's competitors had requested or solicited Duracell's trade secret information, and both of the rivals sent the information back to Duracell." The AP adds, "Duracell, a unit of Procter & Gamble, generates more than $1 billion in revenue from the sale of AA batteries. … Sentencing is scheduled for April 23. … 'The theft of trade secrets is a serious crime that has the potential to cause significant economic damage to the owners of trade secrets and their shareholders,' the United States attorney for the district of Connecticut, Kevin O'Connor, said."

Mover Shot By Maryland Official Dies. The Washington Post (2/3, B1, Rich, Castaneda) reports, "A furniture deliveryman who was shot last week by a Prince George's County homeland security official died yesterday without having recovered to the point that he could describe the circumstances of the shooting, authorities and an attorney for his family said." The Post continues, "Brandon D. Clark, 22, of Oxon Hill succumbed to his injuries at Prince George's Hospital Center. He and a co-worker had been in critical condition there since they were shot by Keith A. Washington, who is a veteran county police officer, as they delivered a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to his home in Accokeek." The Post adds, "Police initially said that Washington, a former driver for County Executive Jack B. Johnson, apparently acted in self-defense and that Clark and his co-worker, Robert White, would probably be charged with assault. They have since backed off that statement, saying they would wait until detectives have completed their work before deciding whom to charge. … The movers were unarmed, authorities have said." The Post notes, "In a statement yesterday confirming Clark's death, Prince George's Police Chief Melvin C. High said, 'This is an unfortunate turn of events that now becomes a part of the internal and criminal investigation.' … The case has attracted wide attention because of a pattern of previous complaints against Washington, 45, who was appointed deputy homeland security director by Johnson in 2004."

DOJ_NMG_0127656

Official Has History Of Conflict, Sources Say. The Washington Post (2/3, B1, Thompson) reports, "In the 10 days since Prince George's County homeland security official Keith A. Washington shot two unarmed deliverymen at his Accokeek home, some critics have told of run-ins with him dating back 15 years. They describe a man who loses his temper easily and has ended up in physical and verbal altercations." The Post continues, "Washington's supporters, including relatives and some county officials, have been reluctant to talk in the midst of an investigation, other than to say that Washington acted in self-defense. … The case took a turn yesterday when one of the men, Brandon D. Clark, 22, died at Prince George's Hospital Center. Clark, of Oxon Hill, and Robert White, 36, were delivering a Marlo Furniture bedroom set to Washington when they were shot during an altercation. White, of the District, remained in critical condition." The Post adds, "Washington has come under investigation at least three times by the Prince George's police department for assault complaints or "unbecoming conduct" and has been sued at least twice, including once by a D.C. police officer who said that Washington assaulted him and had him falsely arrested, according to interviews and court records. … 'Keith has a bad temper,' said Michon Charles, the mother of Washington's teenage daughter, Hali. 'He gets hot under the collar very quickly.'"

Federal Agents Announce Early Successes In NOLA Crime Crackdown. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (2/3, Filosa) reported, "Federal agents announced a slew of arrests, indictments and convictions Friday, saying it marks only the start of their promise to team up with New Orleans police to end the violent crime wave plaguing New Orleans. … 'The feds are not screwing around,' said Jim Bernazzani, the FBI's special agent in charge of the New Orleans field division. 'The train has left the station.' In all, the federal, state and local partnership racked up two guilty verdicts, nine indictments of ten defendants, four arrests and one guilty plea in a plot to murder a Drug Enforcement Administration agent." The Times-Picayune added, "'In the federal system, there is no revolving door,' Bernazzani said. On Monday, FBI agents will meet with NOPD homicide detectives and begin pounding the pavement Tuesday, Bernazzani said. Fifteen agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration have been in the city since last week, embedded with the New Orleans Police Department, said Bill Renton, the DEA special agent in charge in New Orleans."

Virginia Men Plead Guilty In Fake "Purse Party" Scam. The Washington Post (2/3, B3, Markon) reports, "A father and son pleaded guilty yesterday to supplying phony designer purses at massive discounts for 'purse parties' in Northern Virginia and for kiosks they operated at malls throughout the Washington region." The Post continues, "Lalit Kumar Ohri, 63, and his son Gaurav Ohri, 28, both of Fairfax, admitted that they sold purses bearing the trademarks of some of the nation's leading designer labels, including Gucci and Prada. The pair had the counterfeit bags embossed with the sought-after labels or gave the labels to purchasers, some of whom affixed them to the purses with glue. The purses were purchased by the father and son from suppliers in New York. … 'I bought bags. They were counterfeit bags. . . . They were not genuine,' Gaurav Ohri, director of operations for the family company, Sonya Handbags, said as he pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to traffic in counterfeit goods. … 'We had the labels we put on the bags. They looked like the real labels,' Lalit Ohri, the company's owner, said as he pleaded guilty to the same charge in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. Both face up to five years in prison when they are sentenced April 20." The Post notes, "With the last-minute pleas, they avoided a trial scheduled for Monday that had promised to be unusual at a federal courthouse that has hosted some of the nation's most prominent terrorism and spy cases. Representatives from Kate Spade, Louis Vuitton and other high-profile designers had been expected to testify, and prosecutors were planning to show the jury a sampling of hundreds of phony designer purses. … The case has focused attention on the trendy purse parties that began more than a decade ago in New York City and have been going on in Northern Virginia since at least 2000, according to partygoers. Held in private homes, the gatherings feature flowing wine and plentiful food, along with hundreds of designer handbags sold for hundreds of dollars less than the real deal. It is a crime to sell trademarked goods but not to purchase them. … Several women known as 'purse ladies,' who run the purse parties, had been expected to testify at the trial. The Ohris sold counterfeit purses to women who then re-sold them at purse parties 'throughout Northern Virginia,' Assistant U.S. Attorney Jeanine Linehan said in court yesterday."

DOJ_NMG_0127657

Marion Barry Rejects Plea Offer. The Washington Post (2/3, B4, Cauvin) reports, "A D.C. Superior Court judge set a June 12 trial date yesterday for D.C. Council member Marion Barry on several traffic offenses -- charges that Barry and his attorney insist are unfounded." The Post continues, "Barry (D-Ward 8), a former D.C. mayor, has rejected an offer from prosecutors to plead guilty to operating a motor vehicle while impaired in an incident in which police said they detected the smell of alcohol. Had he accepted the offer, prosecutors would have dropped the other charges, including the more serious offense of driving under the influence. Prosecutors also would have dropped charges in connection with a subsequent traffic stop. … But in a hearing yesterday morning, Barry's attorney, Frederick D. Cooke Jr., told Magistrate Judge Milton C. Lee that there is little common ground between the D.C. attorney general's office and the defense and that a deal is unlikely. … 'He can't plead guilty to an offense he didn't commit,' Cooke said." The Post adds, "The charges against Barry, who stood next to his attorney during the brief hearing, stem from two traffic stops last year in the District. … In the first incident, Barry was pulled over Sept. 10 by uniformed Secret Service officers near the White House after allegedly running a red light. Police said he smelled of alcohol, and Barry was asked to take a breathalyzer test. An initial test came in below the legal limit, but officers said they wanted to conduct a urine test for alcohol, Cooke said in an interview. Barry declined to provide a urine sample, and according to Cooke, he said he was willing to take another breath test, which police chose not to administer. … The officers charged Barry with driving under the influence, which can be done when a driver refuses the urine test. But Cooke said that the officers should have given Barry another breath test unless they documented some reason why they could not. Absent that, Cooke said, all they have to stand on is Barry's .02 reading, which is below the legal limit."

US Cracking Down On Online Gambling. The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Johnson) reports, "Federal prosecutors and agents in the FBI's organized crime unit have been mounting a large-scale crackdown on Internet gambling, with indictments against executives at gaming Web sites, arrests of foreign businessmen who process payments, and subpoenas to investment banks that may have helped bankroll the operations." The Post continues, "The aggressive campaign has gathered steam in recent weeks, as Americans prepare to wager more than $5 billion on tomorrow's game between the Chicago Bears and the Indianapolis Colts, the biggest betting day of the year, according to industry experts." The Post adds, "The arrests in California and in the U.S. Virgin Islands last month of two board members of Neteller, a British company that facilitates online money transfers, is spurring overseas executives with even modest gambling connections to avoid traveling to the United States lest they be nabbed. And it is leaving legal analysts and bettors crying foul about the government's approach. … Justice Department officials have long been on record as saying that Internet gambling breaks the law. They cite the long-standing Wire Act, a statute making it a crime to use telephone lines to place a bet within the United States or overseas. The 1961 law, which applies to businesses instead of individual bettors, was designed to eradicate the Mafia from the gambling arena. … But after the 2000 wire-fraud conviction of sports betting entrepreneur Jay Cohen for operating a Web site in Antigua, federal prosecutors enforced it only sporadically. The campaign heated up last year, after the government indicted two popular sports betting Web sites: Antigua's WorldWide Telesports Inc., and London's BetOnSports PLC. Both companies have announced they will no longer accept wagers from U.S. clients."

New York Fire Department Examining Promotions Involving Fake Diplomas. The New York Times (2/3, Buckley) reports that the New York City Fire Department "has not decided whether to take disciplinary action two days after a report revealed that 14 of its employees had used, or tried to use, bogus diplomas to be promoted or hired." The Times continues, "According to the report, by the Department of Investigation, the 14 employees paid hundreds of dollars to buy fake degrees from 'St. Regis University,' an online diploma mill that required no course work, to fulfill the department's educational requirements. … But a spokesman from the Fire Department and a fire union official said the report overstated the extent of the problem. While 13 employees and one job applicant bought the degrees from a fake online university to be promoted or hired, the fire department rejected the phony diplomas from all but three. Ten were hired or promoted anyway because they later legitimately obtained the required credits. The Fire Department also said it began rejecting diplomas in 2003 from the so-called university, which claimed that it was based in Liberia. … 'Of the 14 people, only 3 were promoted with that degree,' said Francis X. Gribbon, a department spokesman. 'We promoted 2,500 people since 2001. This is a handful of people we are talking about.'" The Times adds, "Yet according to Thomas Von Essen, who was fire commissioner from 1996 to 2001, the report underscored what he described as a lax attitude toward obtaining college credits in the department. Beginning in the late 1990s, Mr. Von Essen introduced requirements that higher-ranking Fire Department officials obtain a set number of college credits to be promoted. New hires would need college credits, too. … The Uniformed Firefighters Association, the fire officers' union, fought part of the new requirements. One of their arguments was that higher-ranking officers who came on the job when only high school diplomas were required should not need college credits to advance."

DOJ_NMG_0127658

Former New York Judge Testifies To Political Pressures. The New York Times (2/3, Lee) reports, "A former Brooklyn judge told a jury yesterday that she feared her career would be over if she did not pay $10,000 to associates of Clarence Norman Jr., the longtime leader of the borough's Democratic machine, for get-out-the-vote efforts and fliers during her re-election campaign in 2002." The Times continues, "The former judge, Karen B. Yellen of Brooklyn Civil Court, who ran on the Democratic ticket in the 2002 primary along with Mr. Norman, was the key witness for the prosecution in the weekold corruption trial against Mr. Norman, a former 12-term state assemblyman, in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn. … It is Mr. Norman's fourth corruption trial in two years. In this case, he is accused of pressuring Judge Yellen and another judicial candidate for thousands of dollars. In the week leading up to the 2002 primary, prosecutors say, Mr. Norman demanded that Judge Yellen pay his associates or be 'dumped' and lose the party's support." The Times adds, "Ms. Yellen's testimony repeated much of that given on Thursday by Jeffrey Feldman, Mr. Norman's former second in command. … Mr. Feldman and Ms. Yellen testified that Mr. Norman became angry when a member of the judge's camp asked what would happen if she did not pay. Prosecutors have said Mr. Norman wanted her to pay Ernest Lendler, a printer, $1,000 for a flier he designed, and William H. Boone III, a longtime associate of Mr. Norman's, $9,000 for get-out-the-vote efforts on Primary Day in the mostly black districts of central Brooklyn."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

California Teenagers Given Probation After Halloween Hate-Crime Beating. The AP (2/3) reports from Long Beach, CA, "Four of nine black teenagers convicted in the racially charged beating of three white women on Halloween were sentenced to probation Friday." The AP continues, "Punishment could have ranged up to confinement in a California Youth Authority lockup until age 25. The teens were ordered to serve 250 hours of community service, 60 days house arrest, and take anger management and racial tolerance programs. … 'It was an awful crime. Terrible, emotional and physical injuries,' Juvenile Court Judge Gibson Lee said." The AP adds, "Last week, Lee convicted nine teens — eight female and one male — of felony assault, with a hate-crime enhancement against all but one. … Among those sentenced Friday were an 18-year-old youth, his twin sister, their 16-year-old sister — who didn't receive the hate-crime enhancement — and another 16-year-old girl. … The other five defendants face sentencing next week. Names of the defendants were withheld because they are juveniles or were juveniles at the time and were tried as juveniles."

Judge Delays Decision On Port Chester, NY, Election. The New York Journal News (2/3, Sadler) reports, "A federal judged deferred a decision yesterday on whether to stop the March 20 (Port Chester) village election for two seats on the Board of Trustees." The News continues, "U.S. District Judge Stephen Robinson will instead wait to hear arguments from both sides in the voting rights lawsuit filed by the U.S. Department of Justice against Port Chester, he said in a pre-trial conference. … The judge said he will presume that holding the election would cause irreparable harm, as the Justice Department alleges. The village must prove otherwise at trial later this month in order to proceed with the election." The News adds, "Anthony Piscionere, a lawyer for the village, argued that stopping the election would actually cause irreparable harm to the village because it would force a special election and disenfranchise voters. He said the trustee race would provide a good "snapshot" of Hispanic voter turnout because a Hispanic candidate is running. … But U.S. Attorney David Kennedy said 'this can only be decided after a full and fair hearing.' He said it would be 'informative but wrong' to hold the election in March." The News notes, "The Justice Department sued the village in December, asserting that its at-large method of electing its six trustees violates the federal Voting Rights Act. It is asking the judge to replace Port Chester's system with one in which trustees are elected from six districts. It is also asking the judge to stop the March trustee election until voting districts are implemented."

11th Circuit Finds No Discrimination In Georgia Farmworkers Case. The Moultrie (GA) Observer (2/3, Glenn) reports from Ellenton, GA, "The U.S. Court of Appeals 11th Circuit Thursday upheld a decision from the U.S. Justice Department that a Colquitt County farmer did not discriminate against 17 Puerto Rican farmworkers in favor of Mexican labor." The Observer continues, "The plaintiffs had traveled from Puerto Rico to Georgia in 2003 to work for Booth Farms under a contract approved by the U.S. Department of Labor. They arrived a few days after a group of federal H2A program workers from Mexico. … Producer Larry Booth, of Ellenton, had maintained that some of the citizen workers (Puerto Rico is a territory of the United States) were slow pickers and didn't pick enough to earn the equivalent piece rate of $7.49 an hour, the Adverse Effect Wage Rate at the time, so he fired them citing economic reasons. The plaintiffs complained that no Mexican H2A workers who didn't work up to Booth's standard weren't fired and subsequently filed a discrimination suit. Federal law requires that employers hire Americans over H2A workers, but the plainiffs said Booth favored Mexican workers over Puerto Rican regardless of production rates." The Observer adds, "The 17 workers, some of whom Booth said he didn't fire, were represented through the Georgia Legal Services Farmworker Division. Booth represented himself pro se with some assistance from friend and cousin former Georgia Senator Franklin Sutton, also of Ellenton. Booth wasn't able to secure financing for his farming operation because of the suit and had to sell out, he said. Plus, the same 17 plaintiffs have filed a suit in Puerto Rico against Booth Farms seeking about $383,000."

DOJ_NMG_0127659

Mississippi VRA Challenge Seen As National Test. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (2/3) editorializes, "Quietly, with little fanfare, a national test of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is under way in Mississippi." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "This month, U.S. District Judge Tom S. Lee has been presiding over the first case in U.S. history in which the federal government has accused black election officials of violating the Voting Rights Act by discriminating against white voters. … The U.S. Justice Department is alleging that Noxubee County Democratic Party Chairman Ike Brown and other Noxubee County election officials have rigged the voting process against white voters by manipulating voter rolls, making public threats to ban some whites from voting, certifying candidates who did not live in districts they sought to represent, miscounting ballots to ensure white candidates lost and other discriminatory acts. … Brown has denied all allegations, accusing the white minority in Noxubee County of petty complaints after years of white discrimination against black voters there." The Clarion-Ledger concludes, "The key question facing Judge Lee isn't whether Noxubee County or Mississippi has a sordid history of white election officials discriminating against black voters. The county and the state are guilty on both counts. … The question is if Brown and other black officials in Noxubee have used their powers to do the very same thing to white voters. .. The Voting Rights Act must be enforced equally for voters of all races."

Civil-Rights Era Killings Under Renewed Scrutiny. The New York Times (2/3, Dewan) reports from Atlanta, "For every infamous killing that tore at the South in the 1950s and '60s, there were many more that were barely noted, much less investigated." The Times continues, "Virtually all such cases gained momentum only when the victims of the past found voices in the present, like those that helped arrest a 71-year-old man last month in connection with the Klan killings of two black teenagers in Mississippi in 1964. Rather than police officials, it has often been journalists and filmmakers who have combed through documents and tracked down witnesses, fueling some 15 years of successful prosecutions." The Times adds, "Only now, with time running out because potential witnesses and suspects are dying off, have law enforcement officials begun to take a systematic approach to unsolved civil rights crimes. The Federal Bureau of Investigation recently canvassed its field offices for the first time, compiling a list of 51 victims in 39 cases, most of which were never investigated by the bureau. … The list was prompted not by the string of convictions, but by a letter about the lynching of two black couples at the Moore's Ford Bridge, east of Atlanta, in 1946, said Chip Burrus, the assistant director of the F.B.I.'s criminal investigative division. … That a single letter prodded the F.B.I. to action illustrates how slender are the time-brittled fibers that knit together the outcome in these fading crimes. … In the case that produced the recent arrest, timing was crucial. If the bodies of the victims, Henry H. Dee and Charles E. Moore, had been found just three weeks earlier in the summer of 1964, their deaths might have been largely forgotten."

NYPD "Stop And Frisks" Soar. The New York Times (2/3, Baker, Vasquez) reports, "The New York Police Department released new information yesterday showing that police officers stopped 508,540 individuals on New York City streets last year — an average of 1,393 stops per day — often searching them for illegal weapons. The number was up from 97,296 in 2002, the last time the department divulged 12 months' worth of data." The Times continues, "After inquiries by the City Council and civil rights advocates, the department delivered four bound volumes of statistics to the Council in midafternoon. The raw data showed that more than half of those stopped last year were black: an average of 67,000 per quarter. … At the same time, the average number of people arrested per quarter as a result of such stops almost doubled to 5,317 last year, from 2,819 in 2002, and summonses nearly quintupled, to a quarterly average of 7,292 last year from 1,461 in 2002." The Times adds, "Until yesterday, the most recent information released by the Police Department about how and why it stops people to search them, sometimes looking for illegal guns, was from 2003, according to city officials and city and court records. Some officials have said that lag put the department at odds with a pair of legal requirements that sprang from public outrage at the 1999 fatal police shooting of Amadou Diallo, an unarmed black street peddler. … The department, which rejects such assertions, has not released numbers from 2004 and 2005, or from the last three months of 2003. … Those who review the data are now grappling with dual issues: determining why the Police Department waited so long to release any new figures, and why it is stopping more people and searching them." The Times notes, "The issue of these police-public encounters — called 'stop and frisks' — became an emotional flashpoint after the shooting of Mr. Diallo, whose death in a barrage of 41 police bullets led to weeks of protests and scores of arrests outside 1 Police Plaza, in Lower Manhattan. … Many of the protesters contended that there was a pattern of racial profiling in stop-and-frisks. A state study later in 1999 confirmed racial disparities in such stops."

DOJ_NMG_0127660

Michigan Court Rules Against Domestic Partner Benefits. The New York Times (2/3, A10, Saulny, 1.16M) reports, "Same-sex domestic partners are not entitled to health benefits from public universities or local and state governments under the State Constitution's two-year-old marriage amendment, the Michigan Court of Appeals said in a ruling released Friday. In a reversal of a lower court ruling, a three-judge panel found that the amendment, which bans same-sex marriage, also prohibited government agencies from recognizing 'similar unions' like domestic partnerships for any purposes."

The Washington Times/AP (2/3) reports, "The appeals court agreed with the Michigan attorney general, Republican Mike Cox, who said in a March 2005 opinion that same-sex benefits are not allowed in a state that does not recognize same-sex unions. The legal challenge was mounted by 21 homosexual couples who work for the city of Kalamazoo, universities and the state."

WPost Endorses Voting Reform Paper Trail Requirement. The Washington Post (2/3, A14, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Lawmakers locally and nationally are moving in the right direction in pushing for improvements in how Americans vote. Foremost is the growing movement to require an independent way to verify the results of electronic voting. It's critical, though, that this reform effort be calibrated so that local election officials are given the time and resources to do the job properly. Congress is expected to consider legislation this year requiring that the nation's electronic voting machines produce a paper trail so that people can verify the accuracy of their votes and to facilitate recounts in disputed elections. … While we have not been in the camp of those seeing fanciful conspiracies in electronic voting, a backup system is without question the best way to safeguard security and ensure voter confidence."

ANTITRUST:

Viacom Orders YouTube To Remove Its Videos. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A3, Karnitschnig) reports, "Deciding that trading its copyright protection for Internet buzz was no longer viable, Viacom Inc. ordered Google Inc.'s YouTube to remove all of its content from the video Web site." The Journal continues, "Viacom's decision to force YouTube, which hosts a vast array of video content uploaded by its users, to take down more than 100,000 video clips from its Web site may yet prove to be a negotiating tactic aimed at drawing the company into a deal. But Viacom executives said privately they had determined that the marketing boost they once believed YouTube provided them has proved to be a mirage. … 'People are waking up to the fact that there is no marketing advantage,' a Viacom executive said. 'There's no novelty anymore.' YouTube Chief Executive Chad Hurley said in an interview that other media companies such as CBS and NBC that partnered with YouTube felt otherwise." The Journal notes, "Viacom's decision comes after the two camps failed to reach a distribution agreement despite months of negotiation punctuated by pointed rhetoric from Viacom, which owns a stable of cable networks that includes MTV, Nickelodeon and Comedy Central as well as the Paramount movie studio."

The Financial Times (2/3, Chaffin, Van Duyn) reports, "Viacom, which owns youth brands such as Nickelodeon and Comedy Central, made the demand after months of negotiations with YouTube and Google. It said more than 100,000 affected video clips on the YouTube site had generated more than 1.2bn video streams. … The move threatens to wreck Google's attempts to cement commercial relationships with traditional media groups, which supply most material."

The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Musgrove) reports, "The dilemma for Viacom, as it yanks back control over clips from its popular networks, is whether YouTube is more of a marketing tool that helps it win new viewers, or a business threat. … Though YouTube, which was purchased by Google last year, said it would take down the clips, as of yesterday afternoon there were still thousands for shows like Comedy Central's 'The Colbert Report' on its site." The Post notes, "The tussle between the companies is indicative of a rocky transition for traditional broadcast interests, which must try to make business sense out of the online entertainment age, in which content is easy to produce, copy and distribute. Many networks are putting shows on their own Web sites, but YouTube, which is just a year old, has become the online nexus for trading both homemade and cribbed video. It serves up 100 million videos and its users upload 65,000 videos a day, and now that it's backed by Google's massive advertising machine, YouTube stands to become its own advertising behemoth."

The San Francisco Chronicle (2/3, Lee) reports, "The dispute reflects how popular San Bruno's YouTube has become as an online source of entertainment. And it highlights the dilemmas media companies face as they try to keep control of their material in the digital age. … Since exploding onto the Web less than two years ago, YouTube has drawn ire -- as well as millions of loyal fans -- for its vast and rapidly growing library of videos, many of them copyrighted clips from popular television shows and movies. The site's mushrooming popularity got the attention of Internet powerhouse Google, which bought YouTube for $1.65 billion last year."

DOJ_NMG_0127661

USA Today/AP (2/3, Sutel) reports, "Under federal copyright law, online services such as YouTube are generally immune from liability as long as it responds to takedown requests such as these, which YouTube often does. Less clear legally is what happens when another user posts the same video, something commonly done on the free video-sharing site. … In November, YouTube agreed to delete nearly 30,000 files after the Japan Society for Rights of Authors, Composers and Publishers complained of copyright infringement."

Equity Board Rejects Vornado Offer, Endorses Blackstone Bid. The Washington Post/Bloomberg (2/3, D2) reports, "Equity Office Properties Trust, the target of the largest real estate takeover, yesterday rejected a $41 billion offer from Vornado Realty Trust, saying a $38.3 billion cash bid by Blackstone Group L.P. is less risky for shareholders." Bloomberg continues, "Equity Office said a sale to New York-based Vornado would take months to complete, while a buyout by Blackstone would close within days. Given the time delay, Equity Office put the value of Vornado's bid of $56 a share in cash and stock at $54.28 to $54.88. Blackstone's offer is $54 a share. … The stock closed yesterday at $55.38, up 23 cents a share." Bloomberg adds, "Equity Office of Chicago postponed a vote on the Blackstone bid by two days to Feb. 7 to give shareholders time to review its stance on the Vornado offer, according to a statement filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission. If Blackstone's bid is approved, the purchase would be completed on or about Feb. 9. … The decision by the board of the biggest U.S. office landlord is a setback to Vornado chief executive Steven Roth, who first pursued the company in July. Now Blackstone's Stephen A. Schwarzman must win approval of Equity Office investors to complete the biggest leveraged buyout ever and gain 543 buildings across the country."

Suit Claims Dell Did Not Disclose Intel Payments. The San Jose Mercury News (2/3, Poletti) reports, "Intel's program of rebates to its computer-making customers has come under serious fire again, this time in a massive class-action complaint claiming the chip giant's rebates to Dell inflated the troubled computer maker's profits by $800 million a year." The News continues, "A 252-page lawsuit was filed against Dell in federal court in Austin, contending that Dell did not disclose the rebates -- which the suit also called kickback payments -- from Intel. The suit claims that Dell's reported profits were propped up by about $800 million a year by rebates Intel paid to Dell in return for exclusively using Intel chips in its computers. … The suit was filed by a well-known law firm, Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins, on behalf some Dell shareholders, including Amalgamated Bank." The News adds, "Until last year, Dell was the only computer maker to solely use chips developed by Intel. While most PC and computer server makers have been using chips developed by Intel archrival Advanced Micro Devices, Dell was a major holdout. Last year, it began to use AMD chips. … The suit was filed Wednesday, the same day founder Michael Dell said he was returning as chief executive after Kevin Rollins resigned. The company's chief financial officer, James Schneider, stepped down in December and was replaced by board member Donald Carty."

The AP (2/3, Koenig) reports, "Mary Blasy, one of the lawyers who filed the lawsuit, said in an interview that the plaintiffs don't claim that the payments were illegal. Rather, she said, they believed Dell cheated investors by concealing the payments, which the company didn't control and gave a false picture of Dell's financial strength." The AP adds, "The lawsuit charges that Dell got the Intel payments 'for shipping only Intel-based products and not doing business with AMD,' Advanced Micro Devices Inc. Dell began using chips from Intel's rival last year. … The payments to Dell were mentioned in an ongoing antitrust lawsuit that AMD filed against Intel in 2005. The Lerach law firm learned the size of the payments from Dell insiders, Blasy said."

Delta Creditors Approve Terms Of Bankruptcy Financing Program. The AP (2/3, Weber) reports, "Lawyers for Delta Air Lines Inc., the third-largest U.S. carrier, said Friday in court papers that the company's creditors' committee has approved the terms of the $2.5 billion in financing that Delta has secured to emerge from bankruptcy protection." The AP continues, "The disclosure was made as Delta amended its reorganization plan for a second time. Other technical changes also were made to the plan, which was first filed Dec. 19 and amended on Jan. 19. … Delta's chief bankruptcy lawyer, Marshall Huebner, said the official unsecured creditors' committee's support of the exit financing is a 'tremendous milestone for us as we move toward exiting Chapter 11 under our standalone plan.'" The AP adds, "The filing also provided a few new details of the behind-the-scenes discussions in recent weeks by Delta's board regarding US Airways' now withdrawn $9.8 billion hostile takeover bid. … Delta's board discussed US Airways' revised proposal several times before US Airways withdrew the bid on Wednesday, including that day. The board took no action.

DOJ_NMG_0127662

… Tempe, Arizona-based US Airways Group Inc. withdrew its bid for Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines Inc. after Delta's official committee of unsecured creditors said it supports Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy protection in the spring as a standalone carrier, thus rejected US Airways' merger offer."

MediaNews Purchases Santa Cruz Sentinel. The AP (2/3) reports, "MediaNews Group Inc. said Friday that it has acquired the Santa Cruz Sentinel from Community Newspaper Holdings Inc." The AP continues, "MediaNews, with 56 daily publications, said the California Newspapers Partnership -- which is majority-owned by MediaNews -- acquired the Sentinel, a daily. … MediaNews funded its share of the purchase through a revolving credit agreement. Gannett Co. and SF Holding Corp., the other partners, contributed their share of the purchase price. Financial terms were not disclosed." The AP adds, "Dean Singleton, MediaNews' chief executive officer, said the Santa Cruz newspaper will bolster the company's reach in California. 'The Santa Cruz Sentinel is a fine newspaper today but will be strengthened by the resources of our existing newspapers,' he said. … MediaNews, which owns the Oakland Tribune and seven other Bay Area newspapers, acquired the Monterey County Herald, San Jose Mercury News and Contra Costa Times from McClatchy Co. last year. The complex $1 billion deal included $300 million in financing from the Hearst Corp., owner of the San Francisco Chronicle. The deal between MediaNews and Hearst is the subject of a federal antitrust lawsuit filed by a San Francisco businessman."

Judge Rules Microsoft May Question Expert Who Discovered Violation. The Des Moines Register (2/3) reports, "The computer expert who said he found evidence that Microsoft is violating a federal consent decree can be interviewed by Microsoft lawyers for up to five hours, Polk County District Court Judge Scott Rosenberg has ruled." The Register continues, "The expert, Andrew Schulman, is a witness for Iowa consumers suing Microsoft for anti-trust violations and up to $330 million in damages. … The consent decree ended a federal anti-trust case against Microsoft several years ago." The Register adds, "Schulman reportedly found evidence it was being violated while digging through mountains of secret computer code that is used to drive Microsoft products. … Microsoft lawyers had already questioned Schulman for seven hours in an earlier deposition, but he reported the violation after that testimony. His report caused Microsoft lawyers to ask for permission to question Schulman again before he testifies in court."

Express Scripts Sweetens Bid For Caremark. Dow Jones (2/3) reports, "Express Scripts Inc. is expected to triumph in its bidding war with CVS Corp. for pharmacy benefit manager Caremark Rx Inc. with a sweetened offer price, one industry analyst concluded after conducting a survey of Caremark and CVS clients. … 'Absent a significant external event (pressure from Congress, material adverse change in the industry) or a stronger sales pitch from Caremark-CVS (entirely possible), we expect Express Scripts will acquire Caremark at a higher price,' Cowen & Co. analyst Kemp Dolliver wrote in a research note Friday. He assumed a $3-a-share increase to Express Scripts' current offer, to roughly $62 a share. … 'We continue to think that Express Scripts has the upper hand in the competition for Caremark,' Dolliver said. 'Our survey indicates that Caremark's and CVS' clients share the same uncertainty over the deal as the investment community.' … Dolliver subsequently reiterated an outperform rating on Express Scripts shares." Dow Jones adds, "Caremark in November agreed to a so-called 'merger of equals' with retail drugstore chain CVS Corp. in a deal that would give Caremark shareholders 1.67 shares of CVS share for each share held.The following month, Express Scripts launched a competing, hostile $26 billion cash-and-stock bid for its larger PBM rival which, at the time, represented a 15% premium over CVS' offer. … The Caremark-CVS bid was sweetened in January with a $2 a share onetime dividend."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Bush Administration Expresses Agreement With Global Warming Report. ABC World News (2/2, story 3, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The top climate experts from all around the world, speaking with one voice, issued a blunt and bleak assessment in global warming. They spoke of the damage already done and the fears about where we are headed." NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 4, 2:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Some say it is a wakeup call loud and clear. But US Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman today called America a small contributor to it and called for a global discussion of today's report." ABC World News (2/2, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the White House "said it agreed with today's report. But officials rejected the idea of mandatory reductions in greenhouse gas emissions. If anything new and significant is to be done about global warming, businesses, individuals and governments will all have to play a role. … But some companies, and many scientists, say not much will depend without a push from government. Tough, new laws to force companies to cut greenhouse gases. And the Bush administration is against that, especially if other countries, such as China and India, do not do the same."

The Financial Times (2/3, Harvey) reports, "The world's leading climate scientists on Friday swept away the last doubts surrounding global warming." BBC.com (2/3) reports,

DOJ_NMG_0127663

"Governments around the world have called for urgent action to tackle climate change, after a major report said mankind was very likely the cause. The EU said it was the starkest warning yet, while the UK said climate change threatened world peace and prosperity. The US administration said the report was 'valuable', but rejected mandatory controls to reduce greenhouse gases."

The Washington Post (2/3, Eilperin, 690K), in a front-page article, reports, "Declaring that 'warming of the climate system is unequivocal,' the authors said in their 'Summary for Policymakers' that even in the best-case scenario, temperatures are on track to cross a threshold to an unsustainable level." The Post notes Bush administration officials "welcomed the report and emphasized that U.S. research funding helped underpin its conclusions. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Administrator Conrad C. Lautenbacher Jr., who oversees much of the nation's climate research, said in an interview that the international assessment will lead to 'a more objective and informative public debate.'"

The New York Times (2/3, Rosenthal, Revkin, 1.16M), also in a front-page story, reports the Bush administration, "which until recently avoided directly accepting that humans were warming the planet in potentially harmful ways, embraced the findings. …. Administration officials asserted Friday that the United States had played a leading role in studying and combating climate change, in part by an investment of an average of almost $5 billion a year for the past six years in research and tax incentives for new technologies. At the same time, Secretary of Energy Samuel Bodman rejected the idea of unilateral limits on emissions. 'We are a small contributor to the overall, when you look at the rest of the world, so it's really got to be a global solution,' he said."

The Chicago Tribune (2/3, Neikirk, 617K) reports the Bush administration "embraced the report but rejected demands for a mandatory system of capping 'greenhouse gas' emissions, such as carbon dioxide. Instead, the administration said President Bush would rely on his plans to develop more renewable fuel and require more efficient vehicles. But with Democrats controlling Congress, pressure is apt to build on the White House to take a tougher approach." Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid said, "President Bush should immediately work with Congress to pass legislation that requires reductions in the emissions of greenhouse gases, and he should call together the leaders of the world to obtain their binding commitment to reducing pollution around the globe."

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Maugh, Kaplan, 850K) reports, "Although most of the scientific data behind the report have come out before, their aggregation into a single report, phrased in the boldest of terms, sparked an intense reaction Friday. 'The degree of certainty, which was already very high, is now as close to certain as scientists are willing to say,' said former Vice President Al Gore. … Echoing a phrase that was widely heard Friday, Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.) called the report 'a scientific smoking gun.'"

US Scientists Claim New Report Underestimates Risks. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A4, Fialka, 2.04M) reports, "U.S. government scientists Friday said the long-term outlook for global warming may be more dire than suggested by this week's United Nations' report, which they say doesn't fully address the impact of clouds and melting glaciers. … The computer models used for the IPCC report based their predictions only on the results of heating of the existing water in the world's oceans, causing the oceans to expand and sea levels to rise, said Tom Delworth, a climate modeler for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration." The AP (2/2, Borenstein) reports, "The worst could mean more than 1 million dead and hundreds of billions of dollars in costs by 2100, said the NOAA's Kevin Trenberth. … 'It's later than we think,' said panel co-chair Susan Solomon, the U.S. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration scientist who helped push through the document's strong language."

Gore To Testify At House Hearing On Global Warming. The Politico (2/2, Grim) reports former Vice President Al Gore "has accepted an invitation to testify next month in a congressional hearing on the highly controversial issue of climate change. … For people who make a parlor game of guessing Gore's intentions for 2008, the appearance will surely stoke speculation that he may yet be a late entrant into the Democratic presidential derby. Gore will appear at a joint hearing on Wednesday, March 21. He will be the only witness to appear before the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Energy and Air Quality and the Science and Technology Subcommittee on Energy and Environment."

IPCC "Supercomittee" Dismissed As Overly Political. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/3, A11, 2.04M) Philip Stott, Stott, professor emeritus of biogeography at the University of London, writes, "I confess I was afflicted by a profound world-weariness following the release yesterday of the latest gloomy machinations from the IPCC. … Unfortunately, the IPCC represents science by supercommittee. … Moreover, the IPCC does no original research, nor does it monitor climate-related data; its evidence is instead from selected secondary sources. But, above all, this supercommittee is more political than is often recognized, rule three firmly reminding delegates that: 'documents should involve both peer review by experts and review by governments.'"

States' Ocean Habitat Rescue Initiatives Hailed.

In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/3, A15, 690K) Leon Panetta and James Watkins, co-chairmen of the Joint Ocean Commission Initiative, write, "Buried beneath the headlines about warming oceans, harmful algae blooms and dwindling seafood stocks is the fact that it is within our power to make immediate, measurable progress toward solving the problems facing our oceans. Innovative state leaders are showing us the way, and the federal government needs to follow their example. Over the past three years, California, acting to preserve a vital state resource, has developed an Ocean Action Plan; launched the most comprehensive approach to marine protected areas in the nation; and invested more than $30 million in projects to improve water quality, protect ocean habitats and manage sand on its beaches. In the past year, at least 18 states have taken similar steps. … In most respects, though, the federal government and Congress lag behind states in efforts to protect our oceans."

DOJ_NMG_0127664

Tribe Challenges Interior Official's Recognition Authority. Indian Country Today (2/3, Toensing) reports from Kent, CT, "The Schaghticoke Tribal Nation has challenged Interior Department Associate Deputy Secretary James Cason's authority to act as 'the decision-maker' in overturning the tribe's federal acknowledgement in October 2005." ICT continues, "In the latest twist in the Schaghticokes' decades-long quest for federal recognition, attorneys filed a motion Jan. 23 in U.S. District Court in New Haven, claiming that Cason violated both the Appointments Clause of the Constitution and the Vacancies Reform Act when on Oct. 12, 2005, he issued a Reconsidered Final Determination reversing the BIA's January 2004 positive federal acknowledgement decision. … Cason was functioning as an Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs but was not appointed by the president or confirmed by Congress, and therefore exceeded his authority by issuing decisions that only a 'principal officer of the United States' can lawfully render; therefore, the RFD is void, STN's attorneys wrote. … Cason also reversed that day the federal status of the Eastern Pequots, whose federal recognition had been issued two years earlier." ICT adds, "The motion is part of the tribe's appeal of the reversal of its recognition. The appeal alleges, among other things, that the RFD was arbitrary and capricious, a violation of the tribe's due process rights and the product of unlawful political influence and congressional interference. It asks the court to restore the tribe's recognition. Interior and its officials are named as defendants. … The appeal is 'the Tribe's remaining hope to regain the federal recognition that was wrongly taken from it in the RFD. It is no exaggeration to say that the Tribe is fighting for its very existence. What happened to this Tribe, including the circumstances in which it lost its prior positive recognition are, at a minimum, unusual and deserving of careful review. The Tribe has alleged since its federal recognition first came under attack that various political officials acted improperly to reverse that recognition. This improper delegation of authority to Mr. Cason is one more part of the story of the illegal handling of the Tribe's recognition. The Court should hear the full story of the Tribe's fate,' one of the attorneys said. … The Schaghticokes' claims have 'no merit,' said Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal, who led the state's relentless opposition to the tribe's federal recognition."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Budget Includes Additional Education Funding, Entitlements Cuts. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Havemann, 850K) reports, "In a bid to balance the federal budget in five years, President Bush will seek cuts in several key programs. But the spending blueprint he sends to Congress on Monday leaves room for some sweeteners, according to administration officials. Under the Bush plan, grants for college students would rise after remaining stagnant for three years, and some parts of the No Child Left Behind Act would receive additional funding. There would be new money to spur the manufacture of hybrid cars and production of ethanol. And a new farm bill would give farmers $1 billion more a year than the current law. At the same time, Bush will ask for substantial cuts in Medicare and Medicaid, the government's main healthcare programs." The Times goes on to report that the Pentagon budget, including "will hit $623 billion, according to a senior Defense official. That total includes $481 billion for the military's normal annual budget, a 10% increase over this year's spending. … The budget request also includes, for the first time, funding details for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan; in past years, these war costs have been approved as special emergency funding bills.'

Some Claim Bush Budget Numbers Are Unrealistic. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A2, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that President Bush's budget "will be an early effort to cement his legacy in domestic policy. The key question: Can he convince members of Congress that they can extend his cherished tax cuts, all of which expire by 2010, and still balance the budget? Mr. Bush has pledged to show a path to erasing the existing $248 billion. … Those projections will assume that Mr. Bush's tax cuts, which are estimated to cost about $450 billion over the next five years, are made permanent But the White House is expected to leave out or underestimate other key costs, including an expensive fix to the alternative minimum tax and additional funding for the war in Iraq beyond 2009. It will also include strong revenue growth that some economists may see as unrealistic. As the Bush budget will show, the deficit numbers are notoriously dependent on such assumptions."

NYTimes Praises Democrats For Cutting Earmarks. The New York Times (2/3, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "The Democratic-led House has made the most of a sorry budgetary business, stripping out billions of dollars in earmarked pork from a spending measure urgently needed to keep the government running this year. The $463.5 billion bill is an omnibus mop-up device necessitated by the fact that nine of 11 major spending bills were left unfinished last fall by the Republican leadership in its final weeks of power. The Democrats, who promised to cut out special-interest budget goodies, killed thousands of earmarks custom-designed by lawmakers. … The House measure now heads to the Senate as that rare piece of legislative sausage devoid of expensive, toothsome pork."

DOJ_NMG_0127665

Bush Backs Three Percent Raise For Federal Employees. The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Barr, 690K) reports Clay Johnson, deputy director for management at the OMB said President Bush "will propose a 3 percent pay raise for federal employees and military personnel in his fiscal 2008 budget, a senior administration official said yesterday." Johnson "said the president's civil service pay advisers and Pentagon officials had acted independently in coming up with their pay recommendations. If accepted by Congress, the raises would take effect next January." House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, "a longtime advocate for federal employees," said he "planned to study the budget proposal, particularly in the context of what he called 'an already significant pay gap between federal employees and their private-sector counterparts.'"

Bush Said To Have "Adopted" Democrats' Rhetoric On Domestic Issues. The Washington Post (2/3, A4, Fletcher, 690K), in an article titled, "Bush To Urge Democrats To Consider His Domestic Policy," reports that in "an attempt to sustain key elements of a domestic agenda pronounced dead on arrival by congressional critics, President Bush will challenge the newly empowered House Democrats to give his health-care and energy proposals serious consideration when he addresses them today during a retreat in Virginia. … On domestic matters…Bush has recently adopted the rhetoric -- but not the policy positions -- often associated with Democrats. He has invoked the menace of global climate change, lamented the nation's growing income inequality, and set ambitious goals to develop alternative fuels and cut gasoline consumption. He has also proposed a plan to make health insurance more affordable." According to the Post, Democrats "have greeted such offerings with suspicion. Leading House Democrats remain dismissive of Bush's health-care proposals, in particular." Joel Kaplan, Bush's deputy chief of staff "and a key figure in the development of the president's agenda, said the president's domestic plans confront 'real challenges faced by real people, and they provide real solutions.'"

Senators' Failure To Promptly Disclose Campaign Donations Draws Scrutiny. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Morain, 850K) reports, "Unlike candidates for president and the House, political action committees and most state offices, senators refuse to transmit their campaign donation reports over the Internet. Thanks to a labyrinthine process that takes weeks or months, they are able to delay public access to their campaign donors' identities — sometimes until after the election. Now that seven senators are running for the White House and using money raised as senators to jump-start their campaigns, the practice is under renewed scrutiny. Senators have blocked repeated efforts, backed by 25 of their colleagues from both parties, to change the law. … Like all federal officeholders, senators were required to submit year-end campaign finance reports by Wednesday. Such reports are public documents. But that doesn't mean they are publicly available. Nor will they be any time soon."

CHC Chairman Baca Rebuts Sanchez's Allegations. The Politico (2/2, Hearn) reports, "Amid roiling turmoil in the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, chairman Joe Baca Friday refuted accusations that he had called Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a 'whore,' had mismanaged the group's political arm, thwarted the advancement of female lawmakers and was improperly elected chairman. In a lengthy statement, Baca said he was 'deeply troubled' by the allegations made by several of his colleagues in the 21-member caucus. … 'A months-old internal CHC discussion has been repackaged into accusations with sexual overtones through irresponsible reporting and inflammatory headline writing,' he said. He reiterated his statement, issued Wednesday, that the claims were 'categorically untrue.' Aides to Sanchez and Reps. Hilda L. Solis and Linda Sanchez, two California Democrats who have been very critical of Baca, could not be reached for comment." Baca "dismissed Loretta Sanchez's charge that he had referred to her as a 'whore' during a meeting with California state legislators, including Democratic Assembly Speaker Fabian Nunez. Specifically, Baca noted news reports that Nunez had said he has 'no recollection' of the remark."

LATimes Explores Animosity Between Baca And Sanchez. The Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K), in an editorial, notes "the bad feelings stretch back a year, when caucus PAC money was being used to boost the political fortunes of Baca's sons, Joe Jr. and Jeremy. Jeremy needed the money to help his family keep the state Assembly seat being vacated by Joe Jr., who was trying to extend the Baca empire into the state Senate. Both Baca brothers lost, despite the infusion of PAC money, and it may be worth noting that their opponents were women: Gloria Negrete McLeod defeated Joe Jr., and his old seat went not to his brother but to Wilmer Amina Carter. Sanchez and four other Californians — including her sister, Rep. Linda T. Sanchez

DOJ_NMG_0127666

(D-Lakewood) — and an Arizonan quit the PAC over the use of money for family members."

New Air Traffic Control System Could Cost As Much As $76 Billion. The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Wilber, 690K) reports, "Federal aviation officials expect on Monday to begin introducing a proposal to finance a new air-traffic control system that they say will be needed to keep pace with increasing air travel over the next two decades. Without a new system, officials say, passengers would face delays that would dwarf last year's snarls. 'In the long term, we could see real gridlock,' said Federal Aviation Administrator Marion C. Blakey. … A debate is unfolding over how to finance the next-generation network, which could cost $69 billion to $76 billion, according to the Congressional Research Service. The Federal Aviation Administration and other government agencies want the system completed by 2025. They have not said how much it would cost. The FAA would use its trust fund, which accumulates aviation-related taxes, to pay for the new system. The fund's balance has dropped to $1.8 billion, however, the lowest in a decade, officials said."

Football Fan Rice Picks Colts To Win Super Bowl. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared on ESPN (2/2) to talk about her love of football and Sunday's Super Bowl game. Asked about the significance of this being the first Super Bowl where both coaches will be black, Rice said, "I think it's terrific and as an African-American, I'm really, really proud." Asked for her prediction on the winner of the Chicago Bears-Indianapolis Colts matchup, Rice said, "I have to like the Colts, because I think that offensively, they are a better football team. I also think that they've been playing very well defensively."

Super Bowl Security Efforts Previewed. The CBS Evening News (2/2, story 7, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) ran a detailed report on security planning for the big game, which has been designated a Level One National Security Event by the Department of Homeland Security, as it has been each year since the 9/11 attacks.

NYTimes Considers New NHTSA Crash Tests "Overdue." The New York Times (2/3, A14, 1.16M), in an editorial, writes that the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration "is exploring ways to strengthen its tests and its ratings system for the crashworthiness of motor vehicles. The effort is long overdue but still likely to fall short of what's needed. In far too many cases, the tests are weaker than they should be and fail to address current kinds of accidents, like what happens when one of today's larger vehicles collides with a smaller one."

OTHER NEWS:

Jobs Report "Just About Perfect," Bush Economic Adviser Says. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A3, Conkey, 2.04M) reports the Labor Department said Friday that "nonfarm payrolls rose by 110,000 jobs last month following December's gain of 206,000 jobs. The smaller increase in January -- together with a rise in the unemployment rate to 4.6% from 4.5% in December and a tepid 0.2% gain in the typical employee's pay last month -- suggests the economy is slowing somewhat after a strong finish to 2006." The Financial Times (2/3, Callan, Mackenzie) says the "signs of cooling in the labour market are consistent with the Federal Reserve's view that inflation pressures are starting to moderate as the economy coasts towards a soft landing." Ed Lazear, an economic adviser to President Bush, said, "This jobs report is just about perfect. It suggests that the economy is balanced. It suggests we can sustain this into the future."

The Washington Post (2/3, D1, Henderson, 690K) also says the report "fits with widespread government and private forecasts that the economy will slow to a cooler but still-solid pace of growth this year after expanding rapidly last year. That is expected to cause the drum-tight job market to ease and inflation pressures to ebb." The New York Times (2/3, C3, Peters, Porter, 1.16M) also has a report on the jobs numbers, and ABC World News (2/2, story 6, :10, Gibson, 8.78M) and NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 6, :10, Williams, 9.87M) briefly mentioned them as well.

Dow Down Slightly; S&P, Nasdaq Notch Up. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, B1, McKay, 2.04M) and the New York Times/AP (2/3, C7) report the Dow Jones Industrial average was down 20.19 points Friday to 12653.49. The S&P 500 was up 2.45 points to a six-year high of 1448.39, while the Nasdaq was up 7.50 points to 2475.88.

WSJournal Derides Economists Who Spoke Of "Jobless Recovery." The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A10, 2.04M), in an editorial, writes, "The good economic news keeps rolling in. Yesterday's new-jobs estimate for January, at 110,000, was below Wall Street expectations but it was accompanied by upward revisions of 81,000 jobs for the prior two months. Those revisions brought the 2006 monthly average up to 187,000 new jobs, or 2.2 million for the year. Readers will recall that the current expansion was derided right through 2004 as a 'jobless recovery.' We now know the economy has created 7.4 million new jobs since mid-2003, as revisions by the Bureau of Labor Statistics have added hundreds of thousands to its original monthly estimates. Thus the hand-wringers have had no choice but to move on, turning their laments to allegedly 'stagnant wages.' Well, that's now vanishing too."

DOJ_NMG_0127667

Leading Democratic Presidential Hopefuls Spar Over Iraq At Party Gathering. The Washington Post (2/3, A3, Balz, Kornblut, 690K) reports that "with Congress in their control and their eyes now on the White House, Democratic Party leaders took their first look at the party's field of presidential candidates yesterday at a forum in which the three front-runners presented their positions on Iraq and jockeyed over who can defeat the Republicans in 2008." Addressing the Democratic National Committee Winter Meeting, Sen. Hillary Clinton "presented herself as a tough, experienced pragmatist," while Sen. Barack Obama "offered himself as an inspirational critic of politics as usual," and John Edwards "made himself the keeper of the Democratic flame, delivering a call for Democrats to reclaim their heritage."

NBC Nightly News (2/2, story 7, 1:30, Williams, 9.87M) said "as expected, one topic dominated the red meat political speeches before the sympathetic crowd: the war in Iraq." The New York Times (2/3, A12, Nagourney, Healy, 1.16M) says the contenders, "to shouts and cheers from thousands of Democrats," condemned the war but differed "over how to end it -- and particularly whether Democrats should settle for a nonbinding resolution expressing the Senate's opposition to Mr. Bush's war policies." Clinton, "who voted for the war and has since turned against it," drew the "most attention. Talking over a handful of hecklers, she argued that a bipartisan resolution, supported by a large number of senators and soon to be debated on the Senate floor, was the most powerful way for Congress to begin the process of blocking Mr. Bush from moving ahead with his plan to send 21,000 more troops to Iraq." But she "faced strong opposition from the left in the form of Mr. Edwards…who said that his former colleagues should not support the nonbinding resolution next week and should instead vote for measures to cut off funds for the war." On its Web site, The Hill (2/2, Youngman) reports Edwards "continued to move to the left of his leading presidential rivals" with his remarks.

ABC World News (2/2, story 7, 2:20, Tapper, 8.78M) reported, "To a room full of Democratic activists, fund-raisers and party leaders needed for any presidential campaign, the candidates made their distinct pitches." Obama: "The campaigns shouldn't be about making each other look bad. They should be about figuring out how we can all do some good for this precious country of ours." Tapper: "The war in Iraq was another way to draw distinctions." Obama: "I was opposed to this invasion, publicly, frequently, before it began." Clinton: "I want to be very clear about this: If I had been President in October of 2002, I would not have started this war." Tapper: "Many Democrats think politicians expressing disapproval of the war, which is Senate is likely to do next week, is not enough. They want it ended now." Edwards: "We cannot be satisfied with passing nonbinding resolutions that we know this president will ignore. We have the power to stop the escalation of this war. We have to use this power. We have to be strong. We have to do what's right."

The Washington Times (2/3, Lambro, 88K) headlines its front-page story "Hillary Vows To End War," leading by reporting that Clinton said she "would end the Iraq war as president if the conflict was still raging when she took office." Clinton told the gathering, "If we in Congress don't end this war before January 2009, as president, I will." Newsday (2/3, Thrush) also runs that quote from Clinton.

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Hamburger, Hook, 850K) reports on its front page that Democrats "have begun an increasingly harsh debate" over Iraq. The Times says that, "until recently, most Democratic presidential candidates, like the party generally, found success by bashing President Bush's Iraq strategy without offering comprehensive alternatives." But this week, Obama, "in a departure from his own past statements, introduced legislation that would begin a phased redeployment of troops by April and require that all combat troops leave Iraq by March 2008," which "set him at odds" with Clinton. The AP (2/2, Pickler) says Obama "reminded the party's rank-and-file -- twice -- that he was against the Iraq invasion from the beginning." The Financial Times (2/3, Luce) says Obama received a "rock star reception" at the meeting.

The Washington Post (2/3, A3, Milbank, 690K) writes that despite a seven-minute time limit on the speeches, Edwards spoke for 17 minutes and 40 seconds, Clinton for 16 minutes and 12 seconds, and Obama for 15 minutes and 30 seconds. Sen. Christopher Dodd and Rep. Dennis Kucinich also spoke Friday; Dodd took 20 minutes and 15 seconds for his speech, which Kucinich finished after 12 minutes and 38 seconds, "but this was probably because the audience treated his appearance as a chance to start conversations or to visit the restrooms."

DNC To Consider District Of Columbia House Seat Resolution. The Washington Post (2/3, B1, Sheridan, 690K) reports the DNC meeting will today consider a resolution backing a bill to give the District of Columbia a full seat in the House. The resolution is expected to pass.

Clinton Up By 20, McCain By Seven, In ARG New Hampshire Polls. The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/3, DiStaso) reports that a new American Research Group poll finds Sen. Hillary Clinton widening her lead in the New Hampshire Democratic primary field. Clinton stands at 39%, with Sen. Barack Obama at 19%, John Edwards 13%, and no other candidate above two percent, with 21% undecided. In December, Clinton led Obama by just six points, 27%-21%. On the GOP side, Sen. John McCain leads with 27%, with Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney tied at 20% each, Newt Gingrich 11%, and no other candidate above one percent, with 21% undecided. ARG surveyed 600 likely voters (+/- 4%) in each party primary January 31-February 1.

DOJ_NMG_0127668

Clinton's "Flat Footedness" With Humor Seen As Gender Double-Standard. In her Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K) column, Meghan Daum examines Sen. Hillary Clinton's campaign trail attempts at humor, saying it is likely her "flat footedness is a symptom of a double standard that rarely comes up in conversations about the challenges faced by powerful women. If there's anything that can hinder a woman's credibility faster than becoming visibly pregnant or getting caught watching Lifetime, it's revealing the ability to be genuinely funny. … Clinton, hyper-focused wonk that she is, has a personality that has long appeared to be the product of focus groups. … She has been so ravaged by the media, the public and, it would seem, her own perfectionism that she comes across less as a human being than as a historical figure whose legacy depends on keeping her humanity out of the equation. … But the fact that we're seeing a black candidate who seems infinitely more relaxed with himself than his female competitor speaks volumes about just how much we're likely to punish women who step outside the bounds of corporate-flavored gravitas."

Obama Addresses Internet-Mobilized Supporters. The Washington Post (2/3, A5, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "At his first rally since announcing his presidential exploratory committee," Sen. Barack Obama "appealed yesterday for support from the young people who had mobilized for the event online. The gathering of several thousand students at George Mason University in Fairfax underscored the potential power of online communities in the 2008 campaign. Its genesis was a group created last summer on Facebook.com, a Web site frequented by college students who post profiles and assemble virtually."

Obama Said To Have "Bubble Around Him." The Politico (2/2, Allen) writes that while "Clinton's opening slogan was, 'Let the conversation begin,'" Obama "just wanted the conversation to end. … Obama, riding an astonishing wave of glowing publicity for a candidate 21 months from an election, already has a bubble around him that is tighter than the one that surrounded Texas Gov. George W. Bush, who spent long hours of the fledgling days of his candidacy in bull sessions with reporters."

Biden Appears On Sharpton's Radio Show. Under the headline "Joe Biden Courts Al Sharpton," The Politico (2/2, Ben Smith) runs a brief item on the Delaware senator's appearance on Sharpton's radio show. When Biden "paused for breath at the end of his appearance," Sharpton told him, "I thought you were drowning in giving me flattery."

Romney Slams Clinton For "Timidity" Toward Iran. The AP (2/2, Dominguez) reports Mitt Romney accused Sen. Hillary Clinton "of 'timidity' regarding the security threat posed by Iran." Addressing the Republican Study Committee, Romney "lashed out at Clinton for telling a pro-Israel dinner that a dialogue with countries hostile to Israel -- including Iran and Syria -- is needed to promote peace in the Middle East." Romney said, "At this point, we don't need a listening tour about Iran. Someone who wants to engage Iran displays a troubling timidity toward a terrible threat of a nuclear Iran." Clinton spokesman Mo Elleithee responded, "Sen. Clinton believes that no option should be taken off the table when it comes to preventing Iran from developing nuclear weapons. Given his record of flip flops, the only thing that's timid are Gov. Romney's convictions." On its Web site, The Hill (2/2, Kucinich) also reports on Romney's remarks.

The Politico (2/2, Martin) reports Romney also "explained his shift on social issues" during his speech, presenting himself "not as a convert but as a student who had received an education on key social issues." Afterward, Rep. Wally Herger "said he was satisfied with Romney's explanation. 'I felt very comfortable,' said Herger, who is so far uncommitted in the presidential contest but offered that he could 'absolutely' back Romney." But Rep. Darrell Issa said that while Romney "said what he needed to say to the conservative audience, his address was short on specifics. … Asked about Romney's accounting of how he had come to oppose abortion rights, Issa acknowledged that it was 'artful,' but probably not quite as clear-cut as Romney tried to make it."

WSJournal Says Hagel Should Have Courage To Run For President. The Wall Street Journal (2/3, A10, 2.04M) headlines an editorial "Hagel For President," but immediately says, "No, we don't mean this as an endorsement. The Journal doesn't endorse candidates, and on the big issues of the day we don't much agree with Chuck Hagel in any case. But with the Nebraska Republican loudly agitating for a rapid withdrawal from Iraq, we think it's time the Senator tested his ideas somewhere other than the Sunday talk shows." If Hagel "thinks his foreign-policy vision is superior to President Bush's or to Senator John McCain's, he should stop booing from the gallery and get into the fight for the Republican Presidential nomination. The primaries are only a year away, and the GOP field awaits a genuine antiwar candidate. It's one thing to win the Beltway media primary, another to prevail among actual voters, as Mr. Bush has done twice."

Two Arkansas Journalists Advise Huckabee To "Cool It." In a Wall Street Journal (2/3, A10, 2.04M) op-ed,

DOJ_NMG_0127669

Paul Greenberg and Kane Webb of the Arkansas Democrat-Gazette examine some of Mike Huckabee's clashes with the media during his time as governor of Arkansas, saying that "Huckabee, at times, can be the most elevating of speakers. … But, too many other times, Brother Huckabee just likes to wallow in the old invective, and the pettier his complaint, the longer he wallows." Huckabee "has a lot of potential as a presidential candidate, and a record of accomplishment here in Arkansas -- from getting health care to kids whose families couldn't afford it to fixing our interstate highways. He's been willing to take on the educational establishment in order to improve our schools, and early on he finally simplified this state's once byzantine requirements for something as basic as renewing your car tags." But his "campaign will be history soon…unless he learns to cool it. Which may not be possible for the Huck, given his showman's personality and rhetorical impulses."

At Least 19 Dead Following Florida Storms. The AP (2/2, Ellis) has an update on the situation in central Florida, where "powerful storms, including at least one tornado, smashed hundreds of homes…and killed 19 people or more." Gov. Charlie Crist has declared a state of emergency in four counties. ABC World News, the CBS Evening News, and NBC Nightly News all led with the disaster and had detailed coverage. CBS gave the story about nine minutes of coverage, NBC eight, and ABC five and one-half.

Beltway Gossip Columns Multiply. The New York Times (2/3, Leibovich, 1.16M), in a front-page article titled, "Titillating Or Not, Washington Gossip Blossoms," reports, "As the globe warms, Iraq burns and a presidential campaign heats up, Washington finds itself red-hot in gossip, or what passes for such here. … Ten publications carry a total of 14 columns focusing on political tidbits that appear regularly, up from three columns a decade ago. They include the Reliable Source and In the Loop columns, The Washington Post's entrenched offerings (the paper's Web site started a new enterprise, the Sleuth, last month); In the Know and Under the Dome, which dish in the tabloid The Hill; and Heard on the Hill, which appears in Roll Call. The Examiner offers Yeas and Nays, while the latest entry, The Politico, nourishes its politerati with Shenanigans and the Crypt."

US Preeminence In Stem Cell Research Said To Be Vulnerable. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (2/3, A15, 690K) Joseph Fuller, founder of the Monitor Group, and Brock Reeve, executive director of the Harvard Stem Cell Institute, write, "Many Americans assume that once the current restrictions on federal funding of embryonic stem cell research have been lifted, America will surge to the forefront. … But closer examination suggests that such confidence might be misplaced. If one analyzes the state of the industry along some of the same critical dimensions that contributed to our come-from-behind win in biotechnology, unnerving patterns emerge. … In short, the stem cell sector is at risk of experiencing a failure to launch at the national level."

Noonan Notes Reagan's 1976 Fight Against GOP Establishment. In a column for the Wall Street Journal (2/3, P18, 2.04M) Peggy Noonan writes, "Next Tuesday would have been Ronald Reagan's 96th birthday, which is amazing when you consider he is, in a way, more with us than ever: his memory and meaning summoned in political conversation, his name evoked by candidates. … Lately we are hearing of President Reagan's famous 11th commandment: 'Speak no ill of a fellow Republican.' It's a good rule for both parties, but it's good also to remember how he approached it in practice. Ronald Reagan turned his own party upside down, enraged its establishment, and threatened its immediate future when, in 1976, he mounted a fierce challenge to an incumbent Republican president."

Texans Richards, Connally, Ivins Remembered. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/3, A15, 1.16M) Mimi Swartz, executive editor of Texas Monthly magazine, writes, "Last September, we lost both a former governor, Ann Richards, and a former state first lady, Nellie Connally. When the columnist Molly Ivins died on Wednesday, it seemed that a certain kind of Texas woman might be gone forever."

Russia Challenges US On Engagement With Hamas, Syria. Under the headline, "Russia Clashes With U.S. On Mideast Policy," the Washington Post (2/3, A10, Kessler, 690K) says Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "urged ending the isolation of the anti-Israeli militant group Hamas and including Syria in Middle East peace talks, exposing fissures in a high-level diplomatic group that [Secretary Rice] gathered yesterday in Washington to validate her new effort to end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict." Lavrov's "proposals run directly counter to Rice's strategy of rallying what she calls 'mainstream' Arabs to isolate what she calls 'extremist' elements in the region." Administration "officials were miffed at Lavrov's intervention, which overshadowed the group's endorsement of Rice's plans to bring together [Palestinian President Mahmoud] Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and push them to accelerate a long-dormant peace plan." An anonymous administration source "said the Russians did not suggest any of the ideas in preliminary meetings nor in yesterday's gathering of foreign ministers."

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Richter, 850K) adds the Quartet "blessed the latest American effort to restart the Middle East peace process, but not before signaling that divisions remained among its members." In "private talks, European officials signaled that they wanted to move faster than the Americans toward a deal to create a Palestinian state, diplomats said. And the Russian delegation urged the group to lift its economic boycott of the Palestinian government, saying the measure punished ordinary Palestinians without forcing Hamas to reform."

DOJ_NMG_0127670

The AP (2/3, Gearan) uses similar language to describe the discussion, saying Washington and Moscow "clashed" over Lavrov's plan. Rice "expressed little enthusiasm for" engaging Syria. The AP says Washington has "expressed reluctance to reach out to Syria and Iran in a regional effort to reduce violence in Iraq, arguing that both countries' actions show they have little interest in stabilizing the area." For its part, the Quartet "reiterated the conditions they set for the Hamas-led Palestinian government to receive vital overseas financial aid and international political recognition." Assistant Secretary McCormack "said the internal divisions are issues for the Palestinians alone to resolve."

In somewhat more positive tones, the New York Times (2/3, Shanker, 1.16M) notes the Quartet "gave broad endorsement on Friday to American designs for three-way talks led by [Rice] and involving Israeli and Palestinian leaders. But discord immediately surfaced with Russian comments that Syria, too, could play a constructive role." AFP (2/3, Millikin) reports, "Major powers endorsed a US plan to accelerate efforts to achieve an Arab-Iraeli peace deal and establish a Palestinian state." However, that deal "initiative was marred by renewed Palestinian factional violence, a rift with Russia over whether to bring Syria into the process and a weary skepticism that Israeli and Palestinian leaders are strong enough to lead their people to peace."

The Washington Times (2/3, Kralev, 88K) adds Moscow "urged the United States and Europe yesterday to end a boycott of the Palestinians' Hamas-led government, exposing divisions in the group of international mediators known as the Quartet as it met in Washington in an effort to restart Middle East peace talks." The group "expressed support for Washington's initiative to begin talks between Israel and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who also leads Fatah." Lavrov "said the U.S. and EU policy of boycotting Hamas is not working."

Gaza Deaths Leaves Truce "In Ashes." The Washington Post (2/3, A10, Wilson, 690K) reports, "At least 18 Palestinians, including two children, were killed in heavy factional fighting across the northern Gaza Strip on Friday, leaving a truce reached this week in ashes." At least 24 people have been killed and "more than 220 people" injured in two days of fighting, "described by witnesses in Gaza as some of the most sustained since Hamas took day-to-day control of the Palestinian government 10 months ago." The Post adds, "The fighting … appears increasingly resistant to efforts by party leaders to stop it."

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Ellingwood, Alouf, 850K) adds, "As gunmen battled in the streets, Egyptian officials sought to broker a fresh truce between" Hamas and Fatah. "By day's end, the two sides had announced a tentative agreement to restore the cease-fire reached Tuesday, but it seemed at best a fragile deal as heavily armed men continued to stalk the streets."

Hughes Says US "Trying To Work Very Hard." Undersecretary of State for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs Karen Hughes said on Fox News' On The Record (2/2, Van Susteren), "People don't recognize that we are trying to work very hard to create a situation where there are two states, Israel and Palestine, living side by side in peace and security."

Bloomberg Visits Israeli Town Frequented By Rocket Attacks. The New York Times (2/3, B3, Cardwell, 1.16M) notes New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg "touched down by helicopter on a bare patch of dirt [in Sderot] on Friday, bringing his message against terror to a town shaken by persistent attacks from Palestinian militants firing rockets over the border from Gaza." Bloomberg "said that the country needed to work with its Arab neighbors, but added that if groups did not renounce terrorism, abide by their accords and recognize Israel's right to exist, 'I personally think Israel shouldn't talk to them.'" The Times adds, "In a tour that lasted just under an hour, Mr. Bloomberg made the traditional stops for a visitor here, including one to examine a pile of spent and rusty rocket shells at the police station."

US Files WTO Case Against China. The Washington Post (2/3, D3, Crutsinger, 690K) reports the Administration, "under pressure from the Democratic-controlled Congress to do something about America's soaring trade deficit, filed a trade case yesterday against China in a dispute involving government subsidies." The WTO complaint "alleges that China is using government support and tax policies to bolster local companies in competition against U.S. and other foreign firms." The Post notes the "action will trigger a 60-day consultation during which trade negotiators will try to resolve the dispute. If that fails, a WTO hearing panel will be convened to handle it." Also, "a victory by the administration would clear the way for the United States to impose economic sanctions against China if it refuses to change its subsidy program." US Trade Representative Susan Schwab is quoted saying, "We are seeking to level the playing field to allow U.S. manufacturers to compete fairly with Chinese firms."

The Financial Times (2/3, Callan, McGregor) notes the Administration "launched a major trade dispute with China over alleged subsidies for manufacturing exports in an escalation of economic tensions with Beijing." This "escalation…follows pressure from the new Democratic majority in Congress and for tougher action over a record annual trade deficit with China of $214bn." The filing of the suit "is viewed by White House advisers as necessary to advance their economic agenda during President George W. Bush's last two years in office."

DOJ_NMG_0127671

The New York Times (2/3, C3, Weisman, 1.16M) pairs the complaint filing with the resignation of Treasury Undersecretary Timothy Adams, titling its coverage, "U.S. Trade Effort On China Suffers 2 More Setbacks." Administration "efforts to ease economic strains with China suffered two setbacks Friday with the resignation of a top official in charge of the China dialogue and an announcement that talks on a critical trade dispute had failed to resolve differences." The Times calls the WTO suit "a major escalation in American pressure," and says Adams' move "was the second departure in five months of the person at Treasury in charge of the overall dialogue with China."

G-7 Could Consider Chinese, Japanese Currencies At Meeting. Under the headline, "G-7 May Cast A Wary Eye On Valuations Of The Yuan, Yen," the Wall Street Journal (2/3, A2, Perry, 2.04M) reports, "When finance ministers from the Group of Seven leading industrial nations meet in Germany next weekend, look out for a tussle over two Asian currencies." The Administration "will continue to focus on China's weak yuan at the talks, … but European policy makers have said they will push for a discussion about Japan's currency to be included in the talks, as well." The Journal says Tokyo "is expected to fight back, and this time will find the U.S. on its side," because "Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson said last week that the yen's value now accurately reflects Japan's economic situation."

WPost Backs Trade Promotion Authority Extension. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (2/3, A14, 690K) credits "burgeoning American exports" for "the strong growth in the U.S. economy," and notes export growth is now triple import growth. The Post backs President Bush's "request to renew his trade promotion authority," saying that "important bilateral trade pacts" and the WTO Doha Round "probably won't be finished by midyear, so the extra time will be needed." Bush's farm bill, which "would reduce U.S. agricultural subsidies by $18 billion in the next five years," is "an important step" towards successfully completing the Doha Round, and key Democrats including Congressman Charles Rangel and Senator Max Baucus "appear to recognize the harm that would be caused if Congress torpedoed" it. "They have signaled a willingness to talk with the administration about the renewal of trade promotion authority," and, "with flexibility on both sides, a deal should be possible."

Top Chinese Official Warns Against Independent Legal System. The New York Times (2/3, A5, Kahn, 1.16M) reports comments by Chinese Politburo member Luo Gan that "'enemy forces' are seeking to use China's legal system to Westernize and divide the country, and the Communist Party must fend them off by maintaining its dominance over lawyers, judges and prosecutors." The Times calls Luo "China's top law and order official," and says he noted "that judicial officials had the responsibility to 'prevent infiltration that might threaten national security.'" Luo also "said that China is now part of the global community and that it must consider 'international factors' when making judicial decisions. But he drew a sharp line between such interests and allowing greater leeway for lawyers, judges and prosecutors to make decisions independently as they do in the West." The Times says Luo's remarks "appeared to amplify President Hu Jintao's past calls to guard against a Western-inspired 'color revolution' of the kind that brought political change in Central Asia, Central Europe and Lebanon."

Hu's Commitment To Free Press Questioned. The New York Times (2/3, A5, Kahn, 1.16M) also reports today on criticisms of the openness of the Chinese press. Reporters Without Borders "accused" Hu "of seeking to bring the media to heel and instigating an expanding crackdown on the press despite China's pledge to enhance media freedoms before the 2008 Olympics, which are to be held in Beijing. That group's report is quoted saying, ""The press is being forced into self-censorship, the Internet is filtered, and the foreign media very closely watched. Faced with burgeoning social unrest and journalists who are becoming much less compliant, the authorities, directed by President Hu Jintao, have been bringing the media to heel in the name of a 'harmonious society.'"

China's Hu Said To Engage Khartoum On Darfur. The Financial Times (2/3, England) notes Chinese President Hu Jintao "embarked on the most contentious leg of his African tour, visiting Sudan for the first time to buttress bilateral trade with a government accused of multiple human rights abuses in its western Darfur region." Hu "urged Khartoum, behind closed doors, to solve the crisis and pursue dialogue with rebel groups. But no public statement was made on the issue," and Chinese Ambassador Zhang Dong said "that China 'never interferes in Sudan's internal affairs.'" Beijing "insists it has played a positive role in tackling the Darfur crisis, but critics regard its relations with Sudan as an example of what they see as China's questionable role in Africa."

Under the headline, "Chinese President Pushes Sudan On Darfur," the AP (2/2, De Montesquiou) says Hu "told Sudan's leader on Friday he must give the United Nations a bigger role in trying to resolve the conflict in Darfur… In what appeared to be China's bluntest message to Sudan on the Darfur crisis, Hu urged President Omar al-Bashir in a face-to-face meeting to boost the U.N.'s 'constructive role in realizing peace in Darfur' along with the African Union." The AP adds that Beijing "usually refuses to mix human rights issues with diplomacy, but Hu has come under international pressure to use his clout with Sudan to push it to accept U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur." AFP (2/2, Saeed) notes Hu "has offered Sudan assistance for the peaceful resolution of the Darfur conflict but ignored Western pressure to make future aid conditional on the progress made." Beijing's "mild words on Darfur seem to underscore the Asian giant's no-strings-attached stance on doing business in Sudan."

DOJ_NMG_0127672

Two Americans Arrested Near Somali-Kenyan Border. The Los Angeles Times/AP (2/3) carries comments by a Kenyan police official that "two Americans were among at least 10 foreigners detained by Kenyan police at the Somali border after allegedly fighting on the side of Somalia's ousted Islamist movement." That source told that AP that "one of the Americans is wanted in the U.S. on suspicion of links to radical movements." The police force "said it seized the foreigners after they fled from Ethiopian troops who had helped oust the Islamists. It was preparing to deport them to their home countries."

Morocco Said To Stifle Free And Open Media. In an op-ed in today's New York Times (2/3, A15, 1.16M), novelist Laila Lalami discusses freedom of expression in Morocco. "In the United States, Morocco is often seen as a liberal country and a bulwark against Islamic extremism," and recent reforms "are steps in the right direction. But while the court cases against independent news magazines like Nichane, Le Journal Hebdomadaire and several others are within the bounds of Moroccan law, they appear to single out the independent press, to the exclusion of more partisan publications." The Administration "has time and again referred to Morocco as a moderate Arab state that deserves to receive millions of dollars of taxpayers' money to encourage democratic reforms. American officials point to" some successes, "but they turn a blind eye to problems of press freedom." Lalami concludes, "Without freedom of expression, Morocco's reforms are merely a varnish. Underneath it lies the same old country."

Blair Vows Not To Resign During Honors Investigation. The Washington Post (2/3, A12, Jordan, 690K) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "said Friday he will not resign because of a growing scandal concerning his party's financing and added that 'I am not going to beg for my character in front of anyone.'" The Post says "calls for his resignation have intensified," noting that "many" Britons "want him to leave now, as members of his own party publicly admit the damage this scandal is doing to" them. In addition, "there has been noticeable tension between police and the prime minister's office as the case has dragged on," and that Post notes that "no one has been charged with a crime. All four of those arrested have denied wrongdoing."

Serbia Pans Draft Plan For Kosovo. The New York Times (2/3, Smith, 1.16M) notes Belgrade "rejected a United Nations proposal on Friday that paves the way for an independent Kosovo, setting up a possible showdown between its supporter, Russia, and the West over the disputed territory's final status." That "response came almost immediately" after UN envoy Martti Ahtisaari "resented the complex plan to politicians" in Belgrade and Pristina. Detractors included President Boris Tadic and Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica. "The proposal, which is still subject to weeks of negotiation between the two sides, will require Russian acquiescence in order to win Security Council approval." Ahtisaari's plan "shifts the onus to Russia and, to a lesser extent, China, both of which have supported Serbia's territorial claims — in part, over concerns about ethnically motivated secessionist movements in their own countries." The Times explains, "While the plan does not mention independence, its provisions describe de facto statehood for Kosovo — providing for an army, constitution and flag — though it would still be protected by NATO and overseen by the international community for the indefinite future. The plan would also allow Kosovo to declare independence if the package is approved by the Security Council."

The AP (2/3, Kraja) adds, "Kosovo took its first tentative steps on the road to becoming what would look very much like a sovereign nation Friday after [Ahtisaari] unveiled a blueprint for the future of the tense, ethnically divided Balkan province." His "58-page roadmap spelled out conditions for internationally supervised self-rule — complete with the trappings of nationhood, including a flag, anthem, army and constitution and the right to apply for membership in international organizations."

The Los Angeles Times (2/3, Farley, 850K) titles its coverage, "U.N. Kosovo Proposal Tries To Appease All Sides." Ahtisaari "unveiled a blueprint for Kosovo's future Friday that gives the province de facto independence without formal sovereignty, a compromise between the Serbian government's demand for control and the majority Albanians' wish for nationhood."

Under the headline, "Debt Is Key To Kosovo's Status," the Financial Times (2/3, MacDonald) portrays the report as saying that "the future status of Kosovo must open the way for international financing to repair its fragile economy." Kosovo "would be able to join institutions such as the International Monetary Fund, opening the way for credit and possibly foreign investment." Nearly one "quarter of the document deals with unresolved economic questions – including what to do about debt inherited from the former Yugoslavia, amounting to nearly €1bn ($1.3bn, £660m). The European Union wants to see the debt question cleared up before taking charge of a new supervisory mission to monitor the local authorities after the close-down of the UN Interim Mission in Kosovo."

DOJ_NMG_0127673

Bay Of Pigs Veterans Eye Return To Post-Castro Cuba. In a front-page feature entitled, "Bay of Pigs Vets Fight to Outlast An Ailing Castro," the Wall Street Journal (2/3, A1, Lagnado, 2.04M) notes the Brigadistas "have long lived with the hope of resuming their lives in a free Cuba. But today, many surviving members are just hoping to be buried there. The 80-year-old Mr. Castro's illness has given them a new lease on life."

Castro Said To Manipulate Enemies Even In Sickness. In an op-ed in today's Los Angeles Times (2/3, 850K), editorial page assistant editor Tim Cavanaugh discusses recent rumors of a decline in Cuban President Fidel Castro's health. "Inevitably, Castro got the last laugh. Late Tuesday, Cuban state television released footage of the president-for-life looking slightly stronger than he had during his last appearance." The rumor "was not motivated by any actual news, and this is not unusual. So flammable is the Duraflame of the Castro deathwatch that it can ignite spontaneously, at any time." Castro "and his watchers bring generations of built-up agon and emotional commitment. The dictator's death will almost certainly occasion a mass public outpouring in Miami," and Castro "will retain, probably until his last breath, a genius for working the media and humiliating his enemies. This week's uptick in the deathwatch leaves just one question: Did Fidel, maybe, plan it this way?"

Cubana Airlines Bomber Said To Seek Quiet Life In Caracas. This week's New York Times (2/3, A4, Romero, 1.16M) "Saturday Profile" details the life of Freddy Lugo, who was imprisoned for the destruction of a Cubana Airlines flight over Barbados in 1976. He "has tried to put the past behind him. … But the past has a way of catching up with him. There is the occasional journalist to contend with, and glimmers of recognition from among the many Cubans who live" in Caracas. "As many Americans would recognize Mohamed Atta if he were alive and walking the streets of New York, to Venezuelans, Mr. Lugo's face is haunting."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Iraq Plans Divide 2008 Democratic Hopefuls."
"Grand Avenue Project Needs Help."
"Separation Of Church And Football."
"EBay Bans Auctions Of Virtual Items."

New York Times:
"Science Panel Says Global Warming Is 'Unequivocal.'"
"Push To Resolve Fading Killings Of Rights Era."
"Among Hispanics, N.F.L. Mania Hits Cultural Wall."
"Silicon Valley's High-Tech Hunt For Colleague."
"Titillating Or Not, Washington Gossip Blossoms."
"Analysis Is Bleak On Iraq's Future."
"Number Of People Stopped By Police Soars In New York."

Washington Post:
"Bush To Request Billions For Wars."
"Bleak Iraq Report Is Sent To Congress."
"U.N. Climate Panel Says Warming Is Man-Made."
"Missing Md. Teens' Car Found With 2 Bodies."
"In Va. House, 'Profound Regret' On Slavery."
"Brazilians' Arrest Focuses Scrutiny On Evangelical Groups."

Washington Times:
"Hillary Vows To End War."
"Warner To Help Block His Own Resolution On Iraq."
"Dungy And Smith Ready To Make History."
"Anti-Super Bowl Gatherings Give Women The Big Night Off."
"Vaccine Center Issues Warning."
"Beloved Panda Tai Shan Stays, At Least For Now."

Detroit Free Press:
"Pointes Warned Of Mother's Drug Den."
"Court Rejects Same-Sex Benefits."
"Crowning Moment?"
"Sluggish Pistons Wake Up In Time."
"GM: 100,000-Mile Used Car Warranties."
"Panel Calls For Major Tax Hike."
"Auto Dealer Glut Hurts U.S. Makes."
"Lodge Traffic Disruptions Begin."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Stray Bullet Kills Newton Co. Mom."
"Tapes Convinced Coke Jury."
"Search For Bodies In Fla. Storms."
"Horses Moved From Farm."
"City Takes Steps For Pedestrians."
"Blue Laws Don't Cover All Bases."
"Spy Agencies Pessimistic On Iraq."

Dallas Morning News:
"Couple's Families Await Id."
"Palestinian Family Gets New Chance At Asylum."
"Perry Orders HPV Vaccine."
"It's Time Irvin Got The Canton Call."
"Principal Resigns In DISD Inquiry."
"Church Of Convicted Pastor Owes Thousands In Tax Bills."
"Texans Still Paying Fee For Shuttered Grant Program."

Houston Chronicle:
"Perry's Vaccine Move Draws Financial, Sexual Concerns."
"Mexicans Abroad Send Home Record $25 Billion."
"New Chief At Bp's Texas City Plant Pushing Safety."

DOJ_NMG_0127674

"Bush Will Seek $245 Billion In Defense Spending."
"Proposal Would Allow Houston To Sue Polluters."
"Texas' Future May Hold Heat, Drought, Dry Rivers."
"Regents Repay TSU For Children's Scholarships."
"Houston Ministry Aids Homeless."
"'Soul Bowl' T-Shirts Reflect Historic Super Bowl."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Florida Tornado; Florida Tornado Details; Global Warming Report; Response To Global Warming; Iraq NIE; Economic Report; HPV Vaccine; Veteran Welcomes Troops Home.

CBS: Florida Tornado; Tornado Damage; Volusia County Damage; Florida Governor's Response; Florida Weather Analysis; Iraq NIE; Homeland Security-Super Bowl; Super Bowl Turf.

NBC: Florida Tornado; Tornado Damage; Tornado Victim; Global Warming Report; HPV Vaccine; Economic Report; Democratic National Committee Meeting; Iraq NIE; Former Tennis Star; Alternative Programming On Super Bowl Sunday.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — 8:45 a.m. Departs The White House via Marine One. South Lawn. 10:10 a.m. Makes remarks to the House Democratic Caucus Issues Conference. Kingsmill Resort & Spa, Williamsburg, Va. 11:40 a.m. Makes a statement with House Democratic leadership. Kingsmill Resort & Spa, Williamsburg, Va. 1:15 p.m. Arrives The White House via Marine One. South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: DEMOCRATIC MEETING _ Winter meeting of the Democratic National Committee. Highlights:
9 a.m. General Session, with speakers in order of appearance: Governor Kathleen Sebelius of Kansas, Chair of the Democratic Governor's Association; Senator Joseph Biden; New Mexico Governor Bill Richardson; Senator Mike Gravel; and Governor Tom Vilsack. 2 p.m. Association of State Democratic Chairs. Speakers in order of appearance: Governor Howard Dean; Governor Kathleen Sebelius of Kansas, Chair of the Democratic Governor's Association. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW Contacts: Stacie Paxton, 202-863-8148

SHERIFF'S ASSOCIATION _ The National Sheriff's Association holds its 2007 Winter Conference. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave, NW Contacts: n/a, 202-836-7827

ISLAMIC LAW _ The Washington College of Law holds a conference, "Islamic Law in the West: Theory, Doctrine and Practice." Location: Room 603, 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW. Contacts: n/a, 202-274-4279

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0127675

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, February 5, 2007 8:03 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, February 03, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070203.pdf; dojclips070203.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Pentagon Official Who Criticized Detainee Lawyers Quits (WP) 3
Official Quits After Remark On Lawyers (NYT) 4
Guantanamo Remarks Cost Policy Chief His Job (CNN) 4
Guantanamo Remarks Lead To Resignation (LAT) 5
High-profile Guantanamo Detainees Face New Charges (AP) 5
"Torture Victim" Seeks US Justice (BBC) 6

Homeland Response:

Man Was Arming For 'war,' FBI Says (SLPD) 7
Cost Of House-Passed Terror Bill Touches Off A Partisan Clash (NYT) 8
House Security Bill Tagged At $21 Billion (WT) 9
9/11 Security Could Cost $21 Billion (CNN) 10
Court Clears Way For Suit On New Orleans Flooding (NYT) 10

War News:

Bleak Iraq Report Is Sent To Congress (WP) 11
Analysis Is Bleak On Iraq's Future (NYT) 13
The Analysis: On The "Polarization" Of Iraqis And Their "Ready Recourse To Violence" (NYT) 14
U.S. Spy Chiefs Issue Grim Report On Iraq (LAT) 16
Intelligence Estimate Warns On Quick Iraq Pullout (WT) 19
Iraq Conflict Has Elements Of "civil War" (FT) 20
Elements Of "Civil War" In Iraq (BBC) 21
Analysts: Iraq Report Lays Out Tough Road For Success (CNN) 22
Iraq, And Analysis, Revisited (WP) 23
No Way Out (NYT) 24
Bush To Request Billions For Wars (WP) 25
Record $622 Billion Budget Requested For The Pentagon (NYT) 27
Rifts Emerge On Iran Policy (WSJ) 28
U.S. Can't Prove Iran Link To Iraq Strife (LAT) 29
Defense Secretary Says Carrier Dispatch To Gulf Meant To Dramatize Commitment There (AP) 30
Defense Secretary: No Plans For War With Iran (CNN) 31
Gates All But Rules Out Strike On Iran (WT) 31
Kurds Train For Battle With Iran (AP) 32
Iran Installs Equipment For Large-Scale Uranium Enrichment (NYT) 34
Diplomats: Iran Working On Uranium Plant (AP) 35
Chirac's Iran Gaffe Reveals A Strategy: Containment (NYT) ..36
Republicans Plan To Block Iraq Debate (NYT) 37
Warner To Help Block His Own Resolution On Iraq (WT) 38
U.S. Copter Crash In Iraq Kills 2 In Fourth Such Incident This Year (WP) 39
2 Killed As U.S. Helicopter Is Shot Down Near Baghdad (NYT) 40
2 U.S. Troops Killed In Latest Helicopter Crash In Iraq (LAT) 41
Groundfire Downs Another U.S. Copter; Kills 2 Troops (WT/AP) 43
Another U.S. Helicopter Lost In Iraq (AP) 43
Iraqi Army Brigades Not At Full Strength (LAT) 45
Gates Says Not Enough Iraqi Troops Arriving In Baghdad (AP) 46
Troops Aim To Oust Taliban From Town (AP) 47
Afghan Town Is Overrun By Taliban (NYT) 47
Taliban Militants Overrun Town After British Exit (WT/AP) 48
Afghan District 'Under Taliban Control': Defence Ministry (AFP) 49
Pakistan Says Taliban Activity Is Hard To Stop (NYT) 49
Pakistan To Fence Border Of Afghanistan (AP) 50

DOJ:

Challenge To U.S. Attorney Appointment Should Be Dismissed, Filing Says (ADG) 51

Corporate Scandals:

Siemens Faces Scrutiny In U.S. (WSJ) 52

Sumner Redstone Settles Suit With Son Over Family's Fortune (WSJ) 53

Criminal Law:

Federal Prosecutors Widen Pursuit Of Death Penalty As States Ease Off (WSJ) 54
Stay Of Executions (LAT) 55
Federal Jury Finds Former Secretary Guilty In Theft Of Coca-Cola Secrets (FINDLAW/AP) 56
Coke Worker Guilty Of Stealing Secrets (FT) 57
Ex-Duracell Worker Stole Trade Secrets (AP) 58
Mover Shot By Prince George's Official Dies (WP) 58
Official Has History Of Altercations, Sources Say (WP) 59
Feds Tout Results In Crime Crackdown (NOTP) 60
Va. Men Plead Guilty In Fake Purse Scam (WP) 62
Barry Rejects Offer, Maintains Innocence (WP) 63
Crashing The Party (WP) 63
Fake Degrees Bought By 14 Confound Fire Officials (NYT) .. 65
Former Judge Cites Pressure To Pay Friends Of Party Boss (NYT) 66

Civil Rights:

Calif. Teens Get Probation For Halloween Hate-crime Beating (AP) 67
Judge Defers Decision On Port Chester Election (NYJN) 67
Court: No Discrimination (MOULTO) 68
Voting Rights: Noxubee Case A National Test (JCL) 69
Push To Resolve Fading Killings Of Rights Era (NYT) 69
Number Of People Stopped By New York Police Soars (NYT) 71
Court Bars Government Benefit For Same-Sex Domestic Partners (NYT) 73
Michigan Court Rules Against Gay Benefits (WT/AP) 74
The Right Reform (WP) 74

Antitrust:

Viacom Orders Removal Of Videos From YouTube (WSJ) 75
Viacom Tells YouTube To Remove Content (FT) 76
Viacom Decides YouTube Is A Foe (WP) 77
YouTube Removing Viacom TV Shows Media Firm Says 'Daily Show,' MTV Snippets Must Go (SFC) 78
Viacom Asks YouTube To Remove Over 100,000 Unauthorized Video Clips (USAT/AP) 79
Equity Endorses Blackstone Bid (WP/BLOOM) 79
Lawsuit Targets Dell, Intel (MERCN) 80
Dell Accused Of Hiding Intel Payments (AP) 81
Delta Creditors' Committee Approves Terms Of $2.5 Billion In Bankruptcy Exit Financing (AP) 82
MediaNews Acquires Santa Cruz Sentinel (AP) 82
Judge: Microsoft Can Question Expert Who Found Violation (DMR) 83
UPDATE: Analyst Sees Express Scripts Winning Caremark With Sweetened Bid (DOW) 83

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Scientists Dispel Global Warming Doubts (FT) 84
Climate Paper Prompts Call To Act (BBC) 85
U.N. Climate Panel Says Warming Is Man-Made (WP) 86
Science Panel Says Global Warming Is "Unequivocal" (NYT) 87
UN Report Predicts Global Warming Effects In U.S. (CHIT) .. 90
Deal With Warming, Don't Debate It, Scientists Warn (LAT) ... 91
Global-Warming Report Gets U.S. Emphasis (WSJ) 93
Global Warming To Continue For Centuries (AP) 94
Gore To Testify On Climate Change (POL) 96
Political Science (WSJ) 96
States' Map For Saving The Oceans (WP) 98
Schaghticoke Challenges Cason's Legal Authority (ICT) 99

Congress-Administration:

Bush Budget To Seek Cuts For Medicare, Medicaid (LAT) .100
Budget For Bush, Saving Tax Cuts Is A Tough Balancing Act (WSJ) 102
A Rare Bill In Congress (NYT) 102
Bush To Seek 3 Percent Raise For Civil Service And Military (WP) 103
Bush To Urge Democrats To Consider His Domestic Policy (WP) 103
Senators Move Donor Disclosures At A Snail's Pace (LAT) .. 104
Baca Defends Actions (POL) 105
Who's A "Whore"? (LAT) 106
FAA Looks For Money For New Air-Traffic Control System (WP) 107
Crashworthy Motor Vehicles (NYT) 108

Other News:

Jobs Data Signal Growth Is Easing But Still Solid (WSJ) 108
Economy Adds Fewer Jobs Than Expected (FT) 109
Employment Figures Fit "Soft Landing" Predictions (WP) 110
Slower Job Growth, At Least For Now (NYT) 111
Despite Recent Oil-Price Rally, Stock Investors Hold On (WSJ) 112
Jobs Report Brings A Tepid End To A Strong Week (NYT/AP) 113
The Current "Depression" (WSJ) 114
DNC Turns Focus To White House (WP) 115
Democratic Hopefuls Split Over The Best Path To Peace (NYT) 116

DOJ_NMG_0127678

Edwards Continues Swipes At Senate White House Rivals (HILL) 118
Hillary Vows To End War (WT) 118
'08 Dems Split On Iraq (NSDY) 119
Iraq Plans Divide Democratic Hopefuls (LAT) 120
Clinton Promises To End War If Elected (AP) 121
Democratic 2008 Hopefuls Put On A Show (FT) 122
Democrats Control The Hill, But Not Themselves (WP) 123
DNC Backing Expected For D.C. Vote In House (WP) 124
Sen. Clinton To Visit New Hampshire Next Week (NHUL) 125
What Hillary's Humor Reveals (LAT) 127
Mobilized Online, Thousands Gather To Hear Obama (WP) 128
For Obama, No News Is Good News (POL) 128
Joe Biden Courts Al Sharpton (POL) 130
Romney Says Sen. Clinton "Timid" On Iran (AP) 130
Romney Attacks Hillary Over Iran (HILL) 131
Romney Explains Shifts (POL) 131
Hagel For President (WSJ) 132
Arkansas Underdog (WSJ) 133
Powerful Fla. Storms Kill 19, Raze Homes (AP) 135
Titillating Or Not, Washington Gossip Blossoms (NYT) 136
Will We Lose In The Stem Cell Race? (WP) 137
Happy Birthday, Mr. Reagan (WSJ) 138
Lone Starlets (NYT) 140
Russia Clashes With U.S. On Mideast Policy (WP) 141
"Quartet" Backs Revived Middle East Peace Efforts (LAT) 142
U.S., Russia Clash Over Syria In Mideast (AP) 143
U.S. Talks With Palestinians And Israelis Gain Support (NYT) 144
Major Powers Endorse US Initiative On Israeli-Palestinian Peace (AFP) 145
Russia Decries Hamas Boycott (WT) 147
18 Palestinians Killed In Gaza Fighting (WP) 147
16 Die In Gaza Factional Clashes (LAT) 148
In An Israeli Town Prone To Attacks, New York's Mayor Denounces Terror (NYT) 149
U.S. Takes China To WTO Over Subsidies (WP/AP) 150
US-China Tensions Rise Over Subsidies (FT) 151
U.S. Trade Effort On China Suffers 2 More Setbacks (NYT) 152
Currencies: G-7 May Cast A Wary Eye On Valuations Of The Yuan, Yen (WSJ) 153
Trade Boom (WP) 154
Chinese Official Warns Against Independence Of Courts (NYT) 155
Journalist Group Criticizes Press Freedoms Under Hu Jintao (NYT) 156
Hu Urges Sudan To Act On Darfur Crisis (FT) 156
Chinese President Pushes Sudan On Darfur (AP) 157
China Offers Aid For 'Peaceful Resolution' Of Darfur Conflict (AFP) 158
2 Americans Held, Kenya Official Says (LAT/AP) 159
Censorship's New Clothes (NYT) 159
Blair Vows To Stay Despite Scandal (WP) 160
Serbia Rejects Plan That Could Lead To Kosovo Independence (NYT) 161
U.N. Envoy Unveils Kosovo Proposal (AP) 162
U.N. Kosovo Proposal Tries To Appease All Sides (LAT) 164
Debt Is Key To Kosovo's Status (FT) 165
Bay Of Pigs Vets Fight To Outlast An Ailing Castro (WSJ) 166
Waiting, And Waiting, For Fidel (LAT) 167
Bomb Resonates With Diplomats, Not With The Bomber (NYT) 168

TERRORISM NEWS:

Pentagon Official Who Criticized Detainee Lawyers Quits (WP)

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

A senior Pentagon official resigned yesterday, the Defense Department announced, three weeks after criticizing lawyers who represent terrorism suspects.

Charles "Cully" Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, called it "shocking" that major U.S. law firms represented Guantanamo Bay detainees free of charge and said they would likely suffer financially after their corporate clients learned of the work.

"I think, quite honestly, when corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," Stimson said in a Jan. 11 interview on Federal News Radio.

DOJ_NMG_0127679

The legal community was outraged by his comments. Stimson also suggested that some lawyers were being untruthful about doing the work free of charge and instead were "receiving moneys from who-knows-where."

Stimson believed that the controversy "hampered his ability to be effective in this position," department spokesman Bryan Whitman said. He stressed that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates did not ask him to resign.

Stimson had been in his post since January 2006. He publicly apologized several days after the radio interview, saying his comments did not reflect his values and that he firmly believes in the principles of the U.S. legal system.

Official Quits After Remark On Lawyers (NYT)

By Sarah Abruzzese

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The senior Pentagon official who set off a controversy last month with remarks suggesting that corporations should consider severing business ties with law firms that represent Guantánamo Bay detainees has resigned.

The official, Charles D. Stimson, deputy assistant secretary for detainee affairs, said that it was his decision to resign and that he was not asked to leave by Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, said Bryan Whitman, a spokesman for the Pentagon.

"He determined that it was going to hamper his ability to be effective in this position," Mr. Whitman said.

Mr. Stimson's comments in an interview on Jan. 11 on Federal News Radio angered many lawyers and caused the Defense Department to distance itself publicly from his remarks.

In the interview, Mr. Stimson named more than 12 firms that are defending detainees.

"I think, quite honestly, when corporate C.E.O.'s see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those C.E.O.'s are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," Mr. Stimson said.

Mr. Stimson, a former Navy defense lawyer, wrote an apology published in The Washington Post, saying the remarks did not reflect his "core beliefs."

On Jan. 24, the Bar Association of San Francisco requested that the State Bar of California investigate Mr. Stimson for possible violations of California ethics rules, the San Francisco group's Web site says.

The president of the American Bar Association, Karen J. Mathis, said that she could not comment on the resignation, but that by reacting to his comments "the American public reaffirmed its commitment to a core principle of our justice system: that every accused person deserves adequate legal representation."

Mr. Whitman said Mr. Stimson did a lot for the department "with respect to setting policy standards, increasing transparency and working with international organizations and allies, with respect to the nature of our detention operations."

Guantanamo Remarks Cost Policy Chief His Job (CNN)

CNN.com, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The Pentagon's man in charge of handling the department's policy on detainees from the war on terrorism has resigned, Defense Department officials said Friday.

Charles "Cully" Stimson resigned Thursday after making controversial remarks last month about law firms that represent terrorism suspects held by the U.S. military, Pentagon officials said.

Stimson, the deputy assistant secretary of defense for detainee affairs, submitted his resignation to Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who accepted it, the officials said.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said Stimson resigned because "the controversy surrounding him ... was hampering his ability to be effective in his current position."

Last month during a radio interview, Stimson said major U.S. corporations should not do business with top law firms that are defending terrorist suspects held in the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

During the interview, he also listed more than a dozen law firms that he thought should be boycotted.

"When corporate CEOs see that those firms are representing the very terrorists who hit their bottom line back in 2001, those CEOs are going to make those law firms choose between representing terrorists or representing reputable firms," Stimson said on a Washington radio station, Federal News Radio, on January 11.

The legal community denounced Stimson's comments.

Defense Department officials immediately distanced themselves from Stimson, saying his comments did not reflect those of the Bush administration.

In a letter to the editor published in the Washington Post a week later, he said, "I zealously represented unpopular clients. ... I believe that our justice system requires vigorous representation. ... I apologize for what I said, those comments do not reflect my core beliefs."

Stimson, a former prosecutor and defense attorney, took the job in January 2006 and had been responsible for strengthening the department's relationships with nongovernmental organizations, especially with the International Committee of the Red Cross, Whitman said.

Guantanamo Remarks Lead To Resignation (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

The Pentagon official who criticized law firms for defending detainees held at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, has resigned, a Defense Department spokesman said.

Charles Stimson, deputy assistant secretary for detainee affairs, last month called it "shocking" that major U.S. law firms represented Guantanamo detainees for free and said they would probably suffer financially after their corporate clients learned of the work.

The Pentagon disavowed his remarks and Stimson apologized, saying that he supported pro bono work and that the legal system worked best when both sides had representation.

High-profile Guantanamo Detainees Face New Charges (AP)

AP, February 2, 2007

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) — The U.S. military prepared new charges Friday against three of the best-known detainees at Guantanamo Bay — a key step toward resuming the military tribunals for terrorism suspects that were halted by the U.S. Supreme Court last year.

Authorities drafted new charges — including murder, conspiracy and providing material support for terrorism — against Canadian Omar Khadr, Australian David Hicks and Salim Ahmed Hamdan of Yemen, said Air Force Col. Morris Davis, chief prosecutor in the Guantanamo war crimes trials.

Under military rules, the charges are not considered formally filed against the detainees until they are approved by a U.S. Department of Defense legal adviser and another official who oversees the tribunals.

That process is expected to take two weeks, Davis said. Court hearings are not expected to begin at Guantanamo until at least the spring.

Also Friday, a military defense lawyer whose paralegal reported overhearing guards at the U.S. Navy base in southeastern Cuba brag about beating detainees said she was accused by a military investigator of filing a false statement.

Army Col. Richard Basset, who was ordered by the U.S. Southern Command to investigate the allegations into guards' actions, told the paralegal, Marine Sgt. Heather Cerveny, that the guards denied her account of their September conversations in a Guantanamo bar, according to Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey.

The investigator accused Cerveny of having made a false statement, Vokey told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. He said Basset met with the Cerveny late last year at Camp Pendleton, Calif., where she is based.

The probe began after Vokey filed a complaint with the Pentagon's Inspector General's office in October and attached a sworn statement from Cerveny. Jose Ruiz, a spokesman for Southern Command the where Basset is based, declined to comment on contents of the investigation.

In an earlier attempt to try detainees, the military had charged 10 of them and begun pretrial hearings at Guantanamo. The tribunals were halted by a Supreme Court ruling that their rules violated U.S. and international law.

Congress passed a new law authorizing the military commissions and President Bush signed it into law in October. The military then drafted a new set of rules for military commissions that have drawn criticism because they permit coerced or hearsay evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0127681

The military has said it plans to charge 60 to 80 of the detainees at Guantanamo, where nearly 400 men are held on suspicion of links to al-Qaeda or the Taliban.

Davis said it made sense to start with Hicks, Khadr and Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden, because all were among those previously charged.

"Those three have been around for a while, and they were prepared and ready to go," he said.

Hicks, a former kangaroo skinner who converted to Islam in his native Australia, allegedly fought for the Taliban before he was captured in Afghanistan. Toronto-born Khadr, who is accused of killing an American soldier in Afghanistan, has allegedly acknowledged being trained by al-Qaeda. Hamdan has said he worked for bin Laden but denied any links to terrorism.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard on Saturday welcomed the U.S. announcement that fresh charges have been prepared against Hicks.

"I'm glad that the charges are being laid and that the deadline I set has been met," Howard told reporters, referring to his demand that Hicks be charged by mid-February. Howard has come under mounting political pressure to have Hicks tried or set free.

"Torture Victim" Seeks US Justice (BBC)

By Laurence Peter

BBC.com, February 2, 2007

A Lebanese-born German, who accuses the CIA of having kidnapped and tortured him, says he is determined to get an apology from the US authorities.

Khaled al-Masri alleges that he was seized in Macedonia, flown to a secret jail in Afghanistan and tortured there.

"I'll pursue the case until the Americans admit what they did to me, give an explanation and make an apology," he told the BBC News website.

Munich prosecutors have ordered the arrest of 13 suspected CIA agents.

Mr Masri says he was abducted at the end of 2003 and detained for five months before being released in Albania after the Americans realised they had got the wrong man.

'Traumatised'

Mr Masri says his case is an example of the US policy of "extraordinary rendition" - a practice whereby the US government flies foreign terror suspects to third countries without judicial process for interrogation or detention.

"I'm suffering from stress - this experience has left me traumatised," he said.

His German lawyer Manfred Gnjidic told the BBC News website that his client was feeling "isolated and depressed".

"His life isn't back to normal, he was tortured, nobody cared about him until now. The trauma is so deep in him, he needs a lot of help, not just in psychotherapy. Nobody was able to get him a simple job."

Mr Gnjidic says that he has evidence of how his client was maltreated: "We have some witnesses, we worked a lot to get one of them, from Algeria."

The arrest warrants for the 13 agents accused of involvement were issued last month. The information for them came from Mr Masri's lawyers and a journalist and officials in Spain, where the flight carrying Mr Masri is thought to have originated.

Mr Gnjidic described the CIA agents as "contractors" from a base in North Carolina.

German arrest warrants are not valid in the US, but if the suspects were to travel to the European Union they could be arrested.

Milan case

Mr Masri says he was abducted on 31 December 2003 by US agents in Skopje, capital of the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia.

He is seeking to sue the US government over his detention, but in May a judge dismissed a lawsuit he filed against the CIA, citing national security considerations.

"The most important thing is that the European and German authorities are saying directly to the CIA agents that this is an illegal way to act," Mr Gnjidic said.

DOJ_NMG_0127682

"Now the German government should insist on getting the rehabilitation of Mr Masri by the American side."

Meanwhile in the Italian city of Milan, court hearings to decide whether to indict 25 alleged CIA agents and several Italians accused of kidnapping a Muslim cleric in 2003 are under way.

Osama Mustafa Hassan, or Abu Omar, says he was abducted from the streets of Milan and then tortured in Egypt.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man Was Arming For 'war,' FBI Says (SLPD)

By Robert Patrick

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, February 3, 2007

A St. Charles man obtained fully automatic weapons and tried to buy as many explosives as possible in preparation for what an associate called "war," the FBI says in court documents.

He bought three rifles and a Claymore anti-personnel mine and negotiated for a case of hand grenades, documents obtained by the Post-Dispatch show.

Mousa M. Abuelawi, 22, of Franjoe Court, was arrested Dec. 29 and charged on complaints accusing him of three counts of illegal possession or distribution of a machine gun and conspiracy to violate machine gun statutes.

Abuelawi, a Palestinian immigrant free on $50,000 bond, could not be reached. His brother declined to comment on his behalf. His lawyers, Scott Rosenblum and Gil Sison, did not return calls.

The context of the word "war" was not explained in court filings; the FBI declined to comment.

The man to whom the word was attributed, Thaer Abde Sumad, said in an interview Thursday that the purchases were not intended for terrorism but to make money supplying street gangs in a St. Louis turf war.

Sumad, 23, is not charged, although he is identified in an FBI affidavit as being present for one of the transactions.

He told a reporter he had no role in handling the firearms or explosives. He said he was at a meeting between Abuelawi and a federal informer outside a St. Louis gas station where Sumad works only because he knows both and wanted to say hello.

Sumad suggested that he and Abuelawi attracted special attention because of the sound of their names and their Arab ethnicity.

Abuelawi's lawyers have said he is a Palestinian immigrant.

Sumad is of Palestinian descent but was born in Indiana and raised in St. Louis, he said.

The FBI thinks it's a "terrorist thing," Sumad said, "especially after 9/11. They're trying to make it bigger than what it is."

Sumad said Abuelawi was "trying to make a few extra bucks."

An affidavit filed with the court by FBI Special Agent Stephen M. Smith, based in part on video and audio recordings, described these circumstances:

The informer used a cell phone to call Abuelawi on Nov. 8 and said he had a fully automatic rifle and a bomb or grenade for sale. Abuelawi and Sumad met with the informer at the gas station where they worked, in the 5700 block of West Florissant Road.

Abuelawi said he hoped the informer had brought the weapons and could sell them right away. He also said he would buy "whatever" the informer had to sell.

Sumad "stated he wants to buy as many explosives as possible because, 'we're going to war,'" the affidavit says. However, Sumad said in Thursday's interview that he does not remember making reference to "war," but added that if he did say it, he intended it as a flippant reference to a gang war.

The affidavit goes on to say:

On Nov. 21, the informer delivered a fully automatic M-16 rifle and a Claymore mine, or so Abuelawi was told. They had been rigged not to work.

That night, Abuelawi took the M-16 inside another gas station where he also worked, in the 6000 block of West Florissant Road, then put it back in his car.

DOJ_NMG_0127683

The next day Abuelawi met a man who "appears to be Middle Eastern" at the station in the 5700 block and showed him the M-16 and the Claymore.

On Nov. 23, three St. Louis police officers entered the station and said they had a report of someone seen there with a gun. Sumad denied knowing anything about a firearm. Officers found the M-16, seized it and left.

On Nov. 29, the informer offered Abuelawi a chance to buy 30 hand grenades for $15,000, or $500 per grenade. Abuelawi haggled the price down to $400 per grenade and asked the informer to get him more M-16s and some AK-47 assault rifles.

Abuelawi wanted four grenades immediately but the informer had only pictures.

Abuelawi told the informer, "this is not my first time dealing with this (expletive)," according to the affidavit.

The informer and Abuelawi met again Dec. 5. Abuelawi was nervous and said "he and his people" didn't want the hand grenades at the time because he thought the police were in the cemetery across the street.

In fact, they were.

The affidavit quotes Abuelawi as saying "if me and my people get caught with that (expletive) it is all over." It says, "He expressed that, if caught, he and others could be deported."

But Abuelawi still said he wanted any guns the informer could get, "big or small."

On Dec. 27, the informer sold Abuelawi an M-16 and a Heckler & Koch MP-5 fully automatic submachine gun, for $600.

Abuelawi and an unidentified man took the guns to a house in the 9700 block of Medford Drive in St. Louis County and asked the occupants to store them.

Investigators searched the house the next day and seized both guns.

No one answered when a reporter and photographer went to the house Thursday.

In contrast to the affidavit, Sumad said that when police asked him whether there was a gun at the gas station, he had said, "I don't think so."

Sumad said he had been off when Abuelawi dropped the gun off at the station. Another employee told Sumad about the gun, brought it out from a storage room, pulled it out of its case and waved it around, Sumad said.

Sumad said that after the police seized the gun, FBI agents came to interview him.

During 3½ hours in the store's back room, they asked him for personal information and asked what he knew about the M-16, he said. Sumad said he lied and told agents he didn't know anything about the gun. He said he didn't want them to associate him with Abuelawi or the weapon.

Sumad said the FBI asked him about overseas money transfers, whether he was a member of the factions Hamas or Fatah, and what he thought of President George W. Bush and the war in Iraq. Sumad said he dismissed the factions with an expletive, and said that because Bush got what he wanted by ridding Iraq of dictator Saddam Hussein, the troops should leave.

Abuelawi is single and has no children and no assets, court documents state. He was fired by the gas station, co-workers said.

Jeff Fulton, assistant special agent in charge of the St. Louis office of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said devices such as grenades and mines are "not a common product" for gangs. "But it's not unheard of," he said.

Abuelawi was arrested Dec. 29. He has appeared in federal court in St. Louis multiple times, including a status conference on Monday. At that hearing, U.S. Magistrate Judge Audrey Fleissig told Assistant U.S. Attorney Matt Drake that prosecutors had 30 days to obtain a grand jury indictment against Abuelawi or she would dismiss the charges.

Drake did not return a message seeking comment. Roland Corvington, special agent in charge of FBI's St. Louis office, said he could not comment because it is an ongoing investigation.

Cost Of House-Passed Terror Bill Touches Off A Partisan Clash (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The antiterrorism bill that the House passed last month as part of the new Democratic majority's first-100-hours push would cost the federal government $21 billion over the next five years, according to a new Congressional estimate.

DOJ_NMG_0127684

The five-year estimate, issued Friday by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, is equal to roughly half the Homeland Security Department's entire budget for the current fiscal year, and Republicans called it proof that adopting the bill so quickly had been irresponsible.

"This bill was rushed to the floor without the Democratic leadership giving us any indication of its massive cost," said Representative Peter T. King of New York, the senior Republican on the House Homeland Security Committee. "And now we know why."

The committee chairman, Representative Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, who was the chief sponsor of the legislation, defended the price tag. "Perhaps there would not be such sticker shock if the Congress and the Bush administration had addressed these security gaps identified by the bipartisan 9/11 commission over three years ago," Mr. Thompson said in a statement.

The Senate has not yet taken up its own version of the measure, but some Democrats there have already expressed reservations about tight and costly cargo inspections required by the House bill.

Most of the new spending — $13.1 billion, by the budget office's reckoning — would be for aviation security measures, including the inspection of all cargo loaded onto passenger jets.

A similar mandate requiring the overseas inspection of all ship containers headed to the United States would cost the federal government only $32 million a year, assuming, as the bill envisions, that foreign ports picked up the cost of the screening devices, at a cost of $1.5 billion over three years.

House Security Bill Tagged At $21 Billion (WT)

By Jerry Seper, Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Enacting the homeland security improvements recommended by the 9/11 commission will cost at least $21 billion over the next five years, according to a report yesterday by the Congressional Budget Office.

The CBO said a bill to carry out the recommendations, which passed the House last month, would also raise airline passenger fees by nearly $1.3 billion between 2008 and 2011, with the money going to the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) to improve security at the nation's airports.

House Democrats proposed the bill as part of their "100 hours" agenda. It would:

• Require the federal government to screen the contents of all cargo transported aboard passenger aircraft.

• Prohibit cargo shipping containers from entering the United States unless they have been sealed and scanned with imaging and radiation-detection equipment.

• Authorize grants to improve communications systems among first responders.

• Authorize appropriations for international broadcasting activities and assistance to Arab and predominantly Muslim countries, including Afghanistan and Pakistan.

• Aim to stem the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction by creating a White House office to coordinate a strategy for preventing WMD proliferation and an advisory commission to survey current nonproliferation efforts and recommend improvements.

The report was delivered to Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat and chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, who introduced the legislation. He said the 9/11 commissioners made "41 valuable recommendations on how to prevent" future terrorist attacks, but not all of them were completed.

"As a result, the American people remain at risk and our nation remains unprepared for a major emergency," he said.

But Rep. Peter T. King of New York, the committee's ranking Republican, said the bill was "rushed to the floor without the Democratic leadership giving us any indication of its massive cost -- and now we know why."

"I think this $21 billion estimate makes it clear that the bill actually contradicts 9/11 commission recommendations, which called for a risk-based allocation of homeland security resources," Mr. King said. "Had we known this before the bill was brought to the floor, it would have been a different story."

DOJ_NMG_0127685

Under the bill, the Department of Homeland Security would set the standards for scanning equipment and for container seals that could detect breaches. The bill's new requirements would become effective within three years for containers from countries with large ports and within five years for those with smaller operations.

President Bush opposes the House bill, arguing it undermines many of the administration's own post-September 11 steps and it is impossible to scan 100 percent of all incoming cargo.

The SAFE Ports Act, enacted in October 2006, requires Homeland Security to ensure that all containers are scanned before they arrive in the United States, although it sets no deadline for the department to put the program into operation. Department officials have described the 100 percent requirement as "unrealistic."

9/11 Security Could Cost $21 Billion (CNN)

CNN.com, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- A bill to enact the 9/11 Commission recommendations -- the first bill passed by the new Democratic-led House of Representatives -- will cost $21 billion over five years if enacted into law, congressional budget officials said Friday.

The House passed the bill January 9 during its heralded "first 100 hours" of the new Congress. The Senate has not yet voted on the measure.

The non-partisan Congressional Budget Office said the bill would also allow the Transportation Security Administration to collect nearly $1.3 billion in fees from airline passengers. The money would be spent for airport security improvements.

Rep. Peter King, R-New York., the ranking member of the Homeland Security Committee, said the report validated his opposition to the bill.

"This bill was rushed to the floor without the Democratic leadership giving us any indication of its massive cost -- and now we know why," King said in a written statement. "Had we known [the cost] before the bill was brought to the floor, it would have been a different story."

Democrats said the bill was needed to fulfill the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission.

The bill requires the federal government to screen cargo on passenger aircraft, authorize grants to improve police and fire communications, require shipping cargo containers to be scanned before entering the United States and take numerous other steps to improve security.

Court Clears Way For Suit On New Orleans Flooding (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

Residents of several neighborhoods in the New Orleans area that were hardest hit by flooding after Hurricane Katrina can sue the Army Corps of Engineers over their claims that a government-built navigation channel was largely to blame, a federal judge ruled yesterday.

Successful lawsuits against the corps could result in billions of dollars in damage payments.

Since the flood, those who lived in the devastated neighborhoods near the east side of New Orleans — including the Lower Ninth Ward, New Orleans East and St. Bernard Parish — have contended that the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet caused much of their damage by intensifying the surge from the storm. The damage, they say, was foreseeable.

After residents filed lawsuits, the government tried to get them dismissed. The corps argued that it was protected from lawsuits by the Flood Control Act of 1928, which grants it immunity from liability for flood damage caused by flood-control projects, like levees.

But yesterday, Judge Stanwood R. Duval Jr. of the Federal District Court for the Eastern District of Louisiana, cited previous cases saying that the channel was not a flood-control project. Instead, Judge Duval said, the cases say the channel — known locally as Mr. Go — was built as an aid to navigation, so the protection from liability might not apply. And so, he said, the questions deserved to be decided at trial.

Pierce O'Donnell, a lawyer for those suing the government, called the ruling "a landmark victory for the Katrina victims." But Joseph Bruno, another lawyer for the residents, acknowledged that the judge's ruling was only the first step.

DOJ_NMG_0127686

The 76-mile canal was completed in 1965 as a shortcut for ships heading from the Mississippi River to the Gulf of Mexico. Environmentalists and local officials have long argued that it has done great damage to the coastal environment by piping salt water inland and killing off the cypress swamps and grassy marshes that serve as natural barriers to storms.

During Hurricane Katrina, several scientists have said, the canal was a crucial part of a funnel that amplified the storm's surge and brought its waters into the heart of the city.

A spokesman for the corps in New Orleans, René Poché, declined to discuss pending litigation. The corps has previously argued that the channel did not contribute greatly to the disaster, but announced a plan last year to close the outlet to navigation. That plan does not go far enough for the channel's critics, who demand that it be filled in and the wetland buffer restored.

Also yesterday, President Bush nominated a new leader for the corps, Lt. Gen. Robert L. Van Antwerp Jr. of the Army. If approved by the Senate, General Van Antwerp will succeed Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, who announced last August that he intended to resign. General Van Antwerp has been serving as commanding general for the Army accessions command, which manages recruiting and initial training.

WAR NEWS:

Bleak Iraq Report Is Sent To Congress (WP)

By Karen DeYoung, Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

The U.S. intelligence community yesterday released a starkly pessimistic assessment of the situation in Iraq, warning that even if security improves, deepening sectarian divisions threaten to destroy the government and ultimately could lead to anarchy, partition or the emergence of a new dictatorship.

Citing "the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene," declassified judgments of a new National Intelligence Estimate predicted that Iraqi leaders will be "hard pressed" to reconcile over the next 18 months.

Despite the stepped-up training and U.S. support for Iraqi security forces -- major parts of the new Iraq strategy President Bush announced last month -- the estimate concluded that the Iraqi military will find it very difficult to carry out any new responsibilities or to operate independently against sectarian militias.

The administration struggled yesterday to put the best face on the NIE's assessment of a bleak situation that it says will sharply worsen unless "measurable" military and political progress is made.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley said the estimate "explains why the president concluded that a new approach and new strategy was required." He said Bush received extensive intelligence input before he announced his new plan, which includes the deployment of 21,500 additional U.S. combat troops to Iraq.

The NIE did not directly address the effect of sending more troops. But one section supported the administration's public insistence that U.S. forces are "an essential stabilizing element in Iraq." Their rapid withdrawal, the NIE said, "almost certainly would lead" to increased sectarian violence and make reconciliation more difficult.

The release of the estimate -- written over the past five months by the intelligence community's top Iraq analysts and approved by the heads of the CIA, the intelligence units at the Pentagon and those at the State and Justice departments -- comes on the eve of next week's Senate debate on the increase in U.S. forces in Iraq.

Key Democrats in Congress embraced the estimate to bolster their rejection of Bush's plan. "I do not see anything, so far, in the report that suggests the president's new plan is a winning strategy that protects America's national interest," said Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.).

The entire 90-page, classified NIE, titled "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead," was delivered to Congress yesterday morning after most members had left for the weekend.

Three and a half pages of "Key Judgments," unanimously agreed upon by the intelligence community, were released to the public. Although three dissents are included in the body of the classified document, they were described as tangential to the main conclusions. They deal with the extent to which the Syrian government controls the movement of foreign fighters across its border with Iraq and the extent and activities of al-Qaeda in Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0127687

The tough and unequivocal wording reflects the determination within the intelligence community to prove its independence from political pressure. The community came under harsh criticism for its 2002 assessment of then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein's weapons programs, much of which proved to be inaccurate.

Though the administration has repeatedly asserted that al-Qaeda and Iranian operatives are responsible for provoking much of the violence in Iraq, the NIE played down their roles. Analysts studied what would happen if Iran were not a factor inside Iraq and concluded that, even though Iranian agents target U.S. troops, the absence of Tehran's agents would not appreciably alter the sectarian conflict.

The administration postponed plans to present its evidence of Iranian involvement, originally scheduled for last Wednesday. Hadley said yesterday that "the truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated" Iran's role. "We sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts."

But in a muted criticism of the NIE, Hadley said it failed to consider Iran's negative impact on the entire Middle East.

The NIE called Iran, along with al-Qaeda and other extremist groups, "accelerants" whose activities intensify the conflict. But Iran and Iraq's other neighbors, it said, are "not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics."

The sectarian nature of the fighting, along with the "ethno-sectarian mobilization and population displacements," the estimate said, is consistent with the definition of "civil war." But it said the term "does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, al-Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on Coalition forces, and widely criminally motivated violence."

During a White House briefing, Hadley was pressed to reconcile that assessment with the president's refusal to describe the Iraq situation as a civil war. "I think I can't do better than the description of the facts on the ground that is in the NIE, with which we agree, and that says this is a complex, difficult situation," Hadley said. "And that's what it is."

At a Pentagon news conference, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, noting that he had not read the report, said he agreed with Hadley that "the words 'civil war' oversimplify a very complex situation." Gates said he was encouraged that Iraqi military units assigned to partner with U.S. forces in stepped-up operations in Baghdad are already arriving in the capital. But he acknowledged that the units have not reported with full strength, adding that "55 percent is probably not good enough."

The NIE analyzed the sharp differences among sectarian groups in Iraq, which it said are "driving the current trajectory of the country's security and political evolution."

Despite their majority status, the Shiites who now dominate the government remain "deeply insecure" after decades under the brutal control of Hussein and his Sunni regime, the NIE said. Their insecurity "leads the Shia to mistrust U.S. efforts to reconcile Iraqi sects and reinforces their unwillingness to engage with the Sunnis on a variety of issues," the estimate said.

Many Sunnis "remain unwilling to accept their minority status," the NIE continued, "believe the central government is illegitimate and incompetent, and are convinced that Shia dominance will increase Iranian influence over Iraq."

The Kurds, the country's third major group, "are moving systematically to increase their control" over the oil-rich city of Kirkuk and are looking to a constitutionally required referendum to take place no later than the end of this year, the NIE said. The voting will deal with the incorporation of the city within the Kurds' regional border. Such a move, the estimate said, "could prompt Turkey to launch a military incursion."

Without mentioning Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite, by name, the estimate noted that "the absence of unifying leaders among the Arab Sunni or Shia with the capacity to speak for or exert control over their confessional groups limits prospects for reconciliation."

It noted that some developments -- including broader Sunni acceptance of the current government, Shiite and Kurdish concessions and enhanced resources for local tribal and religious groups -- " could" help reverse the negative trends.

On the other hand, the NIE concluded, "a number of identifiable internal security and political triggering events . . . have the potential to convulse severely Iraq's security environment" and could "spark an abrupt increase in communal and insurgent violence and shift Iraq's trajectory from gradual decline to rapid deterioration."

DOJ_NMG_0127688

Those events include sustained mass sectarian killing, the assassination of major political and religious leaders, and a complete Sunni defection from the government. Any one of the three, the estimate said, could result in "chaos leading to partition . . . emergence of a Shia strongman . . . [or] anarchic fragmentation of power."

Analysis Is Bleak On Iraq's Future (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The release on Friday of portions of a bleak new National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq's future left the White House and its opponents vying over whether its findings buttressed their vastly different views about how to arrest the worsening sectarian chaos there.

The assessment, by American intelligence agencies, expressed deep doubts about the abilities of Iraqi politicians to hold together an increasingly balkanized country, and about whether Iraqi troops might be able to confront powerful militias over the next 18 months and assume more responsibility for security.

The analysis, the first such estimate on Iraq in more than two years, described in sober language a rapidly unraveling country in which security has worsened despite four years of efforts by the administration. [Text, Page A6.]

President Bush acknowledged last month that his strategy had failed so far.

The estimate suggested that the United States now faced an unpalatable decision in which a rapid withdrawal of American troops would only accelerate momentum toward Iraq's collapse, and in which Iraq faced long odds of quelling the violence and overcoming hardening sectarian divisions, regardless of how many American troops police Iraq's streets.

The report was released a week after Vice President Dick Cheney dismissed suggestions that Iraq is in a parlous state, saying, "The reality on the ground is, we've made major progress."

The administration has also intensified its criticism of Iran, accusing it of fueling the sectarian violence in Iraq and providing Shiite militias with material for bombs that the administration says have been used in attacks on American forces. The White House has thus far made little evidence public to support its case.

The intelligence report did conclude that Iran is providing "lethal support" for Shiite groups that is intensifying the violence. But it portrayed the violence as essentially "self-sustaining," and suggested that the involvement of outsiders, including Iran, was "not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability."

National Intelligence Estimates provide a consensus of the 16 agencies that make up the intelligence community.

In choosing to take the rare step of making public three and a half pages of "key judgments" from the classified report, administration officials seized on one conclusion — that American forces remain "an essential stabilizing element in Iraq" — to reinforce their view that more troops are needed to secure Baghdad and give Iraqi leaders breathing room to develop a political settlement, particularly between the warring Sunnis and Shiites.

But top Democratic lawmakers said the estimate's conclusions supported their view that the best way to combat violence in Baghdad would be through new political and diplomatic programs.

The declassified portions included an assessment that an Iraqi military hampered by sectarian divisions would be "hard pressed" over the next 12 to 18 months to "execute significantly increased security responsibilities, and particularly to operate independently against Shia militias with any success."

The report also concluded that security in Iraq would continue to deteriorate at current rates unless "measurable progress" can be made in efforts to reverse the conditions that fuel violence.

The full classified report was said by officials to be about 90 pages in length, and was provided to the White House and members of Congress. Top Democrats said the release of the intelligence estimate would strengthen their hand as the Senate prepares for a possible vote next week on a nonbinding resolution opposing President Bush's new Iraq strategy.

"The estimate reaffirms my belief that the best hope for progress toward stabilizing Iraq lies only with the Iraqi people and their political leaders," Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, the West Virginia Democrat and chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said in a statement. "The steps identified by the intelligence community as having the best chance of reversing the chaos and bloodshed in Iraq are all political developments, not military."

DOJ_NMG_0127689

But Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said at the White House that the estimate "gives us some evidence" of why Mr. Bush had concluded that "an American withdrawal or stepping back now would be a prescription for fast failure and a chaos that would envelop not only Iraq, but the region."

Mr. Hadley said the estimate also bolstered the White House strategy of sending more than 20,000 new troops into Iraq.

The previous National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, in the summer of 2004, detailed three possible outlooks for Iraq over the following 18 months, with the most pessimistic possibility that Iraq would descend into civil war.

By contrast the new report, struggling to describe the nature of the ongoing violence, said that calling it a "civil war" was hardly sufficient.

"The intelligence community judges that the term 'civil war' does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, Al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces, and widespread criminally motivated violence," the assessment read.

John E. McLaughlin, who oversaw the previous intelligence estimate when he was acting director of central intelligence, said that he believed that intelligence officials in 2004 had presciently assessed what was to come in Iraq, but that the escalation of sectarian violence over the past year had made the situation even more complex.

"Civil war is checkers," he said. "This is chess."

The report also warned that a further sectarian splintering of Iraq could incite other countries in the Middle East to arm and finance various sects in the country: Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt supporting the Sunnis, and Iran coming to the aid of Shiite forces.

A National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq that was produced in 2002 in the prelude to the American invasion has become infamous as an example of an intelligence failure, because most of its central assertions about Iraq's weapons capabilities and ties to terrorism have since been proven to have been mistaken.

Since then, American intelligence officials have made efforts to overhaul the process to produce the reports, in part by giving new emphasis to dissenting views that were once buried in obscure footnotes.

The latest analysis is understood to contain multiple dissents, one of which concerns the role of Syria in supporting Sunni insurgents in Iraq.

Intelligence analysts have been divided over whether it is the policy of the government in Damascus to aid the flow of foreign fighters who enter Iraq from Syria, or whether that assistance is the work of lower-level Syrian officials acting on their own.

American intelligence analysts have also disagreed about the extent to which Iranian government officials are aware of the flow of Qaeda operatives between Iran and Iraq.

Beyond the current grim picture, the report described several "triggering events" that could cause the situation to worsen significantly. Among them, it listed the assassination of major religious or political leaders, a complete Sunni defection from the government, and sustained mass sectarian killings that could "shift Iraq's trajectory from gradual decline to rapid deterioration with grave humanitarian, political and security consequences."

Were the already fragile government to collapse, the report outlined three possible outcomes: the emergence of a Shiite strongman to assert authority over minority sects, an "anarchic" fragmentation that puts power in the hands of hundreds of local potentates, or a period of sustained, bloody fighting leading to partition of Iraq along ethnic lines.

"Collapse of this magnitude would generate fierce violence for at least several years," the report concluded, "ranging well beyond the time frame of this estimate, before settling into a partially stable end-state."

The Analysis: On The "Polarization" Of Iraqis And Their "Ready Recourse To Violence" (NYT)

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

Following is the text of the "key judgments" of the new National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq's future that was released yesterday. The report, most of which remains classified, is titled "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead" and is dated January 2007. Italic emphasis and parenthetical abbreviations are from the report.

Iraqi society's growing polarization, the persistent weakness of the security forces and the state in general, and all sides' ready recourse to violence are collectively driving an increase in communal and insurgent violence and political extremism.

DOJ_NMG_0127690

Unless efforts to reverse these conditions show measurable progress during the term of this estimate, the coming 12 to 18 months, we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate at rates comparable to the latter part of 2006.

If strengthened Iraqi Security Forces (I.S.F.), more loyal to the government and supported by coalition forces, are able to reduce levels of violence and establish more effective security for Iraq's population, Iraqi leaders could have an opportunity to begin the process of political compromise necessary for longer term stability, political progress, and economic recovery.

Nevertheless, even if violence is diminished, given the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene, Iraqi leaders will be hard pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation in the time frame of this estimate.

The challenges confronting Iraqis are daunting, and multiple factors are driving the current trajectory of the country's security and political evolution.

Decades of subordination to Sunni political, social, and economic domination have made the Shia deeply insecure about their hold on power. This insecurity leads the Shia to mistrust U.S. efforts to reconcile Iraqi sects and reinforces their unwillingness to engage with the Sunnis on a variety of issues, including adjusting the structure of Iraq's federal system, reining in Shia militias, and easing de-Baathification.

Many Sunni Arabs remain unwilling to accept their minority status, believe the central government is illegitimate and incompetent, and are convinced that Shia dominance will increase Iranian influence over Iraq, in ways that erode the state's Arab character and increase Sunni repression.

The absence of unifying leaders among the Arab Sunni or Shia with the capacity to speak for or exert control over their confessional groups limits prospects for reconciliation. The Kurds remain willing to participate in Iraqi state-building but reluctant to surrender any of the gains in autonomy they have achieved.

The Kurds are moving systematically to increase their control of Kirkuk to guarantee annexation of all or most of the city and province into the Kurdistan Regional Government (K.R.G.) after the constitutionally mandated referendum scheduled to occur no later than 31 December 2007. Arab groups in Kirkuk continue to resist violently what they see as Kurdish encroachment.

Despite real improvements, the Iraqi Security Forces (I.S.F.) — particularly the Iraqi police — will be hard pressed in the next 12-18 months to execute significantly increased security responsibilities, and particularly to operate independently against Shia militias with success. Sectarian divisions erode the dependability of many units, many are hampered by personnel and equipment shortfalls, and a number of Iraqi units have refused to serve outside of the areas where they were recruited.

Extremists — most notably the Sunni jihadist group Al Qaeda in Iraq (A.Q.I.) and Shia oppositionist Jaysh al-Mahdi (J.A.M.) — continue to act as very effective accelerators for what has become a self-sustaining inter-sectarian struggle between Shia and Sunnis.

Significant population displacement, both within Iraq and the movement of Iraqis into neighboring countries, indicates the hardening of ethno-sectarian divisions, diminishes Iraq's professional and entrepreneurial classes, and strains the capacities of the countries to which they have relocated. The U.N. estimates over a million Iraqis are now in Syria and Jordan.

The Intelligence Community judges that the term "civil war" does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, Al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces, and widespread criminally motivated violence. Nonetheless, the term "civil war" accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict, including the hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence, ethno-sectarian mobilization, and population displacements.

Coalition capabilities, including force levels, resources, and operations, remain an essential stabilizing element in Iraq.

If coalition forces were withdrawn rapidly during the term of this estimate, we judge that this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq, intensify Sunni resistance to the Iraqi government, and have adverse consequences for national reconciliation.

If such a rapid withdrawal were to take place, we judge that the I.S.F. would be unlikely to survive as a nonsectarian national institution; neighboring countries — invited by Iraqi factions or unilaterally — might intervene openly in the conflict; massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable; A.Q.I. would attempt to use parts of the country — particularly Al Anbar Province — to plan increased attacks in and outside of Iraq; and spiraling violence and political disarray in Iraq, along with Kurdish moves to control Kirkuk and strengthen autonomy, could prompt Turkey to launch a military incursion.

DOJ_NMG_0127691

A number of identifiable developments could help to reverse the negative trends driving Iraq's current trajectory. They include:

¶Broader Sunni acceptance of the current political structure and federalism to begin to reduce one of the major sources of Iraq's instability.

¶Significant concessions by Shia and Kurds to create space for Sunni acceptance of federalism.

¶A bottom-up approach — deputizing, resourcing, and working more directly with neighborhood watch groups and establishing grievance committees — to help mend frayed relationships between tribal and religious groups, which have been mobilized into communal warfare over the past three years.

A key enabler for all of these steps would be stronger Iraqi leadership, which could enhance the positive impact of all the above developments.

Iraq's neighbors influence, and are influenced by, events within Iraq, but the involvement of these outside actors is not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics.

Nonetheless, Iranian lethal support for select groups of Iraqi Shia militants clearly intensifies the conflict in Iraq. Syria continues to provide safe haven for expatriate Iraqi Baathists and to take less than adequate measures to stop the flow of foreign jihadists into Iraq.

For key Sunni regimes, intense communal warfare, Shia gains in Iraq, and Iran's assertive role have heightened fears of regional instability and unrest and contributed to a growing polarization between Iran and Syria on the one hand and other Middle East governments on the other.

But traditional regional rivalries, deepening ethnic and sectarian violence in Iraq over the past year, persistent anti-Americanism in the region, anti-Shia prejudice among Arab states, and fears of being perceived by their publics as abandoning their Sunni co-religionists in Iraq have constrained Arab states' willingness to engage politically and economically with the Shia-dominated government in Baghdad and led them to consider unilateral support to Sunni groups.

Turkey does not want Iraq to disintegrate and is determined to eliminate the safe haven in northern Iraq of the Kurdistan People's Congress (K.G.K., formerly P.K.K.) — a Turkish Kurdish terrorist group.

A number of identifiable internal security and political triggering events, including sustained mass sectarian killings, assassination of major religious and political leaders, and a complete Sunni defection from the government have the potential to convulse severely Iraq's security environment. Should these events take place, they could spark an abrupt increase in communal and insurgent violence and shift Iraq's trajectory from gradual decline to rapid deterioration with grave humanitarian, political, and security consequences. Three prospective security paths might then emerge:

¶Chaos leading to partition. With a rapid deterioration in the capacity of Iraq's central government to function, security services and other aspects of sovereignty would collapse. Resulting widespread fighting could produce de facto partition, dividing Iraq into three mutually antagonistic parts. Collapse of this magnitude would generate fierce violence for at least several years, ranging well beyond the time frame of this estimate, before settling into a partially stable end-state.

¶Emergence of a Shia strongman. Instead of a disintegrating central government producing partition, a security implosion could lead Iraq's potentially most powerful group, the Shia, to assert its latent strength.

¶Anarchic fragmentation of power. The emergence of a checkered pattern of local control would present the greatest potential for instability, mixing extreme ethno-sectarian violence with debilitating intra-group clashes.

U.S. Spy Chiefs Issue Grim Report On Iraq (LAT)

By Greg Miller,

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

Stability isn't possible within a year, they say, even if the fighting can be slowed.

DOJ_NMG_0127692

WASHINGTON — Iraq is unraveling at an accelerating rate, and even if U.S. and Iraqi forces can slow the spreading violence, the country's fragile government is unlikely to deliver stability to its people during the next year, according to a much-anticipated assessment by U.S. intelligence agencies.

The report, titled "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead," catalogs an array of forces pulling the country apart and concludes that to call the situation a civil war "does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict" because the causes of violence are so varied.

The assessment, delivered to Congress on Friday, says there are scenarios that could lead to political progress and a slow recovery, but it also identifies "triggering events" that could push Iraq into complete chaos, with neighboring nations choosing sides in what could become a regional conflagration.

"Given the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene, Iraqi leaders will be hard-pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation in the [18-month] time frame of this estimate," the report says in a blunt, bottom-line summary.

The document, known as a National Intelligence Estimate, represents the consensus of all 16 U.S. spy agencies. The director of national intelligence took the unusual step of releasing the document's key judgments publicly even as the full, 90-page classified version was being delivered to members of Congress and senior government officials.

The assessment does not specifically address the prospects for success of President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. But it notes that "even if violence is diminished" over the next 12 to 18 months, prospects for "sustained political reconciliation" among Iraq's warring factions are dim.

That means that even under optimistic scenarios, the nation's top intelligence analysts do not envision meaningful stability within the period during which Bush has said additional U.S. troops would be deployed — raising the prospect that the so-called surge might drag on much longer than the administration has indicated.

Beyond that, the report provides fodder for proponents and critics of Bush's plan.

It warns that the presence of U.S. troops remains "an essential stabilizing element in Iraq" and that if there were a rapid withdrawal, Iraqi security forces "would be unlikely to survive as a nonsectarian national institution."

In such a scenario, neighboring countries — including Iran and Saudi Arabia — "might intervene openly in the conflict; massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable."

White House officials said that prospect helped make the case for the president's plan, which is under increasing fire on Capitol Hill.

The intelligence estimate is "not at war with this … new strategy the president has developed," national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley told reporters. The assessment, he said, "explains why the president concluded that a new approach, a new strategy was required" and "generally supports" that idea.

But Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a contender for his party's 2008 presidential nomination, called the report "a devastating repudiation of the president's new tactics in Iraq."

"It plainly shows the current strategy isn't working and that there is a dire need for a political settlement to give [breathing] room to the Sunnis, Shia and Kurds," Biden said in a statement. "Without it, Iraq will slide into further chaos and violence."

The report comes as the Senate is arguing over whether to approve a nonbinding resolution sponsored by Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) that criticizes the president's plan to increase troop levels.

Most Democrats and some Republican senators have lined up behind Warner's measure, expected to be debated next week. But Republican Senate leaders emerged from meetings Friday leaving no doubt they would seek to keep the measure from coming to a vote unless they were allowed to present alternative resolutions less critical of the president's policies. Democrats were working to line up the 60 votes needed in the 100-member Senate to thwart an effort to block the Warner resolution.

The assessment by the intelligence agencies was requested in July by senators alarmed by the deteriorating security situation in Iraq. The violence has worsened since then, and the NIE concludes that without significant political and military progress soon, "the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate at rates comparable to the latter part of 2006."

DOJ_NMG_0127693

In outlining the factors that have pushed Iraq toward chaos, the report cites the "insecurity" of Shiites, who were repressed for decades under dictator Saddam Hussein, a Sunni Arab; the refusal of Sunnis to accept their declining political fortunes after Hussein's regime was toppled in early 2003; and the disappearance of a large portion of the Iraqi "professional and entrepreneurial classes" as people fled to other countries.

The report offers a bleak assessment of the Iraqi security forces who are supposed to play the leading role under Bush's plan to stem violence.

These forces will be "hard-pressed" to carry out their responsibilities and operate against Shiite militias, the report concludes.

That assessment seems at odds with recent assertions by U.S. military officials, including Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who testified before Congress on Thursday that "Iraqis are poised to assume responsibility for their own security by the end of 2007, still with some level of support from us."

Echoing concerns Bush has raised, the NIE warns that if the United States withdrew, Al Qaeda "would attempt to use parts of the country — particularly Al Anbar province — to plan increased attacks in and outside of Iraq."

But the document does not indicate that intelligence officials believe Iraq is poised to become an Al Qaeda sanctuary, a scenario cited by Bush in his rejection of calls to set up timetables for a withdrawal of U.S. forces.

The NIE is measured in its assessment of the roles Iran and Syria play in fostering violence in Iraq.

It says that Iran has fueled the fighting by providing "lethal support" to groups of Iraqi Shiite militants and that Syria continues to shelter displaced members of Hussein's Baath Party.

Even so, the report finds that meddling by Iran and Syria "is not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics."

The role played by Iraq's neighbors was the subject of some dissension among intelligence officials involved in assembling the report.

The classified portion of the NIE is said to include "alternate" judgments that reflect disagreements over whether Syria is directly involved in allowing Islamic militants to cross its border into Iraq and the extent to which Iran is aware of and tolerating Al Qaeda activity in its territory.

In giving the alternate assessments prominent placement alongside the document's key judgments, U.S. intelligence officials said, they were responding to criticism of previous NIEs in which dissenting views were often relegated to footnote status and overlooked by policymakers.

Downplaying of dissenting views was one of many major flaws in an NIE produced before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003, which concluded erroneously that Iraq had stockpiles of chemical and biological weapons and was pursuing the development of nuclear weapons.

The new NIE concludes with a discussion of scenarios that could push Iraq into deeper chaos. The triggering events could include mass sectarian killings, assassinations of major religious or political figures and a Sunni defection from the government, it says. Those events could lead to "rapid deterioration with grave humanitarian, political and security consequences."

greg.miller@latimes.com

Times staff writers Maura Reynolds and Noam N. Levey contributed to this report.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Major findings of the report

From Times Staff and Wire Reports

Here are the main findings of the declassified portion of the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, with excerpts from the report in quotes. The full text of the summary, produced by 16 U.S. intelligence agencies, can be found at http://www.dni.gov.

• Growing polarization of Iraqi society, weak security forces and a weak government are driving violence and political extremism.

• If new plans for Iraq don't work over the coming year to 18 months, security in Iraq will continue to deteriorate as in the second half of 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0127694

• Even if the violence lessens, Iraqi leaders will be hard-pressed to stabilize the country by mid-2008 "given the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene."

• Iraq faces daunting challenges driven by Shiite Muslim insecurity after years of Sunni Arab domination, Sunni unwillingness to accept minority status, divided leaders who can't control the groups they represent, a movement by ethnic Kurds toward autonomy, an ineffective Iraqi army, extremist groups inside and outside Iraq and problems with refugees.

"Despite real improvements, the Iraqi security forces (ISF) — particularly the Iraqi police — will be hard-pressed in the next 12 to 18 months to execute significantly increased security responsibilities, and particularly to operate independently against Shia militias with success. Sectarian divisions erode the dependability of many units, many are hampered by personnel and equipment shortfalls, and a number of Iraqi units have refused to serve outside of the areas where they were recruited."

• The term "civil war" "accurately describes key aspects of the conflict in Iraq, including the hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence, ethno-sectarian mobilization and population displacements." Nevertheless, the term doesn't encompass all of the conflict's complexities.

• American and other foreign forces play a key role in the country, and the Iraqi army probably wouldn't survive a rapid U.S. withdrawal. "If coalition forces were withdrawn rapidly during the [12- to 18-month] term of this estimate, we judge that this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq, intensify Sunni resistance to the Iraqi government and have adverse consequences for national reconciliation. If such a rapid withdrawal were to take place, we judge that the ISF would be unlikely to survive as a nonsectarian national institution."

• Political developments, particularly Sunni acceptance of the current government, concessions from the Shiites and the Kurds and efforts to reduce violence in neighborhoods could help calm the conflict. "A key enabler for all of these steps would be stronger Iraqi leadership."

• Iraq's neighbors have some influence in the country and in some cases have intensified the conflict, but they don't play a major role because the sectarian divisions are firmly entrenched and driven by internal political forces.

• Other Sunni Arab regimes in the region are reluctant to support the Shiite-dominated Baghdad government and are considering supporting Sunni groups in Iraq. Turkey wants a stable Iraq to keep a Turkish Kurdish separatist group from finding safe haven in northern Iraq.

• "A number of identifiable internal security and political triggering events, including sustained mass sectarian killings, assassination of major religious and political leaders and a complete Sunni defection from the government have the potential to convulse severely Iraq's security environment. Should these events take place, they could spark an abrupt increase in communal and insurgent violence and shift Iraq's trajectory from gradual decline to rapid deterioration with grave humanitarian, political and security consequences."

• If the security situation worsens, one of three scenarios might emerge: The central government could disintegrate and lead to a de facto partition of Iraq along sectarian lines, resulting in protracted violence; a Shiite strongman could emerge; or an anarchic pattern of local control could arise, leading to chaos and extreme violence.

Intelligence Estimate Warns On Quick Iraq Pullout (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

A new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq warns that pulling U.S. troops out of the country too soon would lead to a collapse of the Iraqi military, outside intervention and the creation of safe havens for al Qaeda terrorists.

An unclassified summary of the 90-page estimate, "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead," stated that U.S. and allied troops "remain an essential stabilizing element in Iraq."

"If coalition forces were withdrawn rapidly, ... we judge that this almost certainly would lead to a significant increase in the scale and scope of sectarian conflict in Iraq, intensify Sunni resistance to the Iraqi government and have adverse consequences for national reconciliation," the report stated.

The conclusion is a blow to Iraq war critics in Congress and elsewhere who are advocating a pullout of U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0127695

"If such a rapid withdrawal were to take place, we judge that the [Iraqi Security Force] would be unlikely to survive as a non-sectarian national institution; neighboring countries ... might intervene openly in the conflict; massive civilian casualties and forced population displacement would be probable," the report stated.

Also, the al Qaeda terrorist group in Iraq would try to "use parts of the country -- particularly al-Anbar province -- to plan increased attacks in and outside of Iraq."

Additionally, Turkey could launch a military incursion if there were no U.S. or allied troops to block Kurdish attempts to control northern Iraq, according to the report.

White House National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said President Bush agreed with the report's conclusion about the danger of removing troops too rapidly.

"That's why the president concluded that while the current strategy was not working and it was a prescription for slow failure, an American withdrawal or stepping back now would be a prescription for fast failure and a chaos that would envelop not only Iraq but also the region and could potentially, by giving al Qaeda a safe haven in Iraq, result in risk and threats to the United States," Mr. Hadley said.

The estimate, a consensus of 16 U.S. intelligence agencies that was ordered by members of Congress, presents a pessimistic view of the prospects for stabilizing Iraq and halting the growing violence over the next 12 to 18 months.

Unless the trends are reversed in that time, "we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate at rates comparable to the latter part of 2006," the report stated.

However, it stated, the Iraqi military and police will be "hard-pressed" over the next 18 months to take on greater security roles or operate alone against Shi'ite militias.

A strengthened Iraqi military backed by U.S. and allied forces would give Iraqi leaders a chance to foster "political compromise" needed for long-term stability, political progress and economic renewal, the report stated.

The current violence is more than a religious and ethnic civil war, the report stated, citing extensive Shi'ite-on-Shi'ite violence, al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces and criminal attacks.

Developments that could reverse the negative trends include broader Sunni acceptance of the political structure, concessions by Shi'ites and Kurds toward Sunnis, and a local community-outreach effort to mend differences between groups and tribes, according to the report.

"A key enabler for all of these steps would be stronger Iraqi leadership, which could enhance the positive impact of all the above developments," the report stated.

On outside influence, the report stated that Iranian support for insurgents intensifies the conflict, and that Syria is providing safe haven for insurgents and has failed to stop the flow of terrorists into Iraq.

Rep. Ike Skelton, Missouri Democrat and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said the report "demonstrates that the situation in Iraq is indeed dire and deteriorating," the Associated Press reported.

"It saddens me that the pessimistic impressions I gained during my recent trip to Iraq are reinforced by the conclusions of the latest NIE," Mr. Skelton said.

Iraq Conflict Has Elements Of "civil War" (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo, Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 3, 2007

The Iraqi government will be “hard-pressed” to achieve political reconciliation over the next 18 months as it tackles a “civil war” and the insurgency, according to a key US intelligence report.

The National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq, a comprehensive report approved by the entire intelligence community, also warned that Iraqi security forces would have great difficulty clamping down on Shia militias without US support.

“Even if violence is diminished, given the current winner-take-all attitude and sectarian animosities infecting the political scene, Iraqi leaders will be hard-pressed to achieve sustained political reconciliation in the [next 12-18 months],” said the long-awaited report.

DOJ_NMG_0127696

It was the first official US document released to the public that concluded that elements of the conflict in Iraq constituted a "civil war".

"The term 'civil war' does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, al-Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces and widespread criminally motivated violence," said the report.

"Nonetheless, the term 'civil war' accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict, including the hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence, ethno-sectarian mobilisation and population displacements."

The Bush administration has resisted using the term "civil war" to describe the deteriorating conditions in Iraq. Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, shifted attention on Friday from the NIE's use of the phrase by citing a long passage from an Iraqi official, denying that Iraq was in a civil war.

When asked if Mr Bush now accepted that "civil war" did accurately describe part of the violence in Iraq, he said the president accepted the conclusions about "hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence, ethno-sectarian mobilisation and population displacements".

The declassified version of NIE did not include reference to two elements of the full 90-page report, which included dissenting views in the intelligence community over the role of Iran and Syria in Iraq.

On Syria, analysts disagree over the complicity of Damascus in allowing extremists to flow across the border into Iraq. On Iran, they differed over whether the government was harbouring al-Qaeda members inside Iran.

The Bush administration has stepped up both military and rhetorical pressure on Iran in recent weeks. Senior officials have argued that Iran is responsible for killing American and British soldiers inside Iraq.

But Robert Gates, the defence secretary, said on Friday that the Pentagon did not know whether the Iranian government was sponsoring the efforts.

Democrats immediately leapt on the report as evidence that Mr Bush's military surge in Iraq would fail. Harry Reid, the Senate majority leader, said the report was the "latest in a long line of bleak assessments . . . indicating the president's plan is flawed and failing".

But the report concluded that a sudden withdrawal of US troops would propel Iraq into great chaos. It said the Iraqi security forces "would be unlikely to survive as a non-sectarian national institution" and neighbouring countries might "intervene openly in the conflict".

Elements Of "Civil War" In Iraq (BBC)

BBC.com, February 2, 2007

A US intelligence assessment on Iraq says "civil war" accurately describes certain aspects of the conflict, including intense sectarian violence.

However the report, compiled by US security agencies, adds that the controversial term does not adequately sum up the complexity of the situation.

The National Intelligence Estimate gives a bleak assessment of Iraq's future unless the violence is stemmed.

The White House described the report as "tough but fair".

The document uses "civil war" to describe elements of the conflict, including "the hardening of ethno-sectarian identities, a sea change in the character of the violence and population displacements".

It says violence between Sunnis and Shias is being driven by increasing polarisation within Iraqi society, compounded by a weak government and security force.

The UN says the war has produced the biggest movement of refugees in the Middle East since the creation of Israel in 1948.

However, the report points out that the conflict also includes Shia-on-Shia violence, al-Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces, and widespread violence by criminals.

US Defence Secretary Robert Gates said the term "civil war" over-simplified the situation.

DOJ_NMG_0127697

"I believe that there are essentially four wars going on in Iraq: one is Shia-on-Shia, principally in the south; the second is sectarian conflict, principally in Baghdad; third is the insurgency; and fourth is al-Qaeda," he told reporters before the intelligence estimate was issued.

'Ominous consequences'

The report also warned of ominous consequences if the level of violence went unchecked.

"Unless efforts to reverse these conditions show measurable progress during the term of this estimate in the coming 12 to 18 months, we assess that the overall security situation will continue to deteriorate."

Bombings and mortar attacks are a daily threat to Iraqi civilians It adds: "Coalition capabilities including force levels, resources and operations remain an essential stabilising element in Iraq."

US national security adviser Steve Hadley said the report was "a tough look at Iraq", but did not contradict the president's plans to send 21,500 additional troops.

Instead, it "explains why the president concluded that a new approach, a new strategy was required", he said.

The BBC's Ian Watson in Washington says the Bush administration is likely to use the report to justify the president's new strategy, as it concludes the Iraqi security forces will be hard-pressed to operate on their own against Shia militias.

The document argued against a quick withdrawal of US troops, saying it would fracture the Iraqi army, strengthen al-Qaeda elements in the country and significantly increase violence.

However, the Democratic leader of the House of Representatives, Nancy Pelosi, said "no number of US troops is going to change" the deadly circle in Iraq.

"Our emphasis should be on working with Iraq's leaders and Iraq's neighbours to produce the kind of political and diplomatic breakthroughs that offer the best chance to stop the violence," she said.

The report - the first National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq in more than two years - also says Iran and to a lesser extent Syria are contributing to a worsening of the situation.

Analysts: Iraq Report Lays Out Tough Road For Success (CNN)

CNN.com, February 2, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The national intelligence estimate on Iraq released Friday does not address whether the president's plan to "surge" up to 21,500 troops into Iraq will work, but it lays out an extremely chaotic and complex situation that will make it difficult for those troops to succeed, intelligence and military analysts told CNN.

It will be up to the policy makers -- including President Bush and Congress -- to decide if the additional troops have a legitimate chance of success in the situation that the report says is "deteriorating," said John McLaughlin, a former deputy director of the CIA and CNN intelligence analyst. (Watch how the report reached its blistering conclusions)

"This is a pretty clear-eyed assessment by the intelligence community," McLaughlin said. "They didn't hold anything back." (Read the report -- PDF)

The estimate was formulated at the time the president crafted his new Iraq policy, and Bush had access to the same information the intelligence community used to form the estimate's judgments.

McLaughlin said the intelligence community didn't make an assessment of whether the troop increase would work, in part, because it didn't have enough data to make a recommendation and, in part, because it did not want to weigh in on a debate that is essentially political. (Watch McLaughlin break down the NIE)

But the report did say that combating the increasing sectarian violence is a "daunting" task because Shiites are insecure about their hold on power after decades of Sunni hegemony in the social, political and economic realms, and Sunnis are deeply skeptical of a Shiite-controlled government they view as "illegitimate and incompetent."

"No matter how much we surge, no matter how many resources we pour into Iraq, unless you get unity of effort with the Iraqi government, that the Iraqi people themselves are the main purpose and not the tribes, the sects, the different pieces, we'll have a tough go at making any change," said retired Gen. David Grange, a CNN military analyst.

Yet, having viewed the intelligence that went into the estimate while drafting his new Iraq strategy, the president believes the U.S. still has a chance to stabilize the situation by adding up to five brigades.

DOJ_NMG_0127698

Stephen Hadley, the U.S. national security adviser, said Friday that Bush concluded that in Iraq, the "status quo is not stable" and that change was needed.

"It's going to be hard and the president made it clear it's going to be hard. There's no assurance for success," he said.

The president's plan is a strategy that many lawmakers -- both Democrats and Republicans -- in the Congress remain highly skeptical of, and little in the report, they said, gave the skeptical lawmakers reason to change their minds.

"I do not see anything so far in the report that suggests the president's new plan is a winning strategy that protects America's national interest," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada, said in a statement. "Rather this NIE appears to be the latest in a long line of bleak assessments by foreign policy and military experts indicating the president's plan is flawed and failing."

"Nothing in this document tells us that sending 21,500 additional troops to Iraq will make the situation better," the Democratic chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, Rep. Silvestre Reyes of Texas, said in a statement.

The estimate also makes it clear, however, that simply walking away from Iraq may even be worse. If the U.S. makes a "rapid withdrawal" from Iraq, a move many Democratic lawmakers have called for, the estimate said it could lead to the collapse of the Iraqi Security Forces, potentially plunging the country into a chaotic situation marked by "extreme ethno-sectarian violence with debilitating intra-group clashes."

And it is such a situation, the White House argues, the U.S. simply cannot accept.

"An American withdrawal or stepping back now would be a prescription for fast failure and a chaos that would envelop not only Iraq, but also the region," Hadley said.

Iraq, And Analysis, Revisited (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

The intelligence community's bleak set of judgments about Iraq, made public yesterday, differs significantly from the flawed assessments of that country's alleged weapons programs that the White House released more than four years ago.

Twenty-seven pages of confident assertions about a nuclear weapons program, mustard gas, nerve agents and elusive government ties to al-Qaeda have been replaced, more than four years later, with heavily qualified glimmers of hope across a mere 3 1/2 pages laying out the prospects for reversing Iraq's dive into chaos.

The intelligence community's glossy October 2002 estimate, which claimed that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, was touted by the White House as a main reason for war with Iraq. After no such weapons were found, the intelligence community -- particularly the CIA -- significantly altered the way in which it would conduct future analyses, highlight uncertainty and acknowledge dissent.

Current and former intelligence officers said a better system for producing the National Intelligence Estimate was put in place immediately. The result, they said, is that the new estimate -- which describes an Iraq engulfed by numerous bloody wars -- is strikingly similar to a still-classified assessment written in late 2004 and widely distributed among President Bush's top advisers.

That assessment predicted that over a period of 12 to 18 months, there would be "at best, tenuous stability, at worst a slide into civil war" in Iraq, said Paul R. Pillar, a Middle East scholar and veteran intelligence officer who was one of the report's principal authors.

"If you could compare the 2004 and 2007 estimates, it would be clear they are two installments of the same story, done the same way. The only difference is that the policy debate has become more intense in the intervening two years because the situation has become worse and worse," said Pillar, who left the intelligence community in 2005 and now teaches at Georgetown University.

Pillar could not discuss details of the 2004 assessment, but a senior intelligence official agreed to discuss some of its findings on the condition of anonymity. The official said that like yesterday's estimate, the 2004 review offered three difficult scenarios for Iraq, all of which have been borne out to some degree.

DOJ_NMG_0127699

"We imagined some slow and uneven progress, which has happened in parts of the country," the official said. The estimate also considered a breakup of Iraq along sectarian lines. "The preconditions for that have sort of happened, but only really up in the north with the Kurds; and the third one was chaos and instability and we've certainly seen some of that."

Based on the accuracy of the previous political estimates, Pillar said, it is very possible that the worst-case scenarios set out in yesterday's assessment could occur in the next year and a half.

In crafting key judgments of the 2007 estimate, analysts from across the intelligence community laid out three possible scenarios, each of which could have enormously negative consequences for Iraq: Chaos leading to partition, the emergence of a Shiite strongman who would seize power and rule by dictatorship, or a complete collapse of central control resulting in violent fiefdoms across the country.

The official said the new estimate "highlighted a trend of deterioration that is not irreversible. But if it's not reversed soon, then we're heading toward a worsening security situation over the next 12 to 18 months. It's more of a main judgment than we were able to give in 2004, if significantly caveated."

Robert Hutchings, who until 2004 was the chairman of the National Intelligence Council, which produced the earlier assessments, said, "The basic tack on the political, security and economic situation in Iraq has been pretty consistent, before, during and after the war."

Hutchings, who is now a diplomat-in-residence at Princeton University, said a January 2003 estimate, which was done two months before the U.S. invasion of Iraq and which also remains classified, was the first to include the word "insurgency." The 2004 estimate "was the first to use the term 'civil war,' " he said.

Pillar said, "What we saw and see today is a very unfavorable state of affairs and unfavorable trend lines."

The senior intelligence official who agreed to discuss some aspects of both reports said that while the 2004 estimate now seems prescient, analysts failed to predict "the rapid degree of intensification of sectarian mobilization and consciousness, and the speed in which that happened. I don't think we were that insightful."

No Way Out (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON

"Everything you've heard and read is true. And I am deeply sorry about that." Who said it?

(a) George Bush, about the chilling new intelligence report on Iraq.

(b) Joe Biden, about his self-imploding prolixity.

(c) Condi Rice, on her ability to understand Peyton Manning's vulnerabilities better than Nuri Kamal al-Malaki's.

(d) Silvio Berlusconi, on his wife's Junoesque lightning bolt after his public flirting.

(e) Jacques Chirac, after giving a Gallic shrug at the prospect of Iran getting un or deux nuclear weapons.

(f) Hillary Clinton, on enabling the president to invade Iraq.

(g) Barack Obama, for the ultimate sin of not being black enough or white enough.

(h) Mary Cheney, on her decision to work on her terrifying dad's homophobic campaign because the thought of John Kerry was "terrifying."

(i) Gavin Newsom, the mayor of San Francisco, about his affair with his campaign manager's wife.

The answer is Gavin Newsom.

It's rare to get a simple apology when a complex obfuscation will do.

Even after releasing parts of an intelligence report so pessimistic that it may as well have been titled "Iraq: We're Cooked," Bush officials clung to their alternate reality, using nonsensical logic and cherry-picking whatever phrases they could find in the report that they could use to sell the Surge.

In the 2004 National Intelligence Estimate, civil war was a worst-case scenario. In the 2007 one, Iraq has zoomed past civil war to hell: "The Intelligence Community judges that the term 'civil war' does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq, which includes extensive Shia-on-Shia violence, Al Qaeda and Sunni insurgent attacks on coalition forces, and widespread criminally motivated violence."

DOJ_NMG_0127700

As John McLaughlin, the former acting director of central intelligence, told The Times's Mark Mazzetti: "Civil war is checkers. This is chess."

Far from Dick Cheney's claim of "enormous successes" and Gen. William Casey's claim of "slow progress," the report shows that any path the U.S. takes in Iraq could lead to a river of blood. It says that in the absence of any strong Sunni and Shiite leaders who can control their groups, prospects are dim for a cohesive government, much less a democracy.

If the violence gets worse, the report concludes, three sulfurous possibilities loom: chaos leading to partition, the emergence of a Shiite strongman or anarchy "mixing extreme ethnosectarian violence with debilitating intragroup clashes."

So after four years of war, we get to choose between chaos, another Saddam or anarchy. Good work, W. And at such bargain prices; the administration is breaking the record for the military budget, asking for $100 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan this year and $145 billion more for 2008.

The White House thinks it can somehow spin the Iraq apocalypse so it sounds as if multiple wars are better than one civil war.

At a Pentagon briefing yesterday, Bob Gates rebuffed the idea of a civil war, saying: "I think that the words 'civil war' oversimplify a very complex situation in Iraq. I believe that there are essentially four wars going on in Iraq. One is Shia on Shia, principally in the south. The second is sectarian conflict, principally in Baghdad but not solely. Third is the insurgency, and fourth is Al Qaeda."

That's a relief, all right — we're in four wars in Iraq and threatening another with Iran.

Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, agreed that the term civil war is unacceptable: "We need to get across the complexities of the situation we face in Iraq ... and simple labels don't do that."

When General Casey testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee on Thursday, he sounded as if he was talking about a completely different Iraq than the one limned in the intelligence report. "Today," he said, "Iraqis are poised to assume responsibility for their own security by the end of 2007, still with some level of support from us."

Compare that with the bleak tone of the report, which states that "the Iraqi Security Forces — particularly the Iraqi police — will be hard-pressed in the next 12 to 18 months to execute significantly increased security responsibilities, and particularly to operate independently against Shia militias with success."

It's official. We're in a cycle of violence so complex and awful that withdrawing American troops will make it worse and keeping American troops there may also make it worse.

We can try or we can leave, but either way, it seems, we're cooked.

Bush To Request Billions For Wars (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz, Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, February 3, 2007

President Bush will ask Congress for close to three-quarters of a trillion dollars in defense spending on Monday, including $245 billion to cover the cost of fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan and other elements of the "global war on terror," senior administration officials said yesterday.

Democrats said the gigantic spending request will precipitate "sticker shock" on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers were already planning to scrutinize White House war-spending requests more zealously.

As expected, Bush will ask Congress for an additional $100 billion for Iraq and Afghanistan for the current fiscal year, to go with the $70 billion already approved. He will also seek an additional $145 billion for the wars in fiscal 2008, which begins Oct. 1, and administration officials warned that even more money probably will be needed.

Those totals come on top of regular spending for the Pentagon, which officials say will be $481 billion in 2008, a 10 percent increase over this year's budget.

If approved by Congress, the new war spending would bring the overall cost of fighting to about $745 billion since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the United States -- adjusting for inflation, more than was spent on the Vietnam War.

DOJ_NMG_0127701

The administration has obtained most of the funding for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan through emergency or supplemental spending bills, which are not subject to the same level of congressional scrutiny as the regular budget. That practice has drawn sharp criticism from lawmakers and members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group.

To answer those critics, White House budget officials say they will offer a much more detailed accounting of the costs of the war than they have previously provided, adding a special chapter to the thick budget books the president plans to send to Congress. But those details could be used by opponents of the war in arguing their case, according to lawmakers and other experts on Pentagon spending. Moreover, some war critics in Congress have served notice that they intend to use the spending bills containing the new money to try to bring the war in Iraq to a close.

"The defense budget request is the sleeper political issue of the year," said John J. Hamre, a former top Pentagon official who is chief executive of the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "When you add the various supplemental requests to the baseline defense budget, you get an astounding number, a number easily exploited by political opponents."

Top House Democrats, gathered yesterday in Williamsburg for a retreat, sounded skeptical about the new defense numbers and said they will not give the president a blank check.

"This is a huge number," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who noted that it includes an "opportunity cost" that would cut into Democrats' ability to fund domestic priorities.

"You can't help but note the irony: The president calls for us to rein in spending but sends us a budget for more than $700 billion in new spending," said House Budget Committee Chairman John M. Spratt Jr. (D-S.C.). "For Republicans who profess to oppose big spending, this will be a budget they will find hard to swallow."

Still, Spratt, Pelosi and other lawmakers did not rule out supporting the request. "We clearly want to make sure our troops have everything they need," said Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.), a member of the House Appropriations Committee.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said in a statement that Democrats pledge to provide U.S. troops with "everything they need to do their jobs" but warned: "It is past time for the President to accurately and appropriately budget for this war and give the American people a full accounting of its true cost."

Though defense spending would see huge increases, the president's budget would allow a 1 percent increase for spending other than on defense, the first time in two years Bush has not sought cuts in government operations outside the Pentagon and homeland security.

Bush's budget also calls for slowing the rapid growth of Medicare, the federal health program for the elderly, by one percentage point. The president proposes to slice $66 billion over five years from previous projections by reducing payments to health-care providers such as hospitals and nursing homes and by charging wealthier seniors higher premiums for prescription-drug coverage.

The president wants to extend tax cuts that were enacted in 2001 and 2003 instead of letting them expire in 2010, as they are scheduled to do, and his budget would prevent the alternative minimum tax from expanding to ensnare millions of additional families next year. But after that, the president's budget would depend on billions of dollars in new revenue because of the rapid growth of the AMT.

That additional revenue -- along with projections for a healthy economy -- would allow Bush to keep his promise that the budget would be balanced by 2012, according to administration estimates, and that there would be a surplus, the first since Bush took office in 2001, despite a significant increase in military spending.

Since the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, Congress has approved about $500 billion for military operations and terrorism-related activities, much of it appropriated as emergency spending. The Iraq Study Group, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton, concluded in December that the public has not been "well-served" by that process and that the funds have received minimal scrutiny from either the White House or the Republican-controlled Congress.

Since Democrats took charge on Capitol Hill last month, they have promised to scrutinize the administration's spending requests more aggressively.

"We're going to be very focused in looking to see whether the funds are being spent wisely or simply going to fatten the pockets of big contractors like Halliburton," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.).

DOJ_NMG_0127702

Vin Weber, a Republican strategist and former congressman, said he has long thought the coming defense bills would be among the most controversial facing the new Congress, which is now considering a nonbinding resolution to condemn Bush's decision to send more troops to Iraq.

Although some members have talked about tying the president's hands through the budget process, others are reluctant to try that for fear of being accused of not supporting the troops. If the situation in Iraq does not improve, however, many Democrats will be under pressure to restrict funding, Weber said.

Whatever happens on the battlefield, Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) predicted, the United States will be paying for the war for years to come.

"There's going to be real sticker shock when we get down to what the truth is about the cost of this war," he said. "It's going to be way beyond what anybody has fessed up to."

Record $622 Billion Budget Requested For The Pentagon (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — The Bush administration is seeking a record military budget of $622 billion for the 2008 fiscal year, Pentagon officials have said. The sum includes more than $140 billion for war-related costs.

The administration is also seeking $93 billion in the current fiscal year, which ends on Sept. 30, to pay for military operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, the officials said.

The requests are part of the annual budget request to Congress for all federal spending programs. The budget is to be made public on Monday, and Congress will revise it in the coming months.

Together with money for combat operations this year already approved by Congress, the new request would push spending related to Iraq and Afghanistan to $163 billion.

“It is the highest level of spending since the height of the Korean War,” said Steven Kosiak, a military budget expert with the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments, a policy analysis organization here.

Mr. Kosiak said that in 1952 the United States spent the equivalent of $645 billion in today’s dollars, factoring in inflation, and that in the Korean War military spending exceeded 13 percent of the gross national product. The figure is now 4 percent.

With Democrats in control of Congress and opposition to the Iraq war running strong, the administration’s request may face even greater scrutiny than it has in recent years. But few if any budget experts expect significant cuts in military spending while large numbers of troops are in combat in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In a statement, the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid of Nevada, said: “Democrats pledge that our troops will receive everything they need to do their jobs. We will also subject this supplemental to the tough and serious oversight that Congress has ignored for four years.”

The regular Pentagon budget request for 2008, which excludes war-related costs but covers Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine costs as well as other spending, will be $481 billion, a Pentagon official said. That would be an increase of $49 billion over what Congress provided this year, Mr. Kosiak said.

“As long as we’re engaged in major military operations, you are probably not going to see decreases in the baseline budget,” he said.

The Pentagon is seeking $128.6 billion for the Army, $110.7 billion for the Air Force and $140 billion for the Navy, department officials said.Background briefings for members of Congress and their staffs have begun. As details leaked out, Pentagon officials agreed to provide an outline of the request. The officials said the budget included no cancellations of major weapons systems, despite delays and escalating costs in procurement accounts in all the services.

The $141 billion request for war-related costs in 2008 represents the first time the administration has tried at the beginning of the budget cycle to provide a total estimate for how much the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and other military operations will cost a year in advance.

Congress has been pressing the administration for several years to provide such estimates. Even as they comply, Pentagon officials emphasized that actual costs could be far different, depending on the course of the wars.

DOJ_NMG_0127703

The budget request, which takes many months to prepare, is being released as the administration is sending an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq.

A spokesman for the Pentagon, Bryan Whitman, said Friday that that the Office of Management and Budget had estimated that the additional forces would cost $5.6 billion in the current fiscal year, which ends in September.

On Thursday, the Congressional Budget Office released its estimate, which said the costs could run much higher.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, at a Pentagon news conference, disputed the office's estimate, saying it greatly overstated the number of support troops that would be necessary to go along with the 21,500 increase in combat forces.

Mr. Gates also said he had recommended that President Bush nominate Adm. Timothy J. Keating of the Navy, now commander of Norad, as commander of the United States Pacific Command, making him the top commander in the Pacific, and Lt. Gen. Gene Reunart of the Air Force to head the Northern Command, which is responsible for defending the continental United States.

Rifts Emerge On Iran Policy (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration's war of words with Iran is sparking divisions within the government over how heavily Tehran actually is involved in fomenting instability in Iraq -- and how aggressive a stance the U.S. should adopt in response.

The White House has steadily ratcheted up its public statements about Iran, with senior officials in both Washington and Baghdad promising to take steps to curb what they portray as Iran's continuing transfers of weapons, money and military trainers to Shiite militants in Iraq. Some U.S. officials have suggested Iran may have played a direct role in a sophisticated attack in the Iraqi city of Karbala in late January that left five Americans dead.

But U.S. opinion about Iran is far from monolithic, and divisions over the country's intentions and activities in Iraq are emerging within the military and the intelligence community. The skeptics are challenging key aspects of the Bush administration's justifications for its hard-line approach toward Iran, making it more difficult for the White House to rally public support.

Those tensions broke into the open with the release Friday of declassified portions of the new National Intelligence Estimate about Iraq, which represents the collective findings of the intelligence community's 16 agencies. The report said Iran is playing only a minimal role in stoking sectarian violence in Iraq, an assessment that runs counter to a string of recent public statements by administration officials accusing Tehran of contributing significantly to Iraq's instability.

While the report said "Iranian lethal support for select groups of Iraqi Shia militants clearly intensifies the conflict in Iraq," it concluded that Iraq's raging sectarian war would continue even if Iran completely ended its involvement.

"The involvement of these outside actors is not likely to be a major driver of violence ... because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics," the report said.

The release came as the administration delayed -- for the second time -- a planned release of military evidence that it says will buttress its claims that Iran is funneling weapons to Iraqi Shiites. National Security Adviser Steve Hadley acknowledged that the administration was concerned about the quality of the evidence that was to be presented.

"The truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts," he said.

The intelligence report issued yesterday, entitled "Prospects for Iraq's Stability: A Challenging Road Ahead," was requested by Congress and runs to 90 pages in its classified form. It presented a bleak assessment of conditions in Iraq, arguing that the "term 'civil war' accurately describes key elements of the Iraq conflict" even though the overall violence there was part of a conflict even more dangerous and complex than a traditional civil war. (See related article1.)

The report's skeptical assessment of Iran's overall role in Iraq echoes what many current and former U.S. officials have been saying for months. While most agree that largely Shiite Iran has been working to expand its influence inside Iraq and its support for fellow Shiites there, they discount the idea that Tehran is a central player in fueling the unrest.

DOJ_NMG_0127704

"There are two main engines of violence: the Sunni jihadists and the Shiite militias that have been in operation since February 2006. Neither of these two cycles of violence was incited by the Iranians," says Wayne White, a member of the Iraq Study Group and a former State Department intelligence analyst. "Whatever the Iranians are doing has to be like 1% of the total problem."

While playing down Iran's influence on Iraq's overall security situation, U.S. intelligence agencies generally agree with the Bush administration's contention that Tehran is funding and supplying munitions to Shiite militias.

Military and intelligence officials say they are particularly concerned by Iran's alleged supplying of shaped charges -- a particularly lethal type of roadside bomb capable of penetrating tanks and armored vehicles. U.S. officials say members of Shiite militias have used those munitions to kill American and British servicemen.

Even here, the evidence remains murky. The Bush administration has long accused Iran of arming Iraq's Shiite fighters, but has never been able to provide clear evidence substantiating the allegations.

On Jan. 24, the U.S. ambassador to Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, said the government would publicly release evidence buttressing the claims "in the coming days." The briefing was delayed without explanation, however, then delayed a second time a few days ago. Mr. Hadley declined to say when it would ultimately take place.

U.S. Can't Prove Iran Link To Iraq Strife (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 3, 2007

Despite pledges to show evidence, officials have repeatedly put off presenting their case.

WASHINGTON — Bush administration officials acknowledged Friday that they had yet to compile evidence strong enough to back up publicly their claims that Iran is fomenting violence against U.S. troops in Iraq.

Administration officials have long complained that Iran was supplying Shiite Muslim militants with lethal explosives and other materiel used to kill U.S. military personnel. But despite several pledges to make the evidence public, the administration has twice postponed the release — most recently, a briefing by military officials scheduled for last Tuesday in Baghdad.

"The truth is, quite frankly, we thought the briefing overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts," national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley said Friday.

The acknowledgment comes amid shifting administration messages on Iran. After several weeks of saber rattling that included a stiff warning by President Bush and the dispatch of two aircraft carrier strike groups to the Persian Gulf, near Iran, the administration has insisted in recent days that it does not want to escalate tensions or to invade Iran.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates seemed to concede Friday that U.S. officials can't say for sure whether the Iranian government is involved in assisting the attacks on U.S. personnel in Iraq.

"I don't know that we know the answer to that question," Gates said.

Earlier this week, U.S. officials acknowledged that they were uncertain about the strength of their evidence and were reluctant to issue potentially questionable data in the wake of the intelligence failures and erroneous assessments that preceded the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

In particular, officials worried about a repetition of former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell's February 2003 U.N. appearance to present the U.S. case against Iraq. In that speech, Powell cited evidence that was later discredited.

In rejecting the case compiled against Iran, senior U.S. officials, including Hadley, Gates and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, confirmed Friday that they were concerned about possible inaccuracies.

"I and Secretary Rice and the national security advisor want to make sure that the briefing that is provided is absolutely accurate and is dominated by facts — serial numbers, technology and so on," Gates told reporters at the Pentagon.

Another reason for the delay, as is often the case when releasing intelligence, was that officials were concerned about inadvertently helping adversaries identify the agents or sources that provided the intelligence, Hadley said.

Hadley also said that the administration sought to delay the release of evidence until after a key intelligence report on Iraq was unveiled, so that Americans could place the evidence in the context of the broader conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0127705

That report, called a National Intelligence Estimate, was issued Friday, concluding that Iraq was deteriorating and faces a bleak future that U.S. efforts may do little to avert.

However, the report tends to downplay the role of Iran and Syria, another target of U.S. criticism, in fomenting sectarian violence, while acknowledging that Iranian involvement "intensifies" the conflict.

"The involvement of these outside actors is not likely to be a major driver of violence or the prospects for stability because of the self-sustaining character of Iraq's internal sectarian dynamics," says the report, compiled by experts from the nation's 16 intelligence agencies.

Few doubt that Iran is working to increase its influence inside Iraq, but many of its beneficiaries have been political groups that also are allied with the United States.

So far, the U.S. government has provided scant evidence that the government of Iran is directly supporting militant Shiite groups.

U.S. military leaders in Iraq have said they have evidence that Iran is behind the supply network of explosives. Military officials have blamed Iran for the increasing casualties caused by the use of "shaped charge" explosive devices that can penetrate armored vehicles.

"What we are trying to do is … counter what the Iranians are doing to our soldiers, their involvement in activities, particularly these explosively formed projectiles that are killing our troops, and we are trying to get them to stop their nuclear enrichment," Gates said.

U.S. officials detained five Iranians in a raid in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil last month, accusing them of planning attacks on Americans.

Gates also acknowledged Friday that there was "a lot of speculation" about involvement by Iranians in the abduction and killings of five U.S. servicemen in Karbala last month. But he refused to say whether an investigation had turned up any evidence that Iranians took part.

"I would just tell you flatly that the investigation is still going on, and the information that I've seen is ambiguous," Gates said. "It's not clear yet."

In a major speech on Iraq last month, Bush accused Iran of "providing material support for attacks on American troops" and vowed to "seek out and destroy" weapon transport networks.

Since then, Air Force officials have said they are planning new missions that could include flights along the Iran-Iraq border aimed at disrupting weapons shipments.

Iranian officials challenged the Americans to produce evidence of their charges, and Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, pledged last week to do so.

The increasingly harsh words from the Bush administration stoked fears of a possible U.S. attack on Iran. In recent days, the White House and top U.S. officials have sought to counter the concern. Gates became the latest administration official to offer such reassurances.

"The president has made clear, the secretary of State has made clear, I've made clear … we are not planning for a war with Iran," Gates said Friday.

maura.reynolds@latimes.com

Times staff writer Julian E. Barnes in Washington contributed to this report.

Defense Secretary Says Carrier Dispatch To Gulf Meant To Dramatize Commitment There (AP)

AP, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Friday that the decision to send a second U.S. carrier to the Persian Gulf region does not mean the United States is planning for a war with Iran.

Gates told Pentagon reporters the U.S. is trying to stem Iranian involvement in ongoing violence by Iraqi insurgents, and said there are continuing concerns about Iran's move toward nuclear power. But he quickly added that the movement of the carrier is to demonstrate that America is committed to the Gulf region.

DOJ_NMG_0127706

He also said that he has not seen any credible proof yet that any Iranians were involved in the ambush last week in Karbala that left five soldiers dead.

'Nobody is planning, we are not planning for a war with Iran,' Gates told reporters at a Defense Department briefing.

The Bush administration has increased pressure on Iran in recent months in response to allegations that Iran has been helping train and provide explosives to extremists fighting U.S. troops in Iraq, and the long-running dispute over Iran's nuclear program.

Besides sending a second carrier task force to the Gulf, U.S. raids inside Iraq have netted Iranian officials and Bush has said that the U.S. will send anti-missile batteries to the region. He has also spoken about breaking up networks the Iranians use to help groups battling U.S. troops.

Defense Secretary: No Plans For War With Iran (CNN)

CNN, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Friday that the United States is "not planning for a war with Iran."

Gates said he was reiterating what President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice have said earlier. The defense chief spoke at a press conference with Gen Peter Pace, chairman of Joint Chiefs of Staff.

But Gates said U.S. forces are "trying to counter" what Iranians are doing to U.S. forces in Iraq.

He said that "explosively formed projectiles" with roots in Iran were killing troops.

Calling the explosives by the acronym EFP, Gates said either the weaponry or the technology for it emanates from Iran. The weapon is more powerful than the roadside bombs that insurgents have used with deadly effectiveness to ambush American convoys in Iraq.

The EFP's increased sophistication allows it to penetrate armored vehicles, posing a greater threat to U.S. troops.

Gates said the U.S. military strategy is involved in "uprooting" the networks providing the EFP material as well as other explosives used to create the roadside bombs.

Referring to the latter explosives, Gates said, "these darn things account for about 70 percent of our casualties."

Pace said the military is "working day and night to disassemble" the networks bringing in explosives and the material to make them and is doing that "without regard to nationality" but to "who our enemies are."

"It is instructive that at least twice in the last month that in going after the networks we have picked up Iranians," Pace said.

When asked whether the government or rogue elements are shipping the material, Gates said, "I don't know that we know the answer to that question."

Military investigators reportedly have been looking into the possibility Iranians or Iranian-trained operatives carried out a January 20 attack on a Karbal military compound in southern Iraq that resulted in the deaths of five U.S. soldiers.

Gates said the investigation is ongoing and information about who was involved is "ambiguous."

Gates All But Rules Out Strike On Iran (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, February 3, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates yesterday all but ruled out military strikes on Iran, declaring "we are not planning for a war with Iran."

Mr. Gates, who has called military action against Iran an absolute last resort, made the denial during a flurry of press and Internet blogger speculation that President Bush is preparing to order strikes against Iran's nuclear facilities.

In announcing a new strategy for Iraq on Jan. 10, the president said U.S. troops would target Iranian agents inside the country who are aiding the deadly insurgency. The administration said Iran is supplying Shi'ite insurgents with powerful improvised explosive devices whose explosions penetrate armor and result in multiple casualties.

Mr. Bush also ordered an increase in the U.S. military presence in the Persian Gulf by deploying Patriot anti-missile batteries and a second aircraft carrier in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0127707

Those twin moves stirred speculation that a war was in the offing. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has threaten to destroy Israel and refuses to stop enriching uranium, as the United Nations has demanded.

Administration officials say the buildup was done to mollify Persian Gulf Arab states who fear attacks from Iran, and to put pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad.

Mr. Gates explained it this way: "What we are trying to do is, in Iraq, counter what the Iranians are doing to our soldiers, their involvement in activities, particularly these explosively formed projectiles that are killing our troops and we are trying to get them to stop their nuclear enrichment. We are doing the latter strictly through the diplomatic process. ... The diplomatic process is working and I think that that's where we are relying."

At the White House, where officials released a new intelligence estimate on the Iraq war's path, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said he has delayed release of a "white paper" detailing Iran's transgressions in Iraq.

Mr. Hadley told reporters the draft paper was "overstated, and we sent it back to get it narrowed and focused on the facts."

Mr. Gates said the briefing is being compiled by the U.S. command in Baghdad. He said Cabinet officials "want to make sure that the briefing that is provided is absolutely accurate and is dominated by facts -- serial numbers, technology and so on."

Kurds Train For Battle With Iran (AP)

By Kathy Gannon, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

Deep in the mountains of eastern Iraq, a cluster of mud huts and the chatter of machine gun fire reveal another piece of the jigsaw puzzle called Kurdistan.

Here, recruits are training to fight Iran, one of the four countries that rule the fractured Kurdish people. And although they belong to an organization officially outlawed as terrorist by Washington, they appear to be operating unhindered either by Iraqi-Kurdish units or the limited U.S. force in Kurdish areas.

A boulder-studded road spirals up through sun-soaked mountains to a pale yellow building that flies the flag of the Kurdistan Workers Party (PKK), condemned as a terrorist organization by the U.S. and its NATO ally, Turkey.

A giant face of Abdullah Ocalan, the PKK founder who is serving a life sentence in Turkey, is painted on the mountainside. Ten miles farther on lies the Qandil range, which runs like a snow-dusted spine along Iraq's northern border with both Turkey and Iran.

In the camp, lugging heavy machine guns and AK-47 assault rifles, are men and women of the Party for a Free Life in Kurdistan, or PEJAK, an offshoot set up by the PKK in 2004 to fight for Kurdish autonomy in Iran.

The PKK and its affiliates are spread through a region of some 35 million Kurds that straddles Turkey, Iraq, Iran and Syria. PEJAK, the newest group, claims to number thousands of recruits, and targets only Iran — a mission which has made PEJAK the subject of intense speculation that it is being used to undermine the radical Islamic regime of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

In the Nov. 27 issue of The New Yorker, investigative reporter Seymour Hersh wrote that PEJAK was receiving support from the U.S. as well as from Israel, which fears Iran's nuclear ambitions and Ahmadinejad's call to wipe the Jewish state off the map.

The State Department Friday declined to comment on the claim of U.S. support for PEJAK.

PEJAK says it regularly launches raids into Iran, and Iran has fired back with artillery. In October the English-language Iran Daily, published by Iran's official news agency, said Iran accused PEJAK of killing dozens of its armed forces in insurgent attacks.

Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), a presidential candidate who claims the White House is overplaying the Iranian threat, last year wrote to President Bush expressing concern that the U.S. was using PEJAK to weaken Ahmadinejad.

James Brandon, an analyst for the U.S.-based Jamestown Foundation, told The Associated Press that PEJAK has refused to discuss its funding sources. But he said its greatest threat to Iran is not military. It has veins running deep into the Iranian Kurdish population and is offering to join forces with other restless minorities in Iran, he said.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said "Israel is not involved in any way in what's going on there."

DOJ_NMG_0127708

Meir Javedanfar, an Israel-based Iran expert, noted however that Israel has a long-standing relationship with Iraqi Kurdish leader Mustafa Barzani and "It would not surprise me to discover that Israel is using the Kurdish areas of Iraq to undermine Iran's influence in Iraq and monitor what's going on along the Iranian border, as well as to undermine the Iranian government itself."

The AP recently spent two winter days at a PEJAK training camp tucked in the shadow of the Qandil Mountains in northern Iraq, listening to its followers describe their goals and operations in Iran.

According to a camp commander, Hussein Afsheen, "PKK gives ideological and logistical support" while funding comes from Iranian Kurds. He said he didn't know of U.S. funding, but would gladly accept it.

The camp is designed to toughen up the new recruits, who numbered 38 during the AP's visit. Beds are single wool blankets spread over a rough concrete floor, or over a narrow steel bench that hugs an icy mud wall. The only heat comes from a wood-fired potbelly stove.

It's still pitch dark and freezing at 5 a.m., when the fighters line up and pledge allegiance to the Kurdish cause.

Soztar Afreen, a 22-year-old Syrian with a quick smile, says she joined five years ago and the first months were tough.

"I had trouble keeping up. You have to toughen yourself. The physical work is difficult but once you get used to it life here gets easier," she said.

She recalled that her parents, PKK sympathizers, sent her off with this plea: "Don't let down the struggle; make us proud."

Gunfire and explosions echo off mountainsides as recruits learn to fire artillery and rocket launchers and automatic rifles. They are taught to lay ambushes and to endure long hours isolated and in hiding.

Food is spartan — potatoes, tomato broth, onions and a lot of bread baked flat in a deep stone oven.

Much time is spent in ideological training and studying Ocalan's vision of a united Kurdistan, which the guerrillas say has gradually shifted from demanding full-blown independence to settling for autonomy as a distinct culture within the various countries where they live.

PEJAK ideology is rigorously leftist and includes equality of the sexes — unusual in this region. The camp has two leaders, a man and a woman.

The male one, Afsheen, is a Turkish Kurd who joined the PKK in 1990, at age 19. He said he enlisted after Turkish soldiers herded him, his family and his neighbors into the town square and burned down their homes.

Four shepherds were coming home and "The soldiers just opened fire on them. I had inside of me a lot of anger. I promised I would get my revenge," said Afsheen.

In training, "Recruits were put in a cave and left there for a month, allowed out only for half an hour each day. We walked for hours in frigid water," he said.

Afsheen said he has made several forays into Iran, including one monthlong trek to the Iranian town of Shahha three months ago, not to attack Iranians but to organize Kurds. "We were discovered. There was a firefight and it went on until dark. We were pinned down, trapped," he said.

"At nightfall we found an opening and we tried to slip out but we were discovered. The firing went on again and they called in their helicopters. One of our friends was wounded and three Iranian security men were killed."

Afsheen's co-leader is Beridon Dersim, who grew up in Austria and found her identity with the PKK.

"What I wanted I couldn't find from Turkey. I couldn't find from Europe. The PKK offered me answers about myself, about my ethnicity."

Dersim, 32, said she wanted to pick up a gun the day she joined the PKK at 17 but it was just before her 20th birthday that she was allowed into the guerrilla ranks.

Unlike Afreen of Syria, she did not have her family's blessing, she says, and her father, a Turkish civil servant, was tortured and left in a wheelchair. She said she has since fought in gunbattles.

The guerrillas vow not to marry or visit their families lest they put them in danger or be distracted from their struggle. Afsheen said he hasn't seen his parents since their village was destroyed 16 years ago. "I was the youngest of nine children, but maybe there are more now. I don't know."

Dersim says her presence encourages Kurdish women but also frightens the men.

DOJ_NMG_0127709

"We go to a village and when we speak they are surprised and they ask us: 'Where do you get such power to do this? How can you speak like this and in front of men?'"

Iran Installs Equipment For Large-Scale Uranium Enrichment (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2 — International nuclear investigators have confirmed that Iran is beginning to install equipment in the large underground chamber in Natanz, the center where Iranian officials have said they will move to industrial-scale enrichment of uranium, according to foreign diplomats and American officials.

Iran said last year that it planned to install 3,000 centrifuges by this spring at Natanz, as a first step toward putting more than 50,000 of the devices in operation to produce nuclear fuel. But the program has been behind schedule, and based on reports from investigators from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the centrifuges are just now beginning to be assembled.

Nonetheless, the move signals a continued defiance of the Untied Nations Security Council, which demanded last summer that Iran suspend all uranium enrichment. At the White House on Friday, the spokesman for the National Security Council said, "This clearly demonstrates that Iran is not moving to meet the U.N.'s mandate."

This weekend, ambassadors from several countries are invited by the Iranians to visit the plant at Isfahan, where Iran produces the uranium gas that is fed into centrifuges for enrichment. American officials dismissed the invitation as a diplomatic stunt, meant to create a false sense of openness about the program.

"Instead of inviting I.A.E.A. ambassadors, Iran should invite I.A.E.A. inspectors," said Gregory L. Schulte, the American ambassador to the atomic agency. "Iran should give them access to all the documents, nuclear facilities and individuals that it has refused to provide access to in the last three years."

He added that a United Nations resolution requires Iran to suspend its nuclear activities. "Suspending them would build confidence," he said. "Showcasing them does not."

In Tehran, Iranian officials said on Friday that President Jacques Chirac of France was speculating when he first said this week that Iran would not pose a big danger if it had one or two nuclear weapons. Mr. Chirac, who later retracted his remarks, also said that if Iran were to launch a nuclear weapon against a country like Israel, it would lead to the immediate destruction of Tehran.

"This is more like a fantasy by Mr. Chirac because the International Atomic Energy Organization and its director have repeatedly said that Iran is not moving in that direction," said a Foreign Ministry spokesman, Mohammad Ali Hosseini, referring to the agency's declarations that it has developed no evidence that Iran is enriching uranium for bomb production. But the agency has also said that Iran never answered a series of questions about suspicious activities that could indicate work on a weapons project. "We have also said that the Islamic Republic of Iran has no plans to have nuclear weapons and that nuclear weapons are religiously banned," he added. "We really hope they talk realistically."

Mr. Hosseini said that Iran was surprised that European leaders had ignored comments by Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, recently that seemed to confirm that Israel possessed nuclear weapons. In a television interview, Mr. Olmert suggested that Iran was "aspiring to have nuclear weapons, as America, France, Israel, Russia."

The Israelis, clearly embarrassed by Mr. Olmert's statement, immediately said his remark was not intended as a confirmation or denial of whether his country possesses the weapons. But Iran has seized on it as evidence of a double standard, saying that European nations should be pressing the Israelis, not the Iranians.

If Iran is preparing to take its enrichment program to the next level, it may be rushing. It currently has a pilot program under way to determine if it can master the process. But so far that project is small and has run into numerous technical problems, according to foreign diplomats who have reviewed reports on its progress.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, had promised an announcement about Iran's latest advances during celebrations that began Thursday for the 28th anniversary of the Islamic Revolution.

DOJ_NMG_0127710

Diplomats in Vienna told The Associated Press that hundreds of technicians and laborers were “working feverishly” at the Natanz facility, near Tehran, over the past week. The news agency said that by Thursday, pipes, wiring, control panels and air-conditioning had been installed — setting the stage for hooking up the centrifuges that spin uranium into enriched levels.

The process can lead to making nuclear fuel for power plants, or for nuclear weapons if the uranium is enriched to higher levels. The United States and some European countries have accused Iran of having a clandestine weapons program, though Iran contends that its program is peaceful.

The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 banning the trade of goods and technology related to Iran’s nuclear program. Mr. Ahmadinejad has repeatedly scoffed at the measure, but in recent weeks he has faced internal public criticism for fanning a confrontation with the West.

Diplomats: Iran Working On Uranium Plant (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 3, 2007

Technical crews have hauled centrifuges into Iran's vast underground Natanz complex and were on the threshold of launching a program that could be used to create nuclear arms, diplomats said Friday.

Hundreds of technicians have been "working feverishly" in recent weeks in the bunker-like hall beneath the desert near the central Iranian city of Natanz, said a diplomat accredited to the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N. nuclear monitor.

By Thursday, they had installed and tested the pipes, wiring, control panels and air conditioning, setting the stage for hooking up the centrifuges that spin uranium into enriched levels.

Iran says it wants to develop enrichment to generate power, with Natanz as the centerpiece of a program first to link 3,000 centrifuges, and then ultimately to expand to 54,000. The United States and other countries fear Tehran will enrich to a higher level than needed for energy and use the material for the fissile core of nuclear warheads.

The recent activity in Natanz increases the tension between Tehran and the world's major powers over the Islamic republic's nuclear program, and will likely spur U.S. efforts to sharpen existing U.N. sanctions on Iran for its defiance of a Security Council demand that it freeze enrichment efforts.

"This work is not necessary for a peaceful nuclear energy program, but is needed to give Iran's leaders the know-how to make highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons," said Matt Boland, spokesman for the U.S. delegation to the IAEA.

A diplomat — one of four who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because the information was confidential — said that with all the support equipment now installed, "everything is done except putting the machines in and hooking them up."

The centrifuges would be placed in "cascades" or series, allowing them to spin and re-spin uranium gas to a required level of enrichment — low for energy, high for the fissile core of nuclear warheads.

Another diplomat said that less critical preparatory work has been going on for weeks inside the Natanz facility — set underground below a barren desert mountain that is spiked with anti-aircraft batteries and radar to protect it from attack.

Even if Tehran successfully installs 3,000 centrifuges, experts estimate it would still take several years for all of them to be running smoothly.

The International Institute for Strategic Studies, a London-based think tank, on Wednesday estimated that Iran was two to three years away from having the capacity to build a nuclear weapon. The head of U.S. national intelligence, John Negroponte, has spoken of a four-year period.

Once enrichment begins, IAEA inspectors want to check to what level the uranium is being processed, and to ensure that none of the material produced is siphoned off. One of the diplomats familiar with the Iran nuclear dossier said the IAEA was negotiating with Iranian officials on details of what it would be allowed to see and control at the underground bunker.

In a further setback to IAEA monitoring attempts, a U.N. official familiar with Tehran's nuclear dossier said Thursday that Iranian officials had turned down a request from agency inspectors to install cameras in key areas of the underground facility.

DOJ_NMG_0127711

In Tehran on Friday, a top Iranian nuclear official — who demanded anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media — disputed that assertion, saying U.N. inspectors had set up cameras in the underground facility. But another U.N. official said Iran had met only some — not all — of the IAEA requests.

Other nations — among them Brazil — also do not allow cameras in their enrichment halls. But unlike Iran, none is under direct scrutiny for possible attempts to make nuclear weapons.

Associated Press writer Ali Akbar Dareini contributed to this report from Tehran.

Chirac's Iran Gaffe Reveals A Strategy: Containment (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, February 3, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 2 — When President Jacques Chirac said this week that he would not be overly worried if Iran obtained a nuclear weapon, he inadvertently said aloud what some policy makers and arms control experts have been whispering: that the world may have to learn to live with a nuclear Iran.

Mr. Chirac quickly retracted his words, and Élysée Palace reaffirmed France's commitment to preventing Iran from becoming a nuclear-weapons state. But in veering from the prepared script and letting the veil of caution fall, he became the first Western leader to imply that containment of a nuclear Iran is preferable to other options, especially war.

"Jacques Chirac said things that many experts are saying around the world, even in the United States," Hubert Védrine, foreign minister from 1997 to 2002, said on LCI television on Friday. "That is to say, that a country that possesses the bomb does not use it and automatically enters the system of deterrence and doesn't take absurd risks."

The logic of the argument goes this way: Iran is making enriched uranium, which can be used either for making electricity or, with additional enrichment, nuclear weapons. If Iran masters that process for military purposes, it may be able to build a bomb or two in the next few years.

Under that thinking, the only realistic goal is to slow down the process as long as possible. But even if Iran has the bomb, it will be subject to the same classic doctrine of nuclear deterrence that restrained the nuclear powers during the cold war.

"There is a growing realization that the international community is failing to stop Iran from acquiring a uranium enrichment capability," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a senior fellow at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. "The U.S. government wouldn't accept it, but it's becoming a fait accompli. Can the next step — a nuclear weapon — be prevented? Chirac skipped over that question and cut to the chase in saying, 'We can live with a nuclear-armed Iran.' "

The Bush administration has made stopping an Iranian bomb the object of an increasingly aggressive policy. But administration officials are concerned that the Iranians have learned from North Korea — which ignored Washington's warnings and detonated a nuclear device last year. Iran, they fear, is on the same path.

So the administration is pressing reluctant European governments to curtail support for exports to Iran and to block transactions and freeze the assets of some Iranian companies. In Iraq, the administration has pursued Iranian agents it believes to be involved in attacks against American and allied forces.

Among the Europeans, there is an overwhelming consensus that the American-led war in Iraq has been a disaster and that Washington's Iran strategy could end in an even more destabilizing military confrontation.

It was Mr. Chirac who led Europe's opposition to the war in Iraq, and in an I-told-you-so speech last month he said that his predictions that the war would spread more chaos, regional instability and terrorism had come true.

